Madame Soavi, a Bolognese dancer whom I had known at Parma and Paris, came to Bologna with her daughter by M. de Marigni. The girl, whose name was Adelaide, was very beautiful, and her natural abilities had been fostered by a careful education.

When Madame Soavi got to Bologna she met her husband whom she had not seen for fifteen years.

“Here is a treasure for you,” said she, shewing him her daughter.

“She’s certainly very pretty, but what am I to do with her? She does not belong to me.”

“Yes she does, as I have given her to you. You must know that she has six thousand francs a year, and that I shall be her cashier till I get her married to a good dancer. I want her to learn character dancing, and to make her appearance on the boards. You must take her out on holidays.”

“What shall I say if people ask me who she is?”

“Say she is your daughter, and that you are certain, because your wife gave her to you.”

“I can’t see that.”

“Ah, you have always stayed at home, and consequently your wits are homely.”

I heard this curious dialogue which made me laugh then, and makes me laugh now as I write it. I offered to help in Adelaide’s education, but Madame Soavi laughed, and said, —

“Fox, you have deceived so many tender pullets, that I don’t like to trust you with this one, for fear of your making her too precocious.”

“I did not think of that, but you are right.”

Adelaide became the wonder of Bologna.

A year after I left the Comte du Barri, brother-in-law of the famous mistress of Louis XV., visited Bologna, and became so amorous of Adelaide that her mother sent her away, fearing he would carry her off.

Du Barri offered her a hundred thousand francs for the girl, but she refused the offer.

I saw Adelaide five years later on the boards of a Venetian theatre. When I went to congratulate her, she said, —

"My mother brought me into the world, and I think she will send me out of it; this dancing is killing me."

In point of fact this delicate flower faded and died after seven years of the severe life to which her mother had exposed her.

Madame Soavi who had not taken the precaution to settle the six thousand francs on herself, lost all in losing Adelaide, and died miserably after having rolled in riches. But, alas! I am not the man to reproach anyone on the score of imprudence.

At Bologna I met the famous Afflisio, who had been discharged from the imperial service and had turned manager. He went from bad to worse, and five or six years later committed forgery, was sent to the galleys, and there died.

I was also impressed by the example of a man of a good family, who had once been rich. This was Count Filomarino. He was living in great misery, deprived of the use of all his limbs by a succession of venereal complaints. I often went to see him to give him a few pieces of money, and to listen to his malevolent talk, for his tongue was the only member that continued active. He was a scoundrel and a slanderer, and writhed under the thought that he could not go to Naples and torment his relations, who were in reality respectable people, but monsters according to his shewing.

Madame Sabatini, the dancer, had returned to Bologna, having made enough money to rest upon her laurels. She married a professor of anatomy, and brought all her wealth to him as a dower. She had with her her sister, who was not rich and had no talents, but was at the same time very agreeable.

At the house I met an abbe, a fine young man of modest appearance. The sister seemed to be deeply in love with him, while he appeared to be grateful and nothing more.

I made some remark to the modest Adonis, and he gave me a very sensible answer. We walked away together, and after telling each other what brought us to Bologna we parted, agreeing to meet again.

The abbe, who was twenty-four or twenty-five years old, was not in orders, and was the only son of a noble family of Novara, which was unfortunately poor as well as noble.

He had a very scanty revenue, and was able to live more cheaply at Bologna than Novara, where everything is dear. Besides, he did not care for his relations; he had no friends, and everybody there was more or less ignorant.

The Abbe de Bolini, as he was called, was a man of tranquil mind, living a peaceful and quiet life above all things. He liked lettered men more than letters, and did not trouble to gain the reputation of a wit. He knew he was not a fool, and when he mixed with learned men he was quite clever enough to be a good listener.

Both temperament and his purse made him temperate in all things, and he had received a sound Christian education. He never talked about religion, but nothing scandalized him. He seldom praised and never blamed.

He was almost entirely indifferent to women, flying from ugly women and blue stockings, and gratifying the passion of pretty ones more out of kindliness than love, for in his heart he considered women as more likely to make a man miserable than happy. I was especially interested in this last characteristic.

We had been friends for three weeks when I took the liberty of asking him how he reconciled his theories with his attachment to Brigida Sabatini.

He supped with her every evening, and she breakfasted with him every morning. When I went to see him, she was either there already or came in before my call was over. She breathed forth love in every glance, while the abbe was kind, but, in spite of his politeness, evidently bored.

Brigida looked well enough, but she was at least ten years older than the abbe. She was very polite to me and did her best to convince me that the abbe was happy in the possession of her heart, and that they both enjoyed the delights of mutual love.

But when I asked him over a bottle of good wine about his affection for Brigida, he sighed, smiled, blushed, looked down, and finally confessed that this connection was the misfortune of his life.

“Misfortune? Does she make you sigh in vain? If so you should leave her, and thus regain your happiness.”

“How can I sigh? I am not in love with her. She is in love with me, and tries to make me her slave.”

"How do you mean?"

"She wants me to marry her, and I promised to do so, partly from weakness, and partly from pity; and now she is in a hurry."

"I daresay; all these elderly girls are in a hurry."

"Every evening she treats me to tears, supplications, and despair. She summons me to keep my promise, and accuses me of deceiving her, so you may imagine that my situation is an unhappy one."

"Have you any obligations towards her?"

"None whatever. She has violated me, so to speak, for all the advances came from her. She has only what her sister gives her from day to day, and if she got married she would not get that."

"Have you got her with child?"

"I have taken good care not to do so, and that's what has irritated her; she calls all my little stratagems detestable treason."

"Nevertheless, you have made up your mind to marry her sooner or later?"

"I'd as soon hang myself. If I got married to her I should be four times as poor as I am now, and all my relations at Novara would laugh at me for bringing home a wife of her age. Besides, she is neither rich nor well born, and at Novara they demand the one or the other."

"Then as a man of honour and as a man of sense, you ought to break with her, and the sooner the better."

"I know, but lacking normal strength what am I to do? If I did not go and sup with her to-night, she would infallibly come after me to see what had happened. I can't lock my door in her face, and I can't tell her to go away."

"No, but neither can go on in this miserable way.

"You must make up your mind, and cut the Gordian knot, like Alexander."

"I haven't his sword."

"I will lend it you."

"What do you mean?"

"Listen to me. You must go and live in another town. She will hardly go after you there, I suppose."

"That is a very good plan, but flight is a difficult matter."

"Difficult? Not at all. Do you promise to do what I tell you, and I will arrange everything quite comfortably. Your mistress will not know anything about it till she misses you at supper."

"I will do whatever you tell me, and I shall never forget your kindness; but Brigida will go mad with grief."

"Well my first order to you is not to give her grief a single thought. You have only to leave everything to me. Would you like to start to-morrow?"

"To-morrow?"

"Yes. Have you any debts?"

"No."

"Do you want any money?"

"I have sufficient. But the idea of leaving tomorrow has taken my breath away. I must have three days delay."

"Why so?"

"I expect some letters the day after to-morrow, and I must write to my relations to tell them where I am going."

"I will take charge of your letters and send them on to you."

"Where shall I be?"

"I will tell you at the moment of your departure; trust in me. I will send you at once where you will be comfortable. All you have to do is to leave your trunk in the hands of your landlord, with orders not to give it up to anyone but myself."

"Very good. I am to go without my trunk, then."

"Yes. You must dine with me every day till you go, and mind not to tell anyone whatsoever that you intend leaving Bologna."

"I will take care not to do so."

The worthy young fellow looked quite radiant. I embraced him and thanked him for putting so much trust in me.

I felt proud at the good work I was about to perform, and smiled at the thought of Brigida's anger when she found that her lover had escaped. I wrote to my good friend Dandolo that in five or six days a young abbe would present himself before him bearing a letter from myself. I begged Dandolo to get him a comfortable and cheap lodging, as my friend was so unfortunate as to be indifferently provided with money, though an excellent man. I then wrote the letter of which the abbe was to be the bearer.

Next day Bolini told me that Brigida was far from suspecting his flight, as owing to his gaiety at the thought of freedom he had contented her so well during the night she had passed with him that she thought him as much in love as she was.

"She has all my linen," he added, "but I hope to get a good part of it back under one pretext or another, and she is welcome to the rest."

On the day appointed he called on me as we had arranged the night before, carrying a huge carpet bag containing necessaries. I took him to Modena in a post chaise, and there we dined; afterward I gave him a letter for M. Dandolo, promising to send on his trunk the next day.

He was delighted to hear that Venice was his destination, as he had long wished to go there, and I promised him that M. Dandolo should see that he lived as comfortably and cheaply as he had done at Bologna.

I saw him off, and returned to Bologna. The trunk I dispatched after him the following day.

As I had expected, the poor victim appeared before me all in tears the next day. I felt it my duty to pity her; it would have been cruel to pretend I did not know the reason for her despair. I gave her a long but kindly sermon, endeavouring to persuade her that I had acted for the best in preventing the abbe marrying her, as such a step would have plunged them both into misery.

The poor woman threw herself weeping at my feet, begging me to bring her abbe back, and swearing by all the saints that she would never mention the word "marriage" again. By way of calming her, I said I would do my best to win him over.

She asked where he was, and I said at Venice; but of course she did not believe me. There are circumstances when a clever man deceives by telling the truth, and such a lie as this must be approved by the most rigorous moralists.

Twenty-seven months later I met Bolini at Venice. I shall describe the meeting in its proper place.

A few days after he had gone, I made the acquaintance of the fair Viscioletta, and fell so ardently in love with her that I had to make up my mind to buy her with hard cash. The time when I could make women fall in love with me was no more, and I had to make up my mind either to do without them or to buy them.

I cannot help laughing when people ask me for advice, as I feel so certain that my advice will not be taken. Man is an animal that has to learn his lesson by hard experience in battling with the storms of life. Thus the world is always in disorder and always ignorant, for those who know are always in an infinitesimal proportion to the whole.

Madame Viscioletta, whom I went to see every day, treated me as the Florentine widow had done, though the widow required forms and ceremonies which I could dispense with in the presence of the fair Viscioletta, who was nothing else than a professional courtezan, though she called herself a virtuosa.

I had besieged her for three weeks without any success, and when I made any attempts she repulsed me laughingly.

Monsignor Buoncompagni, the vice-legate, was her lover in secret, though all the town knew it, but this sort of conventional secrecy is common enough in Italy. As as ecclesiastic he could not court her openly, but the hussy made no mystery whatever of his visits.

Being in need of money, and preferring to get rid of my carriage than of anything else, I announced it for sale at the price of three hundred and fifty Roman crowns. It was a comfortable and handsome carriage, and was well worth the price. I was told that the vice-legate offered three hundred crowns, and I felt a real pleasure in contradicting my favoured rival’s desires. I told the man that I had stated my price and meant to adhere to it, as I was not accustomed to bargaining.

I went to see my carriage at noon one day to make sure that it was in good condition, and met the vice-legate who knew me from meeting me at the legate's, and must have been aware that I was poaching on his preserves. He told me rudely that the carriage was not worth more than three hundred crowns, and that I ought to be glad of the opportunity of getting rid of it, as it was much too good for me.

I had the strength of mind to despise his violence, and telling him dryly that I did not chaffer I turned my back on him and went my way.

Next day the fair Viscioletta wrote me a note to the effect that she would be very much obliged if I would let the vice-legate have the carriage at his own price, as she felt sure he would give it to her. I replied that I would call on her in the afternoon, and that my answer would depend on my welcome, I went in due course, and after a lively discussion, she gave way, and I signified my willingness to sell the carriage for the sum offered by the vice-legate.

The next day she had her carriage, and I had my three hundred crowns, and I let the proud prelate understand that I had avenged myself for his rudeness.

About this time Severini succeeded in obtaining a position as tutor in an illustrious Neapolitan family, and as soon as he received his journey-money he left Bologna. I also had thoughts of leaving the town.

I had kept up an interesting correspondence with M. Zaguri, who had made up his mind to obtain my recall in concert with Dandolo, who desired nothing better. Zaguri told me that if I wanted to obtain my pardon I must come and live as near as possible to the Venetian borders, so that the State Inquisitors might satisfy themselves of my good conduct. M. Zuliani, brother to the Duchess of Fiano, gave me the same advice, and promised to use all his interest in my behalf.

With the idea of following this counsel I decided to set up my abode at Trieste, where M. Zaguri told me he had an intimate friend to whom he would give me a letter of introduction. As I could not go by land without passing through the States of Venice I resolved to go to Ancona, whence boats sail to Trieste every day. As I should pass through Pesaro I asked my patron to give me a letter for the Marquis Mosca, a distinguished man of letters whom I had long wished to know. Just then he was a good deal talked about on account of a treatise on alms which he had recently published, and which the Roman curia had placed on the "Index."

The marquis was a devotee as well as a man of learning, and was imbued with the doctrine of St. Augustine, which becomes Jansenism if pushed to an extreme point.

I was sorry to leave Bologna, for I had spent eight pleasant months there. In two days I arrived at Pesaro in perfect health and well provided for in every way.

I left my letter with the marquis, and he came to see me the same day. He said his house would always be open to me, and that he would leave me in his wife's hands to be introduced to everybody and everything in the place. He ended by asking me to dine with him the following day, adding that if I cared to examine his library he could give me an excellent cup of chocolate.

I went, and saw an enormous collection of comments on the Latin poets from Ennius to the poets of the twelfth century of our era. He had had them all printed at his own expense and at his private press, in four tall folios, very accurately printed but without elegance. I told him my opinion, and he agreed that I was right.

The want of elegance which had spared him an outlay of a hundred thousand francs had deprived him of a profit of three hundred thousand.

He presented me with a copy, which he sent to my inn, with an immense folio volume entitled "Marmora Pisaurentia," which I had no time to examine.

I was much pleased with the marchioness, who had three daughters and two sons, all good-looking and well bred.

The marchioness was a woman of the world, while her husband's interests were confined to his books. This difference in disposition sometimes gave rise to a slight element of discord, but a stranger would never have noticed it if he had not been told.

Fifty years ago a wise man said to me: "Every family is troubled by some small tragedy, which should be kept private with the greatest care. In fine, people should learn to wash their dirty linen in private."

The marchioness paid me great attention during the five days I spent at Pesaro. In the day she drove me from one country house to another, and at night she introduced me to all the nobility of the town.

The marquis might have been fifty then. He was cold by temperament, had no other passion but that of study, and his morals were pure. He had founded an academy of which he was the president. Its design was a fly, in allusion to his name Mosca, with the words 'de me ce', that is to say, take away 'c' from 'musca' and you have 'musa'.

His only failing was that which the monks regard as his finest quality, he was religious to excess, and this excess of religion went beyond the bounds where 'nequit consistere rectum'.

But which is the better, to go beyond these bounds, or not to come up to them? I cannot venture to decide the question. Horace says, — and it is the beginning of an ode in which he condemns philosophy for estranging him from religion.

Excess of every kind is bad.

I left Pesaro delighted with the good company I had met, and only sorry I had not seen the marquis's brother who was praised by everyone.

CHAPTER XX

A Jew Named Mardocheus Becomes My Travelling Companion —

He Persuades Me to Lodge in His House — I Fall in Love With His Daughter Leah — After a Stay of Six Weeks I Go to Trieste

Some time elapsed before I had time to examine the Marquis of Mosca's collection of Latin poets, amongst which the 'Priapeia' found no place.

No doubt this work bore witness to his love for literature but not to his learning, for there was nothing of his own in it. All he had done was to classify each fragment in chronological order. I should have liked to see notes, comments, explanations, and such like; but there was nothing of the kind. Besides, the type was not elegant, the margins were poor, the paper common, and misprints not infrequent. All these are bad faults, especially in a work which should have become a classic. Consequently, the book was not a profitable one; and as the marquis was not a rich man he was occasionally reproached by his wife for the money he had expended.

I read his treatise on almsgiving and his apology for it, and understood a good deal of the marquis's way of thinking. I could easily imagine that his writings must have given great offence at Rome, and that with sounder judgment he would have avoided this danger. Of course the marquis was really in the right, but in theology one is only in the right when Rome says yes.

The marquis was a rigorist, and though he had a tincture of Jansenism he often differed from St. Augustine.

He denied, for instance, that almsgiving could annul the penalty attached to sin, and according to him the only sort of almsgiving which had any merit was that prescribed in the Gospel: "Let not thy right hand know what thy left hand doeth."

He even maintained that he who gave alms sinned unless it was done with the greatest secrecy, for alms given in public are sure to be accompanied by vanity.

It might have been objected that the merit of alms lies in the intention with which they are given. It is quite possible for a good man to slip a piece of money into the palm of some miserable being standing in a public place, and yet this may be done solely with the idea of relieving distress without a thought of the onlookers.

As I wanted to go to Trieste, I might have crossed the gulf by a small boat from Pesaro; a good wind was blowing, and I should have got to Trieste in twelve hours. This was my proper way, for I had nothing to do at Ancona, and it was a hundred miles longer; but I had said I would go by Ancona, and I felt obliged to do so.

I had always a strong tincture of superstition, which has exercised considerable influence on my strange career.

Like Socrates I, too, had a demon to whom I referred my doubtful counsels, doing his will, and obeying blindly when I felt a voice within me telling me to forbear.

A hundred times have I thus followed my genius, and occasionally I have felt inclined to complain that it did not impel me to act against my reason more frequently. Whenever I did so I found that impulse was right and reason wrong, and for all that I have still continued reasoning.

When I arrived at Senegallia, at three stages from Ancona, my vetturino asked me, just as I was going to bed, whether I would allow him to accommodate a Jew who was going to Ancona in the chaise.

My first impulse made me answer sharply that I wanted no one in my chaise, much less a Jew.

The vetturino went out, but a voice said within me, “You must take this’ poor Israelite;” and in spite of my repugnance I called back the man and signified my assent.

“Then you must make up your mind to start at an earlier hour, for it is Friday to-morrow, and you know the Jews are not allowed to travel after sunset.”

“I shall not start a moment earlier than I intended, but you can make your horses travel as quickly as you like.”

He gave me no answer, and went out. The next morning I found my Jew, an honest-looking fellow, in the carriage. The first thing he asked me was why I did not like Jews.

“Because your religion teaches you to hate men of all other religions, especially Christians, and you think you have done a meritorious action when you have deceived us. You do not look upon us as brothers. You are usurious, unmerciful, our enemies, and so I do not like you.”

“You are mistaken, sir. Come with me to our synagogue this evening, and you will hear us pray for all Christians, beginning with our Lord the Pope.”

I could not help bursting into a roar of laughter.

“True,” I replied, “but the prayer comes from the mouth only, and not from the heart. If you do not immediately confess that the Jews would not pray for the Christians if they were the masters, I will fling you out of the chaise.”

Of course I did not carry out this threat, but I completed his confusion by quoting in Hebrew the passages in the Old Testament, where the Jews are bidden to do all possible harm to the Gentiles, whom they were to curse every day.

After this the poor man said no more. When we were going to take our dinner I asked him to sit beside me, but he said his religion would not allow him to do so, and that he would only eat eggs, fruit, and some foiegras sausage he had in his pocket. He only drank water because he was not sure that the wine was unadulterated.

“You stupid fellow,” I exclaimed, “how can you ever be certain of the purity of wine unless you have made it yourself?”

When we were on our way again he said that if I liked to come and stay with him, and to content myself with such dishes as God had not forbidden, he would make me more comfortable than if I went to the inn, and at a cheaper rate.

“Then you let lodgings to Christians?”

“I don’t let lodgings to anybody, but I will make an exception in your case to disabuse you of some of your mistaken notions. I will only ask you six pauls a day, and give you two good meals without wine.”

"Then you must give me fish and wine, I paying for them as extras."

"Certainly; I have a Christian cook, and my wife pays a good deal of attention to the cooking."

"You can give me the foie gras every day, if you will eat it with me."

"I know what you think, but you shall be satisfied."

I got down at the Jew's house, wondering at myself as I did so. However, I knew that if I did not like my accommodation I could leave the next day.

His wife and children were waiting for him, and gave him a joyful welcome in honour of the Sabbath. All servile work was forbidden on this day holy to the Lord; and all over the house, and in the face of all the family, I observed a kind of festal air.

I was welcomed like a brother, and I replied as best I could; but a word from Mardocheus (so he was called) changed their politeness of feeling into a politeness of interest.

Mardocheus shewed me two rooms for me to choose the one which suited me, but liking them both I said I would take the two for another paul a day, with which arrangement he was well enough pleased.

Mardocheus told his wife what we had settled, and she instructed the Christian servant to cook my supper for me.

I had my effects taken upstairs, and then went with Mardocheus to the synagogue.

During the short service the Jews paid no attention to me or to several other Christians who were present. The Jews go to the synagogue to pray, and in this respect I think their conduct worthy of imitation by the Christians.

On leaving the synagogue I went by myself to the Exchange, thinking over the happy time which would never return.

It was in Ancona that I had begun to enjoy life; and when I thought it over, it was quite a shock to find that this was thirty years ago, for thirty years is a long period in a man's life. And yet I felt quite happy, in spite of the tenth lustrum so near at hand for me.

What a difference I found between my youth and my middle age! I could scarcely recognize myself. I was then happy, but now unhappy; then all the world was before me, and the future seemed a gorgeous dream, and now I was obliged to confess that my life had been all in vain. I might live twenty years more, but I felt that the happy time was passed away, and the future seemed all dreary.

I reckoned up my forty-seven years, and saw fortune fly away. This in itself was enough to sadden me, for without the favours of the fickle goddess life was not worth living, for me at all events.

My object, then, was to return to my country; it was as if I struggled to undo all that I had done. All I could hope for was to soften the hardships of the slow but certain passage to the grave.

These are the thoughts of declining years and not of youth. The young man looks only to the present, believes that the sky will always smile upon him, and laughs at philosophy as it vainly preaches of old age, misery, repentance, and, worst of all, abhorred death.

Such were my thoughts twenty-six years ago; what must they be now, when I am all alone, poor, despised, and impotent. They would kill me if I did not resolutely subdue them, for whether for good or ill my heart is still young. Of what use are desires when one can no longer satisfy them? I write to kill ennui, and I take a pleasure in writing. Whether I write sense or nonsense, what matters? I am amused, and that is enough.

Dum mea delectent mala me vel denique fallunt,

Quam sapere.’

When I came back I found Mardocheus at supper with his numerous family, composed of eleven or twelve individuals, and including his mother — an old woman of ninety, who looked very well. I noticed another Jew of middle age; he was the husband of his eldest daughter, who did not strike me as pretty; but the younger daughter, who was destined for a Jew of Pesaro, whom she had never seen, engaged all my attention. I remarked to her that if she had not seen her future husband she could not be in love with him, whereupon she replied in a serious voice that it was not necessary to be in love before one married. The old woman praised the girl for this sentiment, and said she had not been in love with her husband till the first child was born.

I shall call the pretty Jewess Leah, as I have good reasons for not using her real name.

While they were enjoying their meal I sat down beside her and tried to make myself as agreeable as possible, but she would not even look at me.

My supper was excellent, and my bed very comfortable.

The next day my landlord told me that I could give my linen to the maid, and that Leah could get it up for me.

I told him I had relished my supper, but that I should like the foie gras every day as I had a dispensation.

“You shall have some to-morrow, but Leah is the only one of us who eats it.”

“Then Leah must take it with me, and you can tell her that I shall give her some Cyprus wine which is perfectly pure.”

I had no wine, but I went for it the same morning to the Venetian consul, giving him M. Dandolo’s letter.

The consul was a Venetian of the old leaven. He had heard my name, and seemed delighted to make my acquaintance. He was a kind of clown without the paint, fond of a joke, a regular gourmand, and a man of great experience. He sold me some Scopolo and old Cyprus Muscat, but he began to exclaim when he heard where I was lodging, and how I had come there.

“He is rich,” he said, “but he is also a great usurer, and if you borrow money of him he will make you repent it.”

After informing the consul that I should not leave till the end of the month, I went home to dinner, which proved excellent.

The next day I gave out my linen to the maid, and Leah came to ask me how I liked my lace got up.

If Leah had examined me more closely she would have seen that the sight of her magnificent breast, unprotected by any kerchief, had had a remarkable effect on me.

I told her that I left it all to her, and that she could do what she liked with the linen.

“Then it will all come under my hands if you are in no hurry to go.”

“You can make me stay as long as you like,” said I; but she seemed not to hear this declaration.

“Then I will make it for you myself.”

“Then I will give out a double quantity, and we will take it together.”

“I don’t like chocolate.”

“I am sorry to hear that; but you like foie gras?”

“Yes, I do; and from what father tells me I am going to take some with you to-day.”

“I shall be delighted.”

“I suppose you are afraid of being poisoned?”

“Not at all; I only wish we could die together.”

She pretended not to understand, and left me burning with desire. I felt that I must either obtain possession of her or tell her father not to send her into my room any more.

The Turin Jewess had given me some valuable hints as to the conduct of amours with Jewish girls.

My theory was that Leah would be more easily won than she, for at Ancona there was much more liberty than at Turin.

This was a rake’s reasoning, but even rakes are mistaken sometimes.

The dinner that was served to me was very good, though cooked in the Jewish style, and Leah brought in the foie gras and sat down opposite to me with a muslin kerchief over her breast.

The foie gras was excellent, and we washed it down with copious libations of Scopolo, which Leah found very much to her taste.

When the foie gras was finished she got up, but I stopped her, for the dinner was only half over.

“I will stay then,” said she, “but I am afraid my father will object.”

“Very good. Call your master,” I said to the maid who came in at that moment, “I have a word to speak to him.”

“My dear Mardocheus,” I said when he came, “your daughter’s appetite doubles mine, and I shall be much obliged if you will allow her to keep me company whenever we have foie gras.”

“It isn’t to my profit to double your appetite, but if you like to pay double I shall have no objection.”

“Very good, that arrangement will suit me.”

In evidence of my satisfaction I gave him a bottle of Scopolo, which Leah guaranteed pure.

We dined together, and seeing that the wine was making her mirthful I told her that her eyes were inflaming me and that she must let me kiss them.

“My duty obliges me to say nay. No kissing and no touching; we have only got to eat and drink together, and I shall like it as much as you.”

“You are cruel.”

“I am wholly dependent on my father.”

“Shall I ask your father to give you leave to be kind?”

“I don’t think that would be proper, and my father might be offended and not allow me to see you any more.”

“And supposing he told you not to be scrupulous about trifles?”

“Then I should despise him and continue to do my duty.”

So clear a declaration shewed me that if I persevered in this intrigue I might go on for ever without success. I also bethought me that I ran a risk of neglecting my chief business, which would not allow me to stay long in Ancona.

I said nothing more to Leah just then, and when the dessert came in I gave her some Cyprus wine, which she declared was the most delicious nectar she had ever tasted.

I saw that the wine was heating her, and it seemed incredible to me that Bacchus should reign without Venus; but she had a hard head, her blood was hot and her brain cool.

However, I tried to seize her hand and kiss it, but she drew it away, saying pleasantly, —

This witty remark amused me, and it also let me know that she was not exactly a neophyte.

I determined to postpone matters till the next day, and told her not to get me any supper as I was supping with the Venetian consul.

The consul had told me that he did not dine, but that he would always be delighted to see me at supper.

It was midnight when I came home, and everyone was asleep except the maid who let me in. I gave her such a gratuity that she must have wished me to keep late hours for the rest of my stay.

I proceeded to sound her about Leah, but she told me nothing but good. If she was to be believed, Leah was a good girl, always at work, loved by all, and fancy free. The maid could not have praised her better if she had been paid to do so.

In the morning Leah brought the chocolate and sat down on my bed, saying that we should have some fine foie gras, and that she should have all the better appetite for dinner as she had not taken any supper.

“Why didn’t you take any supper?”

“I suppose it was because of your excellent Cyprus wine, to which my father has taken a great liking.”

“Ah! he like it? We will give him some.”

Leah was in a state of undress as before, and the sight of her half-covered spheres drove me to distraction.

“Are you not aware that you have a beautiful breast?” said I.

“I thought all young girls were just the same.”

"Have you no suspicion that the sight is a very pleasant one for me?"

"If that be so, I am very glad, for I have nothing to be ashamed of, for a girl has no call to hide her throat any more than her face, unless she is in grand company."

As she was speaking, Leah looked at a golden heart transfixed with an arrow and set with small diamonds which served me as a shirt stud.

"Do you like the little heart?" said I.

"Very much. Is it pure gold?"

"Certainly, and that being so I think I may offer it to you."

So saying I took it off, but she thanked me politely, and said that a girl who gave nothing must take nothing.

"Take it; I will never ask any favour of you."

"But I should be indebted to you, and that's the reason why I never take anything."

I saw that there was nothing to be done, or rather that it would be necessary to do too much to do anything, and that in any case the best plan would be to give her up.

I put aside all thoughts of violence, which would only anger her or make her laugh at me. I should either have been degraded, or rendered more amorous, and all for nothing. If she had taken offense she would not have come to see me any more, and I should have had nought to complain of. In fine I made up my mind to restrain myself, and indulge no more in amorous talk.

We dined very pleasantly together. The servant brought in some shell-fish, which are forbidden by the Mosaic Law. While the maid was in the room I asked Leah to take some, and she refused indignantly; but directly the girl was gone she took some of her own accord and ate them eagerly, assuring me that it was the first time she had had the pleasure of tasting shellfish.

"This girl," I said to myself, "who breaks the law of her religion with such levity, who likes pleasure and does not conceal it, this is the girl who wants to make me believe that she is insensible to the pleasures of love; that's impossible, though she may not love me. She must have some secret means of satisfying her passions, which in my opinion are very violent. We will see what can be done this evening with the help of a bottle of good Muscat."

However, when the evening came, she said she could not drink or eat anything, as a meal always prevented her sleeping.

The next day she brought me my chocolate, but her beautiful breast was covered with a white kerchief. She sat down on the bed as usual, and I observed in a melancholy manner that she had only covered her breast because I had said I took a pleasure in seeing it.

She replied that she had not thought of anything, and had only put on her kerchief because she had had no time to fasten her stays.

"You are whole right," I said, smilingly, "for if I were to see the whole breast I might not think it beautiful."

She gave no answer, and I finished my chocolate.

I recollected my collection of obscene pictures, and I begged Leah to give me the box, telling her that I would shew her some of the most beautiful breasts in the world.

"I shan't care to see them," said she; but she gave me the box, and sat down on my bed as before.

I took out a picture of a naked woman lying on her back and abusing herself, and covering up the lower part of it I shewed it to Leah.

"But her breast is like any other," said Leah.

"Take away your handkerchief."

"Take it back; it's disgusting. It's well enough done," she added, with a burst of laughter, "but it's no novelty for me."

"No novelty for you?"

"Of course not; every girl does like that before she gets married."

"Then you do it, too?"

"Whenever I want to."

"Do it now."

"A well-bred girl always does it in private."

"And what do you do after?"

"If I am in bed I go to sleep."

"My dear Leah, your sincerity is too much for me. Either be kind or visit me no more."

"You are very weak, I think."

"Yes, because I am strong."

"Then henceforth we shall only meet at dinner. But shew me some more miniatures."

"I have some pictures which you will not like."

"Let me see them."

I gave her Arentin's figures, and was astonished to see how coolly she examined them, passing from one to the other in the most commonplace way.

"Do you think them interesting?" I said.

"Yes, very; they are so natural. But a good girl should not look at such pictures; anyone must be aware that these voluptuous attitudes excite one's emotions."

"I believe you, Leah, and I feel it as much as you. Look here!"

She smiled and took the book away to the window, turning her back towards me without taking any notice of my appeal.

I had to cool down and dress myself, and when the hairdresser arrived Leah went away, saying she would return me my book at dinner.

I was delighted, thinking I was sure of victory either that day or the next, but I was out of my reckoning.

We dined well and drank better. At dessert Leah took the book out of her pocket and set me all on fire by asking me to explain some of the pictures but forbidding all practical demonstration.

I went out impatiently, determined to wait till next morning.

When the cruel Jewess came in the morning she told me that she wanted explanations, but that I must use the pictures and nothing more as a demonstration of my remarks.

“Certainly,” I replied, “but you must answer all my questions as to your sex.”

“I promise to do so, if they arise naturally from the pictures.”

The lesson lasted two hours, and a hundred times did I curse Aretin and my folly in shewing her his designs, for whenever I made the slightest attempt the pitiless woman threatened to leave me. But the information she gave me about her own sex was a perfect torment to me. She told me the most lascivious details, and explained with the utmost minuteness the different external and internal movements which would be developed in the copulations pictured by Aretin. I thought it quite impossible that she could be reasoning from theory alone. She was not troubled by the slightest tincture of modesty, but philosophized on coition as coolly and much more learnedly than Hedvig. I would willingly have given her all I possessed to crown her science by the performance of the great work. She swore it was all pure theory with her, and I thought she must be speaking the truth when she said she wanted to get married to see if her notions were right or wrong. She looked pensive when I told her that the husband destined for her might be unable to discharge his connubial duties more than once a week.

“Do you mean to say,” said she, “that one man is not as good as another?”

“How do you mean?”

“Are not all men able to make love every day, and every hour, just as they eat, drink and sleep every day?”

“No, dear Leah, they that can make love every day are very scarce.”

In my state of chronic irritation I felt much annoyed that there was no decent place at Ancona where a man might appease his passions for his money. I trembled to think that I was in danger of falling really in love with Leah, and I told the consul every day that I was in no hurry to go. I was as foolish as a boy in his calf-love. I pictured Leah as the purest of women, for with strong passions she refused to gratify them. I saw in her a model of virtue; she was all self-restraint and purity, resisting temptation in spite of the fire that consumed her.

Before long the reader will discover how very virtuous Leah was.

After nine or ten days I had recourse to violence, not in deeds but in words. She confessed I was in the right, and said my best plan would be to forbid her to come and see me in the morning. At dinner, according to her, there would be no risk.

I made up my mind to ask her to continue her visits, but to cover her breast and avoid all amorous conversation.

“With all my heart,” she replied, laughing; “but be sure I shall not be the first to break the conditions.”

I felt no inclination to break them either, for three days later I felt weary of the situation, and told the consul I would start on the first opportunity. My passion for Leah was spoiling my appetite, and I thus saw myself deprived of my secondary pleasure without any prospect of gaining my primary enjoyment.

After what I had said to the consul I felt I should be bound to go, and I went to bed calmly enough. But about two o’clock in the morning I had, contrary to my usual habit, to get up and offer sacrifice to Cloacina. I left my room without any candle, as I knew my way well enough about the house.

The temple of the goddess was on the ground floor, but as I had put on my soft slippers, and walked very softly, my footsteps did not make the least noise.

On my way upstairs I saw a light shining through a chink in the door of a room which I knew to be unoccupied. I crept softly up, not dreaming for a moment that Leah could be there at such an hour. But on putting my eye to the chink I found I could see a bed, and on it were Leah and a young man, both stark naked, and occupied in working out Aretin’s postures to the best of their ability. They were whispering to one another, and every four or five minutes I had the pleasure of seeing a new posture. These changes of position gave me a view of all the beauties of Leah, and this pleasure was something to set against my rage in having taken such a profligate creature for a virtuous woman.

Every time they approached the completion of the great work they stopped short, and completed what they were doing with their hands.

When they were doing the Straight Tree, to my mind the most lascivious of them all, Leah behaved like a true Lesbian; for while the young man excited her amorous fury she got hold of his instrument and took it between her lips till the work was complete. I could not doubt that she had swallowed the vital fluid of my fortunate rival.

The Adonis then shewed her the feeble instrument, and Leah seemed to regret what she had done. Before long she began to excite him again; but the fellow looked at his watch, pushed her away, and began to put on his shirt.

Leah seemed angry, and I could see that she reproached him for some time before she began to dress.

When they were nearly clothed I softly returned to my room and looked out of a window commanding the house-door. I had not to wait long before I saw the fortunate lover going out.

I went to bed indignant with Leah; I felt myself degraded. She was no longer virtuous, but a villainous prostitute in my eyes; and I fell to sleep with the firm resolve of driving her from my room the next morning, after shaming her with the story of the scene I had witnessed. But, alas, hasty and angry resolves can seldom withstand a few hours' sleep. As soon as I saw Leah coming in with my chocolate, smiling and gay as usual, I told her quite coolly all the exploits I had seen her executing, laying particular stress on the Straight Tree, and the curious liquid she had swallowed. I ended by saying that I hoped she would give me the next night, both to crown my love and insure my secrecy.

She answered with perfect calm that I had nothing to expect from her as she did not love me, and as for keeping the secret she defied me to disclose it.

“I am sure you would not be guilty of such a disgraceful action,” said she.

With these words she turned her back on me and went out.

I could not help confessing to myself that she was in the right; I could not bring myself to commit such a baseness. She had made me reasonable in a few words:

“I don't love you.” There was no reply to this, and I felt I had no claim on her.

Rather it was she who might complain of me; what right had I to spy over her? I could not accuse her of deceiving me; she was free to do what she liked with herself. My best course was clearly to be silent.

I dressed myself hastily, and went to the Exchange, where I heard that a vessel was sailing for Fiume the same day.

Fiume is just opposite Ancona on the other side of the gulf. From Fiume to Trieste the distance is forty miles, and I decided to go by that route.

I went aboard the ship and took the best place, said good-bye to the consul, paid Mardocheus, and packed my trunks.

Leah heard that I was going the same day, and came and told me that she could not give me back my lace and my silk stockings that day, but that I could have them by the next day.

“Your father,” I replied coolly, “will hand them all over to the Venetian consul, who will send them to me at Trieste.”

Just as I was sitting down to dinner, the captain of the boat came for my luggage with a sailor. I told him he could have my trunk, and that I would bring the rest aboard whenever he liked to go.

When Mardocheus heard where I was going he begged me to take charge of a small box and a letter he wanted to send to a friend.

“I shall be delighted to do you this small service.”

At dinner Leah sat down with me and chattered as usual, without troubling herself about my monosyllabic answers.

I supposed she wished me to credit her with calm confidence and philosophy, while I looked upon it all as brazen impudence.

I hated and despised her. She had inflamed my passions, told me to my face she did not love me, and seemed to claim my respect through it all. Possibly she expected me to be grateful for her remark that she believed me incapable of betraying her to her father.

As she drank my Scopolo she said there were several bottles left, as well as some Muscat.

“I make you a present of it all,” I replied, “it will prime you up for your nocturnal orgies.”

She smiled and said I had had a gratuitous sight of a spectacle which was worth money, and that if I were not going so suddenly she would gladly have given me another opportunity.

This piece of impudence made me want to break the wine bottle on her head. She must have known what I was going to do from the way I took it up, but she did not waver for a moment. This coolness of hers prevented my committing a crime.

I contented myself with saying that she was the most impudent slut I had ever met, and I poured the wine into my glass with a shaking hand, as if that were the purpose for which I had taken up the bottle.

After this scene I got up and went into the next room; nevertheless, in half an hour she came to take coffee with me.

This persistence of hers disgusted me, but I calmed myself by the reflection that her conduct must be dictated by vengeance.

“I should like to help you to pack,” said she.

“And I should like to be left alone,” I replied; and taking her by the arm I led her out of the room and locked the door after her.

We were both of us in the right. Leah had deceived and humiliated me, and I had reason to detest her, while I had discovered her for a monster of hypocrisy and immodesty, and this was good cause for her to dislike me.

Towards evening two sailors came after the rest of the luggage, and thanking my hostess I told Leah to put up my linen, and to give it to her father, who had taken the box of which I was to be the bearer down to the vessel.

We set sail with a fair wind, and I thought never to set face on Leah again. But fate had ordered otherwise.

We had gone twenty miles with a good wind in our quarter, by which we were borne gently from wave to wave, when all of a sudden there fell a dead calm.

These rapid changes are common enough in the Adriatic, especially in the part we were in.

The calm lasted but a short time, and a stiff wind from the west-north-west began to blow, with the result that the sea became very rough, and I was very ill.

At midnight the storm had become dangerous. The captain told me that if we persisted in going in the wind's eye we should be wrecked, and that the only thing to be done was to return to Ancona.

In less than three hours we made the harbour, and the officer of the guard having recognized me kindly allowed me to land.

While I was talking to the officer the sailors took my trunks, and carried them to my old lodgings without waiting to ask my leave.

I was vexed. I wanted to avoid Leah, and I had intended to sleep at the nearest inn. However, there was no help for it. When I arrived the Jew got up, and said he was delighted to see me again.

It was past three o'clock in the morning, and I felt very ill, so I said I would not get up till late, and that I would dine in my bed without any foie gras. I slept ten hours, and when I awoke I felt hungry and rang my bell.

The maid answered and said that she would have the honour of waiting on me, as Leah had a violent headache.

I made no answer, thanking Providence for delivering me from this impudent and dangerous woman.

Having found my dinner rather spare I told the cook to get me a good supper.

The weather was dreadful. The Venetian consul had heard of my return, and not having seen me concluded I was ill, and paid me a two hours' visit. He assured me the storm would last for a week at least. I was very sorry to hear it; in the first place, because I did not want to see any more of Leah, and in the second, because I had not got any money. Luckily I had got valuable effects, so this second consideration did not trouble me much.

As I did not see Leah at supper-time I imagined that she was feigning illness to avoid meeting me, and I felt very much obliged to her on this account. As it appeared, however, I was entirely mistaken in my conjectures.

The next day she came to ask for chocolate in her usual way, but she no longer bore upon her features her old tranquillity of expression.

“I will take coffee, mademoiselle,” I observed; “and as I do not want foie gras any longer, I will take dinner by myself. Consequently, you may tell your father that I shall only pay seven pauls a day. In future I shall only drink Orvieto wine.”

“You have still four bottles of Scopolo and Cyprus.”

“I never take back a present; the wine belongs to you. I shall be obliged by your leaving me alone as much as possible, as your conduct is enough to irritate Socrates, and I am not Socrates. Besides, the very sight of you is disagreeable to me. Your body may be beautiful, but knowing that the soul within is a monster it charms me no longer. You may be very sure that the sailors brought my luggage here without my orders, or else you would never have seen me here again, where I dread being poisoned every day.”

Leah went out without giving me any answer, and I felt certain that after my plain-spoken discourse she would take care not to trouble me again.

Experience had taught me that girls like Leah are not uncommon. I had known specimens at Spa, Genoa, London, and at Venice, but this Jewess was the worst I had ever met.

It was Saturday. When Mardocheus came back from the synagogue he asked me gaily why I had mortified his daughter, as she had declared she had done nothing to offend me.

“I have not mortified her, my dear Mardocheus, or at all events, such was not my intention; but as I have put myself on diet, I shall be eating no more foie gras, and consequently I shall dine by myself, and save three pauls a day.”

“Leah is quite ready to pay me out of her private purse, and she wants to dine with you to assure you against being poisoned, as she informs me that you have expressed that fear.”

“That was only a jest; I am perfectly aware that I am in the house of an honest man. I don’t want your daughter to pay for herself, and to prove that I am not actuated by feelings of economy, you shall dine with me too. To offer to pay for me is an impertinence on her part. In fine, I will either dine by myself and pay you seven pawls a day, or I will pay you thirteen, and have both father and daughter to dine with me.”

The worthy Mardocheus went away, saying that he really could not allow me to dine by myself.

At dinner-time I talked only to Mardocheus, without glancing at Leah or paying any attention to the witty sallies she uttered to attract me. I only drank Orvieto.

At dessert Leah filled my glass with Scopolo, saying that if I did not drink it neither would she.

I replied, without looking at her, that I advised her only to drink water for the future, and that I wanted nothing at her hands.

Mardocheus, who liked wine, laughed and said I was right, and drank for three.

The weather continued bad, and I spent the rest of the day in writing, and after supper I retired and went to sleep.

Suddenly I was aroused by a slight noise.

“Who is there?” said I.

I heard Leah’s voice, whispering in reply,

“’Tis I; I have not come to disturb you, but to justify myself.”

So saying she lay down on the bed, but on the outside of the coverlet.

I was pleased with this extraordinary visit, for my sole desire was for vengeance, and I felt certain of being able to resist all her arts. I therefore told her politely enough that I considered her as already justified and that I should be obliged by her leaving me as I wanted to go to sleep.

“Not before you have heard what I have to say.”

“Go on; I am listening to you.”

Thereupon she began a discourse which I did not interrupt, and which lasted for a good hour.

She spoke very artfully, and after confessing she had done wrong she said that at my age I should have been ready to overlook the follies of a young and passionate girl. According to her it was all weakness, and pardonable at such an age.

“I swear I love you,” said she, “and I would have given you good proof before now if I had not been so unfortunate as to love the young Christian you saw with me, while he does not care for me in the least; indeed I have to pay him.

“In spite of my passion,” she continued, “I have never given him what a girl can give but once. I had not seen him for six months, and it was your fault that I sent for him, for you inflamed me with your pictures and strong wines.”

The end of it all was that I ought to forget everything, and treat her kindly during the few days I was to remain there.

When she finished I did not allow myself to make any objection. I pretended to be convinced, assuring her that I felt I had been in the wrong in letting her see Aretin’s figures, and that I would no longer evince any resentment towards her.

As her explanation did not seem likely to end in the way she wished, she went on talking about the weakness of the flesh, the strength of self-love which often hushes the voice of passion, etc., etc.; her aim being to persuade me that she loved me, and that her refusals had all been given with the idea of making my love the stronger.

No doubt I might have given her a great many answers, but I said nothing. I made up my mind to await the assault that I saw was impending, and then by refusing all her advances I reckoned on abasing her to the uttermost. Nevertheless, she made no motion; her hands were at rest, and she kept her face at a due distance from mine.

At last, tired out with the struggle, she left me pretending to be perfectly satisfied with what she had done.

As soon as she had gone, I congratulated myself on the fact that she had confined herself to verbal persuasion; for if she had gone further she would probably have achieved a complete victory, though we were in the dark.

I must mention that before she left me I had to promise to allow her to make my chocolate as usual.

Early the next morning she came for the stick of chocolate. She was in a complete state of negligee, and came in on tiptoe, though if she chose to look towards the bed she might have seen that I was wide awake.

I marked her artifices and her cunning, and resolved to be equal to all her wiles. When she brought the chocolate I noticed that there were two cups on the tray, and I said, —

“Then it is not true that you don’t like chocolate?”

I noticed that she was now dressed with the utmost decency, while half an hour before she had only her chemise and petticoat her neck being perfectly bare. The more resolved she seemed to gain the victory, the more firmly I was determined to humiliate her, as it appeared to me the only other alternative would have been my shame and dishonour; and this turned me to stone.

In spite of my resolves, Leah renewed the attack at dinner, for, contrary to my orders, she served a magnificent foie gras, telling me that it was for herself, and that if she were poisoned she would die of pleasure; Mardocheus said he should like to die too, and began regaling himself on it with evident relish.

I could not help laughing, and announced my wish to taste the deadly food, and so we all of us were eating it.

“Your resolves are not strong enough to withstand seduction,” said Leah. This remark piqued me, and I answered that she was imprudent to disclose her designs in such a manner, and that she would find my resolves strong enough when the time came.

A faint smile played about her lips.

"Try if you like," I said, "to persuade me to drink some Scopolo or Muscat. I meant to have taken some, but your taunt has turned me to steel. I mean to prove that when I make up my mind I never alter it."

"The strong-minded man never gives way," said Leah, "but the good-hearted man often lets himself be overpersuaded."

"Quite so, and the good-hearted girl refrains from taunting a man for his weakness for her."

I called the maid and told her to go to the Venetian consul's and get me some more Scopolo and Muscat. Leah piqued me once more by saying enthusiastically, —

"I am sure you are the most good-hearted of men as well as the firmest." Mardocheus, who could not make out what we meant, ate, drank, and laughed, and seemed pleased with everything.

In the afternoon I went out to a cafe in spite of the dreadful weather. I thought over Leah and her designs, feeling certain that she would pay me another nocturnal visit and renew the assault in force. I resolved to weaken myself with some common woman, if I could find one at all supportable.

A Greek who had taken me to a disgusting place a few days before, conducted me to another where he introduced me to a painted horror of a woman from whose very sight I fled in terror.

I felt angry that in a town like Ancona a man of some delicacy could not get his money's worth for his money, and went home, supped by myself, and locked the door after me.

The precaution, however, was useless.

A few minutes after I had shut the door, Leah knocked on the pretext that I had forgotten to give her the chocolate.

I opened the door and gave it her, and she begged me not to lock myself in, as she wanted to have an important and final interview.

"You can tell me now what you want to say."

"No, it will take some time, and I should not like to come till everyone is asleep. You have nothing to be afraid of; you are lord of yourself. You can go to bed in peace."

"I have certainly nothing to be afraid of, and to prove it to you I will leave the door open."

I felt more than ever certain of victory, and resolved not to blow out the candles, as my doing so might be interpreted into a confession of fear. Besides, the light would render my triumph and her humiliation more complete. With these thoughts I went to bed.

At eleven o'clock a slight noise told me that my hour had come. I saw Leah enter my room in her chemise and a light petticoat. She locked my door softly, and when I cried, "Well; what do you want with me?" she let her chemise and petticoat drop, and lay down beside me in a state of nature.

I was too much astonished to repulse her.

Leah was sure of victory, and without a word she threw herself upon me, pressing her lips to mine, and depriving me of all my faculties except one.

I utilised a short moment of reflection by concluding that I was a presumptuous fool, and that Leah was a woman with a most extensive knowledge of human nature.

In a second my caress became as ardent as hers, and after kissing her spheres of rose and alabaster I penetrated to the sanctuary of love, which, much to my astonishment, I found to be a virgin citadel.

There was a short silence, and then I said, —

"Dearest Leah, you oblige me to adore you; why did you first inspire me with hate? Are you not come here merely to humiliate me, to obtain an empty victory? If so, I forgive you; but you are in the wrong, for, believe me, enjoyment is sweeter far than vengeance."

"Nay, I have not come to achieve a shameful victory, but to give myself to you without reserve, to render you my conqueror and my king. Prove your love by making me happy, break down the barrier which I kept intact, despite its fragility and my ardour, and if this sacrifice does not convince you of my affection you must be the worst of men."

I had never heard more energetic opinions, and I had never seen a more voluptuous sight. I began the work, and while Leah aided me to the best of her ability, I forced the gate, and on Leah's face I read the most acute pain and pleasure mingled. In the first ecstasy of delight I felt her tremble in every limb.

As for me, my enjoyment was quite new; I was twenty again, but I had the self-restraint of my age, and treated Leah with delicacy, holding her in my arms till three o'clock in the morning. When I left her she was inundated and exhausted with pleasure, while I could do no more.

She left me full of gratitude, carrying the soaking linen away with her. I slept on till twelve o'clock.

When I awoke and saw her standing by my bedside with the gentle love of the day after the wedding, the idea of my approaching departure saddened me. I told her so, and she begged me to stay on as long as I could. I repeated that we would arrange everything when we met again at night.

We had a delicious dinner, for Mardocheus was bent on convincing me that he was no miser.

I spent the afternoon with the consul, and arranged that I should go on a Neapolitan man-of-war which was in quarantine at the time, and was to sail for Trieste.

As I should be obliged to pass another month at Ancona, I blessed the storm that had driven me back.

I gave the consul the gold snuff-box with which the Elector of Cologne had presented me, keeping the portrait as a memento. Three days later he handed me forty gold sequins, which was ample for my needs.

My stay in Ancona was costing me dear; but when I told Mardocheus that I should not be going for another month he declared he would no longer feed at my expense. Of course I did not insist. Leah still dined with me.

It has always been my opinion, though perhaps I may be mistaken, that the Jew was perfectly well aware of my relations with his daughter. Jews are usually very liberal on this article, possibly because they count on the child being an Israelite.

I took care that my dear Leah should have no reason to repent of our connection. How grateful and affectionate she was when I told her that I meant to stay another month! How she blessed the bad weather which had driven me back. We slept together every night, not excepting those nights forbidden by the laws of Moses.

I gave her the little gold heart, which might be worth ten sequins, but that would be no reward for the care she had taken of my linen. She also made me accept some splendid Indian handkerchiefs. Six years later I met her again at Pesaro.

I left Ancona on November 14th, and on the 15th I was at Trieste.

CHAPTER XXI

Pittoni — Zaguri — The Procurator Morosini — The Venetian Consul — Gorice — The French Consul — Madame Leo — My Devotion to The State Inquisitors — Strasoldo — Madame Cragnoline — General Burghausen

The landlord asked me my name, we made our agreement, and I found myself very comfortably lodged. Next day I went to the post-office and found several letters which had been awaiting me for the last month. I opened one from M. Dandolo, and found an open enclosure from the patrician Marco Dona, addressed to Baron Pittoni, Chief of Police. On reading it, I found I was very warmly commended to the baron. I hastened to call on him, and gave him the letter, which he took but did not read. He told me that M. Donna had written to him about me, and that he would be delighted to do anything in his power for me.

I then took Mardocheus's letter to his friend Moses Levi. I had not the slightest idea that the letter had any reference to myself, so I gave it to the first clerk that I saw in the office.

Levi was an honest and an agreeable man, and the next day he called on me and offered me his services in the most cordial manner. He shewed me the letter I had delivered, and I was delighted to find that it referred to myself. The worthy Mardocheus begged him to give me a hundred sequins in case I needed any money, adding that any politeness shewn to me would be as if shewn to himself.

This behaviour on the part of Mardocheus filled me with gratitude, and reconciled me, so to speak, with the whole Jewish nation. I wrote him a letter of thanks, offering to serve him at Venice in any way I could.

I could not help comparing the cordiality of Levi's welcome with the formal and ceremonious reception of Baron Pittoni. The baron was ten or twelve years younger than I. He was a man of parts, and quite devoid of prejudice.

A sworn foe of ‘meum and tuum’, and wholly incapable of economy, he left the whole care of his house to his valet, who robbed him, but the baron knew it and made no objection. He was a determined bachelor, a gallant, and the friend and patron of libertines. His chief defect was his forgetfulness and absence of mind, which made him mismanage important business.

He was reputed, though wrongly, to be a liar. A liar is a person who tells falsehoods intentionally, while if Pittoni told lies it was because he had forgotten the truth. We became good friends in the course of a month, and we have remained friends to this day.

I wrote to my friends at Venice, announcing my arrival at Trieste, and for the next ten days I kept my room, busied in putting together the notes I had made on Polish events since the death of Elizabeth Petrovna. I meant to write a history of the troubles of unhappy Poland up to its dismemberment, which was taking place at the epoch in which I was writing.

I had foreseen all this when the Polish Diet recognized the dying czarina as Empress of all the Russians, and the Elector of Brandenburg as King of Prussia, and I proceeded with my history; but only the first three volumes were published, owing to the printers breaking the agreement.

The four last volumes will be found in manuscript after my death, and anyone who likes may publish them. But I have become indifferent to all this as to many other matters since I have seen Folly crowned king of the earth.

To-day there is no such country as Poland, but it might still be in existence if it had not been for the ambition of the Czartoryski family, whose pride had been humiliated by Count Bruhl, the prime minister. To gain vengeance Prince Augustus Czartoryski ruined his country. He was so blinded by passion that he forgot that all actions have their inevitable results.

Czartoryski had determined not only to exclude the House of Saxony from the succession, but to dethrone the member of that family who was reigning. To do this the help of the Czarina and of the Elector of Brandenburg was necessary, so he made the Polish Diet acknowledge the one as Empress of all the Russians, and the other as King of Prussia. The two sovereigns would not treat with the Polish Commonwealth till this claim had been satisfied; but the Commonwealth should never have granted these titles, for Poland itself possessed most of the Russias, and was the true sovereign of Prussia, the Elector of Brandenburg being only Duke of Prussia in reality.

Prince Czartoryski, blinded by the desire of vengeance, persuaded the Diet that to give the two sovereigns these titles would be merely a form, and that they would never become anything more than honorary. This might be so, but if Poland had possessed far-seeing statesmen they would have guessed that an honorary title would end in the usurpation of the whole country.

The Russian palatin had the pleasure of seeing his nephew Stanislas Poniatowski on the throne.

I myself told him that these titles gave a right, and that the promise not to make any use of them was a mere delusion. I added jokingly — for I was obliged to adopt a humorous tone — that before long Europe would take pity on Poland, which had to bear the heavy weight of all the Russias and the kingdom of Prussia as well, and the Commonwealth would find itself relieved of all these charges.

My prophecy has been fulfilled. The two princes whose titles were allowed have torn Poland limb from limb; it is now absorbed in Russia and Prussia.

The second great mistake made by Poland was in not remembering the apologue of the man and the horse when the question of protection presented itself.

The Republic of Rome became mistress of the world by protecting other nations.

Thus Poland came to ruin through ambition, vengeance, and folly — but folly most of all.

The same reason lay at the root of the French Revolution. Louis XVI. paid the penalty of his folly with his life. If he had been a wise ruler he would still be on the throne, and France would have escaped the fury of the Revolutionists. France is sick; in any other country this sickness might be remedied, but I would not wonder if it proved incurable in France.

Certain emotional persons are moved to pity by the emigrant French nobles, but for my part I think them only worthy of contempt. Instead of parading their pride and their disgrace before the eyes of foreign nations, they should have rallied round their king, and either have saved the throne or died under its ruins. What will become of France? It was hard to say; but it is certain that a body without a head cannot live very long, for reason is situate in the head.

On December 1st Baron Pittoni begged me to call on him as some one had come from Venice on purpose to see me.

I dressed myself hastily, and went to the baron's, where I saw a fine-looking man of thirty-five or forty, elegantly dressed. He looked at me with the liveliest interest.

"My heart tells me," I began, "that your excellence's name is Zaguri?"

"Exactly so, my dear Casanova. As soon as my friend Dandolo told me of your arrival here, I determined to come and congratulate you on your approaching recall, which will take place either this year or the next, as I hope to see two friends of mine made Inquisitors. You may judge of my friendship for you when I tell you that I am an 'avogador', and that there is a law forbidding such to leave Venice. We will spend to-day and to-morrow together."

I replied in a manner to convince him that I was sensible of the honour he had done me; and I heard Baron Pittoni begging me to excuse him for not having come to see me. He said he had forgotten all about it, and a handsome old man begged his excellence to ask me to dine with him, though he had not the pleasure of knowing me.

"What!" said Zaguri. "Casanova has been here for the last ten days, and does not know the Venetian consul?"

I hastened to speak.

"It's my own fault," I observed, "I did not like calling on this gentleman, for fear he might think me contraband."

The consul answered wittily that I was not contraband but in quarantine, pending my return to my native land; and that in the meanwhile his house would always be open to me, as had been the house of the Venetian consul at Ancona.

In this manner he let me know that he knew something about me, and I was not at all sorry for it.

Marco Monti, such was the consul's name, was a man of parts and much experience; a pleasant companion and a great conversationalist, fond of telling amusing stories with a grave face — in fact, most excellent company.

I was something of a 'conteur' myself, and we soon became friendly rivals in telling anecdotes. In spite of his thirty additional years I was a tolerable match for him, and when we were in a room there was no question of gaining to kill the time.

We became fast friends, and I benefited a good deal by his offices during the two years I spent in Trieste, and I have always thought that he had a considerable share in obtaining my recall. That was my great object in those days; I was a victim to nostalgia, or home sickness.

With the Swiss and the Sclavs it is really a fatal disease, which carries them off if they are not sent home immediately. Germans are subject to this weakness also; whilst the French suffer very little, and Italians not much more from the complaint.

No rule, however, lacks its exception, and I was one. I daresay I should have got over my nostalgia if I had treated it with contempt, and then I should not have wasted ten years of my life in the bosom of my cruel stepmother Venice.

I dined with M. Zaguri at the consul's, and I was invited to dine with the governor, Count Auersperg, the next day.

The visit from a Venetian 'avogador' made me a person of great consideration. I was no longer looked upon as an exile, but as one who had successfully escaped from illegal confinement.

The day after I accompanied M. Zaguri to Gorice, where he stayed three days to enjoy the hospitality of the nobility. I was included in all their invitations, and I saw that a stranger could live very pleasantly at Gorice.

I met there a certain Count Cobenzl, who may be alive now — a man of wisdom, generosity, and the vastest learning, and yet without any kind of pretention. He gave a State dinner to M. Zaguri, and I had the pleasure of meeting there three or four most charming ladies. I also met Count Tomes, a Spaniard whose father was in in the Austrian service. He had married at sixty, and had five children all as ugly as himself. His daughter was a charming girl in spite of her plainness; she evidently got her character from the mother's side. The eldest son, who was ugly and squinted, was a kind of pleasant madman, but he was also a liar, a profligate, a boaster, and totally devoid of discretion. In spite of these defects he was much sought after in society as he told a good tale and made people laugh. If he had been a student, he would have been a distinguished scholar, as his memory was prodigious. He it was who vainly guaranteed the agreement I made with Valerio Valeri for printing my "History of Poland." I also met at Gorice a Count Coronini, who was known in learned circles as the author of some Latin treatises on diplomacy. Nobody read his books, but everybody agreed that he was a very learned man.

I also met a young man named Morelli, who had written a history of the place and was on the point of publishing the first volume. He gave me his MS. begging me to make any corrections that struck me as desirable. I succeeded in pleasing him, as I gave him back his work without a single note or alteration of any kind, and thus he became my friend.

I became a great friend of Count Francis Charles Coronini, who was a man of talents. He had married a Belgian lady, but not being able to agree they had separated and he passed his time in trifling intrigues, hunting, and reading the papers, literary and political. He laughed at those sages who declared that there was not one really happy person in the world, and he supported his denial by the unanswerable dictum:

"I myself am perfectly happy."

However, as he died of a tumor in the head at the age of thirty-five, he probably acknowledged his mistake in the agonies of death.

There is no such thing as a perfectly happy or perfectly unhappy man in the world. One has more happiness in his life and another more unhappiness, and the same circumstance may produce widely different effects on individuals of different temperaments.

It is not a fact that virtue ensures happiness for the exercise of some virtues implies suffering, and suffering is incompatible with happiness.

My readers may be aware that I am not inclined to make mental pleasure pre-eminent and all sufficing. It may be a fine thing to have a clear conscience, but I cannot see that it would at all relieve the pangs of hunger.

Baron Pittoni and myself escorted Zaguri to the Venetian border, and we then returned to Trieste together.

In three or four days Pittoni took me everywhere, including the club where none but persons of distinction were admitted. This club was held at the inn where I was staying.

Amongst the ladies, the most noteworthy was the wife of the merchant, David Riguelin, who was a Swabian by birth.

Pittoni was in love with her and continued so till her death. His suit lasted for twelve years, and like Petrarch, he still sighed, still hoped, but never succeeded. Her name was Zanetta, and besides her beauty she had the charm of being an exquisite singer and a polished hostess. Still more noteworthy, however, was the unvarying sweetness and equability of her disposition.

I did not want to know her long before recognizing that she was absolutely impregnable. I told Pittoni so, but all in vain; he still fed on empty hope.

Zanetta had very poor health, though no one would have judged so from her appearance, but it was well known to be the case. She died at an early age.

A few days after M. Zaguri’s departure, I had a note from the consul informing me that the Procurator Morosini was stopping in my inn, and advising me to call on him if I knew him.

I was infinitely obliged for this advice, for M. Morosini was a personage of the greatest importance. He had known me from childhood, and the reader may remember that he had presented me to Marshal Richelieu, at Fontainebleau, in 1750.

I dressed myself as if I had been about to speak to a monarch, and sent in a note to his room.

I had not long to wait; he came out and welcomed me most graciously, telling me how delighted he was to see me again.

When he heard the reason of my being at Trieste, and how I desired to return to my country, he assured me he would do all in his power to obtain me my wish. He thanked me for the care I had taken of his nephew at Florence, and kept me all the day while I told him my principal adventures.

He was glad to hear that M. Zaguri was working for me, and said that they must concert the mater together. He commended me warmly to the consul, who was delighted to be able to inform the Tribunal of the consideration with which M. Morosini treated me.

After the procurator had gone I began to enjoy life at Trieste, but in strict moderation and with due regard for economy, for I had only fifteen sequins a month. I abjured play altogether.

Every day I dined with one of the circle of my friends, who were the Venetian consul, the French consul (an eccentric but worthy man who kept a good cook), Pittoni, who kept an excellent table, thanks to his man who knew what was to his own interests, and several others.

As for the pleasures of love I enjoyed them in moderation, taking care of my purse and of my health.

Towards the end of the carnival I went to a masked ball at the theatre, and in the course of the evening a harlequin came up and presented his columbine to me. They both began to play tricks on me. I was pleased with the columbine, and felt a strong desire to be acquainted with her. After some vain researches the French consul, M. de St. Sauveur, told me that the harlequin was a young lady of rank, and that the columbine was a handsome young man.

“If you like,” he added, “I will introduce you to the harlequin’s family, and I am sure you will appreciate her charms when you see her as a girl.”

As they persisted in their jokes I was able, without wounding decency overmuch, to convince myself that the consul was right on the question of sex; and when the ball was over I said I should be obliged by his introducing me as he had promised. He promised to do so the day after Ash Wednesday.

Thus I made the acquaintance of Madame Leo, who was still pretty and agreeable, though she had lived very freely in her younger days. There was her husband, a son, and six daughters, all handsome, but especially the harlequin with whom I was much taken. Naturally I fell in love with her, but as I was her senior by thirty years, and had begun my addresses in a tone of fatherly affection, a feeling of shame prevented my disclosing to her the real state of my heart. Four years later she told me herself that she had guessed my real feelings, and had been amused by my foolish restraint.

A young girl learns deeper lessons from nature than we men can acquire with all our experience.

At the Easter of 1773 Count Auersperg, the Governor of Trieste, was recalled to Vienna, and Count Wagensberg took his place. His eldest daughter, the Countess Lantieri, who was a great beauty, inspired me with a passion which would have made me unhappy if I had not succeeded in hiding it under a veil of the profoundest respect.

I celebrated the accession of the new governor by some verses which I had printed, and in which, while lauding the father, I paid conspicuous homage to the charms of the daughter.

My tribute pleased them, and I became an intimate friend of the count's. He placed confidence in me with the idea of my using it to my own advantage, for though he did not say so openly I divined his intention.

The Venetian consul had told me that he had been vainly endeavouring for the last four years to get the Government of Trieste to arrange for the weekly diligence from Trieste to Mestre to pass by Udine, the capital of the Venetian Friuli.

“This alteration,” he had said, “would greatly benefit the commerce of the two states; but the Municipal Council of Trieste opposes it for a plausible but ridiculous reason.”

These councillors, in the depth of their wisdom, said that if the Venetian Republic desired the alteration it would evidently be to their advantage, and consequently to the disadvantage of Trieste.

The consul assured me that if I could in any way obtain the concession it would weigh strongly in my favour with the State Inquisitors, and even in the event of my non-success he would represent my exertions in the most favourable light.

I promised I would think the matter over.

Finding myself high in the governor's favour, I took the opportunity of addressing myself to him on the subject. He had heard about the matter, and thought the objection of the Town Council absurd and even monstrous; but he professed his inability to do anything himself.

"Councillor Rizzi," said he, "is the most obstinate of them all, and has led astray the rest with his sophisms. But do you send me in a memorandum shewing that the alteration will have a much better effect on the large commerce of Trieste than on the comparatively trifling trade of Udine. I shall send it into the Council without disclosing the authorship, but backing it with my authority, and challenging the opposition to refute your arguments. Finally, if they do not decide reasonably I shall proclaim before them all my intention to send the memoir to Vienna with my opinion on it."

I felt confident of success, and wrote out a memoir full of incontrovertible reasons in favour of the proposed change.

My arguments gained the victory; the Council were persuaded, and Count Wagensberg handed me the decree, which I immediately laid before the Venetian consul. Following his advice, I wrote to the secretary of the Tribunal to the effect that I was happy to have given the Government a proof of my zeal, and an earnest of my desire to be useful to my country and to be worthy of being recalled.

Out of regard for me the count delayed the promulgation of the decree for a week, so that the people of Udine heard the news from Venice before it had reached Trieste, and everybody thought that the Venetian Government had achieved its ends by bribery. The secretary of the Tribunal did not answer my letter, but he wrote to the consul ordering him to give me a hundred ducats, and to inform me that this present was to encourage me to serve the Republic. He added that I might hope great things from the mercy of the Inquisitors if I succeeded in negotiating the Armenian difficulty.

The consul gave me the requisite information, and my impression was that my efforts would be in vain; however, I resolved to make the attempt.

Four Armenian monks had left the Convent of St. Lazarus at Venice, having found the abbot's tyranny unbearable. They had wealthy relations at Constantinople, and laughed the excommunication of their late tyrant to scorn. They sought asylum at Vienna, promising to make themselves useful to the State by establishing an Armenian press to furnish all the Armenian convents with books. They engaged to sink a capital of a million florins if they were allowed to settle in Austria, to found their press, and to buy or build a convent, where they proposed to live in community but without any abbot.

As might be expected the Austrian Government did not hesitate to grant their request; it did more, it gave them special privileges.

The effect of this arrangement would be to deprive Venice of a lucrative trade, and to place it in the emperor's dominions. Consequently the Viennese Court sent them to Trieste with a strong recommendation to the governor, and they had been there for the past six months.

The Venetian Government, of course, wished to entice them back to Venice. They had vainly induced their late abbot to make handsome offers to them, and they then proceeded by indirect means, endeavoring to stir up obstacles in their way, and to disgust them with Trieste.

The consul told me plainly that he had not touched the matter, thinking success to be out of the question; and he predicted that if I attempted it I should find myself in the dilemma of having to solve the insoluble. I felt the force of the consul's remark when I reflected that I could not rely on the governor's assistance, or even speak to him on the subject. I saw that I must not let him suspect my design, for besides his duty to his Government he was a devoted friend to the interests of Trieste, and for this reason a great patron of the monks.

In spite of these obstacles my nostalgia made me make acquaintance with these monks under pretence of inspecting their Armenian types, which they were already casting. In a week or ten days I became quite intimate with them. One day I said that they were bound in honour to return to the obedience of their abbot, if only to annul his sentence of excommunication.

The most obstinate of them told me that the abbot had behaved more like a despot than a father, and had thus absolved them from their obedience. "Besides," he said, "no rascally priest has any right to cut off good Christians from communion with the Saviour, and we are sure that our patriarch will give us absolution and send us some more monks."

I could make no objection to these arguments; however, I asked on another occasion on what conditions they would return to Venice.

The most sensible of them said that in the first place the abbot must withdraw the four hundred thousand ducats which he had entrusted to the Marquis Serpos at four per cent.

This sum was the capital from which the income of the Convent of St. Lazarus was derived. The abbot had no right whatever to dispose of it, even with the consent of a majority among the monks. If the marquis became bankrupt the convent would be utterly destitute. The marquis was an Armenian diamond merchant, and a great friend of the abbot's.

I then asked the monks what were the other conditions, and they replied that these were some matters of discipline which might easily be settled; they would give me a written statement of their grievances as soon as I could assure them that the Marquis Serpos was no longer in possession of their funds.

I embodied my negotiations in writing, and sent the document to the Inquisitors by the consul. In six weeks I received an answer to the effect that the abbot saw his way to arranging the money difficulty, but that he must see a statement of the reforms demanded before doing so. This decided me to have nothing to do with the affair, but a few words from Count Wagensberg made me throw it up without further delay. He gave me to understand that he knew of my attempts to reconcile the four monks with their abbot, and he told me that he had been sorry to hear the report, as my success would do harm to a country where I lived and where I was treated as a friend.

I immediately told him the whole story, assuring him that I would never have begun the negotiation if I had not been certain of failure, for I heard on undoubted authority that Serpos could not possibly restore the four hundred thousand ducats.

This explanation thoroughly dissipated any cloud that might have arisen between us.

The Armenians bought Councillor Rizzi's house for thirty thousand florins. Here they established themselves, and I visited them from time to time without saying anything more about Venice.

Count Wagensberg gave me another proof of his friendship. Unhappily for me he died during the autumn of the same year, at the age of fifty.

One morning he summoned me, and I found him perusing a document he had just received from Vienna. He told me he was sorry I did not read German, but that he would tell me the contents of the paper.

“Here,” he continued, “you will be able to serve your country without in any way injuring Austria.

“I am going to confide in you a State secret (it being understood of course that my name is never to be mentioned) which ought to be greatly to your advantage, whether you succeed or fail; at all hazards your patriotism, your prompt action, and your cleverness in obtaining such information will be made manifest. Remember you must never divulge your sources of information; only tell your Government that you are perfectly sure of the authenticity of the statement you make.

“You must know,” he continued, “that all the commodities we export to Lombardy pass through Venice where they have to pay duty. Such has long been the custom, and it may still be so if the Venetian Government will consent to reduce the duty of four per cent to two per cent.

“A plan has been brought before the notice of the Austrian Court, and it has been eagerly accepted. I have received certain orders on the matter, which I shall put into execution without giving any warning to the Venetian Government.

“In future all goods for Lombardy will be embarked here and disembarked at Mezzola without troubling the Republic. Mezzola is in the territories of the Duke of Modem; a ship can cross the gulf in the night, and our goods will be placed in storehouses, which will be erected.

“In this way we shall shorten the journey and decrease the freights, and the Modenese Government will be satisfied with a trifling sum, barely equivalent to a fourth of what we pay to Venice.

“In spite of all this, I feel sure that if the Venetian Government wrote to the Austrian Council of Commerce expressing their willingness to take two per cent henceforth, the proposal would be accepted, for we Austrians dislike novelties.

"I shall not lay the matter before the Town Council for four or five days, as there is no hurry for us; but you had better make haste, that you may be the first to inform your Government of the matter.

"If everything goes as I should wish I hope to receive an order from Vienna suspending the decree just as I am about to make it public."

Next morning the governor was delighted to hear that everything had been finished before midnight. He assured me that the consul should not have official information before Saturday. In the meanwhile the consul's uneasy state of mind was quite a trouble to me, for I could not do anything to set his mind at ease.

Saturday came and Councillor Rizzi told me the news at the club. He seemed in high spirits over it, and said that the loss of Venice was the gain of Trieste. The consul came in just then, and said that the loss would be a mere trifle for Venice, while the first-shipwreck would cost more to Trieste than ten years' duty. The consul seemed to enjoy the whole thing, but that was the part he had to play. In all small trading towns like Trieste, people make a great account of trifles.

I went to dine with the consul, who privately confessed his doubts and fears on the matter.

I asked him how the Venetians would parry the blow, and he replied, —

"They will have a number of very learned consultations, and then they will do nothing at all, and the Austrians will send their goods wherever they please."

"But the Government is such a wise one."

"Or rather has the reputation of wisdom."

"Then you think it lives on its reputation?"

"Yes; like all your mouldy institutions, they continue to be simply because they have been. Old Governments are like those ancient dykes which are rotten at the base, and only stay in position by their weight and bulk."

The consul was in the right. He wrote to his chief the same day, and in the course of the next week he heard that their excellencies had received information of the matter some time ago by extraordinary channels.

For the present his duties would be confined to sending in any additional information on the same subject.

“I told you so,” said the consul; “now, what do you think of the wisdom of our sages?”

“I think Bedlam of Charenton were their best lodging.”

In three weeks the consul received orders to give me another grant of a hundred ducats, and to allow me ten sequins a month, to encourage me to deserve well of the State.

From that time I felt sure I should be allowed to return in the course of the year, but I was mistaken, for I had to wait till the year following.

This new present, and the monthly payment of ten sequins put me at my ease, for I had expensive tastes of which I could not cure myself. I felt pleased at the thought that I was now in the pay of the Tribunal which had punished me, and which I had defied. It seemed to me a triumph, and I determined to do all in my power for the Republic.

Here I must relate an amusing incident, which delighted everyone in Trieste.

It was in the beginning of summer. I had been eating sardines by the sea-shore, and when I came home at ten o’clock at night I was astonished to be greeted by a girl whom I recognized as Count Strasoldo’s maid.

The count was a handsome young man, but poor like most of that name; he was fond of expensive pleasures, and was consequently heavily in debt. He had a small appointment which brought him in an income of six hundred florins, and he had not the slightest difficulty in spending a year’s pay in three months. He had agreeable manners and a generous disposition, and I had supped with him in company with Baron Pittoni several times. He had a girl in his service who was exquisitely pretty, but none of the count’s friends attempted her as he was very jealous. Like the rest, I had seen and admired her, I had congratulated the count on the possession of such a treasure in her presence, but I had never addressed a word to her.

Strasoldo had just been summoned to Vienna by Count Auersperg who liked him, and had promised to do what he could for him. He had got an employment in Poland, his furniture had been sold, he had taken leave of everyone, and nobody doubted that he would take his pretty maid with him. I thought so too, for I had been to wish him a pleasant journey that morning, and my astonishment at finding the girl in my room may be imagined.

"What do you want, my dear?" I asked.

"Forgive me, sir, but I don't want to go with Strasoldo, and I thought you would protect me. Nobody will be able to guess where I am, and Strasoldo will be obliged to go by himself. You will not be so cruel as to drive me away?"

"No, dearest."

"I promise you I will go away to-morrow, for Strasoldo is going to leave at day-break."

"My lovely Leuzica (this was her name), no one would refuse you an asylum, I least of all. You are safe here, and nobody shall come in without your leave. I am only too happy that you came to me, but if it is true that the count is your lover you may be sure he will not go so easily. He will stay the whole of to-morrow at least, in the hope of finding you again."

"No doubt he will look for me everywhere but here. Will you promise not to make me go with him even if he guesses that I am with you?"

"I swear I will not."

"Then I am satisfied."

"But you will have to share my bed."

"If I shall not inconvenience you, I agree with all my heart."

"You shall see whether you inconvenience me or not. Undress, quick! But where are your things?"

"All that I have is in a small trunk behind the count's carriage, but I don't trouble myself about it."

"The poor count must be raging at this very moment."

"No, for he will not come home till midnight. He is supping with Madame Bissolotti, who is in love with him."

In the meantime Leuzica had undressed and got into bed. In a moment I was beside her, and after the severe regimen of the last eight months I spent a delicious night in her arms, for of late my pleasures had been few.

Leuzica was a perfect beauty, and worthy to be a king’s mistress; and if I had been rich I would have set up a household that I might retain her in my service.

We did not awake till seven o’clock. She got up, and on looking out of the window saw Strasoldo’s carriage waiting at the door.

I confronted her by saying that as long as she liked to stay with me no one could force her away.

I was vexed that I had no closet in my room, as I could not hide her from the waiter who would bring us coffee. We accordingly dispensed with breakfast, but I had to find out some way of feeding her. I thought I had plenty of time before me, but I was wrong.

At ten o’clock I saw Strasoldo and his friend Pittoni coming into the inn. They spoke to the landlord, and seemed to be searching the whole place, passing from one room to another.

I laughed, and told Leuzica that they were looking for her, and that our turn would doubtless come before long.

“Remember your promise,” said she.

“You may be sure of that.”

The tone in which this remark was delivered comforted her, and she exclaimed, —

“Well; well, let them come; they will get nothing by it.”

I heard footsteps approaching, and went out, closing the door behind me, and begging them to excuse my not asking them in, as there was a contraband commodity in my room.

“Only tell me that it is not my maid,” said Strasoldo, in a pitiable voice. “We are sure she is here, as the sentinel at the gate saw her come in at ten o’clock.”

“You are right, the fair Leuzica is at this moment in my room. I have given her my word of honour that no violence shall be used, and you may be sure I shall keep my word.”

"I shall certainly not attempt any violence, but I am sure she would come of her own free will if I could speak to her."

"I will ask her if she wishes to see you. Wait a moment."

Leuzica had been listening to our conversation, and when I opened the door she told me that I could let them in.

As soon as Strasoldo appeared she asked him proudly if she was under any obligations to him, if she had stolen anything from him, and if she was not perfectly free to leave him when she liked.

The poor count replied mildly that on the contrary it was he who owed her a year's wages and had her box in his possession, but that she should not have left him without giving any reason.

"The only reason is that I don't want to go to Vienna," she replied. "I told you so a week ago. If you are an honest man you will leave me my trunk, and as to my wages you can send them to me at my aunt's at Laibach if you haven't got any money now."

I pitied Strasoldo from the bottom of my heart; he prayed and entreated, and finally wept like a child. However, Pittoni roused my choler by saying that I ought to drive the slut out of my room.

"You are not the man to tell me what I ought and what I ought not to do," I replied, "and after I have received her in my apartments you ought to moderate your expressions."

Seeing that I stood on my dignity he laughed, and asked me if I had fallen in love with her in so short a time.

Strasoldo here broke in by saying he was sure she had not slept with me.

"That's where you are mistaken," said she, "for there's only one bed, and I did not sleep on the floor."

They found prayers and reproaches alike useless and left us at noon. Leuzica was profuse in her expressions of gratitude to me.

There was no longer any mystery, so I boldly ordered dinner for two, and promised that she should remain with me till the count had left Trieste.

At three o’clock the Venetian consul came, saying that Count Strasoldo had begged him to use his good offices with me to persuade me to deliver up the fair Leuzica.

“You must speak to the girl herself,” I replied; “she came here and stays here of her own free will.”

When the worthy man had heard the girl’s story he went away, saying that we had the right on our side.

In the evening a porter brought her trunk, and at this she seemed touched but not repentant.

Leuzica supped with me and again shared my couch. The count left Trieste at day-break.

As soon as I was sure that he was gone, I took a carriage and escorted the fair Leuzica two stages on her way to Laibach. We dined together, and I left her in the care of a friend of hers.

Everybody said I had acted properly, and even Pittoni confessed that in my place he would have done the same.

Poor Strasoldo came to a bad end. He got into debt, committed peculation, and had to escape into Turkey and embrace Islam to avoid the penalty of death.

About this time the Venetian general, Palmanova, accompanied by the procurator Erizzo, came to Trieste to visit the governor, Count Wagensberg. In the afternoon the count presented me to the patricians who seemed astonished to see me at Trieste.

The procurator asked me if I amused myself as well as I had done at Paris sixteen years ago, and I told him that sixteen years more, and a hundred thousand francs less, forced me to live in a different fashion. While we were talking, the consul came in to announce that the felucca was ready. Madame de Lantieri as well as her father pressed me to join the party.

I gave a bow, which might mean either no or yes, and asked the consul what the party was. He told me that they were going to see a Venetian man-of-war at anchor in the harbor; his excellence there being the captain I immediately turned to the countess and smilingly professed my regret that I was unable to set foot on Venetian soil.

Everybody exclaimed at me, —

“You have nothing to fear. You are with honest people. Your suspicion is quite offensive.”

“That is all very fine, ladies and gentlemen, and I will come with all my heart, if your excellences will assure me that my joining this little party will not be known to the State Inquisitors possibly by to-morrow.”

This was enough. Everybody looked at me in silence, and no objections could be found to my argument.

The captain of the vessel, who did not know me, spoke a few whispered words to the others, and then they left.

The next day the consul told me that the captain had praised my prudence in declining to go on board, as if anyone had chanced to tell him my name and my case whilst I was on his ship, it would have been his duty to detain me.

When I told the governor of this remark he replied gravely that he should not have allowed the ship to leave the harbour.

I saw the procurator Erizzo the same evening, and he congratulated me on my discretion, telling me he would take care to let the Tribunal know how I respected its decisions.

About this time I had the pleasure of seeing a beautiful Venetian, who visited Trieste with several of her admirers. She was of the noble family of Bon, and had married Count Romili de Bergamo, who left her free to do whatever she liked. She drew behind her triumphal chariot an old general, Count Bourghausen, a famous rake who had deserted Mars for the past ten years in order to devote his remaining days to the service of Venus. He was a delightful man, and we became friends. Ten years later he was of service to me, as my readers will find in the next volume, which may perhaps be the last.

CHAPTER XXII

Some Adventures at Trieste — I Am of Service to the Venetian Government — My Expedition to Gorice and My Return to Trieste — I Find Irene as an Actress and Expert Gamester

Some of the ladies of Trieste thought they would like to act a French play, and I was made stage manager. I had not only to choose the pieces, but to distribute the parts, the latter being a duty of infinite irksomeness.

All the actresses were new to the boards, and I had immense trouble in hearing them repeat their parts, which they seemed unable to learn by heart. It is a well-known fact that the revolution which is really wanted in Italy is in female education. The very best families with few exceptions are satisfied with shutting up their daughters in a convent for several years till the time comes for them to marry some man whom they never see till the eve or the day of their marriage. As a consequence we have the 'cicisbeo', and in Italy as in France the idea that our nobles are the sons of their nominal fathers is a purely conventional one.

What do girls learn in convents, especially in Italian convents? A few mechanical acts of devotion and outward forms, very little real religion, a good deal of deceit, often profligate habits, a little reading and writing, many useless accomplishments, small music and less drawing, no history, no geography or mythology, hardly any mathematics, and nothing to make a girl a good wife and a good mother.

As for foreign languages, they are unheard of; our own Italian is so soft that any other tongue is hard to acquire, and the 'dolce far niente' habit is an obstacle to all assiduous study.

I write down these truths in spite of my patriotism. I know that if any of my fellow-countrywomen come to read me they will be very angry; but I shall be beyond the reach of all anger.

To return to our theatricals. As I could not make my actresses get their parts letter perfect, I became their prompter, and found out by experience all the ungratefulness of the position.

The actors never acknowledged their debt to the prompter, and put down to his account all the mistakes they make.

A Spanish doctor is almost as badly off; if his patient recovers, the cure is set down to the credit of one saint or another; but if he dies, the physician is blamed for his unskilful treatment.

A handsome negress, who served the prettiest of my actresses to whom I shewed great attentions, said to me one day, —

“I can’t make out how you can be so much in love with my mistress, who is as white as the devil.”

“Have you never loved a white man?” I asked.

“Yes,” said she, “but only because I had no negro, to whom I should certainly have given the preference.”

Soon after the negress became mine, and I found out the falsity of the axiom, ‘Sublata lucerna nullum discrimen inter feminas’, for even in the darkness a man would know a black woman from a white one.

I feel quite sure myself that the negroes are a distinct species from ourselves. There is one essential difference, leaving the colour out of account — namely, that an African woman can either conceive or not, and can conceive a boy or a girl. No doubt my readers will disbelieve this assertion, but their incredulity would cease if I instructed them in the mysterious science of the negresses.

Count Rosenberg, grand chamberlain of the emperor, came on a visit to Trieste in company with an Abbe Casti, whose acquaintance I wished to make on account of some extremely blasphemous poems he had written. However, I was disappointed; and instead of a man of parts, I found the abbe to be an impudent worthless fellow, whose only merit was a knack of versification.

Count Rosenberg took the abbe with him, because he was useful in the capacities of a fool and a pimp-occupations well suited to his morals, though by no means agreeable to his ecclesiastical status. In those days syphilis had not completely destroyed his uvula.

I heard that this shameless profligate, this paltry poetaster, had been named poet to the emperor. What a dishonour to the memory of the great Metastasio, a man free from all vices, adorned with all virtues, and of the most singular ability.

Casti had neither a fine style, nor a knowledge of dramatic requirements, as appears from two or three comic operas composed by him, in which the reader will find nothing but foolish buffooneries badly put together. In one of these comic operas he makes use of slander against King Theodore and the Venetian Republic, which he turns into ridicule by means of pitiful lies.

In another piece called The Cave of Trophonius, Casti made himself the laughing-stock of the literary world by making a display of useless learning which contributes nothing towards the plot.

Among the persons of quality who came to Gorice, I met a certain Count Torriano, who persuaded me to spend the autumn with him at a country house of his six miles from Gorice.

If I had listened to the voice of my good genius I should certainly never have gone.

The count was under thirty, and was not married. He could not exactly be called ugly in spite of his hangdog countenance, in which I saw the outward signs of cruelty, disloyalty, treason, pride, brutal sensuality, hatred, and jealousy. The mixture of bad qualities was such an appalling one that I thought his physiognomy was at fault, and the goods better than the sign. He asked me to come and see him so graciously that I concluded that the man gave the lie to his face.

I asked about him before accepting the invitation, and I heard nothing but good. People certainly said he was fond of the fair sex, and was a fierce avenger of any wrong done to him, but not thinking either of these characteristics unworthy of a gentleman I accepted his invitation. He told me that he would expect me to meet him at Gorice on the first day of September, and that the next day we would leave for his estate.

In consequence of Torriano's invitation I took leave of everybody, especially of Count Wagensberg, who had a serious attack of that malady which yields so easily to mercury when it is administered by a skilled hand, but which kills the unfortunate who falls amongst quacks. Such was the fate of the poor count; he died a month after I had left Trieste.

I left Trieste in the morning, dined at Proseco, and reached Gorice in good time. I called at Count Louis Torriano's mansion, but was told he was out. However, they allowed me to deposit what little luggage I had when I informed them that the count had invited me. I then went to see Count Torres, and stayed with him till supper-time.

When I got back to the count's I was told he was in the country, and would not be back till the next day, and that in the meantime my trunks had been taken to the inn where a room and supper had been ordered.

I was extremely astonished, and went to the inn, where I was served with a bad supper in an uncomfortable room; however, I supposed that the count had been unable to accommodate me in his house, and I excused him though I wished he had forewarned me. I could not understand how a gentleman who has a house and invites a friend can be without a room wherein to lodge him.

Next morning Count Torriano came to see me, thanked me for my punctuality, congratulated himself on the pleasure he expected to derive from my society, and told me he was very sorry we could not start for two days, as a suit was to be heard the next day between himself and a rascally old farmer who was trying to cheat him.

"Well, well," said I, "I will go and hear the pleadings; it will be an amusement for me."

Soon after he took his leave, without asking me where I intended dining, or apologizing for not having accommodated me himself.

I could not make him out; I thought he might have taken offence at my descending at his doors without having given him any warning.

"Come, come, Casanova," I said to myself, "you may be all abroad. Knowledge of character is an unfathomable gulf. We thought we had studied it deeply, but there is still more to learn; we shall see. He may have said nothing out of delicacy. I should be sorry to be found wanting in politeness, though indeed I am puzzled to know what I have done amiss."

I dined by myself, made calls in the afternoon, and supped with Count Tomes. I told him that I promised myself the pleasure of hearing the eloquence of the bar of Gorice the next day.

"I shall be there, too," said he, "as I am curious to see what sort of a face Torriano will put on it, if the countryman wins. I know something about the case," he continued, "and Torriano is sure of victory, unless the documents attesting the farmer's indebtedness happen to be forgeries. On the other hand, the farmer ought to win unless it can be shewn that the receipts signed by Torriano are forgeries. The farmer has lost in the first court and in the second court, but he has paid the costs and appealed from both, though he is a poor man. If he loses to-morrow he will not only be a ruined man, but be sentenced to penal servitude, while if he wins, Torriano should be sent to the galleys, together with his counsel, who has deserved this fate many times before."

I knew Count Tomes passed for somewhat of a scandal-monger, so his remarks made little impression on me beyond whetting my curiosity. The next day I was one of the first to appear in the court, where I found the bench, plaintiff and defendant, and the barristers, already assembled. The farmer's counsel was an old man who looked honest, while the count's had all the impudence of a practised knave. The count sat beside him, smiling disdainfully, as if he was lowering himself to strive with a miserable peasant whom he had already twice vanquished.

The farmer sat by his wife, his son, and two daughters, and had that air of modest assurance which indicates resignation and a good conscience.

I wondered how such honest people could have lost in two courts; I was sure their cause must be a just one.

They were all poorly clad, and from their downcast eyes and their humble looks I guessed them to be the victims of oppression.

Each barrister could speak for two hours.

The farmer's advocate spoke for thirty minutes, which he occupied by putting in the various receipts bearing the count's signature up to the time when he had dismissed the farmer, because he would not prostitute his daughters to him. He then continued, speaking with calm precision, to point out the anachronisms and contradictions in the count's books (which made his client a debtor), and stated that his client was in a position to prosecute the two forgers who had been employed to compass the ruin of an honest family, whose only crime was poverty. He ended his speech by an appeal for costs in all the suits, and for compensation for loss of time and defamation of character.

The harangue of the count's advocate would have lasted more than two hours if the court had not silenced him. He indulged in a torrent of abuse against the other barrister, the experts in hand-writing, and the peasant, whom he threatened with a speedy consignment to the galleys.

The pleadings would have wearied me if I had been a blind man, but as it was I amused myself by a scrutiny of the various physiognomies before me. My host's face remained smiling and impudent through it all.

The pleadings over, the court was cleared, and we awaited the sentence in the adjoining room.

The peasant and his family sat in a corner apart, sad, sorry, and comfortless, with no friend to speak a consoling word, while the count was surrounded by a courtly throng, who assured him that with such a case he could not possibly lose; but that if the judges did deliver judgment against him he should pay the peasant, and force him to prove the alleged forgery.

I listened in profound silence, sympathising with the countryman rather than my host, whom I believed to be a thorough-paced scoundrel, though I took care not to say so.

Count Torres, who was a deadly foe to all prudence and discretion, asked me my opinion of the case, and I whispered that I thought the count should lose, even if he were in the right, on account of the infamous apostrophes of his counsel, who deserved to have his ears cut off or to stand in the pillory for six months.

"And the client too," said Tomes aloud; but nobody had heard what I had said.

After we had waited for an hour the clerk of the court came in with two papers, one of which he gave to the peasant's counsel and the other to Torriano's. Torriano read it to himself, burst into a loud laugh, and then read it aloud.

The court condemned the count to recognize the peasant as his creditor, to pay all costs, and to give him a year's wages as damages; the peasant's right to appeal ad minimum on account of any other complaints he might have being reserved.

The advocate looked downcast, but Torriano consoled him by a fee of six sequins, and everybody went away.

I remained with the defendant, and asked him if he meant to appeal to Vienna.

"I shall appeal in another sort," said he; but I did not ask him what he meant.

We left Gorice the next morning.

My landlord gave me the bill, and told me he had received instructions not to insist on my paying it if I made any difficulty, as in that case the count would pay himself.

This struck me as somewhat eccentric, but I only laughed. However, the specimens I had seen of his character made me imagine that I was going to spend six weeks with a dangerous original.

In two hours we were at Spessa, and alighted at a large house, with nothing distinguished about it from an architectural point of view. We went up to the count's room, which was tolerably furnished, and after shewing me over the house he took me to my own room. It was on the ground floor, stuffy, dark, and ill furnished.

"Ah!" said he, "this is the room my poor old father used to love to sit in; like you, he was very fond of study. You may be sure of enjoying perfect liberty here, for you will see no one."

We dined late, and consequently no supper was served. The eating and the wine were tolerable, and so was the company of a priest, who held the position of the count's steward; but I was disgusted at hearing the count, who ate ravenously, reproach me with eating too slowly.

When we rose from table he told me he had a lot to do, and that we should see each other the next day.

I went to my room to put things in order, and to get out my papers. I was then working at the second volume of the Polish troubles.

In the evening I asked for a light as it was growing dark, and presently a servant came with one candle. I was indignant; they ought to have given me wax lights or a lamp at least. However, I made no complaint, merely asking one of the servants if I was to rely on the services of any amongst them.

“Our master has given us no instructions on the subject, but of course we will wait on you whenever you call us.”

This would have been a troublesome task, as there was no bell, and I should have been obliged to wander all over the house, to search the courtyard, and perhaps the road, whenever I wanted a servant.

“And who will do my room?” I asked.

“The maid.”

“Then she has a key of her own?”

“There is no need for a key, as your door has no lock, but you can bolt yourself in at night.”

I could only laugh, whether from ill humour or amusement I really cannot say. However, I made no remark to the man.

I began my task, but in half an hour I was so unfortunate as to put out the candle whilst snuffing it. I could not roam about the house in the dark searching for a light, as I did not know my way, so I went to bed in the dark more inclined to swear than to laugh.

Fortunately the bed was a good one, and as I had expected it to be uncomfortable I went to sleep in a more tranquil humour.

In the morning nobody came to attend on me, so I got up, and after putting away my papers I went to say good morning to my host in dressing-gown and nightcap. I found him under the hand of one of his men who served him as a valet. I told him I had slept well, and had come to breakfast with him; but he said he never took breakfast, and asked me, politely enough, not to trouble to come and see him in the morning as he was always engaged with his tenants, who were a pack of thieves. He then added that as I took breakfast he would give orders to the cook to send me up coffee whenever I liked.

“You will also be kind enough to tell your man to give me a touch with his comb after he has done with you.”

“I wonder you did not bring a servant.”

“If I had guessed that I should be troubling you, I should certainly have brought one.”

“It will not trouble me but you, for you will be kept waiting.”

“Not at all. Another thing I want is a lock to my door, for I have important papers for which I am responsible, and I cannot lock them up in my trunk whenever I leave my room.”

“Everything is safe in my house.”

“Of course, but you see how absurd it would be for you to be answerable in case any of my papers were missing. I might be in the greatest distress, and yet I should never tell you of it.”

He remained silent for some time, and then ordered his man to tell the priest to put a lock on my door and give me the key.

While he was thinking, I noticed a taper and a book on the table beside his bed. I went up to it, and asked politely if I might see what kind of reading had beguiled him to sleep. He replied as politely, requesting me not to touch it. I withdrew immediately, telling him with a smile that I felt sure that it was a book of prayers, but that I would never reveal his secret.

“You have guessed what it is,” he said, laughing.

I left him with a courteous bow, begging him to send me his man and a cup of coffee, chocolate, or broth, it mattered not which.

I went back to my room meditating seriously on his strange behaviour, and especially on the wretched tallow candle which was given me, while he had a wax taper. My first idea was to leave the house immediately, for though I had only fifty ducats in my possession my spirit was as high as when I was a rich man; but on second thoughts I determined not to put myself in the wrong by affronting him in such a signal manner.

The tallow candle was the most grievous wrong, so I resolved to ask the man whether he had not been told to give me wax lights. This was important, as it might be only a piece of knavery or stupidity on the part of the servant.

The man came in an hour with a cup of coffee, sugared according to his taste or that of the cook. This disgusted me, so I let it stay on the table, telling him, with a burst of laughter (if I had not laughed I must have thrown the coffee in his face), that that was not the way to serve breakfast. I then got ready to have my hair done.

I asked him why he had brought me a wretched tallow candle instead of two wax lights.

"Sir," the worthy man replied, humbly, "I could only give you what the priest gave me; I received a wax taper for my master and a candle for you."

I was sorry to have vexed the poor fellow, and said no more, thinking the priest might have taken a fancy to economise for the count's profit or his own. I determined to question him on the subject.

As soon as I was dressed I went out to walk off my bad humour. I met the priest-steward, who had been to the locksmith. He told me that the man had no ready-made locks, but he was going to fit my door with a padlock, of which I should have the key.

"Provided I can lock my door," I said, "I care not how it's done."

I returned to the house to see the padlock fitted, and while the locksmith was hammering away I asked the priest why he had given a tallow candle instead of one or two wax tapers.

"I should never dare to give you tapers, sir, without express orders from the count."

"I should have thought such a thing would go without saying."

"Yes, in other houses, but here nothing goes without saying. I have to buy the tapers and he pays me, and every time he has one it is noted down."

"Then you can give me a pound of wax lights if I pay you for them?"

"Of course, but I think I must tell the count, for you know … ."

"Yes, I know all about it, but I don't care:"

I gave him the price of a pound of wax lights, and went for a walk, as he told me dinner was at one. I was somewhat astonished on coming back to the house at half-past twelve to be told that the count had been half an hour at table.

I did not know what to make of all these acts of rudeness; however, I moderated my passion once more, and came in remarking that the abbe had told me dinner was at one.

"It is usually," replied the count, "but to-day I wanted to pay some calls and take you with me, so I decided on dining at noon. You will have plenty of time."

He then gave orders for all the dishes that had been taken away to be brought back.

I made no answer, and sat down to table, and feigning good humour ate what was on the table, refusing to touch those dishes which had been taken away. He vainly asked me to try the soup, the beef, the entrees; I told him that I always punished myself thus when I came in late for a nobleman's dinner.

Still dissembling my ill humour, I got into his carriage to accompany him on his round of visits. He took me to Baron del Mestre, who spent the whole of the year in the country with his family, keeping up a good establishment.

The count spent the whole of the day with the baron, putting off the other visits to a future time. In the evening we returned to Spessa. Soon after we arrived the priest returned the money I had given him for the candles, telling me that the count had forgotten to inform him that I was to be treated as himself.

I took this acknowledgement for what it was worth.

Supper was served, and I ate with the appetite of four, while the count hardly ate at all.

The servant who escorted me to my room asked me at what time I should like breakfast. I told him, and he was punctual; and this time the coffee was brought in the coffee-pot and the sugar in the sugar basin.

The valet did my hair, and the maid did my room, everything was changed, and I imagined that I had given the count a little lesson, and that I should have no more trouble with him. Here, however, I was mistaken, as the reader will discover.

Three or four days later the priest came to me one morning, to ask when I would like dinner, as I was to dine in my room.

“Why so?” I asked.

“Because the count left yesterday for Gorice, telling me he did not know when he should come back. He ordered me to give you your meals in your room.”

“Very good. I will dine at one.”

No one could be more in favour of liberty and independence than myself, but I could not help feeling that my rough host should have told me he was going to Gorice. He stayed a week, and I should have died of weariness if it had not been for my daily visits to the Baron del Mestre. Otherwise there was no company, the priest was an uneducated man, and there were no pretty country girls. I felt as if I could not bear another four weeks of such a doleful exile.

When the count came back, I spoke to him plainly.

“I came to Spessa,” I said, “to keep you company and to amuse myself; but I see that I am in the way, so I hope you will take me back to Gorice and leave me there. You must know that I like society as much as you do, and I do not feel inclined to die of solitary weariness in your house.”

He assured me that it should not happen again, that he had gone to Gorice to meet an actress, who had come there purposely to see him, and that he had also profited by the opportunity to sign a contract of marriage with a Venetian lady.

These excuses and the apparently polite tone in which they were uttered induced me to prolong my stay with the extraordinary count.

He drew the whole of his income from vineyards, which produced an excellent white wine and a revenue of a thousand sequins a year. However, as the count did his best to spend double that amount, he was rapidly ruining himself. He had a fixed impression that all the tenants robbed him, so whenever he found a bunch of grapes in a cottage he proceeded to beat the occupants unless they could prove that the grapes did not come from his vineyards. The peasants might kneel down and beg pardon, but they were thrashed all the same.

I had been an unwilling witness of several of these arbitrary and cruel actions, when one day I had the pleasure of seeing the count soundly beaten by two peasants. He had struck the first blow himself, but when he found that he was getting the worst of it he prudently took to his heels.

He was much offended with me for remaining a mere spectator of the fray; but I told him very coolly that, being the aggressor, he was in the wrong, and in the second place I was not going to expose myself to be beaten to a jelly by two lusty peasants in another man's quarrel.

These arguments did not satisfy him, and in his rage he dared to tell me that I was a scurvy coward not to know that it was my duty to defend a friend to the death.

In spite of these offensive remarks I merely replied with a glance of contempt, which he doubtless understood.

Before long the whole village had heard what had happened, and the joy was universal, for the count had the singular privilege of being feared by all and loved by none. The two rebellious peasants had taken to their heels. But when it became known that his lordship had announced his resolution to carry pistols with him in all future visits, everybody was alarmed, and two spokesmen were sent to the count informing him that all his tenants would quit the estate in a week's time unless he gave them a promise to leave them in peace in their humble abodes.

The rude eloquence of the two peasants struck me as sublime, but the count pronounced them to be impertinent and ridiculous.

"We have as good a right to taste the vines which we have watered with the sweat of our brow," said they, "as your cook has to taste the dishes before they are served on your table."

The threat of deserting just at the vintage season frightened the count, and he had to give in, and the embassy went its way in high glee at its success.

Next Sunday we went to the chapel to hear mass, and when we came in the priest was at the altar finishing the Credo. The count looked furious, and after mass he took me with him to the sacristy, and begun to abuse and beat the poor priest, in spite of the surplice which he was still wearing. It was really a shocking sight.

The priest spat in his face and cried help, that being the only revenge in his power.

Several persons ran in, so we left the sacristy. I was scandalised, and I told the count that the priest would be certain to go to Udine, and that it might turn out a very awkward business.

"Try to prevent his doing so," I added, "even by violence, but in the first place endeavour to pacify him."

No doubt the count was afraid, for he called out to his servants and ordered them to fetch the priest, whether he could come or no. His order was executed, and the priest was led in, foaming with rage, cursing the count, calling him excommunicated wretch, whose very breath was poisonous; swearing that never another mass should be sung in the chapel that had been polluted with sacrilege, and finally promising that the archbishop should avenge him.

The count let him say on, and then forced him into a chair, and the unworthy ecclesiastic not only ate but got drunk. Thus peace was concluded, and the abbe forgot all his wrongs.

A few days later two Capuchins came to visit him at noon. They did not go, and as he did not care to dismiss them, dinner was served without any place being laid for the friars. Thereupon the bolder of the two informed the count that he had had no dinner. Without replying, the count had him accommodated with a plateful of rice. The Capuchin refused it, saying that he was worthy to sit, not only at his table, but at a monarch's. The count, who happened to be in a good humour, replied that they called themselves "unworthy brethren," and that they were consequently not worthy of any of this world's good things.

The Capuchin made but a poor answer, and as I thought the count to be in the right I proceeded to back him up, telling the friar he ought to be ashamed at having committed the sin of pride, so strictly condemned by the rules of his order.

The Capuchin answered me with a torrent of abuse, so the count ordered a pair of scissors to be brought, that the beards of the filthy rogues might be cut off. At this awful threat the two friars made their escape, and we laughed heartily over the incident.

If all the count's eccentricities had been of this comparatively harmless and amusing nature, I should not have minded, but such was far from being the case.

Instead of chyle his organs must have distilled some virulent poison; he was always at his worst in his after dinner hours. His appetite was furious; he ate more like a tiger than a man. One day we happened to be eating woodcock, and I could not help praising the dish in the style of the true gourmand. He immediately took up his bird, tore it limb from limb, and gravely bade me not to praise the dishes I liked as it irritated him. I felt an inclination to laugh and also an inclination to throw the bottle at his head, which I should probably have indulged in had I been twenty years younger. However, I did neither, feeling that I should either leave him or accommodate myself to his humours.

Three months later Madame Costa, the actress whom he had gone to see at Gorice, told me that she would never have believed in the possibility of such a creature existing if she had not known Count Torriano.

"Though he is a vigorous lover," she continued, "it is a matter of great difficulty with him to obtain the crisis; and the wretched woman in his arms is in imminent danger of being strangled to death if she cannot conceal her amorous ecstacy. He cannot bear to see another's pleasure. I pity his wife most heartily."

I will now relate the incident which put an end to my relations with this venomous creature.

Amidst the idleness and weariness of Spessa I happened to meet a very pretty and very agreeable young widow. I made her some small presents, and finally persuaded her to pass the night in my room. She came at midnight to avoid observation, and left at day-break by a small door which opened on to the road.

We had amused ourselves in this pleasant manner for about a week, when one morning my sweetheart awoke me that I might close the door after her as usual. I had scarcely done so when I heard cries for help. I quickly opened it again, and I saw the scoundrelly Torriano holding the widow with one hand while he beat her furiously with a stick he held in the other. I rushed upon him, and we fell together, while the poor woman made her escape.

I had only my dressing-gown on, and here I was at a disadvantage; for civilized man is a poor creature without his clothes. However, I held the stick with one hand, while I squeezed his throat with the other. On his side he clung to the stick with his right hand, and pulled my hair with the left. At last his tongue started out and he had to let go.

I was on my feet again in an instant, and seizing the stick I aimed a sturdy blow at his head, which, luckily for him, he partially parried.

I did not strike again, so he got up, ran a little way, and began to pick up stones. However, I did not wait to be pelted, but shut myself in my room and lay down on the bed, only sorry that I had not choked the villain outright.

As soon as I had rested I looked to my pistols, dressed myself, and went out with the intention of looking for some kind of conveyance to take me back to Gorice. Without knowing it I took a road that led me to the cottage of the poor widow, whom I found looking calm though sad. She told me she had received most of the blows on her shoulders, and was not much hurt. What vexed her was that the affair would become public, as two peasants had seen the count beating her, and our subsequent combat.

I gave her two sequins, begging her to come and see me at Gorice, and to tell me where I could find a conveyance.

Her sister offered to shew me the way to a farm, where I could get what I wanted. On the way she told me that Torriano had been her sister’s enemy before the death of her husband because she rejected all his proposals.

I found a good conveyance at the farm, and the man promised to drive me in to Gorice by dinner-time.

I gave him half-a-crown as an earnest, and went away, telling him to come for me.

I returned to the count's and had scarcely finished getting ready when the conveyance drove up.

I was about to put my luggage in it, when a servant came from the count asking me to give him a moment's conversation.

I wrote a note in French, saying that after what had passed we ought not to meet again under his roof.

A minute later he came into my room, and shut the door, saying, —

"As you won't speak to me, I have come to speak to you."

"What have you got to say?"

"If you leave my house in this fashion you will dishonour me, and I will not allow it."

"Excuse me, but I should very much like to see how you are going to prevent me from leaving your house."

"I will not allow you to go by yourself; we must go together."

"Certainly; I understand you perfectly. Get your sword or your pistols, and we will start directly. There is room for two in the carriage."

"That won't do. You must dine with me, and then we can go in my carriage."

"You make a mistake. I should be a fool if I dined with you when our miserable dispute is all over the village; to-morrow it will have reached Gorice."

"If you won't dine with me, I will dine with you, and people may say what they like. We will go after dinner, so send away that conveyance."

I had to give in to him. The wretched count stayed with me till noon, endeavouring to persuade me that he had a perfect right to beat a country-woman in the road, and that I was altogether in the wrong.

I laughed, and said I wondered how he derived his right to beat a free woman anywhere, and that his pretence that I being her lover had no right to protect her was a monstrous one.

"She had just left my arms," I continued, "was I not therefore her natural protector? Only a coward or a monster like yourself would have remained indifferent, though, indeed, I believe that even you would have done the same.”

A few minutes before we sat down to dinner he said that neither of us would profit by the adventure, as he meant the duel to be to the death.

“I don’t agree with you as far as I am concerned,” I replied; “and as to the duel, you can fight or not fight, as you please; for my part I have had satisfaction. If we come to a duel I hope to leave you in the land of the living, though I shall do my best to lay you up for a considerable time, so that you may have leisure to reflect on your folly. On the other hand, if fortune favours you, you may act as you please.”

“We will go into the wood by ourselves, and my coachman shall have orders to drive you wherever you like if you come out of the wood by yourself.”

“Very good indeed; and which would you prefer — swords or pistols?”

“Swords, I think.”

“Then I promise to unload my pistols as soon as we get into the carriage.”

I was astonished to find the usually brutal count become quite polite at the prospect of a duel. I felt perfectly confident myself, as I was sure of flooring him at the first stroke by a peculiar lunge. Then I could escape through Venetian territory where I was not known.

But I had good reasons for supposing that the duel would end in smoke as so many other duels when one of the parties is a coward, and a coward I believed the count to be.

We started after an excellent dinner; the count having no luggage, and mine being strapped behind the carriage.

I took care to draw the charges of my pistols before the count.

I had heard him tell the coachman to drive towards Gorice, but every moment I expected to hear him order the man to drive up this or that turning that we might settle our differences.

I asked no questions, feeling that the initiative lay with him; but we drove on till we were at the gates of Gorice, and I burst out laughing when I heard the count order the coachman to drive to the posting inn.

As soon as we got there he said, —

“You were in the right; we must remain friends. Promise me not to tell anyone of what has happened.”

I gave him the promise; we shook hands, and everything was over.

The next day I took up my abode in one of the quietest streets to finish my second volume on the Polish troubles, but I still managed to enjoy myself during my stay at Gorice. At last I resolved on returning to Trieste, where I had more chances of serving and pleasing the State Inquisitors.

I stayed at Gorice till the end of the year 1773, and passed an extremely pleasant six weeks.

My adventure at Spessa had become public property. At first everybody addressed me on the subject, but as I laughed and treated the whole thing as a joke it would soon be forgotten. Torriano took care to be most polite whenever we met; but I had stamped him as a dangerous character, and whenever he asked me to dinner or supper I had other engagements.

During the carnival he married the young lady of whom he had spoken to me, and as long as he lived her life was misery. Fortunately he died a madman thirteen or fourteen years after.

Whilst I was at Gorice Count Charles Coronini contributed greatly to my enjoyment. He died four years later, and a month before his death he sent me his will in ostosyllabic Italian verses — a specimen of philosophic mirth which I still preserve. It is full of jest and wit, though I believe if he had guessed the near approach of death he would not have been so cheerful, for the prospect of imminent destruction can only enliven the heart of a maniac.

During my stay at Gorice a certain M. Richard Lorrain came there. He was a bachelor of forty, who had done good financial service under the Viennese Government, and had now retired with a comfortable pension. He was a fine man, and his agreeable manners and excellent education procured him admission into the best company in the town.

I met him at the house of Count Torres, and soon after he was married to the young countess.

In October the new Council of Ten and the new Inquisitors took office, and my protectors wrote to me that if they could not obtain my pardon in the course of the next twelve months they would be inclined to despair. The first of the Inquisitors was Sagredo, and intimate friend of the Procurator Morosini's; the second, Grimani, the friend of my good Dandolo; and M. Zaguri wrote to me that he would answer for the third, who, according to law, was one of the six councillors who assist the Council of Ten.

It may not be generally known that the Council of Ten is really a council of seventeen, as the Doge has always a right to be present.

I returned to Trieste determined to do my best for the Tribunal, for I longed to return to Venice after nineteen years' wanderings.

I was then forty-nine, and I expected no more of Fortune's gifts, for the deity despises those of ripe age. I thought, however, that I might live comfortably and independently at Venice.

I had talents and experience, I hoped to make use of them, and I thought the Inquisitors would feel bound to give me some sufficient employment.

I was writing the history of the Polish troubles, the first volume was printed, the second was in preparation, and I thought of concluding the work in seven volumes. Afterwards I had a translation of the "Iliad" in view, and other literary projects would no doubt present themselves.

In fine, I thought myself sure of living in Venice, where many persons who would be beggars elsewhere continue to live at their ease.

I left Gorice on the last day of December, 1773, and on January 1st I took up my abode at Trieste.

I could not have received a warmer welcome. Baron Pittoni, the Venetian consul, all the town councillors, and the members of the club, seemed delighted to see me again. My carnival was a pleasant one, and in the beginning of Lent I published the second volume of my work on Poland.

The chief object of interest to me at Trieste was an actress in a company that was playing there. She was no other than the daughter of the so-called Count Rinaldi, and my readers may remember her under the name of Irene. I had loved her at Milan, and neglected her at Genoa on account of her father's misdeeds, and at Avignon I had rescued her at Marcoline's request. Eleven years had passed by since I had heard of her.

I was astonished to see her, and I think more sorry than glad, for she was still beautiful, and I might fall in love again; and being no longer in a position to give her assistance, the issue might be unfortunate for me. However, I called on her the next day, and was greeted with a shriek of delight. She told me she had seen me at the theatre, and felt sure I would come and see her.

She introduced me to her husband, who played parts like Scapin, and to her nine-year-old daughter, who had a talent for dancing.

She gave me an abridged account of her life since we had met. In the year I had seen her at Avignon she had gone to Turin with her father. At Turin she fell in love with her present husband, and left her parents to join her lot to his.

“Since that,” she said, “I have heard of my father’s death, but I do not know what has become of my mother.”

After some further conversation she told me she was a faithful wife, though she did not push fidelity so far as to drive a rich lover to despair.

“I have no lovers here,” she added, “but I give little suppers to a few friends. I don’t mind the expense, as I win some money at faro.”

She was the banker, and she begged me to join the party now and then.

“I will come after the play to-night,” I replied, “but you must not expect any high play of me.”

I kept the appointment and supped with a number of silly young tradesmen, who were all in love with her.

After supper she held a bank, and I was greatly astonished when I saw her cheating with great dexterity. It made me want to laugh; however, I lost my florins with a good grace and left. However, I did not mean to let Irene think she was duping me, and I went to see her next morning at rehearsal, and complimented her on her dealing. She pretended not to understand what I meant, and on my explaining myself she had the impudence to tell me that I was mistaken.

In my anger I turned my back on her saying, “You will be sorry for this some day.”

At this she began to laugh, and said, “Well, well, I confess! and if you tell me how much you lost you shall have it back, and if you like you shall be a partner in the game.”

“No, thank you, Irene, I will not be present at any more of your suppers. But I warn you to be cautious; games of chance are strictly forbidden.”

“I know that, but all the young men have promised strict secrecy.”

“Come and breakfast with me whenever you like.”

A few days later she came, bringing her daughter with her. The girl was pretty, and allowed me to caress her.

One day Baron Pittoni met them at my lodgings, and as he liked young girls as well as I he begged Irene to make her daughter include him in her list of favoured lovers.

I advised her not to reject the offer, and the baron fell in love with her, which was a piece of luck for Irene, as she was accused of playing unlawful games, and would have been severely treated if the baron had not given her warning. When the police pounced on her, they found no gaming and no gamesters, and nothing could be done.

Irene left Trieste at the beginning of Lent with the company to which she belonged. Three years later I saw her again at Padua. Her daughter had become a charming girl, and our acquaintance was renewed in the tenderest manner.

Prothonotary Apostolic, and Scoundrel Cosmopolitic.]

EPISODE 30 — OLD AGE AND DEATH OF CASANOVA

APPENDIX AND SUPPLEMENT

WHETHER THE AUTHOR died before the work was complete, whether the concluding volumes were destroyed by himself or his literary executors, or whether the MS. fell into bad hands, seems a matter of uncertainty, and the materials available towards a continuation of the Memoirs are extremely fragmentary. We know, however, that Casanova at last succeeded in obtaining his pardon from the authorities of the Republic, and he returned to Venice, where he exercised the honourable office of secret agent of the State Inquisitors — in plain language, he became a spy. It seems that the Knight of the Golden Spur made a rather indifferent "agent;" not surely, as a French writer suggests, because the dirty work was too dirty for his fingers, but probably because he was getting old and stupid and out-of-date, and failed to keep in touch with new forms of turpitude. He left Venice again and paid a visit to Vienna, saw beloved Paris once more, and there met Count Wallenstein, or Waldstein. The conversation turned on magic and the occult sciences, in, which Casanova was an adept, as the reader of the Memoirs will remember, and the count took a fancy to the charlatan. In short Casanova became librarian at the count's Castle of Dux, near Teplitz, and there he spent the fourteen remaining years of his life.

As the Prince de Ligne (from whose Memoirs we learn these particulars) remarks, Casanova's life had been a stormy and adventurous one, and it might have been expected that he would have found his patron's library a pleasant refuge after so many toils and travels. But the man carried rough weather and storm in his own heart, and found daily opportunities of mortification and resentment. The coffee was ill made, the maccaroni not cooked in the true Italian style, the dogs had bayed during the night, he had been made to dine at a small table, the parish priest had tried to convert him, the soup had been served too hot on purpose to annoy him, he had not been introduced to a distinguished guest, the count had lent a book without telling him, a groom had not taken off his hat; such were his complaints. The fact is Casanova felt his dependent position and his utter poverty, and was all the more determined to stand to his dignity as a man who had talked with all the crowned heads of Europe, and had fought a duel with the Polish general. And he had another reason for finding life bitter — he had lived beyond his time. Louis XV. was dead, and Louis XVI. had been guillotined; the Revolution had come; and Casanova, his dress, and his manners, appeared as odd and antique as some "blood of the Regency" would appear to us of these days. Sixty years before, Marcel, the famous dancing-master, had taught young Casanova how to enter a room with a lowly and ceremonious bow; and still, though the eighteenth century is drawing to a close, old Casanova enters the rooms of Dux with the same stately bow, but now everyone laughs. Old Casanova treads the grave measures of the minuet; they applauded his dancing once, but now everyone laughs. Young Casanova was always dressed in the height of the fashion; but the age of powder, wigs, velvets, and silks has departed, and old Casanova's attempts at elegance ("Strass" diamonds have replaced the genuine stones with him) are likewise greeted with laughter. No wonder the old adventurer denounces the whole house of Jacobins and canaille; the world, he feels, is permanently out of joint for him; everything is cross, and everyone is in a conspiracy to drive the iron into his soul.

At last these persecutions, real or imaginary, drive him away from Dux; he considers his genius bids him go, and, as before, he obeys. Casanova has but little pleasure or profit out of this his last journey; he has to dance attendance in ante-chambers; no one will give him any office, whether as tutor, librarian, or chamberlain. In one quarter only is he well received — namely, by the famous Duke of Weimar; but in a few days he becomes madly jealous of the duke's more famous proteges, Goethe and Wieland, and goes off declaiming against them and German literature generally — with which literature he was wholly unacquainted. From Weimar to Berlin; where there are Jews to whom he has introductions. Casanova thinks them ignorant, superstitious, and knavish; but they lend him money, and he gives bills on Count Wallenstein, which are paid. In six weeks the wanderer returns to Dux, and is welcomed with open arms; his journeys are over at last.

But not his troubles. A week after his return there are strawberries at dessert; everyone is served before himself, and when the plate comes round to him it is empty. Worse still: his portrait is missing from his room, and is discovered 'salement placarde a la porte des lieux d'aisance'!

Five more years of life remained to him. They were passed in such petty mortifications as we have narrated, in grieving over his ‘afreuse vieillesse’, and in laments over the conquest of his native land Venice, once so splendid and powerful. His appetite began to fail, and with it failed his last source of pleasure, so death came to him somewhat as a release. He received the sacraments with devotion, exclaimed, —

“Grand Dieu, et vous tous temoins de ma mort, j’ai vecu en philosophe, et je meurs en Chretien,” and so died.

It was a quiet ending to a wonderfully brilliant and entirely useless career. It has been suggested that if the age in which Casanova lived had been less corrupt, he himself might have used his all but universal talents to some advantage, but to our mind Casanova would always have remained Casanova. He came of a family of adventurers, and the reader of his Memoirs will remark how he continually ruined his prospects by his ineradicable love for disreputable company. His “Bohemianism” was in his blood, and in his old age he regrets — not his past follies, but his inability to commit folly any longer. Now and again we are inclined to pronounce Casanova to be an amiable man; and if to his generosity and good nature he had added some elementary knowledge of the distinction between right and wrong, he might certainly have laid some claim to the character. The Prince de Ligne draws the following portrait of him under the name of Aventuros:

“He would be a handsome man if he were not ugly; he is tall and strongly built, but his dark complexion and his glittering eyes give him a fierce expression. He is easier to annoy than amuse; he laughs little but makes others laugh by the peculiar turn he gives to his conversation. He knows everything except those matters on the knowledge of which he chiefly prides himself, namely, dancing, the French language, good taste, and knowledge of the world. Everything about him is comic, except his comedies; and all his writings are philosophical, saving those which treat of philosophy. He is a perfect well of knowledge, but he quotes Homer and Horace ad nauseam.”

SUPPLEMENT

JACQUES CASANOVA
DE SEINGALT

Containing an Outline of Casanova’s career from the year 1774, when his own Memoirs abruptly end, until his death in 1798

PART THE FIRST — VENICE 1774-1782

I — CASANOVA'S RETURN TO VENICE

THUS CASANOVA ENDED his Memoirs, concluding his narrative with his sojourn at Trieste, in January 1774, where he had remained, except for a few excursions, since the 15th November 1772. He was forty-nine years of age. Since his unfortunate experiences in England, the loss of his fortune and the failure of his efforts to obtain congenial and remunerative employment in Germany or Russia, he had come to concentrate his efforts on a return to his native city.

Of his faithful friends, the nobles Bragadin, Barbaro and Dandolo, the first had died in 1767, having gone into debt "that I might have enough," sending Casanova, from his death-bed, a last gift of a thousand crowns. Barbaro who had died also, in 1771, left Casanova a life-income of six sequins a month. The survivor, Dandolo, was poor, but until his death, he also gave Casanova a monthly provision of six sequins. However, Casanova was not without influential friends who might not only obtain a pardon from the State Inquisitors but also assist him to employment; and, in fact, it was through such influence as that wielded by the Avogador Zaguri and the Procurator Morosini, that Casanova received his pardon, and later, a position as "Confidant," or Secret Agent, to the Inquisitors at Venice.

Casanova re-entered Venice the 14th September 1774 and, presenting himself, on the 18th, to Marc-Antoine Businello, Secretary of the Tribunal of the Inquisitors of State, was advised that mercy had been accorded him by reason of his refutation of the History of the Venetian Government by Amelot de la Houssaie which he had written during his forty-two day imprisonment at Barcelona in 1768. The three Inquisitors, Francesco Grimani, Francesco Sagredo and Paolo Bembo, invited him to dinner to hear his story of his escape from The Leads.

In 1772, Bandiera, the Republic's resident at Ancona, drew this portrait of Casanova:

"One sees everywhere this unhappy rebel against the justice of the August Council, presenting himself boldly, his head carried high, and well equipped. He is received in many houses and announces his intention of going to Trieste and, from there, of returning to Germany. He is a man of forty years or more," [in reality, forty-seven] "of high stature and excellent appearance, vigorous, of a very brown color, the eye bright, the wig short and chestnut-brown. He is said to be haughty and disdainful; he speaks at length, with spirit and erudition." [Letter of information to the Very Illustrious Giovanni Zon, Secretary of the August Council of Ten at Venice. 2 October 1772.]

Returning to Venice after an absence of eighteen years, Casanova renewed his acquaintance with many old friends, among whom were:

The Christine of the Memoirs. Charles, who married Christine, the marriage being arranged by Casanova while in Venice in 1747, was of financial assistance to Casanova, who "found him a true friend." Charles died "a few months before my last departure from Venice," in 1783.

Mlle. X —— C —— V —— , really Giustina de Wynne, widow of the Count Rosenberg, Austrian Ambassador at Venice. "Fifteen years afterwards, I saw her again and she was a widow, happy enough, apparently, and enjoying a great reputation on account of her rank, wit and social qualities, but our connection was never renewed."

Callimena, who was kind to him "for love's sake alone" at Sorrento in 1770.

Marcoline, the girl he took away from his younger brother, the Abby Casanova, at Geneva in 1763.

Father Balbi, the companion of his flight from The Leads.

Doctor Gozzi, his former teacher at Padua, now become Arch-Priest of St. George of the Valley, and his sister Betting. "When I went to pay him a visit … she breathed her last in my arms, in 1776, twenty-four hours after my arrival. I will speak of her death in due time."

Angela Toselli, his first passion. In 1758 this girl married the advocate Francesco Barnaba Rizzotti, and in the following year she gave birth to a daughter, Maria Rizzotti (later married to a M. Kaiser) who lived at Vienna and whose letters to Casanova were preserved at Dux.

C —— C —— , the young girl whose love affair with Casanova became involved with that of the nun M —— M —— Casanova found her in Venice “a widow and poorly off.”

The dancing girl Binetti, who assisted Casanova in his flight from Stuttgart in 1760, whom he met again in London in 1763, and who was the cause of his duel with Count Branicki at Warsaw in 1766. She danced frequently at Venice between 1769 and 1780.

The good and indulgent Mme. Manzoni, “of whom I shall have to speak very often.”

The patricians Andrea Memmo and his brother Bernardo who, with P. Zaguri were personages of considerable standing in the Republic and who remained his constant friends. Andrea Memmo was the cause of the embarrassment in which Mlle. X —— C —— V —— found herself in Paris and which Casanova vainly endeavored to remove by applications of his astonishing specific, the ‘aroph of Paracelsus’.

It was at the house of these friends that Casanova became acquainted with the poet, Lorenzo Da Ponte. “I made his acquaintance,” says the latter, in his own Memoirs, “at the house of Zaguri and the house of Memmo, who both sought after his always interesting conversation, accepting from this man all he had of good, and closing their eyes, on account of his genius, upon the perverse parts of his nature.”

Lorenzo Da Ponte, known above all as Mozart’s librettist, and whose youth much resembled that of Casanova, was accused of having eaten ham on Friday and was obliged to flee from Venice in 1777, to escape the punishment of the Tribunal of Blasphemies. In his Memoirs, he speaks unsparingly of his compatriot and yet, as M. Rava notes, in the numerous letters he wrote Casanova, and which were preserved at Dux, he proclaims his friendship and admiration.

Irene Rinaldi, whom he met again at Padua in 1777, with her daughter who “had become a charming girl; and our acquaintance was renewed in the tenderest manner.”

The ballet-girl Adelaide, daughter of Mme. Soavi, who was also a dancer, and of a M. de Marigny.

Barbara, who attracted Casanova’s attention at Trieste, in 1773, while he was frequenting a family named Leo, but toward whom he had maintained an attitude of respect. This girl, on meeting him again in 1777, declared that “she had guessed my real feelings and had been amused by my foolish restraint.”

At Pesaro, the Jewess Leah, with whom he had the most singular experiences at Ancona in 1772.

II — RELATIONS WITH THE INQUISITORS

SOON AFTER REACHING Venice, Casanova learned that the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, following the example of other German princes, wished a Venetian correspondent for his private affairs. Through some influence he believed he might obtain this small employment; but before applying for the position he applied to the Secretary of the Tribunal for permission. Apparently nothing came of this, and Casanova obtained no definite employment until 1776.

Early in 1776, Casanova entered the service of the Tribunal of Inquisitors as an “occasional Confidant,” under the fictitious name of Antonio Pratiloni, giving his address as “at the Casino of S. E. Marco Dandolo.”

In October 1780, his appointment was more definitely established and he was given a salary of fifteen ducats a month. This, with the six sequins of life-income left by Barbaro and the six given by Dandolo, gave him a monthly income of three hundred and eighty-four lires — about seventy-four U. S. dollars — from 1780 until his break with the Tribunal at the end of 1781.

In the Archives of Venice are preserved forty-eight letters from Casanova, including the Reports he wrote as a “Confidant,” all in the same handwriting as the manuscript of the Memoirs. The Reports may be divided into two classes: those referring to commercial or industrial matters, and those referring to the public morals.

Among those of the first class, we find:

A Report relating to Casanova’s success in having a change made in the route of the weekly diligence running from Trieste to Mestre, for which service, rendered during Casanova’s residence at Trieste in 1773, he received encouragement and the sum of one hundred ducats from the Tribunal.

A Report, the 8th September 1776, with information concerning the rumored project of the future Emperor of Austria to invade Dalmatia after the death of Maria Theresa. Casanova stated he had received this information from a Frenchman, M. Salz de Chalabre, whom he had known in Paris twenty years before. This M. Chalabre [printed Calabre] was the pretended nephew of Mme. Amelin. “This young man was as like her as two drops of water, but she did not find that a sufficient reason for avowing herself his mother.” The boy was, in fact, the son of Mme. Amelin and of M. de Chalabre, who had lived together for a long time.

A Report, the 12th of December 1776, of a secret mission to Trieste, in regard to a project of the court of Vienna for making Fiume a French port; the object being to facilitate communications between this port and the interior of Hungary. For this inquiry, Casanova received sixteen hundred lires, his expenditures amounting to seven hundred and sixty-six lires.

A Report, May-July 1779, of an excursion in the market of Ancona for information concerning the commercial relations of the Pontifical States with the Republic of Venice. At Forli, in the course of this excursion, Casanova visited the dancing-girl Binetti. For this mission Casanova received forty-eight sequins.

A Report, January 1780, remarking a clandestine recruiting carried out by a certain Marrazzani for the [Prussian] regiment of Zarembal.

A Report, the 11th October 1781, regarding a so-called Baldassare Rossetti, a Venetian subject living at Trieste, whose activities and projects were of a nature to prejudice the commerce and industry of the Republic.

Among the Reports relating to public morals may be noted:

December 1776. A Report on the seditious character of a ballet called “Coriolanus.” The back of this report is inscribed: “The impressario of S. Benedetto, Mickel de l’Agata, shall be summoned immediately; it has been ordered that he cease, under penalty of his life, from giving the ballet Coriolanus at the theater. Further, he is to collect and deposit all the printed programmes of this ballet.”

December 1780. A Report calling to the attention of the Tribunal the scandalous disorders produced in the theaters when the lights were extinguished.

3rd May 1781. A Report remarking that the Abbe Carlo Grimani believed himself exempt, in his position as a priest, from the interdiction laid on patricians against frequenting foreign ministers and their suites. On the back of this Report is written: “Ser Jean Carlo, Abbe Grimani, to be gently reminded, by the Secretary, of the injunction to abstain from all commerce with foreign ministers and their adherents.”

Venetian nobles were forbidden under penalty of death from holding any communication with foreign ambassadors or their households. This was intended as a precaution to preserve the secrets of the Senate.

26th November 1781. A Report concerning a painting academy where nude studies were made, from models of both sexes, while scholars only twelve or thirteen years of age were admitted, and where dilettantes who were neither painters nor designers, attended the sessions.

22nd December 1781. By order, Casanova reported to the Tribunal a list of the principal licentious or antireligious books to be found in the libraries and private collections at Venice: la Pucelle; la Philosophie de l’Histoire; L’Esprit d’Helvetius; la Sainte Chandelle d’Arras; les Bijoux indiscrets; le Portier des Chartreux; les Posies de Baffo; Ode a Priape; de Piron; etc., etc.

In considering this Report, which has been the subject of violent criticism, we should bear in mind three points:

first — the Inquisitors required this information; second — no one in their employ could have been in a better position to give it than Casanova; third — Casanova was morally and economically bound, as an employee of the Tribunal, to furnish the information ordered, whatever his personal distaste for the undertaking may have been. We may even assume that he permitted himself to express his feelings in some indiscreet way, and his break with the Tribunal followed, for, at the end of 1781, his commission was withdrawn. Certainly, Casanova’s almost absolute dependence on his salary, influenced the letter he wrote the Inquisitors at this time.

“To the Illustrious and Most Excellent Lords, the Inquisitors of State:

“Filled with confusion, overwhelmed with sorrow and repentance, recognizing myself absolutely unworthy of addressing my vile letter to Your Excellencies confessing that I have failed in my duty in the opportunities which presented themselves, I, Jacques Casanova, invoke, on my knees, the mercy of the Prince; I beg that, in compassion and grace, there may be accorded me that which, in all justice and on reflection, may be refused me.

“I ask the Sovereign Munificence to come to my aid, so that, with the means of subsistence, I may apply myself vigorously, in the future, to the service to which I have been privileged.

“After this respectful supplication, the wisdom of Your Excellencies may judge the disposition of my spirit and of my intentions.”

The Inquisitors decided to award Casanova one month’s pay, but specified that thereafter he would receive salary only when he rendered important services.

In 1782 Casanova made a few more Reports to the Tribunal, for one of which, regarding the failure of an insurance and commercial house at Trieste, he received six sequins. But the part of a guardian of the public morals, even through necessity, was undoubtedly unpleasant to him; and, in spite of the financial loss, it may be that his release was a relief.

III — FRANCESCA BUSCHINI

INTIMATELY CONNECTED WITH Casanova’s life at this period was a girl named Francesca Buschini. This name does not appear in any of the literary, artistic or theatrical records of the period, and, of the girl, nothing is known other than that which she herself tells us in her letters to Casanova. From these very human letters, however, we may obtain, not only certain facts, but also, a very excellent idea of her character. Thirty-two of her letters, dated between July 1779 and October 1787, written in the Venetian dialect, were preserved in the library at Dux.

She was a seamstress, although often without work, and had a brother, a younger sister and also a mother living with her. The probabilities are that she was a girl of the most usual sort, but greatly attached to Casanova who, even in his poverty, must have dazzled her as a being from another world. She was his last Venetian love, and remained a faithful correspondent until 1787; and it is chiefly from her letters, in which she comments on news contained in Casanova’s letters to her, that light is thrown on the Vienna-Paris period, particularly, of Casanova’s life. For this, Francesca has placed us greatly in her debt.

With this girl, at least between 1779 and 1782, Casanova rented a small house at Barbaria delle Tole, near S. Giustina, from the noble Pesaro at S. Stae. Casanova, always in demand for his wit and learning, often took dinner in the city. He knew that a place always awaited him at the house of Memmo and at that of Zaguri and that, at the table of these patricians, who were distinguished by their intellectual superiority, he would meet men notable in science and letters. Being so long and so closely connected with theatrical circles, he was often seen at the theater, with Francesca. Thus, the 9th August 1786, the poor girl, in an excess of chagrin writes: “Where are all the pleasures which formerly you procured me? Where are the theatres, the comedies which we once saw together?”

On the 28th July 1779, Francesca wrote:

“Dearest and best beloved,

“ … In the way of novelties, I find nothing except that S. E. Pietro Zaguri has arrived at Venice; his servant has been twice to ask for you, and I have said you were still at the Baths of Abano …”

The Casanova-Buschini establishment kept up relations, more or less frequent and intimate, with a few persons, most of whom are mentioned in Francesca’s letters; the Signora Anzoletta Rizzotti; the Signora Elisabeth Catrolli, an ancient comedienne; the Signora Bepa Pezzana; the Signora Zenobia de Monti, possibly the mother of that Carlo de Monti, Venetian Consul at Trieste, who was a friend to Casanova and certainly contributed toward obtaining his pardon from the Inquisitors; a M. Lunel, master of languages, and his wife.

IV — PUBLICATIONS

CASANOVA'S PRINCIPAL WRITINGS during this period were:

His translation of the Iliad, the first volume of which was issued in 1775, the second in 1777 and the third in 1778.

During his stay at Abano in 1778, he wrote the Scrutinio del libro, eulogies of M. de Voltaire "by various hands." In the dedication of this book, to the Doge Renier, he wrote, "This little book has recently come from my inexperienced pen, in the hours of leisure which are frequent at Abano for those who do not come only for the baths."

From January until July 1780, he published, anonymously, a series of miscellaneous small works, seven pamphlets of about one hundred pages each, distributed at irregular intervals to subscribers.

From the 7th October to the end of December, 1780, on the occasions of the representations given by a troupe of French comedians at the San Angelo theater, Casanova wrote a little paper called The Messenger of Thalia. In one of the numbers, he wrote:

"French is not my tongue; I make no pretentions and, wrong or astray, I place on the paper what heaven sends from my pen. I give birth to phrases turned to Italian, either to see what they look like or to produce a style, and often, also, to draw, into a purist's snare, some critical doctor who does not know my humor or how my offense amuses me."

The "little romance" referred to in the following letter to "Mlle. X —— C —— V —— ," appeared in 1782, with the title; 'Di anecdoti vinizani militari a amorosi del secolo decimo quarto sotto i dogati di Giovanni Gradenigoe di Giovanni Dolfin'. Venezia, 1782.

V — MLLE. X … C … V…

IN 1782, A letter written by this lady, Giustina de Wynne, referring to a visit to Venice of Paul I, Grand Duke, afterward Emperor of Russia, and his wife, was published under the title of Du sejour des Comptes du Nord a Venise en janvier mdcclxxxii. If he had not previously done so, Casanova took this occasion to recall himself to the memory of this lady to whom he had once been of such great service. And two very polite letters were exchanged:

“Madam,

“The fine epistle which V. E. has allowed to be printed upon the sojourn of C. and of the C. du Nord in this city, exposes you, in the position of an author, to endure the compliments of all those who trouble themselves to write. But I flatter myself, Madam, that V. E. will not disdain mine.

“The little romance, Madam, a translation from my dull and rigid pen, is not a gift but a very paltry offering which I dare make to the superiority of your merit.

“I have found, Madam, in your letter, the simple, flowing style of gentility, the one which alone a woman of condition who writes to her friend may use with dignity. Your digressions and your thoughts are flowers which … (forgive an author who pilfers from you the delicious nonchalance of an amiable writer) or … a will-o’-the-wisp which, from time to time, issues from the work, in spite of the author, and burns the paper.

“I aspire, Madam, to render myself favorable to the deity to which reason advises me to make homage. Accept then the offering and render happy he who makes it with your indulgence.

“I have the honor to sign myself, if you will kindly permit me, with very profound respect.

“Giacomo Casanova.”

“Monsieur

“I am very sensible, Monsieur, of the distinction which comes to me from your approbation of my little pamphlet. The interest of the moment, its references and the exaltation of spirits have gained for it the tolerance and favorable welcome of the good Venetians. It is to your politeness in particular, Monsieur, that I believe is due the marked success which my work has had with you. I thank you for the book which you sent me and I will risk thanking you in advance for the pleasure it will give me. Be persuaded of my esteem for yourself and for your talents. And I have the honor to be, Monsieur.

Among Casanova’s papers at Dux was a page headed “Souvenir,” dated the 2nd September 1791, and beginning: “While descending the staircase, the Prince de Rosemberg told me that Madame de Rosemberg was dead … . This Prince de Rosemberg was the nephew of Giustina.”

Giustina died, after a long illness, at Padua, the 21st August 1791, at the age of fifty-four years and seven months.

VI — LAST DAYS AT VENICE

TOWARD THE END of 1782, doubtless convinced that he could expect nothing more from the Tribunal, Casanova entered the service of the Marquis Spinola as a secretary. Some years before, a certain Carletti, an officer in the service of the court of Turin, had won from the Marquis a wager of two hundred and fifty sequins. The existence of this debt seemed to have completely disappeared from the memory of the loser. By means of the firm promise of a pecuniary recompense, Casanova intervened to obtain from his patron a written acknowledgment of the debt owing to Carletti. His effort was successful; but instead of clinking cash, Carletti contented himself with remitting to the negotiator an assignment on the amount of the credit. Casanova's anger caused a violent dispute, in the course of which Carlo Grimani, at whose house the scene took place, placed him in the wrong and imposed silence.

The irascible Giacomo conceived a quick resentment. To discharge his bile, he found nothing less than to publish in the course of the month of August, under the title of: 'Ne amori ne donne ovvero la Stalla d'Angia repulita', a libel in which Jean Carlo Grimani, Carletti, and other notable persons were outraged under transparent mythological pseudonyms.

This writing embroiled the author with the entire body of the Venetian nobility.

To allow the indignation against him to quiet down, Casanova went to pass some days at Trieste, then returned to Venice to put his affairs in order. The idea of recommencing his wandering life alarmed him. "I have lived fifty-eight years," he wrote, "I could not go on foot with winter at hand, and when I think of starting on the road to resume my adventurous life, I laugh at myself in the mirror."

PART THE SECOND — VIENNA-PARIS

TRAVELS IN 1783

CASANOVA LEFT VENICE in January 1783, and went to Vienna.

On the 16th April Elisabeth Catrolli wrote to him at Vienna:

“Dearest of friends,

“Your letter has given me great pleasure. Be assured, I infinitely regret your departure. I have but two sincere friends, yourself and Camerani. I do not hope for more. I could be happy if I could have at least one of you near me to whom I could confide my cruel anxieties.

“To-day, I received from Camerani a letter informing me that, in a former one, he had sent me a bill of exchange: I did not receive it, and I fear it has been lost.

“Dear friend, when you reach Paris, clasp him to your heart for me … In regard to Chechina [Francesca Buschini] I would say that I have not seen her since the day I took her your letter. Her mother is the ruin of that poor girl; let that suffice; I will say no more … . “

After leaving Venice, Casanova apparently took an opportunity to pay his last disrespects to the Tribunal. At least, in May 1783, M. Schlick, French Secretary at Venice, wrote to Count Vergennes: “Last week there reached the State Inquisitors an anonymous letter stating that, on the 25th of this month, an earthquake, more terrible than that of Messina, would raze Venice to the ground. This letter has caused a panic here. Many patricians have left the capital and others will follow their example. The author of the anonymous letter … is a certain Casanova, who wrote from Vienna and found means to slip it into the Ambassador’s own mails.”

In about four months, Casanova was again on the way to Italy. He paused for a week at Udine and arrived at Venice on the 16th June. Without leaving his barge, he paused at his house just long enough to salute Francesca. He left Mestre on Tuesday the 24th June and on the same day dined at the house of F. Zanuzzi at Bassano. On the 25th he left Bassano by post and arrived in the evening at Borgo di Valsugano.

On the 29th, he wrote to Francesca from the Augsbourg. He had stopped at Innsbruck to attend the theater and was in perfect health. He had reached Frankfort in forty-eight hours, traveling eighteen posts without stopping.

From Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 16th July, he wrote Francesca that he had met, in that city, Cattina, the wife of Pocchini. Pocchini was sick and in deep misery. Casanova, recalling all the abominable tricks this rogue had played on him refused Cattina the assistance she begged for in tears, laughed in her face, and said: “Farewell, I wish you a pleasant death.”

At Mayence, Casanova embarked on the Rhine in company with the Marquis Durazzo, former Austrian Ambassador at Venice. The voyage was excellent and in two days he arrived at Cologne, in rugged health, sleeping well and eating like a wolf.

On the 30th July he wrote to Francesca from Spa and in this letter enclosed a good coin. Everything was dear at Spa; his room cost eight lires a day with everything else in proportion.

On the 6th September he wrote from Antwerp to one of his good friends, the Abbe Eusebio della Lena, telling him that at Spa an English woman who had a passion for speaking Latin wished to submit him to trials which he judged it unnecessary to state precisely. He refused all her proposals, saying, however, that he would not reveal them to anyone; but that he did not feel he should refuse also “an order on her banker for twenty-five guineas.”

On the 9th he wrote to Francesca from Brussels, and on the 12th he sent her a bill of exchange on the banker Corrado for one hundred and fifty lires. He said he had been intoxicated “because his reputation had required it.” “This greatly astonishes me,” Francesca responded, “for I have never seen you intoxicated nor even illuminated … . I am very happy that the wine drove away the inflammation in your teeth.”

Practically all information of Casanova’s movements in 1783 and 1784 is obtained from Francesca’s letters which were in the library at Dux.

In her letters of the 27th June and 11th July, Francesca wrote Casanova that she had directed the Jew Abraham to sell Casanova’s satin habit and velvet breeches, but could not hope for more than fifty lires because they were patched. Abraham had observed that at one time the habit had been placed in pledge with him by Casanova for three sequins.

On the 6th September, she wrote:

“With great pleasure, I reply to the three dear letters which you wrote me from Spa: the first of the 6th August, from which I learned that your departure had been delayed for some days to wait for someone who was to arrive in that city. I was happy that your appetite had returned, because good cheer is your greatest pleasure … .

“In your second letter which you wrote me from Spa on the 16th August, I noted with sorrow that your affairs were not going as you wished. But console yourself, dear friend, for happiness will come after trouble; at least, I wish it so, also, for you yourself can imagine in what need I find myself, I and all my family … . I have no work, because I have not the courage to ask it of anyone. My mother has not earned even enough to pay for the gold thread with the little cross which you know I love. Necessity made me sell it.

“I received your last letter of the 20th August from Spa with another letter for S. E. the Procurator Morosini. You directed me to take it to him myself, and on Sunday the last day of August, I did not fail to go there exactly at three o’clock. At once on my arrival, I spoke to a servant who admitted me without delay; but, my dear friend, I regret having to send you an unpleasant message. As soon as I handed him the letter, and before he even opened it, he said to me, ‘I always know Casanova’s affairs which trouble me.’ After having read hardly more than a page, he said: ‘I know not what to do!’ I told him that, on the 6th of this month, I was to write you at Paris and that, if he would do me the honor of giving me his reply, I would put it in my letter. Imagine what answer he gave me! I was much surprised! He told me that I should wish you happiness but that he would not write to you again. He said no more. I kissed his hands and left. He did not give me even a sou. That is all he said to me … .

“S. E. Pietro Zaguri sent to me to ask if I knew where you were, because he had written two letters to Spa and had received no reply … .”

II — PARIS

ON THE NIGHT of the 18th or 19th September 1783, Casanova arrived at Paris.

On the 30th he wrote Francesca that he had been well received by his sister-in-law and by his brother, Francesco Casanova, the painter. Nearly all his friends had departed for the other world, and he would now have to make new ones, which would be difficult as he was no longer pleasing to the women.

On the 14th October he wrote again, saying that he was in good health and that Paris was a paradise which made him feel twenty years old. Four letters followed; in the first, dated from Paris on S. Martin's Day, he told Francesco not to reply for he did not know whether he would prolong his visit nor where he might go. Finding no fortune in Paris, he said he would go and search elsewhere. On the 23rd, he sent one hundred and fifty lires; "a true blessing," to the poor girl who was always short of money.

Between times, Casanova passed eight days at Fontainebleau, where he met "a charming young man of twenty-five," the son of "the young and lovely O'Morphi" who indirectly owed to him her position, in 1752, as the mistress of Louis XV. "I wrote my name on his tablets and begged him to present my compliments to his mother."

He also met, in the same place, his own son by Mme. Dubois, his former housekeeper at Soleure who had married the good M. Lebel. "We shall hear of the young gentleman in twenty-one years at Fontainebleau."

"When I paid my third visit to Paris, with the intention of ending my days in that capital, I reckoned on the friendship of M. d'Alembert, but he died, like, Fontenelle, a fortnight after my arrival, toward the end of 1783."

It is interesting to know that, at this time, Casanova met his famous contemporary, Benjamin Franklin. "A few days after the death of the illustrious d'Alembert," Casanova assisted, at the old Louvre, in a session of the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. "Seated beside the learned Franklin, I was a little surprised to hear Condorcet ask him if he believed that one could give various directions to an air balloon. This was the response: ‘The matter is still in its infancy, so we must wait.’ I was surprised. It is not believable that the great philosopher could ignore the fact that it would be impossible to give the machine any other direction than that governed by the air which fills it, but these people ‘nil tam verentur, quam ne dubitare aliqua de re videantur.”

On the 13th November, Casanova left Paris in company with his brother, Francesco, whose wife did not accompany him. “His new wife drove him away from Paris.”

“Now [1797 or 1798] I feel that I have seen Paris and France for the last time. That popular effervescence [the French Revolution] has disgusted me and I am too old to hope to see the end of it.”

III — VIENNA

ON THE 29TH November, Casanova wrote from Frankfort that a drunken postilion had upset him and in the fall he had dislocated his left shoulder, but that a good bone-setter had restored it to place. On the 1st December he wrote that he was healed, having taken medicine and having been blooded. He promised to send Francesca eight sequins to pay her rent. He reached Vienna about the 7th of December and on the 15th sent Francesco a bill of exchange for eight sequins and two lires.

On the last day of 1783, Francesca wrote to him at Vienna:

“I see by your good letter that you will go to Dresden and then to Berlin and that you will return to Vienna the 10th January … . I am astonished, my dear friend, at the great journeys you make in this cold weather, but, still, you are a great man, big-hearted, full of spirit and courage; you travel in this terrible cold as though it were nothing … . “

On the 9th January, Casanova wrote from Dessau to his brother Giovanni, proposing to make peace with him, but without results. On the 27th, he was at Prague. By the 16th February, he was again in Vienna, after a trip lasting sixty-two days. His health was perfect, and he had gained flesh due, as he wrote Francesca, to his contented mind which was no longer tormented.

In February, he entered the service of M. Foscarini, Venetian Ambassador, “to write dispatches.”

On the 10th March, Francesca wrote:

“Dearest of Friends, I reply at once to your good letter of the 28th February which I received Sunday … . I thank you for your kindness which makes you say that you love me and that when you have money you will send me some … but that at the moment you are dry as a salamander. I do not know what sort of animal that is. But as for me I am certainly dry of money and I am consumed with the hope of having some … . I see that you were amused at the Carnival and that you were four times at the masked ball, where there were two hundred women, and that you danced minuets and quadrilles to the great astonishment of the ambassador Foscarini who told everyone that you were sixty years old, although in reality you have not yet reached your sixtieth year. You might well laugh at that and say that he must be blind to have such an idea.

"I see that you assisted, with your brother, at a grand dinner at the Ambassador's … .

"You say that you have read my letters to your brother and that he salutes me. Make him my best compliments and thank him. You ask me to advise you whether, if he should happen to return to Venice with you, he could lodge with you in your house. Tell him yes, because the chickens are always in the loft and make no dirt; and, as for the dogs, one watches to see that they do not make dirt. The furniture of the apartment is already in place; it lacks only a wardrobe and the little bed which you bought for your nephew and the mirror; as for the rest, everything is as you left it… ."

It is possible that, at the "grand dinner," Casanova was presented to Count Waldstein, without whose kindness to Casanova the Memoirs probably would never have been written. The Lord of Dux, Joseph Charles Emmanuel Waldstein-Wartenberg, Chamberlain to Her Imperial Majesty, descendant of the great Wallenstein, was the elder of the eleven children of Emmanuel Philibert, Count Waldstein, and Maria Theresa, Princess Liechtenstein. Very egotistic and willful in his youth, careless of his affairs, and an imprudent gambler, at thirty years of age he had not yet settled down. His mother was disconsolated that her son could not separate himself from occupations "so little suited to his spirit and his birth:"

On the 13th March 1784, Count Lamberg wrote Casanova: "I know M. le C. de Waldstein through having heard him praised by judges worthy of appreciating the transcendent qualities of more than one kind peculiar to the Count. I congratulate you on having such a Maecenas, and I congratulate him in his turn on having chosen such a man as yourself." Which last remark certainly foreshadows the library at Dux.

Later, on the lath March, 1785, Zaguri wrote: "In two months at the latest, all will be settled. I am very happy." Referring further, it is conjectured, to Casanova's hopes of placing himself with the Count.

IV — LETTERS FROM FRANCESCA

20TH MARCH 1784. “I see that you will print one of your books; you say that you will send me two hundred copies which I can sell at thirty sous each; that you will tell Zaguri and that he will advise those who wish copies to apply to me …”

This book was the Lettre historico-critique sur un fait connu dependant d’une cause peu connue, adressee au duc de * * *, 1784.

3rd April 1784. “I see with pleasure that you have gone to amuse yourself in company with two ladies and that you have traveled five posts to see the Emperor [Joseph II] … . You say that your fortune consists of one sequin … . I hope that you obtained permission to print your book, that you will send me the two hundred copies, and that I may be able to sell them… .”

14th April 1784. “You say that a man without money is the image of death, that he is a very wretched animal. I learn with regret that I am unlikely to see you at the approaching Festival of the Ascension … that you hope to see me once more before dying … . You make me laugh, telling me that at Vienna a balloon was made which arose in the air with six persons and that it might be that you would go up also.”

28th April 1784. “I see, to my lively regret, that you have been in bed with your usual ailment [hemorrhoids]. But I am pleased to know that you are better. You certainly should go to the baths … . I have been discouraged in seeing that you have not come to Venice because you have no money …. P. S. Just at this moment I have received a good letter, enclosing a bill of exchange, which I will go and have paid … .”

5th May 1784. “I went to the house of M. Francesco Manenti, at S. Polo di Campo, with my bill of exchange, and he gave me at once eighteen pieces of ten lires each … . I figure that you made fun of me saying seriously that you will go up in a balloon and that, if the wind is favorable, you will go in the air to Trieste and then from Trieste to Venice.”

19th May 1784. “I see, to my great regret, that you are in poor health and still short of money …. You say that you need twenty sequins and that you have only twenty trari … . I hope that your book is printed… .”

29th May 1784. “I note with pleasure that you are going to take the baths; but I regret that this treatment enfeebles and depresses you. It reassures me that you do not fail in your appetite nor your sleep…. I hope I will not hear you say again that you are disgusted with everything, and no longer in love with life … . I see that for you, at this moment, fortune sleeps … . I am not surprised that everything is so dear in the city where you are, for at Venice also one pays dearly and everything is priced beyond reach.”

Zaguri wrote Casanova the 12th May, that he had met Francesca in the Mongolfieri casino. And on the 2nd June Casanova, doubtless feeling his helplessness in the matter of money, and the insufficiency of his occasional remittances, and suspicious of Francesca’s loyalty, wrote her a letter of renunciation. Then came her news of the sale of his books; and eighteen months passed before he wrote to her again.

On the 12th June 1784, Francesca replied: “I could not expect to convey to you, nor could you figure, the sorrow that tries me in seeing that you will not occupy yourself any more with me … . I hid from you that I had been with that woman who lived with us, with her companion, the cashier of the Academie des Mongolfceristes. Although I went to this Academy with prudence and dignity, I did not want to write you for fear you would scold me. That is the only reason, and hereafter you may be certain of my sincerity and frankness… . I beg you to forgive me this time, if I write you something I have never written for fear that you would be angry with me because I had not told you. Know then that four months ago, your books which were on the mezzanine were sold to a library for the sum of fifty lires, when we were in urgent need. It was my mother who did it… .”

26th June 1784. “… Mme. Zenobia [de Monti] has asked me if I would enjoy her company. Certain that you would consent I have allowed her to come and live with me. She has sympathy for me and has always loved me.”

7th July 1784. “Your silence greatly disturbs me! To receive no more of your letters! By good post I have sent you three letters, with this one, and you have not replied to any of them. Certainly, you have reason for being offended at me, because I hid from you something which you learned from another … . But you might have seen, from my last letter, that I have written you all the truth about my fault and that I have asked your pardon for not writing it before…. Without you and your help, God knows what will become of us…. For the rent of your chamber Mme. Zenobia will give us eight lires a month and five lires for preparing her meals. But what can one do with thirteen lires! … I am afflicted and mortified… . Do not abandon me.”

V — LAST DAYS AT VIENNA

IN 1785, AT Vienna, Casanova ran across Costa, his former secretary who, in 1761, had fled from him taking “diamonds, watches, snuffbox, linen, rich suits and a hundred louis.” “In 1785, I found this runagate at Vienna. He was then Count Erdich’s man, and when we come to that period, the reader shall hear what I did.”

Casanova did not reach this period, in writing his Memoirs, but an account of this meeting is given by Da Ponte, who was present at it, in his Memoirs. Costa had met with many misfortunes, as he told Casanova, and had himself been defrauded. Casanova threatened to have him hanged, but according to Da Ponte, was dissuaded from this by counter accusations made by Costa.

Da Ponte’s narration of the incident is brilliant and amusing, in spite of our feeling that it is maliciously exaggerated: “Strolling one morning in the Graben with Casanova, I suddenly saw him knit his brows, squawk, grind his teeth, twist himself, raise his hands skyward, and, snatching himself away from me, throw himself on a man whom I seemed to know, shouting with a very loud voice: ‘Murderer, I have caught thee.’ A crowd having gathered as a result of this strange act and yell, I approached them with some disgust; nevertheless, I caught Casanova’s hand and almost by force I separated him from the fray. He then told me the story, with desperate motions and gestures, and said that his antagonist was Gioachino Costa, by whom he had been betrayed. This Gioachino Costa, although he had been forced to become a servant by his vices and bad practices, and was at that very time servant to a Viennese gentleman, was more or less of a poet. He was, in fact, one of those who had honored me with their satire, when the Emperor Joseph selected me as poet of his theater. Costa entered a cafe, and while I continued to walk with Casanova, wrote and send him by a messenger, the following verses:

You stole, indeed, as well as I;

You were the one who first taught me;

Your art I mastered thoroughly.

Silence your wisest course will be.'

"These verses had the desired effect. After a brief silence, Casanova laughed and then said softly in my ear: 'The rogue is right.' He went into the cafe and motioned to Costa to come out; they began to walk together calmly, as if nothing had happened, and they parted shaking hands repeatedly and seemingly calm and friendly. Casanova returned to me with a cameo on his little finger, which by a strange coincidence, represented Mercury, the god-protector of thieves. This was his greatest valuable, and it was all that was left of the immense booty, but represented the character of the two restored friends, perfectly."

Da Ponte precedes this account with a libellous narrative of Casanova's relations with the Marquise d'Urfe, even stating that Casanova stole from her the jewels stolen in turn by Costa, but, as M. Maynial remarks, we may attribute this perverted account "solely to the rancour and antipathy of the narrator." It is more likely that Casanova frightened Costa almost out of his wits, was grimly amused at his misfortunes, and let him go, since there was no remedy to Casanova's benefit, for his former rascality. Casanova's own brief, anticipatory account is given in his Memoirs.

In 1797, correcting and revising his Memoirs, Casanova wrote: "Twelve years ago, if it had not been for my guardian angel, I would have foolishly married, at Vienna, a young, thoughtless girl, with whom I had fallen in love." In which connection, his remark is interesting: "I have loved women even to madness, but I have always loved liberty better; and whenever I have been in danger of losing it, fate has come to my rescue."

While an identification of the "young, thoughtless girl" has been impossible, M. Rava believes her to be "C. M.," the subject of a poem found at Dux, written in duplicate, in Italian and French, and headed "Giacomo Casanova, in love, to C. M."

"When, Catton, to your sight is shown the love Which all my tenderest caresses prove, Feeling all pleasure's sharpest joys and fears, Burning one moment, shivering the next, Caressing you while showering you with tears, Giving each charm a thousand eager kisses, Wishing to touch at once a thousand blisses And, at the ones beyond my power, vexed, Abandoned in a furious desire, Leaving these charms for other charms that fire, Possessing all and yet desiring Until, destroyed by excesses of pleasure, Finding no words of love nor anything To express my fires overflowing measure Than deepening sighs and obscure murmuring: Ah! Then you think to read my inmost heart To find the love that can these signs impart ….Be not deceived. These transports, amorous cries, These kisses, tears, desires and heavy sighs, Of all the fire which devours me Could less than even the lightest tokens be."

Evidently this same girl is the authoress of the two following letters written by "Caton M … ." to Casanova in 1786.

12th April 1786. "You will infinitely oblige me if you will tell me to whom you wrote such pretty things about me; apparently it is the Abbe Da Ponte; but I would go to his house and, either he would prove that you had written it or I would have the honor of telling him that he is the most infamous traducer in the world. I think that the lovely picture which you make of my future has not as much excuse as you may think, and, in spite of your science, you deceive yourself…. But just now I will inform you of all my wooers and you can judge for yourself by this whether I deserve all the reproaches you made me in your last letter. It is two years since I came to know the Count de K … ; I could have loved him but I was too honest to be willing to satisfy his desires … . Some months afterward, I came to know the Count de M … ; he was not so handsome as K … , but he possessed every possible art for seducing a girl; I did everything for him, but I never loved him as much as his friend. In fine, to tell you all my giddinesses in a few words, I set everything right again with K … . and got myself into a quarrel with M … ., then I left K… . and returned to M … ., but at the house of the latter there was always an officer who pleased me more than both the two others and who sometimes conducted me to the house; then we found ourselves at the house of a friend, and it is of this same officer that I am ill. So, my dear friend, that is all. I do not seek to justify my past conduct; on the contrary, I know well that I have acted badly…. I am much afflicted at being the cause of your remaining away from Venice during the Carnival … . I hope to see you soon again and am, with much love,

"Monsieur, your sincere

“Caton M… .”

16th July 1786. “I have spoken with the Abbe Da Ponte. He invited me to come to his house because, he said, he had something to tell me for you. I went there, but was received so coldly that I am resolved not to go there again. Also, Mlle. Nanette affected an air of reserve and took at on herself to read me lessons on what she was pleased to call my libertinism … . I beg that you will write nothing more about me to these two very dangerous personages…. Just now I will tell you of a little trick which I played on you, which without doubt deserves some punishment. The young, little Kasper, whom you formerly loved, came to ask me for the address of her dear Monsieur de Casanova, so that she could write a very tender letter full of recollections. I had too much politeness to wish to refuse a pretty girl, who was once the favorite of my lover, so just a request, so I gave her the address she wished; but I addressed the letter to a city far from you. Is it not, my dear friend, that you would like well to know the name of the city, so that you could secure the letter by posts. But you can depend on my word that you will not know it until you have written me a very long letter begging me very humbly to indicate the place where the divine letter of the adorable object of your vows has gone. You might well make this sacrifice for a girl in whom the Emperor [Joseph II] interests himself, for it is known that, since your departure from Vienna, it is he who is teaching her French and music; and apparently he takes the trouble of instructing her himself, for she often goes to his house to thank him for his kindnesses to her, but I know not in what way she expresses herself.

“Farewell, my dear friend. Think sometimes of me and believe that I am your sincere friend.”

On the 23rd April 1785, the ambassador Foscarini died, depriving Casanova of a protector, probably leaving him without much money, and not in the best of health. He applied for the position of secretary to Count Fabris, his former friend, whose name had been changed from Tognolo, but without success. Casanova then determined to go to Berlin in the hope of a place in the Academy. On the 30th July he arrived at Bruen in Moravia, where his friend Maximilian-Joseph, Count Lamberg gave him, among other letters of recommendation, a letter addressed to Jean-Ferdinand Opiz, Inspector of Finances and Banks at Czaslau, in which he wrote:

“A celebrated man, M. Casanova, will deliver to you, my dear friend, the visiting card with which he is charged for Mme. Opiz and yourself. Knowing this amiable and remarkable man, will mark an epoch in your life, be polite and friendly to him, ‘quod ipsi facies in mei memoriam faciatis’. Keep yourself well, write to me, and if you can direct him to some honest man at Carlsbad, fail not to do so… .”

On the 15th August 1785, M. Opiz wrote Count Lamberg about Casanova’s visit:

“Your letter of the 30th, including your cards for my wife and myself, was delivered the first of this month by M. Casanova. He was very anxious to meet the Princess Lubomirski again at Carlsbad. But as something about his carriage was broken, he was obliged to stop in Czaslau for two hours which he passed in my company. He has left Czaslau with the promise of giving me a day on his return. I am already delighted. Even in the short space of time in which I enjoyed his company, I found in him a man worthy of our highest consideration and of our love, a benevolent philosopher whose homeland is the great expanse of our planet (and not Venice alone) and who values only the men in the kings … . I know absolutely no one at Carlsbad, so I sincerely regret being unable to recommend him to anyone there, according to your desire. He did not wish, on account of his haste, to pause even at Prague and, consequently, to deliver, at this time, your letter to Prince Furstemberg.”

PART THE THIRD — DUX — 1786-1798

I — THE CASTLE AT DUX

IT IS UNCERTAIN how long Casanova remained at Carlsbad. While there, however, he met again the Polish nobleman Zawoiski, with whom he had gambled in Venice in 1746. “As to Zawoiski, I did not tell him the story until I met him in Carlsbad old and deaf, forty years later.” He did not return to Czaslau, but in September 1785 he was at Teplitz where he found Count Waldstein whom he accompanied to his castle at Dux.

From this time onward he remained almost constantly at the castle where he was placed in charge of the Count’s library and given a pension of one thousand florins annually.

Describing his visit to the castle in 1899, Arthur Symons writes: “I had the sensation of an enormous building: all Bohemian castles are big, but this one was like a royal palace. Set there in the midst of the town, after the Bohemian fashion, it opens at the back upon great gardens, as if it were in the midst of the country. I walked through room after room, corridor after corridor; everywhere there were pictures, everywhere portraits of Wallenstein, and battle scenes in which he led on his troops. The library, which was formed, or at least arranged, by Casanova, and which remains as he left it, contains some twenty-five thousand volumes, some of them of considerable value … . The library forms part of the Museum, which occupies a ground-floor wing of the castle. The first room is an armoury, in which all kinds of arms are arranged, in a decorative way, covering the ceiling and the walls with strange patterns. The second room contains pottery, collected by Casanova’s Waldstein on his Eastern travels. The third room is full of curious mechanical toys, and cabinets, and carvings in ivory. Finally, we come to the library, contained in the two innermost rooms. The book shelves are painted white and reach to the low vaulted ceilings, which are whitewashed. At the end of a bookcase, in the corner of one of the windows, hangs a fine engraved portrait of Casanova.”

In this elaborate setting, Casanova found the refuge he so sadly needed for his last years. The evil days of Venice and Vienna, and the problems and makeshifts of mere existence, were left behind. And for this refuge he paid the world with his Memoirs.

II — LETTERS FROM FRANCESCA

IN 1786, CASANOVA renewed his correspondence with Francesca, who wrote:

1st July 1786. “After a silence of a year and a half, I received from you yesterday a good letter which has consoled me in informing me that you are in perfect health. But, on the other hand, I was much pained to see that in your letter you did not call me Friend, but Madame … . You have reason to chide me and to reproach me for having rented a house without surety or means of paying the rent. As to the advice you give me that if some honest person would pay me my rent, or at least a part of it, I should have no scruples about taking it because a little more, or a little less, would be of little importance … . I declare to you that I have been disconsolated at receiving from you such a reproach which is absolutely unjustified … . You tell me that you have near you a young girl who merits all your solicitations and your love, she and her family of six persons who adore you and give you every attention; that she costs you all you have, so that you cannot send me even a sou … . I am pained to hear you say that you will never return to Venice, and yet I hope to see you again… .”

The “young girl” referred to in Francesca’s letter was Anna-Dorothea Kleer, daughter of the porter of the castle. This young girl became pregnant in 1786 and Casanova was accused of seducing her. The guilty one, however, was a painter named Schottner who married the unfortunate girl in January 1787.

9th August 1786.

“My only true friend,

“It is two days since I received your dear letter; I was very happy to see your writing …. You have reason to mortify me and reproach me in recalling all the troubles I caused you, and especially that which you call treachery, the sale of your books, of which in part I was not guilty … . Forgive me, my dear friend, me and my foolish mother who, despite all my objections, absolutely insisted on selling them. Regarding that which you write me that you know that my mother, last year, told about that you had been my ruin, this may unhappily be true, since you already know the evil thoughts of my mother, who even says that you are still at Venice … . When have I not been always sincere with you, and when have I not at least listened to your good advices and offers? I am in a desperate situation, abandoned by all, almost in the streets, almost about to be homeless … . Where are all the pleasures which formerly you procured me? Where are the theatres, the comedies which we once saw together? …"

5th January 1787.

"The first of the year I received your dear letter with the bill of exchange for one hundred and twenty-five lires which you sent me so generously … . You say you have forgiven me for all the troubles I have caused you. Forget all, then, and do not accuse me any more of things which are but too true and of which the remembrance alone cuts me to the heart … . You write me that you have been forgotten by a person of whom you were very fond, that she is married and that you have not seen her for more than a month."

The "person" referred to was Anna Kleer.

5th October 1787.

… . "Until the other day, I had been waiting for your arrival, hoping that you would come to assist at the entry of the Procurator Memmo … . I see by your good letter that you were not able to get away, since your presence is nearly always necessary in the great castle … . I learn of the visit you have received from the Emperor who wished to see your library of forty-thousand volumes! … You say that you detest the chase and that you are unhappy when politeness obliges you to go … . I am pleased to know that you are in good health, that you are stout and that you have a good appetite and sleep well … . I hope that the printing of your book [Histoire de ma fuite] is going according to your wishes. If you go to Dresden for the marriage of your niece, enjoy yourself for me … . Forget not to write to me; this gives me such pleasure! Remember me. Full of confidence in your friendship, I am, and always will be, your true and sincere friend,

"Francesca Buschina."

III — CORRESPONDENCE AND ACTIVITIES

IN 1787, A book was published under the title of ‘Dreissig Brief uber Galizien by Traunpaur’, which included this passage: “The most famous adventurers of two sorts (there are two, in fact: honest adventurers and adventurers of doubtful reputation) have appeared on the scene of the kingdom of Poland. The best known on the shores of the Vistula are: the miraculous Cagliostro: Boisson de Quency, grand charlatan, soldier of fortune, decorated with many orders, member of numerous Academies: the Venetian Casanova of Saint-Gall, a true savant, who fought a duel with Count Branicki: the Baron de Poellnitz … the lucky Count Tomatis, who knew so well how to correct fortune, and many others.”

In June 1789, Casanova received a letter from Teresa Boisson de Quency, the wife of the adventurer above referred to:

“Much honored Monsieur Giacomo:

“For a long time I have felt a very particular desire to evidence to you the estimation due your spirit and your eminent qualities: the superb sonnet augmented my wish. But the inconveniences of childbirth and the cares required by a little girl whom I adore, made me defer this pleasure. During my husband’s absence, your last and much honored letter came to my hands. Your amiable compliments to me, engage me to take the pen to give you renewed assurance that you have in me a sincere admirer of your great talent … . When I wish to point out a person who writes and thinks with excellence, I name Monsieur Casanova … .”

In 1793, Teresa de Quency wished to return to Venice at which time Zaguri wrote Casanova: “The Bassani has received letters from her husband which tell her nothing more than that he is alive.”

Casanova passed the months of May, June and July 1788 at Prague, supervising the printing of the Histoire de ma fuite.

“I remember laughing very heartily at Prague, six years ago, on learning that some thin-skinned ladies, on reading my flight from The Leads, which was published at that date, took great offense at the above account, which they thought I should have done well to leave out."

In May he was troubled with an attack of the grippe. In October, he was in Dresden, apparently with his brother. Around this time "The Magdalene," a painting by Correggio, was stolen from the Museum of the Elector.

On the 30th October 1788, Casanova wrote to the Prince Belozelski, Russian Minister to the Court of Dresden: "Tuesday morning, after having embraced my dear brother, I got into a carriage to return here. At the barrier on the outskirts of Dresden, I was obliged to descend, and six men carried the two chests of my carriage, my two night-bags and my capelire into a little chamber on the ground level, demanded my keys, and examined everything … . The youngest of these infamous executors of such an order told me they were searching for 'The Magdalene! … The oldest had the impudence to put his hands on my waistcoat … . At last they let me go.

"This, my prince, delayed me so that I could not reach Petervalden by daylight. I stopped at an evil tavern where, dying of famine and rage, I ate everything I saw; and, wishing to drink and not liking beer, I gulped down some beverage which my host told me was good and which did not seem unpleasant. He told me that it was Pilnitz Moste. This beverage aroused a rebellion in my guts. I passed the night tormented by a continual diarrhoea. I arrived here the day before yesterday (the 28th), where I found an unpleasant duty awaiting me. Two months ago, I brought a woman here to cook, needing her while the Count is away; as soon as she arrived, I gave her a room and I went to Leipzig. On returning here, I found three servants in the hands of surgeons and all three blame my cook for putting them in such a state. The Count's courier had already told me, at Leipzig, that she had crippled him. Yesterday the Count arrived and would do nothing but laugh, but I have sent her back and exhorted her to imitate the Magdalene. The amusing part is that she is old, ugly and ill-smelling."

In 1789, 1791 and 1792, Casanova received three letters from Maddalena Allegranti, the niece of J. B. Allegranti the innkeeper with whom Casanova lodged at Florence in 1771. "This young person, still a child, was so pretty, so gracious, with such spirit and such charms, that she incessantly distracted me. Sometimes she would come into my chamber to wish me good-morning … . Her appearance, her grace, the sound of her voice … were more than I could resist; and, fearing the seduction would excuse mine, I could find no other expedient than to take flight… . Some years later, Maddalena became a celebrated musician."

At this period of Casanova's life, we hear again of the hussy who so upset Casanova during his visit to London that he was actually on the point of committing suicide through sheer desperation. On the 20th September 1789, he wrote to the Princess Clari, sister of the Prince de Ligne: "I am struck by a woman at first sight, she completely ravishes me, and I am perhaps lost, for she may be a Charpillon."

There were, among the papers at Dux, two letters from Marianne Charpillon, and a manuscript outlining the story of Casanova's relations with her and her family, as detailed in the Memoirs: With the story in mind, the letters from this girl, "the mistress, now of one, now of another," are of interest:

"I know not, Monsieur, whether you forgot the engagement Saturday last; as for me, I remember that you consented to give us the pleasure of having you at dinner to-day, Monday, the 12th of the month. I would greatly like to know whether your ill-humor has left you; this would please me. Farewell, in awaiting the honor of seeing you.

"Marianne de Charpillon."

"Monsieur,

"As I have a part in all which concerns you, I am greatly put out to know of the new illness which incommodes you; I hope that this will be so trifling that we will have the pleasure of seeing you well and at our house, to-day or to-morrow.

"And, in truth, the gift which you sent me is so pretty that I know not how to express to you the pleasure it has given me and how much I value it; and I cannot see why you must always provoke me by telling me that it is my fault that you are filled with bile, while I am as innocent as a new-born babe and would wish you so gentle and patient that your blood would become a true clarified syrup; this will come to you if you follow my advice. I am, Monsieur,

"Your very humble servant,

“[Marianne Charpillon]

“Wednesday at six o’clock”

On the 8th April, 1790, Zaguri wrote in reference to vertigo of which Casanova complained: “Have you tried riding horseback? Do you not think that is an excellent preservative? I tried it this last summer and I find myself very well.”

In 1790, Casanova had a conversation with the Emperor Joseph II at Luxemburg, on the subject of purchased nobility, which he reports in the Memoirs.

This same year, attending the coronation of Leopold at Prague, Casanova met his grandson (and, probably, as he himself believed, his own son), the son of Leonilda, who was the daughter of Casanova and Donna Lucrezia, and who was married to the Marquis C … . In 1792, Leonilda wrote, inviting Casanova to “spend the remainder of my days with her.”

In February 1791, Casanova wrote to Countess Lamberg: “I have in my capitularies more than four hundred sentences which pass for aphorisms and which include all the tricks which place one word for another. One can read in Livy that Hannibal overcame the Alps by means of vinegar. No elephant ever uttered such a stupidity. Livy? Not at all. Livy was not a beast; it is you who are, foolish instructor of credulous youth! Livy did not say aceto which means vinegar, but aceta which means axe.”

In April 1791, Casanova wrote to Carlo Grimani at Venice, stating that he felt he had committed a great fault in publishing his libel, ‘Ne amori ne donne’, and very humbly begging his pardon. Also that his Memoirs would be composed of six volumes in octavo with a seventh supplementary volume containing codicils.

In June, Casanova composed for the theater of Princess Clari, at Teplitz, a piece entitled: ‘Le Polemoscope ou la Calomnie demasquee par la presence d’esprit, tragicomedie en trois actes’. The manuscript was preserved at Dux, together with another form of the same, having the sub-title of ‘La Lorgnette Menteuse ou la Calomnie demasquee’. It may be assumed that the staging of this piece was an occasion of pleasant activity for Casanova.

In January 1792, during Count Waldstein’s absence in London or Paris, Casanova was embroiled with M. Faulkircher, maitre d’hotel, over the unpleasant matter indicated in two of Casanova’s letters to this functionary:

“Your rascally Vidierol … tore my portrait out of one of my books, scrawled my name on it, with the epithet which you taught him and then stuck it on the door of the privy ….

“Determined to make sure of the punishment of your infamous valet, and wishing at the same time to give proof of my respect for Count Waldstein, not forgetting that, as a last resort, I have the right to invade his jurisdiction, I took an advocate, wrote my complaint and had it translated into German … . Having heard of this at Teplitz, and having known that I would not save your name, you came to my chamber to beg me to write whatever I wished but not to name you because it would place you wrong before the War Council and expose you to the loss of your pension … . I have torn up my first complaint and have written a second in Latin, which an advocate of Bilin has translated for me and which I have deposited at the office of the judiciary at Dux….”

Following this matter, Casanova attended the Carnival at Oberleutensdorf, and left at Dux a manuscript headed ‘Passe temps de Jacques Casanova de Seingalt pour le carnaval de l’an 1792 dans le bourg d’Oberleutensdorf’. While in that city, meditating on the Faulkircher incident, he wrote also ‘Les quinze pardons, monologue nocturne du bibliothecaire’, also preserved in manuscript at Dux, in which we read:

“Gerron, having served twenty years as a simple soldier, acquired a great knowledge of military discipline. This man was not yet seventy years old. He had come to believe, partly from practice, partly from theory, that twenty blows with a baton on the rump are not dishonoring. When the honest soldier was unfortunate enough to deserve them, he accepted them with resignation. The pain was sharp, but not lasting; it did not deprive him of either appetite nor honor … . Gerron, becoming a corporal, had obtained no idea of any kind of sorrow other than that coming from the blows of a baton on the rump … . On this idea, he thought that the soul of an honest man was no different than a soldier’s breech. If Gerron caused trouble to the spirit of a man of honor, he thought that this spirit, like his own, had only a rump, and that any trouble he caused would pass likewise. He deceived himself. The breech of the spirit of an honest man is different than the breech of the spirit of a Gerron who rendered compatible the rank of a military officer with the vile employments of a domestic and the stable-master of some particular lord. Since Gerron deceived himself, we must pardon him all his faults …" etc.

Casanova complained of the Faulkircher incident to the mother of Count Waldstein, who wrote: "I pity you, Monsieur, for being obliged to live among such people and in such evil company, but my son will not forget that which he owes to himself and I am sure he will give you all the satisfaction you wish." Also to his friend Zaguri, who wrote, the 16th March: "I hope that the gout in your hand will not torment you any more… . You have told me the story I asked about and which begins: 'Two months have passed since an officer, who is at Vienna, insulted me!' I cannot understand whether he who wrote you an insulting letter is at Vienna or whether he is at Dux. When will the Count return? … You should await his return because you would have, among other reasons to present to him, that of not wishing to have recourse to other jurisdiction than his… You say your letters have been intercepted? Someone has put your portrait in the privy? The devil! It is a miracle that you have not killed someone. Positively, I am curious to know the results and I hope that you make no mistakes in this affair which appears to me very delicate."

In August 1792, or thereabouts, Da Ponte on his way to Dresden, visited Casanova at Dux, in the hope of collecting an old debt, but gave up this hope on realizing Casanova's limited resources. In the winter of 1792-3 Da Ponte found himself in great distress in Holland. "Casanova was the only man to whom I could apply," he writes in his Memoirs. "To better dispose him, I thought to write him in verse, depicting my troubles and begging him to send me some money on account of that which he still owed me. Far from considering my request, he contented himself with replying, in vulgar prose, by a laconic billet which I transcribe: 'When Cicero wrote to his friends, he avoided telling them of his affairs.'"

In May 1793, Da Ponte wrote from London: "Count Waldstein has lived a very obscure life in London, badly lodged, badly dressed, badly served, always in cabarets, cafes, with porters, with rascals, with … we will leave out the rest. He has the heart of an angel and an excellent character, but not so good a head as ours."

Toward the end of 1792, Cssanova wrote a letter to Robespierre, which, as he advises M. Opiz, the 13th January 1793, occupied one hundred and twenty folio pages. This letter was not to be found at Dux and it may possibly have been sent, or may have been destroyed by Casanova on the advice of Abbe O'Kelly. Casanova's feelings were very bitter over the trial of Louis XVI., and in his letters to M. Opiz he complained bitterly of the Jacobins and predicted the ruin of France. Certainly, to Casanova, the French Revolution represented the complete overthrow of many of his cherished illusions.

On the 1st August 1793, Wilhelmina Rietz, Countess Lichtenau (called the Pompadour of Frederic-William II., King of Prussia) wrote to the librarian at Dux:

“Monsieur

“It seems impossible to know where Count Valstaine [Waldstein] is staying, whether he is in Europe, Africa, America, or possibly the Megamiques. If he is there, you are the only one who could insure his receiving the enclosed letter.

“For my part, I have not yet had time to read their history, but the first reading I do will assuredly be that.

“Mademoiselle Chappuis has the honor of recalling herself to your memory, and I have that of being your very humble servant,

“Wilhelmina Rietz.”

The allusions to a “history” and to the ‘Megamiques’ in this letter refer to Casanova's romance, ‘Icosameron’.

About this time, Count Waldstein returned to Dux after having been, at Paris, according to Da Ponte, concerned in planning the flight of Louis XVI., and in attempting to save the Princess Lamballe. On the 17th August, Casanova replied to the above letter:

“Madame,

“I handed the Count your letter two minutes after having received it, finding him easily. I told him that he should respond at once, for the post was ready to go; but, as he begged to wait for the following ordinary, I did not insist. The day before yesterday, he begged me to wait again, but he did not find me so complaisant. I respond to you, Madame, for his carelessness in replying to letters is extreme; he is so shameful that he is in despair when he is obliged to it. Although he may not respond, be sure of seeing him at your house at Berlin after the Leipzig Fair, with a hundred bad excuses which you will laugh at and pretend to believe good ones … . This last month, my wish to see Berlin again has become immeasurable, and I will do my best to have Count Waldstein take me there in the month of October or at least to permit me to go … . You have given me an idea of Berlin far different than that the city left with me when I passed four months there twenty-nine years ago … . If my 'Icosameron' interests you, I offer you its Spirit. I wrote it here two years ago and I would not have published it if I had not dared hope that the Theological Censor would permit it. At Berlin no one raised the least difficulty … . If circumstances do not permit me to pay you my respects at Berlin, I hope for the happiness of seeing you here next year … ."

Sometime after this and following his quarrel with M. Opiz, Casanova evidently passed through a period of depression, as indicated by a manuscript at Dux, headed "Short reflection of a philosopher who finds himself thinking of procuring his own death," and dated "the 13th December 1793, the day dedicated to S. Lucie, remarkable in my too long life."

"Life is a burden to me. What is the metaphysical being who prevents me from slaying myself? It is Nature. What is the other being who enjoins me to lighten the burdens of that life which brings me only feeble pleasures and heavy pains? It is Reason. Nature is a coward which, demanding only conservation, orders me to sacrifice all to its existence. Reason is a being which gives me resemblance to God, which treads instinct under foot and which teaches me to choose the best way after having well considered the reasons. It demonstrates to me that I am a man in imposing silence on the Nature which opposes that action which alone could remedy all my ills.

"Reason convinces me that the power I have of slaying myself is a privilege given me by God, by which I perceive that I am superior to all animals created in the world; for there is no animal who can slay itself nor think of slaying itself, except the scorpion, which poisons itself, but only when the fire which surrounds it convinces it that it cannot save itself from being burned. This animal slays itself because it fears fire more than death.

Reason tells me imperiously that I have the right to slay myself, with the divine oracle of Cen: ‘Qui non potest vivere bene non vivat male.’ These eight words have such power that it is impossible that a man to whom life is a burden could do other than slay himself on first hearing them.”

Certainly, however, Casanova did not deceive himself with these sophisms, and Nature, who for many years had unquestionably lavished her gifts on him, had her way.

Over the end of the year, the two mathematicians, Casanova and Opiz, at the request of Count Waldstein, made a scientific examination of the reform of the calendar as decreed the 5th October 1793 by the National Convention.

In January 1795, Casanova wrote to the Princess Lobkowitz to thank her for her gift of a little dog. On the 16th the Princess wrote from Vienna:

“Monsieur,

“I am enchanted at the charming reception you accorded the dog which I sent you when I learned of the death of your well-loved greyhound, knowing that she would nowhere be better cared for than with you, Monsieur. I hope with all my heart that she has all the qualities which may, in some fashion, help you to forget the deceased … .”

In the autumn of 1795, Casanova left Dux. The Prince de Ligne writes in his Memoirs: “God directed him to leave Dux. Scarcely believing in more than his death, which he no longer doubted, he pretended that each thing he had done was by the direction of God and this was his guide. God directed him to ask me for letters of recommendation to the Duke of Weimar, who was my good friend, to the Duchess of Gotha, who did not know me, and to the Jews of Berlin. And he departed secretly, leaving for Count Waldstein a letter at once tender, proud, honest and irritating. Waldstein laughed and said he would return. Casanova waited in ante-chambers; no one would place him either as governor, librarian or chamberlain. He said everywhere that the Germans were thorough beasts. The excellent and very amiable Duke of Weimer welcomed him wonderfully; but in an instant he became jealous of Goethe and Wieland, who were under the Duke’s protection. He declaimed against them and against the literature of the country which he did not, and could not, know. At Berlin, he declaimed against the ignorance, the superstition and the knavery of the Hebrews to whom I had addressed him, drawing meanwhile, for the money they claimed of him, bills of exchange on the Count who laughed, paid, and embraced him when he returned. Casanova laughed, wept, and told him that God had ordered him to make this trip of six weeks, to leave without speaking of it, and to return to his chamber at Dux. Enchanted at seeing us again, he agreeably related to us all the misfortunes which had tried him and to which his susceptibility gave the name of humiliations. 'I am proud,' he said, 'because I am nothing'… . Eight days after his return, what new troubles! Everyone had been served strawberries before him, and none remained for him."

The Prince de Ligne, although he was Casanova's sincere friend and admirer, gives a rather somber picture of Casanova's life at Dux: "It must not be imagined that he was satisfied to live quietly in the refuge provided him through the kindness of Waldstein. That was not within his nature. Not a day passed without trouble; something was certain to be wrong with the coffee, the milk, the dish of macaroni, which he required each day. There were always quarrels in the house. The cook had ruined his polenta; the coachman had given him a bad driver to bring him to see me; the dogs had barked all night; there had been more guests than usual and he had found it necessary to eat at a side table. Some hunting-horn had tormented his ear with its blasts; the priest had been trying to convert him; Count Waldstein had not anticipated his morning greeting; the servant had delayed with his wine; he had not been introduced to some distinguished personage who had come to see the lance which had pierced the side of the great Wallenstein; the Count had lent a book without telling him; a groom had not touched his hat to him; his German speech had been misunderstood; he had become angry and people had laughed at him."

Like Count Waldstein, however, the Prince de Ligne made the widest allowances, understanding the chafing of Casanova's restless spirit. "Casanova has a mind without an equal, from which each word is extraordinary and each thought a book."

On the 16th December, he wrote Casanova: "One is never old with your heart, your genius and your stomach."

Casanova's own comment on his trip away from Dux will be found in the Memoirs. "Two years ago, I set out for Hamburg, but my good genius made me return to Dux. What had I to do at Hamburg?”

On the 10th December, Casanova’s brother Giovanni [Jean] died. He was the Director of the Academy of Painting at Dresden. Apparently the two brothers could not remain friends.

Giovanni left two daughters, Teresa and Augusta, and two sons, Carlo and Lorenzo. While he was unable to remain friendly with his brother, Casanova apparently wished to be of assistance to his nieces, who were not in the best of circumstances, and he exchanged a number of letters with Teresa after her father’s death.

On the occasion of Teresa Casanova’s visit to Vienna in 1792, Princess Clari, oldest sister of the Prince de Ligne, wrote of her: “She is charming in every way, pretty as love, always amiable; she has had great success. Prince Kaunitz loves her to the point of madness.”

In a letter of the 25th April 1796, Teresa assured her “very amiable and very dear uncle” that the cautions, which occupied three-fourths of his letter, were unnecessary; and compared him with his brother Francois, to the injury of the latter. On the 5th May, Teresa wrote:

“Before thanking you for your charming letter, my very kind uncle, I should announce the issue of our pension of one hundred and sixty crowns a year, which is to say, eighty crowns apiece; I am well satisfied for I did not hope to receive so much.” In the same letter, Teresa spoke of seeing much of a “charming man,” Don Antonio, who was no other than the rascally adventurer Don Antonio della Croce with whom Casanova had been acquainted since 1753, who assisted Casanova in losing a thousand sequins at Milan in 1763; who in 1767, at Spa, following financial reverses, abandoned his pregnant mistress to the charge of Casanova; and who in August 1795, wrote to Casanova: “Your letter gave me great pleasure as the sweet souvenir of our old friendship, unique and faithful over a period of fifty years.”

It is probable that, at this time, Casanova visited Dresden and Berlin also. In his letter “To Leonard Snetlage,” he writes: “‘That which proves that revolution should arrive,’ a profound thinker said to me in Berlin, last year, ‘is that it has arrived.’”

On the 1st March, 1798, Carlo Angiolini, the son of Maria Maddalena, Casanova’s sister, wrote to Casanova: “This evening, Teresa will marry M. le Chambellan de Veisnicht [Von Wessenig] whom you know well.” This desirable marriage received the approval of Francesco also. Teresa, as the Baroness Wessenig, occupied a prominent social position at Dresden. She died in 1842.

Between the 13th February and the 6th December 1796, Casanova engaged in a correspondence with Mlle. Henriette de Schuckmann who was visiting at Bayreuth. This Henriette (unfortunately not the Henriette of the Memoirs whose “forty letters” to Casanova apparently have not been located), had visited the library at Dux in the summer of 1786. “I was with the Chamberlain Freiberg, and I was greatly moved, as much by your conversation as by your kindness which provided me with a beautiful edition of Metastasio, elegantly bound in red morocco.” Finding herself at Bayreuth in an enforced idleness and wishing a stimulant, wishing also to borrow some books, she wrote Casanova, under the auspices of Count Koenig, a mutual friend, the 13th February 1796, recalling herself to his memory. Casanova responded to her overtures and five of her letters were preserved at Dux. On the 28th May Henriette wrote:

“But certainly, my good friend, your letters have given me the greatest pleasure, and it is with a rising satisfaction that I pore over all you say to me. I love, I esteem, I cherish, your frankness … . I understand you perfectly and I love to distraction the lively and energetic manner with which you express yourself.”

On the 30th September, she wrote: “You will read to-day, if you please, a weary letter; for your silence, Monsieur, has given me humors. A promise is a debt, and in your last letter you promised to write me at least a dozen pages. I have every right to call you a bad debtor; I could summon you before a court of justice; but all these acts of vengeance would not repair the loss which I have endured through my hope and my fruitless waiting … . It is your punishment to read this trivial page; but although my head is empty, my heart is not so, and it holds for you a very living friendship.”

In March 1797, this Henriette went to Lausanne and in May from there to her father’s home at Mecklenburg.

IV — CORRESPONDENCE WITH JEAN-FERDINAND OPIZ

ON THE 27TH July 1792, Casanova wrote M. Opiz that he had finished the twelfth volume of his Memoirs, with his age at forty-seven years 1772. “Our late friend, the worthy Count Max Josef Lamberg,” he added, “could not bear the idea of my burning my Memoirs, and expecting to survive me, had persuaded me to send him the first four volumes. But now there is no longer any questions that his good soul has left his organs. Three weeks ago I wept for his death, all the more so as he would still be living if he had listened to me. I am, perhaps, the only one who knows the truth. He who slew him was the surgeon Feuchter at Cremsir, who applied thirty-six mercurial plasters on a gland in his left groin which was swollen but not by the pox, as I am sure by the description he gave me of the cause of the swelling. The mercury mounted to his esophagus and, being able to swallow neither solids nor fluids, he died the 23rd June of positive famine … . The interest of the bungling surgeon is to say that he died of the pox. This is not true, I beg, you to give the lie to anyone you hear saying it. I have before my eyes four hundred and sixty of his letters over which I weep and which I will burn. I have asked Count Leopold to burn mine, which he had saved, and I hope that he will please me by doing it. I have survived all my true friends. ‘Tempus abire mihi est’ Horace says to me.

“Returning to my Memoirs … I am a detestable man; but I do not care about having it known, and I do not aspire to the honor of the detestation of posterity. My work is full of excellent moral instructions. But to what good, if the charming descriptions of my offences excite the readers more to action than to repentance? Furthermore, knowing readers would divine the names of all the women and of the men which I have masked, whose transgressions are unknown to the world, my indiscretion would injure them, they would cry out against my perfidy, even though every word of my history were true … . Tell me yourself whether or not I should burn my work? I am curious to have your advice.”

On the 6th May 1793, Casanova wrote Opiz: “The letter of recommendation you ask of me to the professor my brother for your younger son, honors me; and there is no doubt that, having for you all the estimation your qualities merit, I should send it to you immediately. But this cannot be. And here is the reason. My brother is my enemy; he has given me sure indications of it and it appears that his hate will not cease until I no longer exist. I hope that he may long survive me and be happy. This desire is my only apology.”

“The epigraph of the little work which I would give to the public,” Casanova wrote the 23rd August 1793, “is ‘In pondere et mensura’. It is concerned with gravity and measure. I would demonstrate not only that the course of the stars is irregular but also that it is susceptible only to approximate measures and that consequently we must join physical and moral calculations in establishing celestial movements. For I prove that all fixed axes must have a necessarily irregular movement of oscillation, from which comes a variation in all the necessary curves of the planets which compose their eccentricities and their orbits. I demonstrate that light has neither body nor spirit; I demonstrate that it comes in an instant from its respective star; I demonstrate the impossibility of many parallaxes and the uselessness of many others. I criticize not only Tiko-Brahi, but also Kepler and Newton … .

“I wish to send you my manuscript and give you the trouble of publishing it with my name at Prague or elsewhere … . I will sell it to the printer or to yourself for fifty florins and twenty-five copies on fine paper when it is printed.”

But Opiz replied:

“As the father of a family, I do not feel myself authorized to dispose of my revenues on the impulse of my fancy or as my heart suggests…. and no offer of yours could make me a book-seller.”

This shows plainly enough that Opiz, for all his interest in Casanova, had not the qualities of true friendship.

On the 6th September 1793, Casanova wrote:

“I will have my Reveries printed at Dresden, and I will be pleased to send you a copy. I laughed a little at your fear that I would take offense because you did not want my manuscript by sending me the ridiculous sum I named to you. This refusal, my dear friend, did not offend me. On the contrary it was useful as an aid in knowing character. Add to this that in making the offer I thought to make you a gift. Fear nothing from the event. Your system of economy will never interfere with either my proceedings or my doctrines; and I am in no need of begging you, for I think that your action followed only your inclination and consequently your greatest pleasure."

On the insistence of Opiz, Casanova continued his correspondence, but he passed over nothing more, neither in exact quotations from Latin authors, nor solecisms, nor lame reasonings. He even reproached him for his poor writing and did not cease joking at the philanthropic and amiable sentiments Opiz loved to parade while at the same time keeping his purse-strings tight. A number of quarreling letters followed, after which the correspondence came to an end. One of Casanova's last letters, that of the 2nd February 1794, concludes: "One day M. de Bragadin said to me: 'Jacques, be careful never to convince a quibbler, for he will become your enemy.' After this wise advice I avoided syllogism, which tended toward conviction. But in spite of this you have become my enemy… ."

Among the Casanova manuscripts at Dux was one giving his final comment on his relations with Opiz. Accusing Opiz of bringing about a quarrel, Casanova nevertheless admits that he himself may not be blameless, but lays this to his carelessness. "I have a bad habit," he writes, "of not reading over my letters. If, in re-reading those I wrote to M. Opiz, I had found them bitter, I would have burned them." Probably Casanova struck the root of the matter in his remark, "Perfect accord is the first charm of a reciprocal friendship." The two men were primarily of so different a temperament, that they apparently could not long agree even on subjects on which they were most in accord.

The complete correspondence is of very considerable interest.

V — PUBLICATIONS

IN 1786, CASANOVA published ‘Le soliloque d’un penseur’, in which he speaks of Saint-Germain and of Cagliostro. On the 23rd December 1792, Zaguri wrote Casanova that Cagliostro was in prison at San Leo. “Twenty years ago, I told Cagliostro not to set his foot in Rome, and if he had followed this advice he would not have died miserably in a Roman prison.”

In January 1788, appeared ‘Icosameron’ a romance in five volumes, dedicated to Count Waldstein, which he describes as “translated from the English.” This fanciful romance, which included philosophic and theological discussions, was the original work of Casanova and not a translation. It was criticized in 1789 by a literary journal at Jena. Preserved at Dux were several manuscripts with variants of ‘Icosameron’ and also an unpublished reply to the criticism.

In 1788 Casanova published the history of his famous flight from “The Leads”. An article on this book appeared in the German ‘Litteratur-Zeitung’, 29th June 1789: “As soon as the history was published and while it was exciting much interest among us and among our neighbors, it was seen that other attempts at flight from prisons would make their appearance. The subject in itself is captivating; all prisoners awake our compassion, particularly when they are enclosed in a severe prison and are possibly innocent … . The history with which we are concerned has all the appearances of truth; many Venetians have testified to it, and the principal character, M. Casanova, brother of the celebrated painter, actually lives at Dux in Bohemia where the Count Waldstein has established him as guardian of his important library.”

In July 1789 there was discovered, among the papers of the Bastille, the letter which Casanova wrote from Augsburg in May 1767 to Prince Charles of Courlande on the subject of fabricating gold. Carrel published this letter at once in the third volume of his ‘Memoirs authentiques et historiques sur la Bastille’. Casanova kept a copy of this letter and includes it in the Memoirs.

In October 1789, Casanova wrote M. Opiz that he was writing to a professor of mathematics [M. Lagrange] at Paris, a long letter in Italian, on the duplication of the cube, which he wished to publish. In August 1790, Casanova published his ‘Solution du Probleme Deliaque demontree and Deux corollaires a la duplication de hexadre’. On the subject of his pretended solution of this problem in speculative mathematics, Casanova engaged with M. Opiz in a heated technical discussion between the 16th September and 1st November 1790. Casanova sought vainly to convince Opiz of the correctness of his solution. Finally, M. Opiz, tired of the polemics, announced that he was leaving on a six-weeks tour of inspection and that he would not be able to occupy himself with the duplication of the cube for some time to come. On the 1st November, Casanova wished him a pleasant journey and advised him to guard against the cold because “health is the soul of life.”

In 1797, appeared the last book published during Casanova’s lifetime, a small work entitled: ‘A Leonard Snetlage, docteur en droit de l’Universite de Goettingue, Jacques Casanova, docteur en droit de l’Universite de Padoue’. This was a careful criticism of the neologisms introduced into French by the Revolution. In reference to Casanova’s title of “Doctor,” researches by M. Favoro at the University of Padua had failed to establish this claim, although, in the Memoirs Casanova had written:

“I remained at Padua long enough to prepare myself for the Doctor’s degree, which I intended to take the following year.” With this devil of a man, it is always prudent to look twice before peremptorily questioning the truth of his statement. And in fact, the record of Casanova’s matriculation was discovered by Signor Bruno Brunelli.

VI — SUMMARY of MY LIFE

THE 2ND NOVEMBER, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff wrote to Casanova: “By the way, how do you call yourself, by your baptismal name? On what day and in what year were you born? You may laugh, if you wish, at my questions, but I command you to satisfy me …” To this request, Casanova responded with:

“Summary of My Life: — my mother brought me into the world at Venice on the 2nd April, Easter day of the year 1725. She had, the night before, a strong desire for crawfish. I am very fond of them.

“At baptism, I was named Jacques-Jerome. I was an idiot until I was eight-and-a-half years old. After having had a hemorrhage for three months, I was taken to Padua, where, cured of my imbecility, I applied myself to study and, at the age of sixteen years I was made a doctor and given the habit of a priest so that I might go seek my fortune at Rome.

“At Rome, the daughter of my French instructor was the cause of my being dismissed by my patron, Cardinal Aquaviva.

“At the age of eighteen years, I entered the military service of my country, and I went to Constantinople. Two years afterward, having returned to Venice, I left the profession of honor and, taking the bit in my teeth, embraced the wretched profession of a violinist. I horrified my friends, but this did not last for very long.

“At the age of twenty-one years, one of the highest nobles of Venice adopted me as his son, and, having become rich, I went to see Italy, France, Germany and Vienna where I knew Count Roggendorff. I returned to Venice, where, two years later, the State Inquisitors of Venice, for just and wise reasons, imprisoned me under The Leads.

“This was the state prison, from which no one had ever escaped, but, with the aid of God, I took flight at the end of fifteen months and went to Paris. In two years, my affairs prospered so well that I became worth a million, but, all the same, I went bankrupt. I made money in Holland; suffered misfortune in Stuttgart; was received with honors in Switzerland; visited M. de Voltaire; adventured in Genoa, Marseilles, Florence and in Rome where the Pope Rezzonico, a Venetian, made me a Chevalier of Saint-Jean-Latran and an apostolic protonotary. This was in the year 1760.

“In the same year I found good fortune at Naples; at Florence I carried off a girl; and, the following year, I was to attend the Congress at Augsburg, charged with a commission from the King of Portugal. The Congress did not meet there and, after the publication of peace, I passed on into England, which great misfortunes caused me to leave in the following year, 1764. I avoided the gibbet which, however, should not have dishonored me as I should only have been hung. In the same year I searched in vain for fortune at Berlin and at Petersburg, but I found it at Warsaw in the following year. Nine months afterwards, I lost it through being embroiled in a pistol duel with General Branicki; I pierced his abdomen but in eight months he was well again and I was very much pleased. He was a brave man. Obliged to leave Poland, I returned to Paris in 1767, but a ‘lettre de cachet’ obliged me to leave and I went to Spain where I met with great misfortunes. I committed the crime of making nocturnal visits to the mistress of the ‘vice-roi’, who was a great scoundrel.

“At the frontiers of Spain, I escaped from assassins only to suffer, at Aix, in Provence, an illness which took me to the edge of the grave, after spitting blood for eighteen months.

“In the year 1769, I published my Defense of the Government of Venice, in three large volumes, written against Amelot de la Houssaie.

“In the following year the English Minister at the Court of Turin sent me, well recommended, to Leghorn. I wished to go to Constantinople with the Russian fleet, but as Admiral Orlof, would not meet my conditions, I retraced my steps and went to Rome under the pontificate of Ganganelli.

“A happy love affair made me leave Rome and go to Naples and, three months later, an unhappy love made me return to Rome. I had measured swords for the third time with Count Medini who died four years ago at London, in prison for his debts.

“Having considerable money, I went to Florence, where, during the Christmas Festival, the Archduke Leopold, the Emperor who died four or five years ago, ordered me to leave his dominions within three days. I had a mistress who, by my advice, became Marquise de * * * at Bologna.

“Weary of running about Europe, I determined to solicit mercy from the Venetian State Inquisitors. For this purpose, I established myself at Trieste where, two years later, I obtained it. This was the 14th September 1774. My return to Venice after nineteen years was the most pleasant moment of my life.

“In 1782, I became embroiled with the entire body of the Venetian nobility. At the beginning of 1783, I voluntarily left the ungrateful country and went to Vienna. Six months later I went to Paris with the intention of establishing myself there, but my brother, who had lived there for twenty-six years, made me forget my interests in favor of his. I rescued him from the hands of his wife and took him to Vienna where Prince Kaunitz engaged him to establish himself. He is still there, older than I am by two years.

“I placed myself in the service of M. Foscarini, Venetian Ambassador, to write dispatches. Two years later, he died in my arms, killed by the gout which mounted into his chest. I then set out for Berlin in the hope of securing a position with the Academy, but, half way there, Count Waldstein stopped me at Teplitz and led me to Dux where I still am and where, according to all appearances, I shall die.

“This is the only summary of my life that I have written, and I permit any use of it which may be desired.

“This 17th November 1797.

“Jacques Casanova.”

In reference to Casanova’s ironic remark about his escape from England, see his conversation, on the subject of “dishonor,” with Sir Augustus Hervey at London in 1763, which is given in the Memoirs.

VII — LAST DAYS AT DUX

SCATTERED THROUGH THE Memoirs are many of Casanova’s thoughts about his old age. Some were possibly incorporated in the original text, others possibly added when he revised the text in 1797. These vary from resignation to bitterness, doubtless depending on Casanova’s state of mind at the moment he wrote them:

“Now that I am seventy-two years old, I believe myself no longer susceptible of such follies. But alas! that is the very thing which causes me to be miserable.”

“I hate old age which offers only what I already know, unless I should take up a gazette.”

“Age has calmed my passions by rendering them powerless, but my heart has not grown old and my memory has kept all the freshness of youth.”

“No, I have not forgotten her [Henriette]; for even now, when my head is covered with white hair, the recollection of her is still a source of happiness for my heart.”

“A scene which, even now, excites my mirth.”

“Age, that cruel and unavoidable disease, compels me to be in good health, in spite of myself.”

“Now that I am but the shadow of the once brilliant Casanova, I love to chatter.”

“Now that age has whitened my hair and deadened the ardor of my senses, my imagination does not take such a high flight and I think differently.”

“What embitters my old age is that, having a heart as warm as ever, I have no longer the strength necessary to secure a single day as blissful as those which I owed to this charming girl.”

“When I recall these events, I grow young again and feel once more the delights of youth, despite the long years which separate me from that happy time."

"Now that I am getting into my dotage, I look on the dark side of everything. I am invited to a wedding and see naught but gloom; and, witnessing the coronation of Leopold II, at Prague, I say to myself, 'Nolo coronari'. Cursed old age, thou art only worthy of dwelling in hell."

"The longer I live, the more interest I take in my papers. They are the treasure which attaches me to life and makes death more hateful still."

And so on, through the Memoirs, Casanova supplies his own picture, knowing very well that the end, even of his cherished memories, is not far distant.

In 1797, Casanova relates an amusing, but irritating incident, which resulted in the loss of the first three chapters of the second volume of the Memoirs through the carelessness of a servant girl at Dux who took the papers "old, written upon, covered with scribbling and erasures," for "her own purposes," thus necessitating a re-writing, "which I must now abridge," of these chapters. Thirty years before, Casanova would doubtless have made love to the girl and all would have been forgiven. But, alas for the "hateful old age" permitting no relief except irritation and impotent anger.

On the 1st August, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff, the daughter of the Count Roggendorff [printed Roquendorf] whom Casanova had met at Vienna in 1753, wrote: "You tell me in one of your letters that, at your death, you will leave me, by your will, your Memoirs which occupy twelve volumes."

At this time, Casanova was revising, or had completed his revision of, the twelve volumes. In July 1792, as mentioned above, Casanova wrote Opiz that he had arrived at the twelfth volume. In the Memoirs themselves we read, "… the various adventures which, at the age of seventy-two years, impel me to write these Memoirs …," written probably during a revision in 1797.

At the beginning of one of the two chapters of the last volume, which were missing until discovered by Arthur Symons at Dux in 1899, we read: "When I left Venice in the year 1783, God ought to have sent me to Rome, or to Naples, or to Sicily, or to Parma, where my old age, according to all appearances, might have been happy. My genius, who is always right, led me to Paris, so that I might see my brother Francois, who had run into debt and who was just then going to the Temple. I do not care whether or not he owes me his regeneration, but I am glad to have effected it. If he had been grateful to me, I should have felt myself paid; it seems to me much better that he should carry the burden of his debt on his shoulders, which from time to time he ought to find heavy. He does not deserve a worse punishment. To-day, in the seventy-third year of my life, my only desire is to live in peace and to be far from any person who might imagine that he has rights over my moral liberty, for it is impossible that any kind of tyranny should not coincide with this imagination."

Early in February, 1798, Casanova was taken sick with a very grave bladder trouble of which he died after suffering for three-and-a-half months. On the 16th February Zaguri wrote: "I note with the greatest sorrow the blow which has afflicted you." On the 31st March, after having consulted with a Prussian doctor, Zaguri sent a box of medicines and he wrote frequently until the end.

On the 20th April Elisa von der Recke, whom Casanova had met, some years before, at the chateau of the Prince de Ligne at Teplitz, having returned to Teplitz, wrote: "Your letter, my friend, has deeply affected me. Although myself ill, the first fair day which permits me to go out will find me at your side." On the 27th, Elisa, still bedridden, wrote that the Count de Montboisier and his wife were looking forward to visiting Casanova. On the 6th May she wrote, regretting that she was unable to send some crawfish soup, but that the rivers were too high for the peasants to secure the crawfish. "The Montboisier family, Milady Clark, my children and myself have all made vows for your recovery." On the 8th, she sent bouillon and madeira.

On the 4th June, 1798, Casanova died. His nephew, Carlo Angiolini was with him at the time. He was buried in the churchyard of Santa Barbara at Dux. The exact location of his grave is uncertain, but a tablet, placed against the outside wall of the church reads:

The Anatomy of Tobacco

This pastiche of seventeenth century scholasticism was Machen’s first published book, appearing in 1884, whilst he worked as a journalist and tutor. It is a sort of prose ode to tobacco, written in the overblown scholarly rhetoric of an Enlightenment essay, which typically sought to taxonomise the world on strictly rational grounds – a tradition often satirised by Jonathan Swift, to whom the book owes much in its style.

PREFACE.

CURIOUS READER, COME with me, I pray, to the wooded hills and dreamy valleys of mine own Siluria. Leave the "chargeable noise of the great town," and stand with me on the mountain that I love, while the wind sweeps over the heather and bracken, bringing with it the salt of the far-away sea. Below us the country is extended; wave after wave of wood and meadow floating in the mist of the morning, and here and there a window-pane shoots back the rays of the mounting sun. In a valley to the east the smoke of a walled city, Caerleon, the metropolitan, arises; and on the yellow water beyond ships are passing in and out of harbour. Just beneath us, on the verge between heather and cornfield, stands an ancient house with mullioned windows that have withstood the storm of many a hundred year, and from its chimneys also a faint blue smoke rises straight till it meets the mountain wind. Here then let us stand awhile and mingle the golden clouds of Virginia with those of Siluria. For, mark me, we have got into a little hollow sheltered from the full strength of the breeze, and a beech - tree that bends over us will give sufficient shade, though, like most of our mountain trees, it is somewhat stunted. Here we can smoke, and meditate, and dream, for a time at least, like to the gods of Epicurus, taking no heed for the turmoil of the world beneath us, but each man, rapt in his own fancies, weaves them into what he sees, and the whole is very sweet for him to remember hereafter in the midst of the streets, and noisome smoke, and clamour without end. More I say not; let my reader make his dreams for himself of what he may, and if they be even dreams of love I will reprove him not in this place; though in my lecture-room at Brentford it would be otherwise. So if in my book I speak somewhat harshly of Venus and her train, you, O reader, must remember that it is the Professor of Pipe Philosophy in his chair, and not the Silurian on his hills, who does so; and this because he will not tolerate any imperium which seems to threaten and diminish the honour of the Pipe and Jar.

Come with me, then, through our shady woods in summer, wander with me by our rivers and wandering brooks, let us drink deep of the life-giving breath of the mountains; and, so it be done moderately, of the crew that is without guile. And what the printer has set after this shall be to you my discourse by the way.

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION.

IT IS A thing well known and ascertained that the ancient philosophers were wont to divide their teaching into two parts; of which one was the Esoteric or Acroamatic, and the other the Exoteric. Now the first or Esoteric was that which was taught to the innermost band of disciples, and contained things which were unfit for the hearing of the senseless and evil-minded crowd. But the second or Exoteric was that which was openly taught, and likewise put in writing, and so hath come down to our own days.

And in compiling this book I have thought well to imitate the example of these mighty men of old, and therefore have not writ at all of the Esoteric Doctrines of Pipe Philosophy, not being of a mind to lay open such high and weighty matters to the idle cavils and senseless animadversions that would most surely follow. Therefore doth this book treat alone of the Fumus Exotericus and not one whit of the Flamma Esoterica.

And they for whom this exposition is chiefly intended are those who deem themselves to have already gone through all human erudition, and to have nothing more to learn. For, unless I mistake, before they have digested many pages they will perceive themselves to have been woefully in the wrong, and that here is laid open a new land of science, set far beyond the limits of Ultima Thule. Nay, more, they will read of men and books before unknown; and some perchance in their pride and stiffneckedness will go so far as to dispute the existence thereof.

And at once to put an end for ever to all objections on the matter, I will demonstrate how it has come to pass that such weighty and erudite doctors as Gulielmus Septemhorologiensis, Johannes de Grotibus, Margites Dummerkopfius, and others have been hitherto unknown to mankind.

Know, then, that when it is said of Pythagoras, “With an elementary work on arithmetic in his pocket he visited the East for the acquirement of knowledge,” only a part is told, and that a small one. For the truth is that after journeying through Persia and Arabia, and paying a short but lively visit to the land of the Anthropophagi, he proceeded still further East, until he came to the Seres or Chinese, whom he describeth as γένος παιδαριωδέστατον καὶ εὐτραπελώτατον — a most childlike and bland race, at which blandness being pleased, he thought to remain there some while.

Now it appeareth that he had already formed his mysterious notions concerning the Divine Essence residing in numbers and sounds; and it was these same ideas that contributed not a little to the shortening of his stay in the country of the Seres. For some time after his advent there, his philosophic meditations on the multiplication table considered as a source of evil were rudely disturbed by a most hideous and awful tumult, which perturbed him not a little, since he perceived that if his disciples were ever to apprehend such a clamour, not only would they ascribe no divinity to sounds, but would even go to the opposite extreme. And on inquiring whence arose this fearful tumult he was answered in Columbarian Greek (the dialect used to communicate with foreigners) that it came from an instrument named the θώμας-θώμας, which Bossius conjectures may be probably identified with that which we now call the “tom-tom.”

But a still greater discomfiture awaited our philosopher, and one which threatened to shatter and destroy the very citadel of his system — namely, the divine order and sequence of numbers both in matters terrestrial and celestial. For it happed that playing at astragaloi or dibs with one whom he describes as παιδαριωδίστατοϊ και evrpaireyTaroc πάντων— “of all men most bland and childlike,” the cast of sea-born Aphrodite did fall to his opponent nine times in sequence; while he himself could throw nought but the obscene Bow-wow; and this although the bland one professed an entire nescience of the game and a willingness to be instructed in it. So perceiving that such an event could harmonise in no way with the eternal unities and reciprocities, PythagoTas fled straightway from that land, fearing to meet perchance with some greater mishap.

And going on ever to the rising of the sun he came at last to the country which we call Kamschatka, but which then was named Cynosimus or Dog’s

Nose, so reaching at last the verge of Asia would have doubtless returned to Greece without any material discovery (save only that the game of astragaloi or dibs containeth in it much food for thought when played by childlike men), but it fell out that walking the sea-shore he observed a strange and remarkable ship moored close to land. And the strangeness of that ship lay in this — that in place of a mast and sails, such as vessels were wont in those days to have, it was furnished with a tube of well-tempered iron, from whence spouted forth smoke, yea black smoke such as is dear to the heart of Below-Ground Zeus. And on the side thereof were inscribed the mystic characters ΠΟΛΙΤΗΣ.Α', at which the heart of Pythagoras greatly rejoiced, for he perceived that now indeed the unities were about to commence. Also besides this he was ‘ware of a melodious diapason which proceeded (as he relates) from the ship, exceeding sweet and thrilling, and likewise the noise as of a silver bell, mighty pleasant and tintinnabulous. And perceiving that the time was now come to dare all things in the cause of philosophy, and calling on the mystic Samothracian divinities ΤΙΝΔΑΛ, ΣΠΕΝΣΕΡ, and ΥΞΛΥ, he boldly ascended the ship. But the instant he touched the deck the noise that was pleasant and tintinnabulous ceased, and after pouring forth one profuse strain of unpremeditated art, likewise ceased the harmonious diapason; and by some mysterious power Pythagoras was borne away over that unknown sea.

Now concerning his voyage there is no certain record, and although many weighty tomes have been written on the matter, the jejunality of this work doth not suffer me to treat of it; so suffice it to say that after a short and fair journey he was at last, with many diapasons and tintinnabulous rejoicings, landed on the opposite coast. But he had scarcely reached the land when a grave and reverend man accosted him, and hailing him nasiloquently as “stranger” gave him welcome. And after the first greetings were over, and the autochthon had ascertained at how many drachmas the nijxius Pythagoras had purchased his Ifiânov, he informed him that his name was Odysseus B. Podge, Prince of the Caucusidæ, and proposed that they should immediately fare unto an adjoining temple and pour libations to the deathless gods. And although it -was early in the morning, when the Greeks were not accustomed to perform such rites, Pythagoras denied him not, and going to the temple honey-sweet wine was brought them, which Pythagoras affirms to have been in strength like unto a wall of stone, and they poured libations in the customary manner. But when Pythagoras made known unto the prince the intent and purpose of his voyage — namely, the seeking out of new and strange philosophies and observances — he sware a dreadful oath. For he sware by the eagle that spreads his wings widely extended, over the land of the Setting Sun, by the Capitol wherein they cease not to worship the deathless gods, by all the wheeling Stars of heaven, and the grievous Stripes wherewith the gods plague men, that Pythagoras should accomplish his desire and return again to his native land.

And so indeed he performed his vow, and imparted to Pythagoras the whole theory and practice of Pipe Philosophy, and gave him of the herb that is more powerful than moly and sweeter than ambrosia; and after he had sojourned there a long while he again embarked on the magic ship, carrying with him much tobacco and many clay pipes, and so came again to Cynosim us.

From thence he went on his way rejoicing through the country of the Seres, nathless taking much care not to linger in the towns where they were wont to play the Oûfiaç-Ôâfiaç, nor did he venture aught in the game of astragaloi or dibs, which in his heart he determined to forbid to his disciples as a game unbefitting a philosopher and utterly contrary to all unity and reciprocity.

So, to make a long matter short, Pythagoras returned home by way of Ægypt, then much perturbed by the cabals and discontents of an insolent soldier, who out of the malice of his heart persuading the common folk that they had a just claim to the management and enjoyment of their own country, incited them to revolt. And for a time it was like to Lave gone hard with Pharaoh, but he called on Golon, Tyrant of Syracuse, to assist him in his hour of need. And Gelon, out of the great goodness and benevolence of his heart, thinking not at all of any gain or reward accruing to himself, did presently send a mighty fleet of ships, furnished with many banks of oars, and armed with all manner of tormentuous engines, both petroboli and catapeltæ, by which the people of Ægypt were soon utterly overcome and smashed. And the counsellors of Gelon were no less wise at home than in the wars; for perceiving that the vulgar folk did in some sort animadvert on the sending of the ships, they employed certain machines of burnished steel, cunningly contrived for the purpose by geometers, wherewith they blinded the eyes of the people so that they might not perceive what was being accomplished.

But when the land was conquered and laid waste, and Pharaoh thought to have been received back to the throne, Gelon did, more scholastico, make perfect a juncture between his thumb and his nose, and so mocked him, bidding him journey to the City of the Waters of the Sun (which men do now call Bath), or if he liked not that, to the City of Palm Trees, which is Jericho. And so Pharaoh, being in the hieroglyphieal language of Ægypt "done brown," ceased to reign, and Gelon of Syracuse reigned in his stead, and his descendants after him, even until the Gauls overran the whole world from Jerusalem to Madagascar.

And Pythagoras carefully considering all these matters, yet forgot not the multiplicity of chests of cedar-wood he bore with him, wherein was stored the precious herb. And in the dead of night he would often secretly light his pipe and smoke without hindrance, till the fumes being apprehended he was accused of gramarye, and so driven from the land. But when he came to Croton in Italy he called together such as he deemed worthy, and imparted to them the great secret whereat they rejoiced mightily, and proceeded to test the greatness thereof by experiment. And though at the first some were perturbed both in body and mind by reason of the virtue of the herb (it being of the kind poetically called ή oipa τού avos or the tail of the pig), yet at last all attained to the dignity of good and sturdy Pipe Philosophers.

But notwithstanding the vows of secrecy which Pythagoras had laid on his disciples, it began to be noised abroad that there were certain men who inhaled the smoke of a herb which made them contented with all things; whereat the populace grew justly indignant, and as History telleth us (though, as is usual, it lies for the most part), burnt down the club of the Pythagoreans, and with it was destroyed all the tobacco which was stored therein. And from that time no man in Europe saw tobacco for nigh two thousand years, but yet the knowledge of it was kept alive by tradition and handed down till it was restored again. And when it was so restored, those wise men who bad before known of it only by theory were able to ascertain empirically whether their ideas concerning it were true, and thus was formed the modern school of Pipe Philosophers. Yet by their assuming names such as Margites Dummerkopfius, Linalaudulus de Tamesi, Jacobulus Corvinus, and the like, and by their writing in such a way as shall only be understood by the initiate, their very existence hath been ignored and passed over.

But in the two thousand three hundred and forty-fifth year after the journey of Pythagoras at a chapter of the principal among the Pipe Philosophers it was determined that it would be well to promulgate in some way the aforesaid Philosophy; and the lot being taken the office fell upon me; and I have writ this book in discharge of the command.

In the name, therefore, of Dionysos Sabazios, Zagreus, Abraxas, Iao, Haix-Tetrax, and Damnemeneus: Κύγs*μπαξ;* Farewell.

BOOK I.

CHAPTER I.

THE PIPE PHILOSOPHY is divided into two parts, which must be dealt with separately and in no wise confounded.

Now the first part concerns itself with the matter (materies), and the second part with the manner (modus). The matter contains all things used in smoking, such as be pipes, tobacco, and so on; and the manner treats of the ways in which smoking can be considered. And since we cannot treat of the latter as it ought to be treated without a perfect knowledge of the former, it followeth of necessity that we must first consider at length the matter, and that being thoroughly digested, pass on to the manner.

Now, matter being taken first, it is proper that it should be reasonably anatomised and divided; and the division commonly in vogue is that into four kinds — namely (1) necessary matter; (2) contingent necessary matter; (3) contingent unnecessary matter; (4) impossible matter. And the meaning of these terms is as follows: —

(1) — Necessary matter is that without which the act of smoking is impossible.

(2) — Contingent necessary matter is that which, although not absolutely necessary to the act of smoking, is seldom wanting.

(3) — Contingent unnecessary matter comprehends such things as are convenient in smoking, but are wholly unnecessary.

(4) — Impossible matter is that of which it is possible to inhale the fumes through a pipe; but since it is not tobacco, the inhaling of its fumes is not smoking, and with it it is impossible to smoke.

Now, to make reference to these four kinds of matter more easy, each hath had a memorial letter assigned to it as follows: —

NECESSARY MATTER — Q.
CONTINGENT NECESSARY MATTER… U.
CONTINGENT UNNECESSARY MATTER.. I.
IMPOSSIBLE MATTER — D.

Which letters being compounded into one word QUID give the whole division of matter; or, as the Schoolmen do name it, the *"*Quidditas," which Quidditas being subdivided and cut up, appeareth in Synopsis, ut infra.

Q. NECESSARY MATTER.. TOBACCO.

U. Contingent Necessary Matter. (pipes.
(CIGAR TUBES.
I. Contingent Unnecessary
(Tobacco Pouches. R.
(CIGAR CASES. O.
(TOBACCO JARS. T.
(CANES. B.
D. IMPOSSIBLE MATTER (BROWN PAPER. O.
(NON-NICOTINOUS HERBS. S.
(OPIUM. H.

Note, then, that in this synopsis the subdivisions of I and D are marked with other significant letters; and for the better remembering the whole division, the following hexameters are much to the purpose; —

Q Tabacum teneat: des U Cala mosque cigarris, Et TUBULOS: ac I solum ROT continet omne:

Ultima BOSH teneat, qaæ D — dicatur; et usque Dum spiro fumem, recuhans sub tegmine fagi.

And by this synopsis we ascertain the exact signification of the four categories. For it is evident that in necessary matter tobacco is the only thing absolutely necessary to smoking, and in contingent necessary matter that pipes and cigar-tubes, though not absolutely necessary, are, in the vast majority of cases, used. As to contingent unnecessary matter, it is plain that men can very well smoke without possessing jars or pouches; but as to impossible matter, since smoking is defined as “the inhaling of the fume of tobacco,” it is evident that the inhaling of the fume of aught beside tobacco is not smoking, and that therefore with such it is impossible to smoke.

This, then, is the generally-received division of matter, and the explanation thereof; but before we proceed to examine the subdivisions of the four categories more precisely, it is needful to notice certain opinions of those who do not assent to the above division.

For, in the first place, there are philosophers who would delete contingent unnecessary matter on the ground that if a man smoke he must have tobacco, and this tobacco must have position. Now, since jar, pouch, &c., are terms of which the meaning is “things to contain tobacco,” it follows that anything which contains tobacco will come under the same category. But it has been shown that tobacco must be contained by something — i e., have position; therefore the matter now named unnecessary should rightly be termed necessary, though contingently and not absolutely.

Secondly come those who attack the scholastic definition of smoking— “the inhaling the fume of tobacco” — and substitute for it “the inhaling the fume of any soporific or narcotic herb or substance,” the effect of which is to alter in some manner the category of impossible matter. For in accordance with their theory they remove opium and all narcotics as being not really impossible, and place them in a new category of contingently possible matter. These men, however, do not go as far as some, who would abolish impossible matter altogether, their definition of smoking being “the inhaling the smoke of any substance whatsoever,” thus putting the vile cabbage on an equality with our superexcellent herb. But the more reasonable of the Soporifics (as they may fairly be named) argue somewhat as follows: —

If I be, perchance, an inhabitant of some land in which tobacco is unknown, but where a herb of like properties is used in its place, then for me that herb becomes in truth necessary matter; for I know of none other, and without it smoking would be, as far as I am concerned, impossible.

Yet, admitting that in this there is some tincture of reason, we must not let ourselves be bewildered into accepting such a theory. For it is to be remarked that these divergencies arise from a denying of the scholastic definition, and the substitution of one more or less plausible. But we of the orthodox school, who pride ourselves on having kept the Divine tradition intact and unaltered from the days of Pythagoras, will not suffer one jot or tittle to be abated from the wisdom of our predecessors, and are therefore untouched by these curious subtleties.

But with regard to those who would affirm that all receptacles of tobacco are contingently necessary, I confess their sophistries are somewhat less facile to grapple with.

Now I will not deny their main thesis, that if I smoke tobacco I must have tobacco; that that tobacco must be contained by something; that the various subdivisions of "pouch,"

"jar," &c., are merely different sorts of things for containing tobacco; and therefore that they are necessary. So in some wise they are in the right. But if we consider that the category is applied strictly to the act of smoking without reference à parte ante or à parte post, but only to the very act itself, we shall perceive the Schoolmen to have been in the right in maintaining that category to be valid. For taking their heterodox position we might as fairly maintain that ash-trays are necessary, seeing that before a pipe can be filled with tobacco the ashes that be in it must be emptied out; that these ashes being matter must be contained by something (and ash-tray is only a name given to a thing for the containing of ashes): therefore ash-trays are necessary. And again arguing à parte ante we may conclude that earth itself is necessary to smoking. For if I smoke I must have tobacco, and that tobacco must have been produced from the earth; therefore earth is necessary. But since no reasonable man would dream of classing it as necessary matter, we hereby perceive the vanity and inutility of such reasoning, And so the scholastic categories having been put to the test and vindicated, we are free to close the present matter and pass on to the next section with clear pipes, unbefouled with the Acrid Oil of Sophistry and the Uliginous Ashes of Unreason.

CHAPTER II.

WITH RESPECT TO tobacco, let it be defined as follows:— “Tabacus est herba in qua inest nicotinica et soporifera virtus” — Tobacco is a herb in which, resides a nicotinic and soporific virtue.

Next to definition cometh division, which, sooth to say, is somewhat difficult and requireth consideration. And the reason of this difficulty is to be imputed to a certain variant form of tobacco known as the cigar — that is to say, tobacco, not shred finely, but rolled and compacted in such a way as to be smokable without the medium of a pipe. Also there is another form known as the cigarette, which is shred tobacco constricted within a roll of thin paper. Some would differentiate these two forms and consider them apart, but I deem it unnecessary, and have devised a plan which compriseth all kinds within a small compass, which I here present thee with: —

Now methinks I hear many a one objecting to this synopsis, and pronouncing it as altogether meagre and imperfect, containing nought but a mere outline of the subject, and that done after a strange manner.

And in answer to such objections, if they be made, I reply as follows: —

First, as to the main plan, it is clear that all tobacco in ordinary use must come from one of three places. (I) From America, which I call Occidental or Hesperidian tobacco.

(2) — From Asia (under Asia I include Roumelia, though Mercator should reprove me). And this I call Oriental tobacco. (3) From the Continent of Europe, which I call Continental tobacco. Secondly, as to the imperfection and bareness of the scheme. I imagine that the specific fault found with it will be that there are no Roney Dews, Golden Clouds, or Bird’s Eyes under tobacco; and no Regalias, Reinitas, or Inlimidads under cigars. The reason for this omission is that these are rather matters for the tobacconist to consider than the Pipe Philosopher, who, so far from bringing to every subject a microscopic meticulosity, knows well the limits and bounds of his science, and when to be full and when to be brief. And, in fine, were I to admit any of these distinctions into my synopsis it would be but an advertisement fit to be displayed in a booth, and altogether unmeet for the study of a philosopher. So I know nought of them; but in so far as the principal kinds have different qualities and influences on the mind and body of the smoker, they shall be briefly treated of in the second part of this book.

Next, with respect to differences between philosophers as to the nature of tobacco: mirabile dictu these are few and trifling, there being little dispute upon the matter. Only, as I have mentioned before, some would consider tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes separately, thinking thus to prevent those disputes which we shall come upon shortly as to the nature and essence of pipes. And in some wise there is wisdom in this, for if their division should obtain a great part of the grounds of difference between the philosophers of the bowl and the philosophers of the tube would be cut away, and they might be at one; but yet on the other hand these same contentions have led to an infinite amount of learned ingenuity and metaphysical refinement, which 'twere surely pity to render of no account. And further, besides that expediency is on our side, the present concatenation is assuredly good, valid, and just, and worth retaining for its own sake. For to separate cigars from tobacco would be as if in a natural history there were separate chapters — one treating of sheep shorn and the other of sheep unshorn, which were folly. For it is certain that cigars are tobacco, and come under the definition, "a herb in which resides a soporific and nicotinic virtue and therefore to treat of the two apart on a doubtful ground of utility would be grave error. Furthermore, to do so would "make harsh the liquid melodies" of those famous lines beginning, "Q tabacum teneat," which is not to be borne. And so, by analogy, I think that these doctrines will not obtain, for, as is well known, some while ago a certain Scotch logician did bring forward amendments in the Art of Logic, which if they had been carried out, Barbara Celarent would have been abolished and done away with. But yet, notwithstanding the pretended utility of these improvements, Barbara Cearent vugentque valerdque (as Ovidius writes of a different matter): nay, by all accounts, there be students at one of our Universities who will go further and (still with Ovidius) prefix intempestive or unseasonably, seeing that the ignorance of Barbara Celarent doth entail no small inconvenience and discomfort in the precincts of the Forum Suarium, or Pig Market.

Concerning tobacco, therefore, let such things have been said. And this is all that can be said as to definition.

CHAPTER III.

I. LET A pipe (tubulus fumificus) be defined “instrumentum pier quod tabaci fumus trahitur” — as an instrument by which the smoke of tobacco is inhaled.

II. — Let a bowl (vas) be defined “ea pars tubuli fumifici in quit tabaeus ponitur fumandus” — as that part of a pipe in which the tobacco that is to be smoked is placed.

III. — Let a stem (fistula) be defined “ea pars tubuli fumifici per quam tabaci fumus e vase in os ducitur” — as that part of a pipe by which the smoke is educted from the bowl into the mouth.

IV. — Let a mouthpiece (enstomateium) be defined “ea, pars fistulæ quæ vasi remotissima est, et quæ à fistula quoad materiam differt” — as that part of the stem which is furthest from the bowl, and differs from the stem in matter.

V. Let a lid (operculum) be defined “id quod nonnullo vasi adjungitur, ne tabacus vento dispergatur” — as that which is sometimes affixed to the bowl lest the tobacco be scattered by the wind.

VI. — Let a hookah (vox Indica, quæ Latiné nominatur “tubulus fumificus aquarius”) be defined “tubuli fumifici species quædam, in qua tabaci fumus per aquam trahitur” — as a certain kind of pipe in which the smoke of tobacco is drawn through water.

VII. — Ornament (omamentum) is said to exist “cum tubulus fumificus, aut in vase, aut in fistula, non planam habet superficiem” — when a pipe, be it in the bowl or be it in the stem, hath not a flat surface.

VIII. Essential colour (color nativus) is 6aid to exist “cum facientie per artem, tubuli fumifici superficies pigmento quolibet imbuta est” — when by the art of the maker the surface of a pipe hath been imbued with some pigment.

IX. Accidental colour (color factitius seu nicotinicus) is said to exist “cum per artem et perseverantiam fumantis, tubulus fumificus adeo oleo nicotinico imbutus est, ut ater aut subfuscus fiat” — when by the art and perseverance of the smoker a pipe hath been so imbued with the oil of tobacco that it becomes of a jet-black or brownish hue.

X. A pipe is said to be simple (simplex) “cum solum ex unâ materie constat” — when it consists of only one kind of matter.

XI. A pipe is said to be complex (complexus) “cum habet materiem complexam” — when it is composed of complex matter — that is to say, of more than one kind of matter.

Such are the eleven scholastic definitions of pipes, the various parts of pipes, the essential or accidental colour of pipes, and lastly the two definitions of simplicity and complicity, by the observance of which the Schoolmen have been able to divide all pipes into two great classes. Time was, indeed, when many were for three divisions — viz., simple, complex, and decomplex; wherein complex signified composed of two kinds of matter, and decomplex of more than two; but the researches of the learned and ingenious Schoolman Peter Pfeiffe (whose famous investigation into the nature of pickled pepper is a byword to this day) went far to demolish this theory, which received its final blow at the hands of the recluse Jacobulus de Cornibus. So we have to consider only two classes, with their various and minute divisions and subdivisions, which are given at length in the following SYNOPSIS OF PIPES: —

And to help the memory of the student are adjoined these six hexameters, which I deem of not such pure and classical Latinity as the former ones, but -which are, nathless, well adapted to their purpose:

Binis ordiuibns tubuli ponnntur: et Alter
Est Simplex; fit diversis è partibus Alter.
In primis Simplex elassis disjnngilur æque,
Fictilis è terrâ, seqaitur turn ligneus ordo.
OBSTltoPuLoas alio, FLaBbERgAST atque secundo
Pertinct. Cui legat, tubulum succendere fas est.

Further, by way of comment upon the synopsis, it is to be observed that in the complex order the various subdivisions of the simple order are to be understood, with such obvious differences as will be apparent to all. For example, china pipes do not admit of accidental colour since they are already percocti; also in a hookah essential colour may coexist in two parts — in the vase for holding the water, and the bowl for the tobacco.

Lastly, whereas some may reproach me for not having mentioned meerschaum pipes, I reply that meerschaum is merely a kind of clay, and whatever may be said of ordinary clay pipes may also be repeated as to meerschaum pipes (save that they have no essential colour). And seeing that this synopsis hath cost me much anxious thought and twisting of my brain, I do pray thee to excuse any defect thou mayest observo (though, indeed, I do hope that none exist). For while the general division into simple and complex hath long existed, yet the disputes and argumentations of the different schools hath left well-nigh every other matter in doubt and confusion. And at this point I must enjoin thee to truss up thine intellect and make it sure and fast, since we are about to enter upon the doctrines of the several schools, compared to which the Olive Groves of the Academy, and the Peripati of the Lyceum are but onion-trees and bitter cucumbers. So empty thy pipe, and let the tobacco in the next one be heedfully pressed down and clearly lighted.

CHAPTER IV.

NOW THE SIX principal schools of philosophers who dispute concerning pipes are as follows: —

(1) — The Chorizontic or Separatists.
(1) — The Solidic.
(2) — The Medioliquorean.
(3) — The Megacremasiiotic.
(4) — The Coelosphaeric or Cyclosematic.
(5) — The Orthopoetic.

And, to take them in the above order, the Chorizontics maintain the following thesis — that if a pipe be simple, considered apart from its mouthpiece, it is also simple with it — that is to say, the mouthpiece should not be held to affect in any way the dichotomy into simple and complex, the two essential parts which are to be considered being the bowl and stem, in support of which the learned Bocterbroddius argues thus:— “If I make me a bowl of wood, fitting to it a stem, also of wood, it is plain that such pipe is simple. Next, if I procure a lid of silver and affix it to the bowl, the pipe still remains simple (since the possession of a lid is an accident of a pipe). Finally then if I get a mouthpiece of amber and fit it to the stem, since a mouthpiece as well as a lid is an accident and not a property or differentia, that pipe will coutinue simple, and should be considered as such.” — Boëterbroddius. De R*e Fttmaria,* b viii., p. 987. And the Chorizoutic définition of a complex pipe is this ‘— “A complex pipe is such that it cannot become simple without ceasing to be a pipe.”

But, on the other hand, the no less learned Dreckenhauserius, chief of the opposite School of Solidics, expresses his judgment as follows:— “A complex pipe is one in which the matter is not homogeneous. So that if any pipe contain or be composed of more than one kind of matter, that pipe is complex. But a wooden pipe with an amber mouthpiece contains more than one kind of matter; for it contains both wood and amber (here followeth a dissertation of some ten pages as to the nature of amber, and as to how far it may be identified with the ijXtKrpov of the Greeks). Therefore a wooden pipe with an amber mouthpiece is complex. Further it is to be remembered that in some pipes the mouthpiece far exceeds in length the true stem, which often does not continue for more than an inch or two beyond the bowl; and to say that in such case the mouthpiece is no essential part of the pipe were surely a rank and insane absurdity.

Such being the opinions of the Chorizontic and Solidic Schools, I shall next proceed to those held by the Medioliquoreans, or half-and-half philosophers, to whom I myself do for the most part incline. Now this School teacheth that the Chorizontics are right and wrong, and the Solidics wrong and right, which seems to me a happy and dextorous distinction. For they agree with the Chorizontics in asserting that the term “pipe” doth by no means of necessity imply the possession of a mouthpiece; so on that ground they allow that the Separatists have reason in refusing to take the mouthpiece into account when making division into simple and complex. But, on the other hand, they do not dispute the contention of the Solidics in the case of a pipe that hath but an inch of true stem, and four or five inches of mouthpiece; and will allow that in such case the pipe should be classed as complex rather than simple.

So that in fact the Medioliquorean must examine the pipe before he will venture to class it; and if it be, by example, a pipe of briar-root six inches as to total length, of which half an inch consists of the mouthpiece, he shall set it down as simple; but if, per contra, it be of six inches of total length, having a true stem of half an inch, and an amber mouthpiece of five and a half inches, then shall it be considered as complex.

Fourthly come the Megacremasuotics, so called ùni TOV Uvai navra rov <rvv, because they go the whole hog. And their doctrine is this: — The term “pipe” doth comprise every part which any given pipe possesses, whether it be differentia, property, or accident. And a pipe which, whether by reason of its mouthpiece, lid, colour, or joint in its bowl, stem, or mouthpiece, hath in it more than one kind of matter, cannot be simple. For they define the term simple as denoting an absolute unity of matter, and allege that as amber both true and false, ivory both true and false, bone and every manner of composition (as to mouthpiece), gold, silver, and base metal (with regard to lids); red, blue, and yellow (with regard to colour, since colour cannot exist on a pipe without the agency of that material substance called paint); — are all certainly matter; therefore they aver that if to Z -f A (by which symbol is denoted the joining of the essence and existence) there be added any matter which is not A, then Z+A + a… — the simple pipe becomes Z+A + x — the complex pipe.

Such are the doctrines of the Megacremasuotic School of Pipe Philosophers.

Fifthly, let us take the Cœlosphaeric or Cyclosematic School. And their teaching is this: — The real essence of the pipe is contained in the bowl, whence cometh the name Cœlosphaeric (Kotyoarqpaupticoi), since they regard the bowl as the root, from out of which, from reasons of practical utility and convenience, the stem hath sprung; some saying that the first pipe was a bowl in which tobacco was placed, and the smoke drawn out from a hole in the side. They profess to find a support to these doctrines in the fact that supposing any one should detach the stem from the bowl he would by no means call the stem by itself a pipe, whereas a bowl without a stem might very well be called so.

Further, by analogy they liken a pipe to a tree. Now without a root the stem of a tree cannot exist, whereas it is conceivable that a root should exist without a stem. So with the bowl and stem of a pipe, they name the bowl the inevitable part and the stem the evitable. They also lay stress on the shape of the bowl, which is circular. Now a circle is the most perfect geometrical conception, and therefore the bowl is the most perfect and ideal part of the pipe, the stem being that part invented by man to bring the whole down to his lower and grosser level. Lastly, they affirm that in the bowl there always resides essence, and sometimes existence also; that in the bowl and stem conjoined there is both essence and existence; and in the stem alone neither essence nor existence.

Sixthly cometh the Orthopoetic Philosophers, so called for that they, rejecting the dogma of the Coelosphaerics that the essence resides in the bowl, maintain that it is in the stem (to fitpos TO ùpdôv), and that the first pipe was a tube, in one end of which tobacco was placed, and the smoke thereof drawn through the other; to strengthen which doctrine they adduce the pipes used by Asiatics for the inhaling of the fumes of opium, which do not possess a bowl, but only a place in the stem in which to set the opium. And in opposition to the Coelosphaeries, who affirm that one who had cut off the stem of his pipe would not call the stem by itself a pipe, they reply that "pipe" is a conventional term, by which is meant the whole instrument as we have it at the present day; and, since the time when pipes had no bowls is long gone by, it is according to nature that men should have come to regard the bowl as an essential part; yet, while admitting this, they by no means admit the contrary — that if the bowl be separated from the stem it is still spoken of as a pipe, but rather that it is called by its own name " bowl," or with the adjective "pipe" prefixed to it, that is "pipe-bowl." And the smoke-addicted and ingenious (though perchance somewhat too eristical) Dummerkopfius, who for a long while past hath stood in the van of battle for the Orthopoetics, seizes as with a vice upon this very expression "pipe-bowl," and shows it to be a compound substantive, in which "pipe" used as an adjective defines and limits the substantive bowl, and is a term of wider distribution than bowl. And since the term "pipe" extends more widely than "bowl," it follows that there are some pipes which have not bowls; and therefore that, so far from a bowl containing the whole essence of a pipe, there is no reason why a pipe should have a bowl at all. (See diagram.) Next he proceeds by analogy, and chooseth the words "horse-cloth,"

"nosering," which are in every way similar to "pipe-bowl." And firstly let "horse-cloth" be taken, in which it is manifest that a horse may have both essence and existence without possessing a cloth, which is an accident of "horse." Secondly, "nose-ring," in which it is manifest also that a nose is perfect and complete without a ring being attached to it.

So noses existing without rings, and horses without cloths, it is manifest that pipes do exist without bowls.

Next the acute and cloud-compelling Dummerkopfius proceeds by etymology, and demonstrates thus: — The common name of anything expresses the common meaning attached to that thing when that common name was first given. And if no other name can be shown to have existed, before that which is now used, then that name expresses the primary and essential conception of the thing named. So that if we find by investigation that a “thing-for-smoking-tobacco” has always been named a “pipe,” and is called so now, then we determine that the word “pipe” expresses the primary, essential, and common meaning of a “thing-for-inhaling-tobacco.” Next let us determine the meaning of the word by etymology. It appears that the primary notion expressed by this word is “whistling,” hence it was probably framed by onomatopoeia, as more plainly appears in the German “pfeiffe” and the Latin “fistula,” which do counterfeit in some measure the noise of whistling. Therefore the etymological first intention of the term *“*pipe” is “something which whistles.”

But when we inquire what is the logical first intention, at first sight there appears some difficulty. For to take a good example of first and second intention, “bird” in its first intention is an animal that has feathers, in its second intention a partridge, and I do not perceive how we can assign a first intention to “pipe” quite in this manner, Second intentions, however, are sufficiently numerous, as will be seen when we consider that an organist, a plumber, and a pastoral poet use the term each in a peculiar technical sense, plainly constituting second intention. But shall we not agree, supposing an organist to be conversing with a plumber, or a plumber with a pastoral poet, that in speaking to one another they would use the term “pipe” with the meaning of an instrument used in smoking? And is not this, then, the logical first intention of the word pipe? Such, at all events, it appears to me.

Thus, then, I have proved that when we pronounce the word “pipe” in common language we imply remotely and etymologically “something that whistles,” and directly and logically *“*an instrument used in smoking.” How, then, can the Coelosphaerics contend that the bowl is the essential part? For bowls cannot whistle, either of themselves or by the help of another. And if the essence and primary nature lies in the bowl, why do we not call this “instrument for smoking” a bowl and not a pipe? And how comes it to pass that we do not call the stem a “bowl-pipe?” Responde mihi, O genus cœlospliaericum et rotundum.!

Finally Dutnnierkopfius citeth the famous Sorites Smalgrueli. The name of a thing expresses the innate ideas we have of that thing; the name of an “instrument for smoking tobacco” is a pipe; the name pipe expresses not ideas of sphæricity and circularity, but of length and hollowness; therefore our innate ideas of an “instrument for smoking tobacco” are not conceptions of sphæricity and circularity, but conceptions of length and hollowness.”

But the Coelosphaerics reply, in answer to the “pipe-bowl” argument, that Dummerkopfius might as well argue from the term “goat-skin” that goats can exist without skins, and that such analogous arguments are absurd and sophistical, and quote in support the words of Devey, who asserts that “we cannot adduce any example in which the force of an analogous argument arises above that of weak probability and as to the etymological argument that it is futile, else we might conclude that all “priests” are old men, that the Esquimaux are “nonchalant” quia non calent, that no one can be “insulted” unless his adversary leaps on him, that all “imbeciles” lean on staffs, and lastly that two persons cannot be “rivals” unless they dwell on the banks of the same river.

But to return to the Orthopoetics: they, in reply to the Cœlosphaeric ideas concerning the perfection of the circular form, maintain that a circle itself is but a number of straight lines joined angularly and continuously to one another in such a way as to form a circular figure; and as that which makes to exist must be prior to that which exists, therefore the idea of a straight lino is primary, while the idea of a circle is secondary. They also aver that the circle is a barren figure generating nothing; whereas from straight lines are produced all the rectilineal figures. To which the Cyclosematics reply that the idea of a circle must have existed before these straight lines were joined to form one, even admitting that they were so joined, which they say is not proven — nay, rather they aver that by taking away an infinitely small part of the circumference of a circle a straight lino was generated; and finally that the objections of the Orthopoetics apply only to the circumference of the circle, and not to the circle itself. For the definition of Euclides commences, “A circle is a plane figure contained by one line which is called the circumference,” where it is evident that the circle is not the circumference, which is only a formal part necessary to render the ideal conception of a circle comprehensible by our material senses; for if the terms “circle” and “circumference” were identical, then would a thing be said to be contained by itself, which is impossible.

To whom rejoin the Orthopoetics that the essence of anything is “that which makes it to be what it is that essence is divided into two parts — the material part or genus, and the formal part or differentia. Now the definition of a circle is “A circle is a plane figure contained by one line which is called the circumference,” which definition “a plane figure” is the genus, and “contained by one line” the differentia; and since if the differentia be taken away the essence no longer remains, therefore if the idea of circumference be separated fro in the idea of circle, as the Cyclosematics direct, then no essence remains, and a circle does not exist. But we know that circles do exist, therefore their arguments are erroneous and absurd.

Now amongst the arguments of the Cœlosphaerics we noticed one that made comparison between the root of a tree and the bowl of a pipe. Know, then, that the Orthopoetics have made a similar comparison between the parts of a pipe and the parts of a lily in blossom. First comes the bulb concealed in the earth, which they say is the invisible essence of the pipe; next the stem, which they say is the stem of the pipe; and lastly the blossom, which is the bowl of the pipe. And since there must be a lily stem before there is a lily blossom, so there must have been a pipe stem before there was a pipe bowl. But yet to this rejoin the Ceelosphaerics that by this very example of a lily which they bring forward the Orthopoetics are condemned; for since the bulb of a lily implies necessarily the idea of a blossom, therefore the essence of a pipe implies necessarily the idea of a bowl, and that as without a blossom the lily does not exist, so neither without a bowl is existence possible to a pipe.

But yet another argument of the Orthopoetics I have to lay before thee, and it is this. The Ccelosphaerics define a pipe as an instrument used in smoking tobacco. Let it be granted that the definition is valid, and it shall be proved to the satisfaction of all that the bowl is no essential part of a pipe. For take any stem of any pipe, having previously disjoined it from the bowl, and insert into one end a cigar, and place the other in your mouth. Now having applied fire to the free end of the cigar draw in the breath, which, when it is ejected from the mouth, shall be found to consist in great part of the fume of the said cigar; from which it is evident that the stem alone of a pipe has been used in smoking tobacco (for who will deny that a cigar is tobacco?) without the agency of a bowl. Wherefore it is proved that the bowl is not an essential part of a pipe, but only a separable accident thereof. And from this conclusion comes the corollary — that what are commonly called cigar-tubes are, in fact, pipes, for they contain in them everything essential to pipes; that they are survivals of the primitive pipes, while those which are commonly called pipes are merely amplified to suit the requirements of tobacco which is cut fine, and requires something to stay it from being drawn into the mouth; that, finally, it is evident that when tobacco was first used it was used in its most simple form, that uncut tobacco is a more simple form than cut, that therefore uncut tobacco was first used; ergo, the first pipes had no bowls, for bowls are for cut tobacco.

Such is the stupendous and gigantic controversy between the two Schools of Ccelosphaerio and Orthopoetic philosophers — such, at least, is a short and incomplete statement of a few of the principal points at which they join issue. For so far have I been from giving their disputations at length that here is contained not a hundredth part of the matter at my disposal. But I am like those men who transcribe the speeches in our Senate House for the diurnals, who out of an oration which hath taken two hours to deliver make a something which taketh up six lines or less of print, and all confess that it is well done. Some rash and daring spirits, indeed, would persuade us that, though it is well done to compress so far, it would be better done to omit the whole oration; but these be atheistical and blasphemous doctrines, to which I do in no wise assent. So, observing the golden mediocrity tha t the Venusian commends, I have touched the matter — I will not say with a needle, but with a pipe-stopper, which, be it remarked, is an image much to the purpose. For as when a man, the smoke coming with diffidence and uncertainty from his pipe, doth gently and carefully compress with a pipe-stopper the tobacco within, and lo! it burneth to admiration; so have I, in considering the contentions of these two Schools, applied the pipe-stopper of my understanding unto them. And I dare swear that as one hath said of the book writ by Immanuel Kant (I would say the Kritik der Reinen Vemunft), "to read it is like going into a lighted room so shall men say of this book, "to read it is like going into a smoky one." And if it be indeed so said, why, sublimi feriam vertice sidera — I shall strike the stars with my sublime top (as Flaccus hath it).

And finally, as to the two Schools, it may not be impertinent to quote the world-renowned and much-learning-possessing Spitsbubius, called for his sublime and impenetrable cloudiness Doctor Fumificus (the Fumifical Doctor), who speaks as follows:— "With regard to the Schools of Cœlosphaeric and Orthopoetic philosophers, verily it appears to me that their several contentions are, as it were, all smoke, and that there is no essential distinction between their dogmas. For since a candle is a candle whether it be long or short, whether it have a large wick or a small wick; and a ball is a ball, whether it be large, as is a football, or small, as is a tennis-ball: so, if they will but consider, the Cœlosphaerics have but to conceive of the stem of the Orthopoetics as a very long bowl to remove all difference between them. And on the other hand the Orthopoetics have but to think of the bowl of the Ccelosphaerics as a very short stem, and they will be completely at one. And therefore since by bowl and stem they plainly mean the same thing, by much the more does glory redound to them, who have so completely proved each other’s doctrines absurd and monstrous.”

So far Spitsbubius, and with his words I deem fit to close the matter, but if any desire to read further let him take Papaverius Donnerblitsius’s De Naturâ Fistularum: Exercitationes Fumigabundce of Spitsbubius, and those excellent Nodes Nebulosœ, or Foggy Nights, of Margites Dummerkopfius, so extolled by Theodorus Wattsius in his Minervic Disputations. For Wattsius sayeth that it is the best done of any book that ever was writ, save only his own sonnet on the “Libellus Lavatorius, or Washerwoman’s Account, of a Minor Poet of the Cave-Dwellers,” lately brought to light and edited (mm vitâ Poetœ) by Gossius. For the excellence of this writer see:also Moncurius Scepticus in his Orationes Notilocéllenses (South-windy Discourses), where he interrupts himself in the midst of denouncing a certain obscure and contemptible sect called Christians to exalt and magnify this notable Dummerkopfius.

And his is certainly the most worthy to be read of all such works, for in the preface to his disquisition he giveth all that hath been said, on either side since the very dawn of Pipe Philosophy, which preface extendeth to only ten volumes of the book (it having but one hundred and twenty volumes in all). And as a concluding, final, and transcendental testimony to the excellence of these Foggy Nights the aforesaid Wattsius can detect one naevus alone in toto egrcgio cor pore, which is that in tom xcix., cap li., sect. 13, subsect. 8, a “P” hath been substituted for a “Q,” which, as Wattsius justly insisteth, doth violate the first canon of the more Humane Letters — i e, “Evyabiov rà vrà II kai Q, or in the vulgar tongue, “Mind your ‘P’s’ and ‘ Q’s.’”

CHAPTER V.

NOW AS TO the contingent unnecessary matter (e g., tobacco-jars) and impossible matter (e g., cabbage-leaves) I will say nothing. And the reason of this is that I have got nothing to say, and since I am not of sufficiently ripe experience in arte nihil dicendi, let this be enough; and so much for the matter of Smoking, which is the first part of this book.

PRŒMIUM TO THE SECOND PART.

IT happed that searching lately among the works of those who have writ things pertinent to this philosophy I found in the third volume of the Noctes Nebulosæ of Dummerkopfius some very notable and ingenious versicles that seemed to me well worthy of a place in this book, so I here annex them as a manner of Preface to my Second Part.

“The lazy Earth doth steam amain,
And fumes and smokes beneath the rain:
The Rivers, Brooks, and Rivulets are
No less in smoke particular
At nightfall: and the storm blast loud
Is often wont to blow a cloud
Around the Mountain-tops, and they
Do take delight in this same way; And send a fiery fame from out
Their angry heights, and such a rout
Of burnt-up ashes, that do strow
Great cities in the plains below.

The setting Sun is oft made dim

With smoky mists that circle him.

So all the World’s on smoking bent,

And puffs and fumes to its content:

Fill up the bowl then, fill it high,

Fill all the gaping pipes, for why

Should every creature smoke but I; Why, man of morals, tell me why?”

This, as it seems to me, contains an exceeding just view of the subject, in so far as is compatible with the poetical and metaphorical diction, although it wants that exact and philosophical minuteness which is to be desired. But yet I esteem it of great weight in testifying to the Macrocosmical doctrines entertained by many and weighty doctors, notably by Vanderhorstius, Be Solutione Nebular um, Lugd. Bat., 1G34; also by Thomas Schelsegensis, Be Gigdbilitate, Be Idolie Limi, &c., so its place here is sufficiently warranted.

Now, since the First Part treated of the matter, it follows that the Second Part treats of the manner, as was observed in Chapter I. of what! Lave already written. What precedes, therefore, is Absolute, and what succeeds Relative, which latter member may be further divided into the following categories: —

I. Substantia. II. Ubi. Ill Quando. IV. Relatio. — Substance, Place, Time, and Relation. And these categories constitute the base of this latter part, and will serve for heads, as it were, of discourse. But let it be noted with regard to substance (which might seem rather to pertain to the First Part) that we shall consider it metaphysically alone, and not physically. And as in the former Part we dissected and examined it as a chirurgeon dissects and examines the brain, be now we shall examine it as a metaphysician examines the mind.

So much, then, by way of Preface to the things which are about to be said.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE FOUR categories let substance be taken first, which having been taken let it be examined and further divided into (1) tobacco, and (2) pipes. To which division it may be objected, “Præterire aliquid maximum vitium in dividendo est”— “In division to pass over anything is a very great fault since many things have been omitted (jars, pouches, and the like). The reason for which omission is that all those things which have been omitted are trifling and unimportant, being contingently unnecessary, and not worthy of any systematic consideration. Wherefore I am constrained to censure all those (notably Gulielmus Cassiteridensis) who have ventured to differ from me in this matter as being stulti, stolidi, fatui, fungi, bardi, blenni, buccones, as Plautus hath it.

Now tobacco being the prior member of the division, let it be considered as the occasion may direct, and in such a way as will tend to the enlightenment of all. Firstly, then, it will be remembered that it was materially defined “Herba, in quâ inest nicotinica et soporifera virtus” — a herb in which there resides a nicotinic and soporific virtue. But metaphysically it is defined “Nicotinica et soporifera virtus, quse sub tabaci specie, nostris sensibus perspicitur” — a nicotinic and soporific virtue which is evident to our senses under the form of tobacco. Hence this nicotinic virtue is an immutable and eternal idea, having a real existence; and though we know not the where, when, or how of this existence, yet we know that it does exist. And this virtue is also named an energy, and likewise an act. But however we name it, it is evident that it has no ordinary material existence, since all tobacco which we can see, touch, and smoke must have certain accidents, such as a light colour, a strong odour, a heavy weight, and the like; also it must have come from some particular land or lands, such as Asia, America, AEgypt, and the like; yet all these are mere accidents, in no wise pertaining to our abstract notion of tobacco as metaphysically defined. This doctrine, now very generally received, was in some way shadowed forth by Pythagoras (albeit he used not the term “nicotinic,” for it is of modern date), who spoke of a certain Avva/us or power, corresponding to the virtue that was afterwards taught. And the theory we now maintain was first plainly declared by the Pundit Iradi Simkhya, and further illustrated and exemplified by his commentator El-Mudi. Hence arose the mystical School of Neo-Pythagoreans, who maintained that by a life of incessant smoking and meditation the philosopher might participate in the essential virtue, and comprehend its real nature. But here I will pause, and for two reasons — firstly, that I do not profess to communicate the esoteric doctrines of Pipe Philosophy; and secondly, lest, if I continue “obscurus fiam,” I become obscure, and be reproved by Proctoratus Omniscientius, for that my subject-matter is not “plainly worded and exactly described,” which reproof may the gods avert!

It having been granted that there exists a certain energy or virtue, let us consider by what means we may best partake of its essence and approximate to its nature. And the best method appears, in my judgment, to be smoking — /i e., *“*fumum tabaci ore trahere,” as the Schoolmen maintain, which definition, however, may be censured on the ground that it is not adequate to the thing defined. For to say that smoking is “a drawing in [inhaling] of the smoke of tobacco with the mouth,” “explicat tantum partem,” explains only a part both of the actual process and the abstract idea; since the smoke cannot in the nature of things be continually inhaled without the corresponding process of exhalation; for which reason Scriblerus Redivivus appears to me more correct in defining smoking as “the sucking in of smoke at one part of the mouth, and the ejection thereof at the other.” But yet he, too, goes astray in the latter part (as I think) of his definition. For I will maintain that if I suck in the smoke at the right side of my mouth and eject it, also on the right side, I have smoked. Whereas Scriblerus would seem to imply that it is necessary that the smoke should be ejected at some other part, diverse from that at which it was sucked in; whereas, so long as the smoke is exhaled, as far as I know, it is indifferent at what part — whether at mouth, nose, eyes, or ears. So I censure Scriblerus Redivivus for this definition of smoking, and do define it as follows:— “Smoking is the complex act by which we participate in the fumes of tobacco, and for which three things are required — (1) the inhalation of the smoke; (2) the retention thereof within the body for a space of time; (3) the exhalation of some part thereof from the mouth, nose, eyes, or ears taken separately or taken conjunctively.” In which definition I would direct your attention to the term “some part” as being significant, and, as far as I know, novel. For it is not necessary to smoking that the whole of the tobacco inhaled should be also exhaled — nay, it is impossible that this is ever the case, a certain portion of each inhalation being retained within the body, on which it exerts its nicotinic virtue.

Which observation recalls our attention to the subject under discourse — namely, the best means to be employed in participating in the above-named virtue. To which question it was answered that smoking is the best means, and most adapted to the end in view. And this answer led to a precise definition of smoking (ut supra), from which definition followed the corollary that “a certain portion of each inhalation is retained within the body on which it exerts its nicotinic virtue.” Hence the participation of the mind in the nicotinic energy is a mediate one, and dependent on the body. And this is the doctrine of physical participation.

To which the upholders of the doctrine of metaphysical participation object that the pleasure received is incomplete if one smoke in the dark. Whence it followeth that the watching of the smoke, as it escapes from the bowl or mouth, has a large part in the process of participation; some even going so far as to make this contemplation of the smoke the essence of participation, and the physical effect only an inseparable accident thereof. And it is alleged by many that one who smokes in total darkness knows not even whether his pipe is in or out, and will often continue inhaling contentedly his own breath, his pipe containing nought but burnt-out ashes. But if this doctrine were true then it follows that to view others smoking would be an equal pleasure to smoking oneself, which if it were so smoking would shortly become a thing of the past (since who would be at the expense to buy tobacco when he could have the same pleasure by merely watching another smoking?) Also, if tobacco produces no physical sensations, any one of the weakest stomach would be free to smoke the strongest tobacco by the hour, provided only that he either bandaged his eyes or smoked in darkness. And this being granted as possible (argumenti causa) leads us necessarily to the conclusion that the sensation of nausea, which undoubtedly does sometimes result from the use of tobacco, is caused alone by the disturbance to the eye, caused by viewing the clouds of smoke in the air. Furthermore, since the clouds arising from Cavendish and the Turkish tobacco are exactly the same in appearance, it follows that nausea is no more likely to result from the use of the one than the other, which is to say that they are both of an equal strength. But this, as any one of my readers can ascertain for himself, is a falsity, Cavendish tobacco being, at the least, double the strength of Turkish tobacco. Hence, since the proposition, "All sensations experienced in smoking are due to the sight of the smoke," has been proved to be false, its contradictory must be true — that is, "Some sensations experienced in smoking are not due to the sight of the smoke."

And this being established on the firm ground of logical inference, I will at once grant that smoking in darkness is a most unsatisfactory and incomplete process, affording very little pleasure at the best of times, and frequently none at all. And the reason is this — namely, "Some sensations experienced in smoking are due to the sight of the smoke," which I account for as follows: — The reception of the smoke into the body acts in two modes — firstly, directly upon the body. And to this first mode are to be referred nausea and sickness as resulting directly from it, and having no connection with the sight of the smoke in the air. Secondly, through the body indirectly on the mind, in which it excites certain sensations and dispositions. Now one of these dispositions is a pleasure in watching the clouds of smoke as they rise, and a desire to do so. Hence if it be dark and the smoke invisible this desire is ungratified, and the pleasure reduced. So in proportion to the virtue of the tobacco is the disappointment experienced, seeing that the more virtuous it be the more does it stir up this desire of beholding the smoke. But the effect upon the body remains entirely the same, being less or greater according to the stomach of the smoker or his habitude to smoking. Such is the explanation of diminution (or even extinction) of pleasure in smoking in the dark.

Now the next question is — how to account for a total absence of all sensation whatever under these conditions. And, firstly, we must inquire if such is the fact, unless we would imitate those erudite members of the Royal Society in the reign of our second Charles of ever blessed and glorious memory. And as far as I am able to judge, using both the experience of myself and that of others, I reply that it is a fact, but one that only is manifest in particular cases and under particular circumstances, which are such as follow: — (1.) He who smokes must have been in the habit of so doing for some years. (2.) He must use always the same kind of tobacco. (3.) He must use always the same kind of pipe. (4.) He must smoke at the same time of day at which he has been aforetime wont to smoke. Now let such a one fill his accustomed pipe with his accustomed tobacco, and if it be daylight let his eyes be blindfolded, and if it be night let the lamps be put out, and in such case I should not at all be astonished to hear him declare that he knows not whether his pipe be in or out. But on the other hand, if any one of the four conditions laid down should be violated, then, if I mistake not, the result would be different, and though the pleasure of smoking would be either entirely absent or greatly reduced, still there would be a complete physical appreciation of the act. And from the whole of the above discourse it appears that participation in the energy (or virtue) is composite, partly proceeding from physical influence on the body, partly from dispositions in the mind, one of which dispositions is gratified by the sight of the smoke in the air. And such other more remote sensations of the mind will be treated of under Relation at full length.

Next it will be profitable to take a brief view of the principal kinds of tobacco, with their several distinguishing properties.

Cavendish. — A good tobacco, I confess, strong, hearty, and wholesome, well adapted to vivify the mind and confirm the body; cool and pleasant to the mouth, and grateful to the stomachs of such as be used to it. Nathless, caution should be observed in its exhibition, lest by reason of its vigour it breed bile and loathing. So, if any one be about to use it for the-first time, I would recommend that it be admixed with some milder kind, such as is Honeydew or Birdseye.

Birdseye. — A pleasant and fragrant tobacco, adapted for common use by all; not lacking savour, but not too vigorous. Yet is it apt to be hot and fretful in the mouth, so let such as be at all tender in that part use it but sparingly.

Honeydew. — Honeydew is cool and bland in the mouth and mild of digestion, yet by itself it wants fragrance and savour, and by reason of that want fails to stimulate, as it ought, both body and mind, but as I have noted, admixed with Cavendish it is mighty pleasant and delightsome.

Turkish. — A hot, tasteless tobacco, little fitted for the pipe, and incapable of good admixture, yet in it (if it be the best) there is a certain faint fragrance which some do much admire.

Returns. — A strong, rank tobacco, without fragrance or pleasant taste. Hot to the mouth, it breeds bile, and is to be avoided, unless by such as are veteran smokers.

Shag. — Like in all respects to Returns, save that it is ranker and more choleric. This tobacco I commend to none, and wish it were altogether abolished, since by its fumes much discredit is brought on tobacco in general.

Latahia. — Of itself a tasteless tobacco, or at least when smoked in pipes of European fashion, but useful for admixture with stronger tobaccos, and (as I am told) pleasantly to be smoked in a hookah or water-pipe.

Virginia. — Exceeding hot and biting in the mouth, and so to be condemned, yet of a most delicate and delightful fragrance, in which I think no tobacco surpasses it. Also of a fair strength, but a quick burner, and so dear to use.

Such are the principal kinds of tobacco in use amongst us, which may either be taken separately or combined in various proportions as the taste of the smoker may direct. And so various is this taste that to lay down any one kind or admixture as good for all times and for all persons were impossible, yet I may roughly and conjecturally say that those who smoke for the love of smoking will smoke Cavendish, Birdseye, or Honeydew, while those who smoke because they think it adds to the beauty of their countenances will smoke Latakia, Turkish, or Virginia. But these are mostly, as Sir Thomas Schelsegensis maintains, clothes-horses, and not men in any rational sense of the term. And as to admixture I would commend that, of which half-a-pound being taken, four ounces shall consist of Honeydew, one of Birdseye, and three of Cavendish, the Honeydew contributing blandness, the Birdseye fragrance, and the Cavendish strength. And this must be said in favour of admixtures — that by smoking several kinds of tobacco in combination the student approximates more nearly to the universal energy than if he smoke one kind alone, for it is to be considered that each sort has its peculiar excellences and its peculiar defects, whence by mixing several sorts in such a proportion that the excellences are combined in a harmony and the defects or vices annulled, we are near to that ideal tobacco possessing every conceivable excellence and no conceivable vice.

So much, then, for the various kinds of Tobacco, the properties thereof, and the combinations thereof. Now Smalgruelius, in the Appendix to his work De Omnibus Rebus, entitled Be Quibusdem Aliis, at the beginning of the chapter De Rebus Hypotheticis, has these words:— "Anything which can be applied to some use, and, on being so applied, is incapable of being used again, is said to exist in three modes, namely — I. Privation. II. Position. III. Negation. Exempli gratia coal, which before it is burnt exists in privation; when it is burning, in position; and when it is burnt to ashes, in negation. Such substance is said to be determinate. And anything which is capable of being applied to some use, and on being applied continues its usefulness to infinity, is said to exist in two modes only, namely — I. Privation. II. Continuation. Exempli gratia stone, which, when it is in the quarry, exists in privation; but when it is shapen into a pyramid, in continuation. Such substance is said to be continuous. Thirdly, anything which is capable of being applied to some use, and on being applied vanishes utterly out of our sight, is said to exist in three modes, namely — I. Privation. II. Position. III. Extinction. Exempli gratia oil, which, when it is unlighted, exists in privation; when it is in the state of being employed in giving light, in position; and when, the oil being consumed, the lamp goes out, in extinction. Such substance is said to be indeterminate. Fourthly, anything which is capable of being applied to some use, and, on being applied to that use, continues its usefulness for a greater or less amount of time, but then becomes incapable of being so applied any longer, is said to exist in three modes, namely — I. Privation. II. Continuation. III. Negation. Exempli gratia wood, which, when alive and growing, exists in privation; when shapen into a beam, in continuation, and when, having in the course of years become rotten, it falls to pieces, in negation. Such substance is said to be temporary. Some, however, would deny that any substance can be properly placed in this class, since it only differs from determinate substance in continuing in position a longer time, which (they allege) is no sufficient differentia. And aught that cannot be placed in some one of these four classes, or partly in one and partly in another, is insoluble and unknowable (est insolubile et inscibile), which substances I have considered under the head Be Insolubilibus in the former part of this work." So far Smalgruelius, whom I have quoted, partly from the curiosity and rareness of his book and partly for the application of his words to our subject-matter. Under which class, then, shall we place tobacco — Determinate, Continuous, Indeterminate, or Temporary? Let us consider, then, the classes in their order and endeavour to resolve this matter. And firstly let it be Determinate. Now, determinate substance has three modes — privation, position, and negation, and tobacco before it is kindled with fire may be said to exist in privation. Next, being alight and in the condition of being smoked, it plainly exists in position. And when it has been reduced to ashes and the pipe is out it exists in negation, since the ashes cannot ever be applied to the use of being smoked. So far good; and since tobacco is evidently neither continuous — i e., lasting to infinity — nor temporary — Le., lasting for a long course of years — nor yet indeterminate, for it does not vanish out of our sight, but leaves ashes, we may with safety declare it to be determinate, existing in the three modes above-named.

This granted, let us consider tobacco existing in privation, that is, before it is placed in position — id est, combustion. Now, since the whole universe and all contained in it may by a comprehensive dichotomy be divided into that which belongs to oneself and that which does not, it appears plain that all the tobacco in the world may be, as far as I am concerned, also divided into that which I have and that which I have not. (And I may remark, by the way, that at this moment I possess about four ounces of the herb to set against the other somewhat larger member of the dichotomy — that which I have not.) But before I can smoke it is necessary that I do practically make this dichotomy — that is, become possessed of some tobacco for my own use and enjoyment. And to this possession there are four ways — borrowing, begging, buying, dealing, any or each of which are open to the would-be dichotomiser and fumigator. And let these four methods be taken in their order and considered. Firstly, borrowing, which I perceive is defined in the dictionary "to ask upon loan,"

"to take for use," neither of which definitions I am able to accept, for many do "ask upon loan" but yet receive nought save refusals, which is not borrowing but endeavouring to borrow; and many do "take things for use" without going through the pain of asking the owner's consent. But this we name stealing, and those amongst us who are unwilling to use harsh words concerning their fellow-men conveying, which is plainly not borrowing. Let borrowing, then, be defined as "the asking for and obtaining anything on loan" — that is, with the intention of restoring it, or its equivalent, back. And provided this intention of restoring be really present, and afterwards carried into effect, I do highly commend this way of getting tobacco as likely to give the borrower a more universal taste in the herb, since if he borrow from many friends it is probable that he borrows, and likewise smokes, many sorts of tobacco. But if this intention of restoring be altogether absent, or if present never resulting in action, then it is no longer borrowing but sponging, a hateful and detestable practice, of which certain students at the University of Oxford did show their abhorrence in coining the future tense of a verb, to express a fellow who was notable for such parasitical champetry. Such a "sponge" will walk into another's rooms with a cheerful smile and "Heus! amice," or "Otror nv,"

*"*Hullo! old fellow," it matters not which, and before he has tarried long out comes his pipe, and with some lame excuse of having forgotten his pouch, or the like, will dive deep into the tobacco-jar, and calling for ale, will play the host most gallantly — at another's expense. Off with such bloodsuckers from the face of the earth! say I— "a twenty devil way," as old Chaucer hath it. So much for borrowing.

Next let us take begging, which differeth from borrowing in that he who begs neither pretends nor intends to pay back that which he has borrowed, but sues of your mercy and kindness to grant him his request. And this way of obtaining tobacco is practised chiefly by such lewd folk as do loiter about the streets and market-places *"*seeking what they may devour." And since any one who has reached this point of my discourse must be of far too obstinate, pigheaded, and determined a nature ever to come to begging tobacco it were unprofitable to continue the matter further; and whether it be profitable or not, this is all I shall say on the question.

Next cometh buying, which meaneth to give the coins of the realm in exchange for that thou buyest. Now, buying may be regarded in three ways — firstly, the place where you buy; secondly, the price at which you buy; and thirdly, those from whom you buy. Now, the place where you buy is sometimes designated a tobacco-shop, but more frequently a "divan or a "cigar stores." And the meaning of the word "divan" is that what would in nature be the sitting-room of the shopkeeper has been fitted up with hard chairs and harder benches and some stony tripods, answering in some respects to tables. Here, by the payment of a shilling, you may smoke a bad cigar and drink a bad cup of coffee, reading meanwhile an obsolete paper. Happy is the man who between this den and the word "divan" can establish any connection. He should be writing this book, not I. Secondly, the price at which you buy may be either a great price, a moderate price, or a small price. For example, of the first take Turkish tobacco at twenty-five shillings the pound; of the second, Birdseye tobacco at six shillings the pound; and of the third, Shag tobacco at four shillings the pound. And in this, as in other matters, wisdom lies in the mean, for he who buys tobacco at a great price needs a long purse, and he who buys it at a small price a strong stomach, but if he observe the mean he need have neither. Thirdly, those from whom you buy, the best division of whom is into male and female. Now the male seller of tobacco is of various sorts, of which take for example (1) the man of many words. From such a one you have much talking concerning all matters in general, especially if he be from foreign lands, which lands he doth not fail greatly to commend, but yet hath no desire to return unto them; (2) the man of few words, whose sole topic is the weather; (3) the man of no words, who selleth thee tobacco as if thou wast doing him an injury, and taketh thy money with a forbidding countenance. Yet if thou givest him no money is his countenance yet more forbidding, which is strange and with difficulty to he explained. For since the contradictory of receiving some money is receiving no money, and likewise the contradictory of a forbidding countenance a cheerful countenance, so rightly in such case should this man's countenance be cheerful; but yet it is not so, the reason whereof has not yet been discovered. —

Next take the female sellers of tobacco, whose very existence I consider an insult to the smoker. For as it is not the habit of females in this country to smoke needs must be that such ones do sell that of which they know nothing and on which they are not qualified to discriminate. And this want of knowledge they endeavour to replace by idle verbosities and foolish grimaces wherewith to please the clothes-horses who may frequent their shop. Yet let it not be thought that they have any pretensions to a pleasant wit or pointed understanding, for I myself, being in company with one whose fault it was to have too great a fondness for these harpies, did list to a conversation lasting above an hour, in which I avow no one sensible, pleasant, or humorous word did pass, the talk being like unto ditchwater. And what pleasure he who calls himself a man can find in such discourse I know not, but am willing to be instructed on the matter. So much for buying tobacco.

Fourthly and lastly, it is possible to obtain tobacco by stealing, to which there is the one objection that the law will not suffer it, and if by means of "bobbies" it can apprehend the stealer will deprive him of both tobacco and liberty for a greater or less period. Otherwise I can see no objection to this method, it being devoid of all expense and being capable of much dexterity in the application. But unless thou possess a quick hand and a swift foot I do not recommend the direct or ostensive method of stealing. But would advise that which is called indirect or per accidens, which is thus accomplished: — By much pains discover a tobacco-shop where the folk seem of a simple and confiding nature, and for some weeks make frequent purchases thereat, paying for all that thou receivest in good and immediate coin. And when thou hast established that confidence which is so much to be desired between man and man it is an easy matter to slide (as it were) into disbursing for that thou hast received at longer and longer intervals, and finally into disbursing not at all. And thus is mere buying converted per accidens into stealing, and that without any risk or harm to the stealer.

So much for the four ways of becoming possessed of tobacco, to which some do add a fifth — namely, presentation, in which you receive it without request on your part and without the understanding that it is in any way to be repaid the presenter, but by free gift. But this is a very rare and phenomenal occurrence; nay, men have doubted whether there is such a thing as a gift at all, thinking to detect in every gift (so called) a certain sub-audition by which the giver implies that he expects some manner of repayment. This question I leave open, only observing that as there are four ways of becoming possessed of tobacco so there are four ways of becoming dispossessed of it — namely, by being borrowed of, by being begged of, by being bought of, and by being robbed of, of which only the third is to be commended, as leading to profit, while the others are at the best doubtful and mostly to be avoided.

And having by one or all of these methods obtained possession of the required tobacco, nothing remains but to smoke it, of which process somewhat hath already been said, and somewhat more shall presently be noted, but for the present let the matter of tobacco be deemed at an end.

CHAPTER II.

NOW IN THE former part of this treatise, amidst other definitions, a pipe was defined thus: — Instrumentum per quod tabaci fumus ore trahitur — an instrument by which the smoke of tobacco is inhaled — which definition is well adapted for that material portion of Pipe Philosophy in which it has been placed. But for our present purposes it will be better defined as “That by which it is possible for tobacco to have position or positive existence which it will readily be perceived is a more abstract and metaphysical statement than the former. A pipe, then, is a thing instrumental to our participation in the energy developed by tobacco in the state of positive existence. Now all will acknowledge that of pipes some are good, some bad, and some indifferent; let it be ours to inquire in what a pipe’s excellence or goodness consists, and what kind of pipe is most likely to possess this excellence. Now a pipe that is excellent in all respects is a rare and precious thing, not to be acquired every day, and deserving of much attention when possessed. And as in the former part the principal division was into simple and complex (quoad materiam), so here the principal division will be into long and short (quoad formam). Of this I esteem the long pipe as on the whole the best, and, in a word, the most adapted for the philosopher; my reason for so doing being that there is a certain pleasure in viewing the clouds of smoke rising from the bowl at a distance from the smoker, which pleasure the short pipe cannot afford. And it having been proved that this viewing of the smoke is one of the most important, and at the same time mysterious, pleasures which it is in the power of tobacco to afford, it is evident that a pipe which increaseth the force of this pleasure is most to be commended. Further, long pipes are divided into four classes, clay, china, wooden, water or hookah pipe. The first of these, clay, is that kind usually known as a churchwarden, either because it bears the same relation to ordinary pipes as a churchwarden does to the common herd of men, or because churchwardens, with that subtle understanding for which they have always been noted, perceiving the dignity of the pipe, determined to make use of it, and so by its being used by them it got the name.

However that may be, it is in many ways a dignified and noble pipe, gracefully curved and pleasant in the mouth. But yet it is easily broken, and does not feel secure in the hand; having, besides, a very small bowl, requiring to be filled often, and very soon being exhausted.

Secondly, by the china pipe I mean those which are separable into three parts — namely, the stem, the bowl, and a third part joining the two, and acting as a reservoir for such liquor as may collect. And this is a pipe to be beheld with reverence and awe; for is it not the very tubulus philo8ophorum Germanicorum — the pipe of German philosophers? Have I not with mine own eyes seen the mighty Spitsbubius in his study holding such a pipe in his hand, and filling it from a mighty jar beside him? Is not the pipe used by the gigantic Dummerkopfius in the compilation of his Noctes Nebulosoe at this present moment to be seen in the Museum of Berlin? And doth it not hold two ounces at the least? Yea, verily it doth, and is a pipe to rejoice the heart of NecXqyepcVa Zeis himself. Happy is he who, possessing such an instrument, fashions his life and conversation agreeably to the same.

Next cometh the long wooden pipe, which, though not hallowed by the names of mighty men, is nathless much to be lauded for its coolness to the mouth and adaptability to the hand. Consisting wholly of wood, it is hard to be broken, in this respect being superior to the churchwarden, Also it hath commonly a large and rotund bowl, pleasing to the eye, and holding much tobacco. And if, in addition to these merits, it hath a flexible joining near to the mouthpiece, so that it may be bent to any direction, it seems to me to approach very near to perfection. But let it be noted that the wood from bowl to mouthpiece be sound and good, which wanting it becomes an abomination, transmuting good tobacco into vile and execrable mundungus.

Last of the long pipes, properly so called, comes the hookah or water pipe. But if this is to be smoked well it must be with its appropriate tobacco, prepared in the orthodox manner, and lighted and kept burning by charcoal. Wherefore he who smokes a hookah should have a slave whose sole duty is the care thereof, else is it a weariness, and productive rather of pain than pleasure. But if the slave understand his office well, then shall it give thee joy, both by reason of the twistings and writhings of the tube and the sight of the smoko curling forth at so great a distance. Wherefore, when I shall become possessed of gold and silver in abundance, I will build me a house with a great hall about the size of a tennis-court. And at one end there shall be a dais, with cushions of precious stuff in the Eastern manner, whereon I will sit me down. But at the other, nigh unto the roof, shall be a gallery with mighty hookahs thereon, the least of which shall hold a full pound of tobacco. And from them, in many twining convolutions, shall their tubes go forth, yea, even unto the cushioned dais shall they go; and seated there with my friends I shall truly smoke and partake of the real and divine energy. But since at the present I have neither gold nor silver, nor apes nor peacocks, I will content me with wood and clay, and receive from them such pleasaunce as they will afford.

Now these being the principal kinds of long pipes, next follow the short pipes, of which there are two divisions, clay and wood. And to all short pipes pertain the following excellences: — (1) They are light in the mouth, and do not drag out one's teeth before their time to be dragged out has come. (2) They give no trouble to the hands. (3) They may be smoked abroad, whether in the city or the country. And in this last particular they plainly surpass the long pipes, which it is impossible to use sub Dio, at least in this land of ours. Now the wooden pipes are subdivided into an infinite variety of forms, and also a great variety of matter, according to the different species of wood that are wont to be used in their confection. As to form, I do most commend those with a large and rotund bowl and a wide mouthpiece. Let the stem also be straight, for in a short pipe a bent and curling stem non est virtus sed tritium — is a blemish and not an excellence. Let the stem likewise be thick and sturdy, of one part with the bowl, and provided with a strong mouthpiece, of some good sort of bone. So that as a fellow-Silurian once observed to me of his favourite pipe, "If thou sittest on this pipe, thou, and not the pipe, wilt be the sufferer." And this saying came not to him by chance or fortuity, but had been handed down from Jestyn ap Gwrgan, his ancestor, the bowl of whose pipe was even a hollow rock, and the stem thereof a young pine-tree. And when the clouds of heaven, hanging low, obscure the mountains from the eyes of men, then they say that Jestyn is smoking his pipe; which whether it be true I dare not pronounce, but am inclined to believe it possible.

Such being our demonstration of short wooden pipes, let us next advance to short clay pipes, which may be arranged under two heads — namely, clay proper, as the term is commonly understood, and meerschaum, which is a finer and better sort of clay. Now it will be remembered that in the former part of this tract in my synopsis of pipes and in the definitions preceding that synopsis mention was made of “ornament” and “essential colour,” and it was explained that the term “ornament” denoted that the surface of a pipe was not smooth and plane, but in all or singular of its parts raised or embossed. And “essential colour” signified that by the art of the maker any colour or colours had been affixed to the pipe to which the term might be applied. Now it is a point much in dispute among philosophers whether it is better that a pipe should be smooth as to its surface, or, on the other hand, he enriched with carving. And for my part I do pronounce that the only way in which carving is profitable is when the bowl of the pipe is made into the similitude of a human head, especially if the head be of that kind known as a skull, the contemplation of which cannot fail to be profitable and agreeable. And if the smoker will but propose to himself that the skull he is smoking is that of a woman, he will, if he think the matter over, be much edified and instructed. And this for two reasons — firstly, that a woman is being turned to some use, which is seldom the case, and when it does occur should be welcomed with joy; and secondly, that by gazing upon this woman’s skull he may better learn to despise and abhor the faces of those women who are alive. For let these faces of flesh be as enticing and beautiful as you please, skulls they are, and ere long skulls they will be, devoid of those graces which have lured many an honest man to shame and destruction — yea, even unto breaking of pipes and burning of cigars for love of a face, than which no shame can be greater or more flagitious. So much for ornament, and as to essential colour I confess I like it not, save that it be used very sparingly, and so as to make of greater effect that “accidental” colour which thy persistent smoking may impart.

Now the merits of short clay pipes are these: (1) They are light and easy to be carried in the mouth; (2) they are “an insult to decent society” — I considering “decent society” as a filthy and obscene harridan which every man does well to trample on and defy; (3) they, after long smoking, become saturated with tobacco, and so excellently sweet. But yet they are of all pipes most easy to be broken, as much for their smallness as their brittle texture. For two things being equally brittle, but one larger than the other, the larger will endure, since every one can see it, and so is ‘ware of breaking it; but the smaller is apt to escape the sight, and so be destroyed unawares. Wherefore a short clay pipe is more likely to be broken than a churchwarden. Further, unless the clay be really of the best, they are very noxious, and apt to breed bile and black choler. And of all bad pipes a bad clay pipe is surely the worst. Therefore let the catechumeu in smoking be chary of using them lest they become a Stumbling-Block to him and a cauae of offence. With regard to meerschaums I would remark one thing, and one only. Be not misled in buying them by a pleasant appearance and outward show of a soft and creamy lustre. For all these are easy to be simulated by cunning men, whom I blame not, but those deceived by such devices. But if thou wouldest test whether it be a true meerschaum hold it in thine hand and try it by its weight. For true meerschaum is exceeding light and clay heavy. And this is a certain proof.

Suck being the principal kinds of pipes, next cometh the question which is the best to possess. And if we were tied by an authority to choose one alone and smoke it perpetually I know not how I should answer, since each pipe has peculiar virtues, and not one possesses them all. But this not being the case I give the following five kinds as meet to be smoked, at different times, and in different cases: (1) A short wooden pipe of that stubborn sort which was commended. And this for general use in the open air and in rough walking. (2) A long wooden pipe with a bulbous bowl and a flexible stem. And this to be used in the house, and convenient for meditation. (3) A short clay pipe, plain and without adornment. And this to be used in the parks and public places for the insulting of Fools. (4) A skull's-head pipe of white clay or meerschaum. And this to be used when in danger of falling in love, or being beguiled by "the monster woman," as Master Abraham Cowley hath it.

(5) — A china pipe of the German fashion, as described. And this to be used in the study of ancient tongues and bygone things, or in reading books of German philosophy.

And concerning the various sorts of pipes, their excellences, their vices, and the uses of each sort, let such things have been said.

Now it having been shown that each pipe is appropriate to a certain disposition of the mind, from which ariseth tie questions — Do certain pipes produce certain dispositions, or do certain dispositions produce certain pipes? — that is to say, are the influences which are undoubtedly exerted by pipes inherent in them, or are they only the results of association? On this point much dispute has arisen; for it is maintained, on the one hand, by Smalgruelius that men are moved to read German philosophy by smoking German pipes, which (he insists) have a certain occult influence on the mind owing chiefly to the strange arrangement and shape of the bowl, and also to the manner in which they are held. To him consents Arnoldus, who declares the abstract idea of German pipes to be "An eternal not ourselves that makes for cloudiness." But, on the other hand, Stoschius will have it that men are not Irish navvies because they smoke short black pipes, but smoke short black pipes because they are Irish navvies, which being a knotty point I leave for the solution of my readers, and trust they may come to a satisfactory conclusion thereon.

Next cometh the question whether pipes can ever begin to be, or ever cease to exist. Now in the Organum Novissimum it is thus argued that pipes have no beginning:— "All matter has existed from eternity, all pipes are matter — ergo, all pipes have existed from eternity," which seems indeed to be a true and valid syllogism in Barbara. And foreseeing that some might object to the major premiss as contrary to religion, it has been put in this form: — Since matter first existed no matter has been destroyed; but pipes are matter, therefore, since matter first existed, no pipes have been destroyed — i e., pipes have existed from the beginning of time. But notwithstanding the force of this argument Dummerkopfius does not hesitate to pronounce it "c*rassa et putida œquivocatio, et nihil amplius*" — a crass and putid equivocation, and nothing more.

On the other hand, those who affirm that it is impossible that a pipe should ever cease to exist argue as follows: —

That which exists cannot cease to exist (since matter is indestructible). A pipe exists! therefore a pipe is indestructible, whence, combining these two conclusions, we determine that pipes have neither a beginning nor ending, which determination cannot fail to produce a calm and equable habit of the mind. For example, yesterday, having the wherewithal, thou didst buy a meerschaum, cunningly and rarely adorned, as if from the very hands of Daedalus, giving, in exchange for it, much gold. And to-day, meeting a friend, in the pride and joy of thine heart thou didst, without delay, pull it forth to exhibit it, and have much honour thereby. But, alas! it slipped from thine hands, and, falling on the stone, was broken and shattered beyond all mending. Nathless grieve not, for hath it not been proved that a pipe is a thing indestructible, and lasting for ever? And though to the eye of sense thy pipe appears to have been destroyed, yet, transcendentally, it doubtless exists unaltered, and will always so exist. And if, upon reading this, the circumstance do really occur as I have related, and thou still wilt persist to repine and cry aloud, ‘AT’At; then shalt thou be accounted a pitiful dolt and loghead, possessed of the Divine reason, but yet not exercising it.

This matter being fully determined and made clear, I would next draw the attention of the studious to a mysterious and doubtful point, by the consideration of which many have become sorely poddered and confounded. And it is this: — Whether, supposing any one to dream of a pipe or of smoking, the pipe that has been dreamt of has any real existence? And the same with regard to the tobacco smoked, the smoke thereof, and the ashes thereof. Now in the judgment of the Rosicrucians pipe, tobacco, ashes, and smoke do verily exist — nay, are more real than the pipes we smoke in our waking hours, which are, indeed, but shadows and similitudes adapted for our material nature, but in no proper sense of the word real. On this see The Rosicrucians, editio altera, p. 116, where the following words may be found:— “But to the questions, what is a dream? — nay, what is waking? — who shall answer? or who can declare whether in that broad outside, where our minds and our powers evaporate and cease, where nature melts away into nothing that we can know as nature, or know as anything else, in regard to dreams and realities, the one may not be the other? The dream may be man’s life to him — as another life other than his own life — and the reality may be the dream,… while we, awake as we fancy ourselves, may be sunk in a sleep of many thousand years.” K.T.. So, it being granted that our dream life is more real than our waking life, the conclusion followeth of necessity that our dream pipes are more real than our waking pipes. Wherefore the whole array of material pipes is, as it were, doubled and confronted by a spiritual host of spiritual pipes, existing in some world we know not of, and to be smoked alone in dreams. To what boundless realms of thought doth this lead us, and what manifold deductions might be drawn therefrom! May not each one of us, from the days of Adam Kadmon to now, have each a patron pipe, as it were, allotted to him, bearing a mysterious relation to his natural habit of mind and body? Hence the pipes a man smokes and his occupation and station may not entirely be disconnected, as Stoschius supposes — e g., it may be in some part true that A is an Irish navvy because he uses a short clay, and X is a man of wealth because he smokes a meerschaum. But of a truth this theory of dream pipes is altogether too deep a matter to be merely handled in so small a treatise, so I do but give hints and outlines, which the reader may fill in for himself as it pleaseth him.

Next I will notice those sophisms or fallacies with which Pipe Philosophers are wont, on occasion, to divert themselves. And, for example, take the following, by which it has been shown that smoking is impossible. To smoke is to inhale tobacco, but to do this it ia necessary for the mouthpiece of the pipe to come in contact with the lips. And suppose that the mouthpiece of the pipe about to be smoked is a foot distant from the lips, then move it so that it becomes nearer by a half; then again move it nearer by a quarter, and then by an eighth, and so on. By which it will continually come more and more near to the mouth, but yet will never touch it. But since it is necessary in smoking for the mouthpiece to touch the mouth, smoking is impossible. This against the possibility of smoking, but against the utility of smoking take the following; —

“If you smoke cigars you cause expense (to yourself).

If you smoke pipes you cause offence (to others).

But you must smoke one or the other, therefore it is best not to smoke.”

And this being the composition of a sophist, who sold it at a great price to a certain Anti-Smoking Association, was confuted as follows by the author of this book in his Disputationes MD Contra Lawsonum: —

“If I smoke pipes I shall please myself.

If I smoke cigars I shall please others.

Therefore it is best to smoke.”

And many other ingenious arguments of this kind are there, which I omit, they pertaining rather to the eristical art than the fumifical, properly so called.

And this is all that I shall say on the matter of pipes.

CHAPTER III.

THE SECOND CATEGORY of place admits of two divisions — the place where not and the place where. For example of the first take, in past time, Socrates; in present time, Mr. Isaac Pitman; in future time, the perfect man of Herbert Spencer, all of whom hare smoked, smoke, and will smoke in the place where they are not, or, in more common language, nowhere. It has, indeed, been asserted that it is impossible for any one to smoke in the place where he is not, but the above examples plainly prove the contradictory, which to all rational men is a self-evident and axiomatic proposition. But as to the manner in which it is accomplished, and as to the pipes which are used (in smoking where you are not), this I may not manifest, it being one of those secret doctrines known only to a few, and unmeet to be revealed. But he who in a reverent and devout spirit shall apply himself to the study of the Pythagorean hymn "Unus, Duo: Soccum Fibulato" (One, Two: Buckle my Shoe), may, by a perception of the mystic numbers therein contained, arrive at an understanding of this matter. For if he can but become a "pontifex" or "bridge-maker" between the limitable (one) and the illimitable (two), and clearly perceive how it comes to pass that "twice one are two," then indeed the buckling of the shoe is an easy task. But this knowledge is not for the many, and is hard to be got. Now I imagine that I perceive many a one who has hitherto read with patience, and it may be not without edification, now fling the book down and scornfully declare that he who thinks it a hard matter to understand "twice one are two" is not fitted to read books, much less to write them. But yet, O Cato, dost thou thyself understand this? Tell me not that it so because the multiplication-table declares it to be so; for that is but saying, "It is so because it is so." Neither use long words such as "unity" and "duality," for they are but one and two in Roman togas. Neither talk of experience, and endeavour to explain the mystery by telling me that "twice one are two" because twice one shilling is two shillings. For there was a time when there were neither shillings, nor denarii, nor drachmas — nay, nor men to possess them, nor a world for men to dwell in; yet, then as now, it might have been written in space, “Twice one are two.”

This being all that I shall write concerning smoking in the place where you are not, I will next treat of that kind of smoking more commonly practised — namely, in the place where you are. And the different divisions of place where I have exhibited in the form of a “tree,” partly after that known as “Arbor Porphyriana,” but differing from it as to matter.

By this synopsis we perceive that place where is capable of two main divisions — in the open air and indoors. The open air or hypæthral division may be further divided into celestial (in the air), terrestrial (on land), and aqueous (on water). Now it is possible to smoke in the air in two ways — in a balloon and out of a balloon, which last, though it is practicable and, perchance, pleasurable, I do not think has ever been accomplished, and this is doubtless due to the mind being in such cases taken up by the consideration of other matters. It will be seen that the terrestrial member is not further subdivided, which omission is not to be imputed to inability or ignorance on my part, but to an unwillingness to occupy the space that would be required, any further subdivision amounting to a description of the habitable world. The aqueous member, however, is here fully partitioned into its several sections, all of which are too commonly known to require particular discourse. I will, nathless, observe that if any one should sit in a boathouse on the shore of a Scotch loch through which a river flows into the sea he will (provided the lock be proximate to the open sea) be smoking in as composite a manner as is possible. For let him, though sitting on the floor of the boat-house, dip his legs into the water, and at the same moment he will be partly indoors and partly in the open air, partly on the land and partly on water, partly on the sea, partly on a river, and partly on a lake. So much for hypæthral or open-air smoking. Next for anæthral or indoor smoking, for all general purposes it is sufficient to say that it always implies the being in a room, the which is further subdivided into possible positions in that room. Of these I most commend smoking in bed, but do advise that the pipe smoked be a long one, and would caution the reader to have all things necessary for smoking to hand, for the jumping out of bed to get a light is plainly contrary to sound reason. And if any one should require a demonstration of this let him read the Great Morals of Aristotle, who leaveth no doubt whatever on the subject. And as by a careful study of the above “tree” it is easy to get at all the maxims relating to place where, I will not give them at length, but only a few by way of example, such as the following: — I. Super mensam et sub mensâ eodem tempore fumare, impossibile est. To smoke on the table and under the table at the same time is impossible. II. Qui fumat in æthere, non fumat in aquâ. He who smokes in the air does not smoke in the water. III. Tribunis sella curuli sedentibus, fumare vetitum est. It was forbidden the tribunes to smoke while sitting on the curule chair. IV. Cavendum est ut fundum habeat, si vis sella fumave. If you wish to smoke in a chair see that it has a seat. V. Auriculariæ vj doinum sestivam non feceruut. Six earwigs don’t make a summer-house. VI. Tam boni in mari continentur tubuli, quam illi exmari extracts. There are as good pipes in the sea as ever came out of it. Of these the fourth has been disputed on the ground that any one who sits down in a chair without a seat experiences a sensation of surprise; that surprise is akin to joy; that joy is akin to happiness; that happiness is the object and end of our whole lives; therefore that he who sits down in a chair witdout a seat has attained the object and end of his whole life. To the fifth maxim Alciphron (known as “The Minute Philosopher”) objects that the number of earwigs required in the composition of a summer-house is, as a matter of fact, 5 3/4; and he also denies the truth of the sixth maxim, since it is impossible for us to really ascertain whether the sea does not contain even better pipes than have come out of it, and he therefore advocates a wise suspension of judgment on this dubious and obscure question It has also been opposed by the dogmatic Pipe Philosophers, who deny that pipes ever have come out of the sea, but this objection being founded on a false and misleading doctrine of experience does not merit a serious consideration.

And concerning these commonplaces or topics of place where enough, they being obvious and of little concern, but I would fain take notice of a disputable and disputed point — whether it should be lawful to smoke in churches. Now at the present this is not the case, and I doubt not that some may consider it profanity to even mention such a matter. But all this is on the assumption that smoking is profanity, which I will by no means allow, for I maintain, on the contrary, that it disposes the mind to attention, which must be either desirable or not desirable. If it is not desirable then it must be right to be inattentive in church (for what is not desirable is not right), but this is plainly not the case, and therefore it is desirable, and therefore right. Secondly, it may be said that the fumes would be disgusting to certain persons, but this objection assumes that whatever is disagreeable to some must be unlawful for all, but this is plainly not a fact; for if it were, since it is disagreeable to some persons to be sober, it would follow that we should be all drunkards, which is absurd. And again, granting that it would be disagreeable to some, and that therefore all should be debarred, what easier than to have smoking galleries, by which all possible annoyance would he avoided? And thirdly, it may be said that smoking in churches is not customary, and therefore not right, in which it is assumed that whatever is not customary is not right. But if so it must have been right to burn heretics and schismatics, for it was very customary. Fourthly, it will be argued that what may be called the associations of smoking are of such a kind that though per se it is not profane, yet by its relations it has become so, and so should not be allowed. These opponents would talk of how "tinkers and beastly folk" do smoke, of the vile places they smoke in, and of the vile words that proceed out of their mouths as they smoke. But no one that I know of has condemned standing or sitting in church because vile people stand and sit in vile places, or singing in church because there are vile and filthy songs. So we perceive that all these objections against smoking in churches are but empty sophisms, possessing no real weight or validity. Yet many feeble folk are misled and confounded by them, and so it was my duty so thoroughly to expose and confute the same that no one upon reading this book should have it in his power to bring forward the excuse of ignorance.

And since some, on a study of the tree, may blame me for having omitted "smoking-carriages," I reply that these "smoking-carriages" are but rooms in motion. And if any one shall say that they are not rooms because they are in motion I tell him he is a dolt and an ass, who if kicked (as he would deserve to be) would deny the foot that kicked him to be a foot for the reason that it was in motion. I may say, however, that some have denied that smoking in anything which moves, whether carriage, boat, or ship, can reasonably be called smoking in any place whatever, since "mobile movetur nec in loco quo est, nec in loco quo non est" — that which is in motion moves neither in the place where it is nor in the place where it is not. (Here the word "loco" would tempt the fool to jest, and seeing that I forbear thou mayest conclude what thou pleasest, but beware of an illicit process.) But since you must either smoke in the place where you are or in the place where you are not, and it is plain that you are not smoking in the place where you are not (for you are in the carriage, ship, or boat), therefore it is clear that you are smoking where you are. But yet, I allow, there is a certain difference between smoking in that which moves and that which moves not, so I will meet the objectors half-way and term such smoking smoking in space. But this again must be carefully distinguished from smoking in or out of a balloon (in air), for in this latter case your body is wholly disconnected from the earth, whereas the carriage rests upon wheels, the wheels upon rails, and the rails upon the earth.

Now as to the question whether it is good to smoke at games, I reply that in all games requiring an application of the mind it is good, as tending to increase the attention and application thereof. Such be chess-play, the philosopher's game, and all ouronomachies and metronomachies, together with games at cards and the like. But, on the other hand, I forbid smoking at tennis and all ball games in which a free play of the body and hands is required, as being likely to impede free action and lead to loss. Especially do I discountenance it in tennis-play, which of all games demandeth the most bodily action, and trust me he who smoketh at this game is little like to make a good chase or put the ball into the grille. But to those in the dedans who watch the sport it may well be allowed, and so for all games with regard to those who look on. And notably in bowls it is a pleasant thing, seated on a bench with a can of ale, to smoke a pipe and cry "Euge! Belle! Pessime!" as it may hap, so to partake in the delight and not the labour of the game. Yet beware of using a pipe of any new-fangled or curious shape, for thus the whole would be marred and become discordant, and like to ancient misereres cushioned with white satin. So the only pipe proper in such case is the churchwarden, and that a full yard in length. Likewise let the tobacco be placed on a dish, and all will be harmonious and in accord.

But this digression into which I have wandered pertains rather to pipe poetry than Pipe Philosophy, and so I will not enlarge upon it. And for the same reason I do not enter into the innumerable digressions which are open to me concerning place, but leave them either to be writ or not to be writ as it may chance. Wherefore as to place, both where and where not, enough, and so to what follows.

CHAPTER IV.

FORASMUCH AS! LAVE lately treated of place I will now treat of time, which for the smoker may be cut into three divisions — initiative, inchoative-contingent, and ultimate, of which technical terms the meaning is this: initiative has reference to the time (or age) at which a man may begin to smoke; inchoative-contingent to the time (or hours) at which he smokes after he hath begun; and ultimate to the time after which he smokes no more, whether by death (which is woeful) or by the compulsion of others (which is more woeful), his own deliberate choice (which is beyond comparison most woeful). But, you ask, do I say that stopping short by death is the least woeful of all? Yea, verily I do. For as in the case of a drunkard (who does evilly) it is good if he cease to drink by his own free-will, less good if he do so compelled by others, and least good if he be estopped by death; so in the case of a smoker (who does well) the very opposite is the case. For it is most melancholy when a man ceases to do well by his own infirmity of mind, less so when he ceases compelled by others (for there is a chance that he may free himself and do well again), and least of all when death finds him still persisting in his well-doing, and to be subdued by it alone. So the three above terms being made clear, we can proceed to a separate consideration thereof.

Firstly, initiative or absolute commencement. That is to say the smoking of the first pipe, the causes that lead to it, the manner of smoking it, and the events that result from it. And as to the causes that lead to it they usually commence with an idle curiosity excited by seeing others smoking, especially if he in whose mind there is this curiosity be of tender years and he perceive certain of his own age (lyXticer ηβψ) smoking in secret or openly, and apparently deriving gratification therefrom. Secondly, I assign as a cause original sin, disposing the mind to do what is forbidden. Especially is this the case in the schools, where smoking, being strictly forbidden, is much practised. Thirdly, I assign as a cause vanity or self-love, which represents that smoking promoteth a brave and manly appearance. All these acting together cause desire, the only counter to which is fear, arising naturally from the risk of stripes and the well-known vigour of tobacco in the unaccustomed stomach. But finally desire casts out fear, and the catechumen obtains possession of the fumificables in one of the four ways that we have before pointed out. And mostly it is by buying, this method affording the most pleasure. Next in secret (if he be fearful) or in the sight of witnesses (if he be vainglorious) is the very first pipe smoked, with all its rites of solemn illumination, placing between the lips, turning in the fingers, and the rest. At this point the casuists make an objection that properly there is, in fact, no such thing as a first pipe, inasmuch as the beginner's courage and stomach both fail him before half or a quarter of the tobacco in the pipe hath been smoked. Therefore, they maintaining that the term "primus tubulus," or first pipe, connotes the smoking of all the tobacco that may be in the aforesaid pipe, deny that such first pipe properly exists. To this I reply that primus tubulus doth by no means respond to their definition, but only denotes the first smoking of tobacco, were it but a single whiff, or even if a pipe be not used, but a cigar or cigarette. Secondly, it is by no means the fact that all beginners are sickened in the middle, for, if I remember rightly, I myself smoked my first pipe through without flinching, and dare say that many others have done likewise. But I admit that in most cases there cometh a horrid presentiment, with quaking of the flesh and a fearful pallor. Then all things, as it were, whirl round, the whole universe appears a-wrack, and night descends upon the soul. Such terrors, indeed, does the wretched one endure that it is likely that he vows henceforth a lifelong abstinence and curseth the hour in which he bought this dreadful herb to be a torment both to his spirit and his flesh. All this if he be private, and no one but himself wotteth of it; how much more if he be discovered and perchance rewarded with stripes and disgrace! And to represent this chain of cause and effect more clearly I subjoin the following scheme ad exemplar Dummerkopfii, the which hath met with much approval at the hands of Pipe Philosophers; —

Of a verity this initiative demandeth "robur et aes triplex," and it might seem wonderful how, knowing all this, any one can have courage to begin. But the heart of man is a stubborn thing and not to be taken aback, so, in spite of all, the flame is ever kindled anew, and the race of smokers multiplieth exceedingly.

Now this state of sorrow and abasement continues not long, and “mox reficit rates,” soon the beginner getteth new pipes to replace those which were broken, and new tobacco in the room of that which was consumed. So little by little, by slow degrees, he advanceth to cloudiness, fearing less with every pipe to be disturbed by sickness, and so at last becometh a smoker. But some there be (O infausti, miserabiles!) whose habit of body will never allow them to smoke, or at best only by whiffs and starts, by which little profit is to be got. Others are so confounded by the event of that first pipe that weeks become months and months years before they venture again and become in truth smokers. And Scriblerus Redivivus appears to me to discriminate very wisely between a smoker and one who smoketh, “for the first hath the habit of smoking, which the last hath not yet.” And if it be asked at what age it is best to acquire the habit, I answer that generally the age of seventeen is the best, or thereabouts, but this must depend greatly on circumstances and habit of body, since it may be too early for some and too late for others.

Next, let us proceed to the inchoative-contingent, which presupposes the habitude of smoking, and has reference to the hours of the day or night at which it is most pleasant, to smoke. And as to this answer — at all hours — with certain necessary and obvious exceptions. Firstly, it is good to smoke one pipe, and only one, before breakfast, at which time the body being empty of food is most amenable to the nicotinic energy. Secondly, fail not to smoke three pipes at the least immediately after breakfast. And these should be performed in the open air, and, if it is possible, while sauntering about a fair garden or pleasaunce, off which the dew has not yet gone, and odorous with the scents of flowers. Thirdly, in the afternoon smoke not less than three pipes, but not immediately after eating lest they breed heaviness and black choler. Fourthly, and lastly, in the evening, and far into the night, when hanging over your books, smoke as many pipes as possible, at the least not less than four. This I propound not as a maximum but a minimum, and necessary to be discharged by ail. For any one who smokes less than eleven pipes per diem is not so much to be accounted a smoker as one who smoketh. And if at any time the student should feel his mouth to be, as it were, cloyed and brackish with much smoking, let him by all means pause for awhile, and drink a strong decoction of tea without either sugar or milk. For nothing is more recuperative and invigorant than this same black tea, and altogether a drink mightily to be commended. And thus in constant smoking and meditation passeth the life of the Pipe Philosopher. To him no place and no time are good save they give him liberty to smoke, and none ill save they take this liberty away. Although, by misfortune, he be compelled to battle with the world and earn his livelihood, yet it is but the body of the man that is so engaged, and his mind not at all. Wealth he only cares for as relieving him of this necessity, and enabling him to be more choice and curious in his fumificables. Opiparous fare and gentle living are held by him of no account, but rather as hindrances and stumbling-blocks to the spirit. Outward show, rich dress, and a fine appearance he dreams not of for himself, but delights to see them in others that he may on them vent his scorn. But most of all he despises that which men call love, and is wont, as we have seen, to look under a fair outside, and see the ruddy skin grow yellow and wrinkled, and at last, bursting asunder, disclose the grinning jaws, and holes for eyes, and layers of bone, about which, when they are covered over, there is such a pitiful to-do and exclamation. Thus, with much tobacco, many books, and a few friends, his life goes on, till at last the inchoative-contingent draws to an end, and the ultimate begins.

And when it has come to this, and he knows that he has but a few pipes more to smoke in this world, he taketh care that they be smoked well and with a good grace, until it cometh to ultimus tubulus, the very last pipe, and dying as he hath lived, neither hoping, fearing, nor regretting, he departs hence, and becomes but a memory of a life well lived, and a death bravely endured. But if this is a woeful matter — fitlfav rj Kara Sitxpva — what shall we say of the man who by his own choice leaves off to smoke, and takes to himself some ribbon as a proclamation of his shame? He shall be as an evil savour, a stink, and an abomination in the nostrils of the faithful, and as one not fit to be named as a man. And let those who have brought him unto this be accounted as lemures and larvæ, and their voices as the squeaking of the bats of hell. So shall they be emptied out like ashes, and the recollection of them be even as the foulness of a pipe that is foul, but with a more exceeding foulness, and their memory as the memory of a bucket that is broken. Wherefore let those to whom there is still time take heed and make use of that time, concerning which let such things have been said.

CHAPTER V.

IN RELATION LET us first take the eight predicaments or categories of fumifical mischance, as they are commonly given by the scholastic writers, and repeated in the Schools of Pipe Philosophy: (1) suffering in body, which befalls detected smokers of tender years; (2) without a pipe-light:

(3) — in a drawing-room, or in the company of females; (4) in a church, which, if my arguments take effect, will soon cease to be reckoned a predicament; (5) sick in body, whether by reason of tobacco or otherwise; (6) with a stopped-up pipe; (7) with a burnt tongue; (8) proctorised, the which is a predicament limited to our English Universities. These predicaments are below enumerated in some Latin lines, of no little elegance and numerosity, and well worthy of a place in the memory: —

"(1) Verbera cum dantur,   (2) tubulo cum lumina desunt, (3) — Aut cum fœmineis œdibus usque manes.

(4) — Aut in Divorum templis,   (5) ægerve,   (6) dedisti Frustra opurarn tubulo, heus! inapertus abit.

(7) — Cum patiens tristi cruciatur lingua dolore, (8) — Proctoribus titulum dicis et asque domum.

Hæc si perlexisse juvit, collecta magistris Omnia fuœantis prædicamenta tencs."

Of these eight predicaments the doctrine was first taught in the University of Padua by certain learned Greeks who had fled thither from Constantinople. And they continued to hold their place without assault, till at the end of the last century they were impugned oy the German Windiemann, who proposed to substitute the following: — Venerability, mulierity, ecclesiasticity, glossarity, and inillumination as being fewer in number, and possessing greater perspicuity. And Zimmerblast, in his "Kritik der Windiemannschen Pfeiffe-Philosophie," Tub., 1815, would further reduce the predicaments to two only — inillumination and imperturbability, or hæccity, by which latter term he denotes that peculiar cohesion of matter inside a pipe which it is impossible, without the assistance of a steam-engine, to pierce through. But the publication of this tractate leading to a riot among the students, and the threatened deprivation of the professorial chair, Zimmerblast consented to withdraw these innovations, and to be content to leave matters as he found them, which, to a German philosopher, is accounted the utmost of humiliation. Yet since that time a new school hath arisen in the University of Paris which teaches that there is in reality but one predicament, which is "N'être pas Parisien" — not to have been born in Paris. For Paris, being the capital of France, is the seat of the French Republic, which is admitted by all to be the most tolerant, magnanimous, and amiable Government that ever has existed or ever can exist; and it being likewise granted that the Parisians are the most courageous people under the sun, and also the most polite (as was indeed most apparent but lately), it follows of necessity that the only real misfortune that can befall a man is not to have been born in Paris; and so but to mention this is sufficient, all other misfortunes being of but minor importance. Moncurius Scepticus, however, in his "Itinerarium per Orbem Terrarum factum," considers the real predicament to be "the not-possessing a house in Bedford Park," which being bounded on one side by an open sewer, on another by a brickfield, and at each end by a railway, cannot fail to be a desirable and pleasant spot. (Rents from <£35 to £100. Apply at the office.) Some obstinate and misguided spirits, indeed, would object to this on the ground that two feet of water on the floor of one room and a delapsed ceiling on the table of another are, to say the least, inconveniences; but as Moncurius contends, is there not a club and a School of Art, and doth not the railway take men direct to that spot, hallowed by the delivery of so many Orationes Notilocellenses, or south-windy discourses? And he who having read that notable discourse in which Moncurius completely, logically, and syllogistically proves the absurdity of the Christian religion is yet inclined to doubt the blessedness of living in propinquity to so great a man, must be, in very deed and truth, nought but an ignoramus and blockhead. So that there is not a little to be said for this Moncurian predicament, but as it is but lately promulgated, I am constrained to adhere to the old predicament until such time as the world be dichotomised into — 1. Wise men = Dwellers in Bedford Park. 2. Fools = Dwellers in other places.

To pass from the predicaments to other matters, I will first take the doctrine of tubular remembrance, or anamnesis, which, stated briefly, is as follows: — A pipe that has been smoked by any one, (1) in a certain place, (2) at a certain time, (3) in a certain relation, will, if laid by for a season and smoked again by the same person, (1) in another place, (2) at another time, (3) in a different relation, bring back to the soul an anmnnesis, or remembrance of the former place, time, and relation. And this, not imperfectly as an outline, but perfectly as in a finished picture. Which in the Fumifical Logic of Peter Pfeiffe (Petrus Fistularius) stands thus:— “Tubulus, ab aliquo fumatus; 1° In loco quodam; 11° In tempore quodam; IIP In ratione quadam; si per temporis quoddam epatium deponatur, et inde rursus ab eodem. 1° In alio loco; 11° In alio tempore; III° In ratione diversâ, fumetur: in animum ejus perfectam, loci, temporis, raiionis prioris memoriam reducet. Quod non indistincte, aut confuse, sed distincte et perspicue, perficit.”

Such being the doctrine of anamnesis in the precision of the Latin tongue, for the benefit of those who love to see a dignified subject treated of in a dignified language, let us examine somewhat closely this ingenious and subtle opinion. And firstly it may be inquired, Is it in reality so? and if it be so, whether universally or particularly? To which questions I may make one answer, It is so, but not universally. For as a cucumber seed would attain to nothing if it were planted in ice, so neither can this process of anamnesis take place in a cold and unfruitful mind, but only in one that is delicate and readily receiveth and fructifieth whatever is cast upon it. And secondly, what is the cause of this recollection? Why, as to this various explications have been given. Some will have it that a pipe collects while it is being smoked certain atoms of a subtile aether, which in its turn is impregnated with the quintessence of the surrounding air, which differeth in some degree in every different place. And if the recollection includes a recollection of persons it is said that the atoms collected were partly composed of the breath of these persons. So these atoms being collected are stored up within the substance of the pipe, and remain within it for any length of time (but Spitsbubius will not allow a greater duration than a thousand years), and upon the pipe being smoked again are drawn out by the heat, and pass with the smoke into the body, and so act on the mind, not immediately but mediately. But this theory seeming somewhat gross and material was rejected by Limalaudulus de Tamesi, who maintains that the anamnesis is owing to the ideas of place, time, and relation being perceived by the "anima tubuli," or spirit of the pipe, and so becoming a part of it, whence after a certain mysterious fashion they pass directly into the mind when the pipe is again used. But the means by which this is effected he explains not, and so lays himself open in some way to the charge of obscurity which hath been brought against him. And if we admitted this hypothesis we could not fail to regard a pipe as divinitatis specie quadam imbutus, a kind of divinity capable of receiving and imparting ideas, independent of matter, which would seem somewhat too extravagant. For my own part I do mostly incline to the opinions of Jacobulus de Corvis, who holds that a pipe is neither capable of receiving aethereal atoms or ideas, much less of storing them up and imparting them. And his explanation by instance is this: — Supposing that on a bitter and frosty day in midwinter I walk through a wild country abounding in hills, the tops of which are covered with snow. And let me also meet with certain of my acquaintance, and talk with them on some particular matter to which we alone are privy. Grant me likewise to fall into a ditch as I journey along, and be not wroth if I be covered with slush even to my doublet. And further when I reach my journey's end let it be not forbidden me to devour muffins (placentæ calefactæ) even till I can eat no more. Now all these events have occupied a certain space of time, during some part of which (say from my meeting with my friends till the falling into the ditch) I have smoked a particular pipe and none other. And a twelvemonth after, this pipe in the meantime not having been used by me, suppose that in the heart of a city, on a burning July day, I once more smoke it. And I have scarce put it to my lips when in imagination I am again among the snow-clad hills and feel again the cold keen air of winter. Next cometh to my mind the meeting with my acquaintance, the matter of our discourse, the wetness of the ditch, and the hotness of the muffins. Now it was only during a part of the whole time that I was actually smoking, so that neither by aethereal atoms or ideas could the pipe participate in what preceded and what followed my smoking of it. And the cause of recollection is as follows: — Every single pipe hath in it a somewhat that renders it different from other pipes. And this somewhat is perceived by the mind secretly — that is to say, it is not known by itself, but by what results from it. So taking this along with more material differences of substance, shape, colour, and the like, it is easy to understand that all these acting together recall to the mind when it was they were last perceived. Which being accomplished, the mind, not content with the bare particulars of time, proceeds to place, relation, action, passion, and so on through the categories until the whole circumstances, with what preceded and what followed, are run over anew. So that the very slightest matter which occurred formerly is now remembered and pondered over, it may be even to a ridiculous and disproportionate extent. And this seems to be a very rational view to take of the matter, far more agreeable to the intellect than the former hypotheses I have cited. For if we allow that the ideas do actually exist in the pipe itself it must follow that they exist for all who may afterwards smoke it, and not alone for the original smoker. So we might suppose a new species of divination arising named capnomancy, in which by merely smoking a pipe we might gain a knowledge not only of the deeds or words of others but their very thoughts and desires, which would be an art greedily sought after and pursued, and, indeed, might have we know not what results. For since it is agreed that the superior produces the inferior, and since ideas are confessedly superior to matter, who shall say that ideas may not be so managed as to produce matter? So by continually brooding over the ideas — say of wealth — contained in a pipe the smoker might be surprised by one day seeing the ideas take visible form in the shape of gold, silver, and broad lands. But this hath not yet been accomplished, and as far as I can judge is not at present likely to be, which is much to be regretted and deplored. And as to the atomic theory it is clear that it is not possible that, except during the very act of smoking, the atoms can influence the pipe at all, and since the most subtile part of the anamnesis is its comprehension of what preceded and what succeeded, this is left altogether unexplained, or only to be explained in an unnatural and improbable manner. So let the hypothesis of Jacobulus be adjudged the conqueror, and with this let us end the matter.

Next, by way of disputation, I will take the statement often made by the thoughtless — smoking is a slow poison. First as to the form. What is a “poison?” A poison is a substance, either solid, liquid, or gaseous, which being absorbed into the system of the body either kills it or more or less grievously injures it. And a “slow poison” is therefore a substance which does this slowly and by degrees. From which it appears that “smoking” is a substance. But smoking is the act of inhaling smoke. Therefore an act is also a substance, which is absurd. For how can we talk of a solid act, or a liquid act, or a gaseous act? It might as justly, quoad formam, be said of dancing that “it is a slow poison,” or of any other act of the body that can be conceived of. And again, what meaning are we to assign to the word “slow?” I will grant that “smoking” is a poison, and search among other poisons and endeavour to understand in what manner “slow” is applied to them. Now among rapid poisons we find, for example, aconite, prussic acid, and the venom of certain snakes. These will kill a man, it may be, in a second of time, it may be in two or three days at the most. And among slow poisons there are those mysterious powders formerly in fashion by which, at most in a few months, a man’s strength was undermined and he seemed to fade away as if by natural disease. Now since “smoking” is a “slow” poison it is in the latter way that we should expect it to act, and a year of smoking at the utmost would be sufficient to insure death. But who ever heard of a smoker fading away after this manner? and even if it has happened so, how many out of the millions of men who have smoked have been thus caused to perish? Furthermore, can we say of any man who has attained the age of seventy, eighty, or ninety years, and who throughout (say fifty years) of his life has persisted in a certain habit, that he has been poisoned by that habit? Yet many who have died at such ages have been constant smokers for the greater part of their lives, and glory in having thus done. I grant that if a boy of twelve, without previous preparation, smoke eight ounces of tobacco in as many hours it is not unlikely he will die, or at any rate be grievously sick, but this amounts only to saying that “Tobacco, if it be used to an inordinate extent by one not used to it, will act as a poison,” which might be said of well-nigh every substance we can think of as capable of being taken into the body. But yet not a slow poison, for the boy would probably die in a very short space of time, or be at death’s-door for a day or two and then recover. So in no case can tobacco be said to be a slow poison, and only a poison when taken under exceptional surroundings. And, in fact, this argument, or rather statement (for an argument requires its terms to have a distinct meaning, and also a solid foundation), is mostly brought forward by those who

By damning those they have no mind to.”

Such as are, for instance, your fine City dames, who will become well-nigh exanimate at the smell of good wholesome tobacco, but who, in the privity of their chambers, will stupefy themselves with chloral or morphia and the like. But it were waste of breath, better employed in smoking, to rebuke these malaperts, so I will leave them to their drugs, and betake me to my pipe.

This pernicious and hateful dogma being analysed into its elements of equivocation, folly, and alazonie, and so confuted, I will next observe the ten topics of doubt as propounded by Ænesidemus Minimus in his Prior Fumifics (Kaimicpopa UpoTepa). They refer actually to the lighting of pipes, but do strike indirectly at the certainty of all smoking whatsoever. For it being impossible to smoke tobacco before it be lighted, if it can be shown that considerable doubt attaches to the certainty of lighting, then it follows that an equal doubt attaches to the certainty of smoking. And this Ænesidemus endeavoured to prove. For being a professor at the famous University of Gotham, he grew dissatisfied with the empirical methods there in vogue, and from his professorial tub enunciated the following sceptical propositions: — Supposing any one to have a pipe containing tobacco in one hand and a matchbox in the other, it is very improbable that this pipe will be lighted. For these reasons: 1. The tobacco may be damp. 2. The pipe may be too full. 3. The pipe may not be full enough. 4. The match may go out (a) of its own volition, (b) by the force of the wind, (c) by the foolishness of the agent. 5. the pipe may be undrawable, (a) because it is stopped up too much, (6) — b)because it is not stopped up enough. 6. The intending smoker may become an idiot, or have a fit, and so be incapable of light bg the pipe. 7. If he be at school he may be interrupted by the archididascalus or one or more of the hypodidasculi. 8. He may change his mind. 9. There’s many a slip ‘twixt the pipe and the lip. 10. Supposing none of these things happen, and the matter be accomplished, yet it is false to say that the pipe has been lighted; for it is not lighted, but the tobacco that is in it. Which doctrines were no sooner made known than a storm of rage and indignation against Ænesidemus burst forth in Gotham, and not only was his tub of fumifical philosophy at once declared vacant, but its very bottom was knocked out by the students, by which it became yet more vacant, and wholly unfit for professorial purposes. Ænesidemus was further declared to be tainted with the worst errors of Gulielmus de Læto Lapide, the Pope, and the Caucus; and within a short space of time Gotham knew him no more, save as a Radical and a backslider, who had bitten the bosom that cherished him. And Gotham being a city of full five hundred souls, returning two Conservative members to the Commons' House, and possessing six churches and nine public pumps, besides innumerable private ones, it was universally thought in the town that this verdict would be decisive; but the country at large had lately experienced one of its occasional attacks of madness, and had placed Gulielmus de Læto Lapide at the head of the Government. And he, with that shameless wickedness for which he is everywhere known, did show favour to Ænesidemus, and (it is vulgarly reported) did enter into a Corrupt Compact with him, and did give him golden money, on the condition that he should exercise his art of blacking boots for his (Gulielmus's) benefit. But all this, the disputations in the Commons' House upon the matter, the questions asked therein upon it, and the leading articles thereon, are they not written in the books of the misdeeds of Gulielmus de Læto Lapide, who made the people of England to go astray?

But if it be inquired by the curious what was the fate of the tub that was made vacant by the abominable heresies of Ænesidemus, and the boots of the students, I am able in some sort to answer. On every thirty-first of April (Old Style) this tub is borne round the town, vested in full academicals, and surrounded by a body of the graduates of the University of Gotham shouting discordantly the following verses: —

I.

"O! cives civitatis
Hujus clarissâmæ,
Menoriam pravitatis
Æternam tenetc.

II.

"Illius P rofessoris,
Qui ausit dubitare; Et est expulsus è foris,
Ncc seio cur, nec quare.

III.

"Sed solum hoc scio, —
Qui audet dubiture,
Is expelletur Gotbamo
Si absunt cur et quare."

So much for the history of these notable topics of doubt. But if we proceed to examine them critically, notwithstanding the indignation that they aroused, I believe we shall find them more or less reasonable. Being for the most part expressed in clear and precise language, there appears to be no necessity of a particular explication. But I would advise the reader that in the fifth topic the words "not stopped up enough" denote what is usually named "leaking" — that is, an escape of air at some part of the pipe diverse from the bowl or mouthpiece. So considering that of these topics not one is impossible, and very many do frequently come to pass, it seems not unreasonable to argue for an apathy, or suspension of the judgment upon the question of certainty or non-certainty. I confess, however, that the tenth topic hath somewhat the appearance of a quibbling with words and of drawing too nice a distinction; yet we must understand that one of the most distinguishing marks of a true philosopher is a nicety in speech and a disposition to correct a loose and vulgar diction. So I will concede that these topics are well founded, and justify a wise suspension of judgment upon the matter of lighting pipes. Yet I can by no means consent with Ænesidemus when in his Posterior Fumifics he deduces from this improbability that it will be possible to light any given pipe the conclusion that, it being so uncertain a matter, it is better not to smoke at all. And when he proceeds, on these grounds, to recommend the taking of snuff and the chewing of quids as a substitute for smoking, I do not hesitate to pronounce him a gross materialist. For though he affirms that a quid contains the quidditas or whole essence of the Schoolmen, he seems to me but to equivocate and play the sophist, and I do therefore warn such of my readers as are inclined to materialism against these Posterior Fumifics, as being in some places little better than plain acapnism, and evidently contrary to the teaching of Pythagoras. And let all such would-be materialists remember that, though metaphysically the possibility of smoking may seem doubtful, yet to all rational intents and purposes it is possible, and may therefore be believed in and practised with an easy conscience. And all doubters on this question I refer to the Κάπνισμά EiTeXfeciat or Smoke-offering of Perfection by Proclus Capnobates, where shall be found much wholesome doctrine of a just mean between dogmatism and scepticism. Which observation applies equally to the downright acapnists, who deny all virtue whatsoever to tobacco, in whatsoever form it may be taken. For, they maintain, if there be any real savour in tobacco it must exist independently of the smoker, chewer, or snuffer, and be perceived in the same manner by all who use it. But what is more common than to hear two smokers of the same tobacco express directly contradictory judgments thereon? One will say it is mild, another strong, and if a third enter to them he will probably pronounce it neither mild nor strong, but of a medium flavour. Whence it is evident the virtue exists only in the mind of the smoker, and not at all in the tobacco itself. And who is ignorant that a single puff of tobacco-smoke appears a very different thing to an aphis vastator than to a man, inasmuch as to the insect it is death, but to the man a pleasure; but if the virtue really existed in the tobacco or the smoke from the tobacco it would be the same to the one as to the other. And again, you will hear the same man express different opinions at different times concerning the qualities of the very same tobacco; but if there existed any real savour in the tobacco itself this could not possibly be the case. So this nicotinic virtue is plainly a concept or notion of the mind, and in that manner really existing, but as it is vulgarly conceived to exist (namely, not in the mind, but in tobacco), it exists not at all. But these doctrines are so far harmless in that they do not advise the abjuration of smoking, but only regard it in a new and mysterious light, and so may be admired for their ingenuity without fear of any practical consequence. Yet they are to be condemned for obscurity and mistiness of expression, and are therefore not to be studied save by solid and profound doctors of Pipe Philosophy.

Such, in brief outline, are the two principal schools of sceptics, the one headed by the sometime Professor of Gotham, and becoming degraded to the base materialism of snuffing and chewing, and the other diverging into a mystic idealism, or notional philosophy, which, albeit not nocent, is yet wanting in basis, and so not worthy of any high laudation. And now, since I have traced from its origin and dim dawnings this Disciplina Tabulata, or PIPE PHILOSOPHY, expounding, anatomising, and dividing it on my way, rendering plain things dark and dark things plain, I may declare with Naso, Hoc opus exegi. Fessæ date serta carinæ. Contigimus portum, quo mihi cursus erat; or with Tully, using less tropical adornment, Adducta ad exüum quæstio est. And so, most stubborn and undaunted reader, I — bid thee farewell, wishing thee half as much pleasure in the reading as I have had in the writing, which in truth has not been a little.

Hieroglyphics

Published in 1902, this is Machen's only full-length work of literary criticism and offers a valuable insight into his thoughts on writing. Machen was moved to write the book after becoming sub-editor of Literature (later the Times Literary Supplement) in 1898.

As well as a valuable insight into Machen's own literary ideas – particularly his notion that writers should strive above all else to create 'ecstasy' in the reader – the work is also of great use to students of fin de siècle literary theory in general.

Hieroglyphics

by

ARTHUR MACHEN

IN this fascinating volume, written in the form of a series of conversations, Arthur Machen develops his theory of the art of literature, explaining why in his opinion Dickens is greater than Thackeray, running, indeed, over the whole field of letters from the time of the Greeks to our own day. He names ecstasy as the touchstone by which one can distinguish art from hackwork, and he proved himself consistent by writing a book which glows with this requisite quality. Hieroglyphics will delight not only the lover of Machen, but also any one who is interested in books about books, for under this classification it may be considered one of the best.

NOTE

IT WAS MY privilege, many years ago, to make the acquaintance of the obscure literary hermit, whose talk I have tried to reproduce in the pages that follow. Our first meeting was one of those chance affairs that now and then mitigate the loneliness of the London streets, and a second hazard led to the discovery that we had many interests in common. I think that the Hermit (as I shall call him) had begun to find the perpetual solitude of his years a growing terror, and he was not sorry to have a listener; at first, indeed, he talked almost with the joy of a child, or rather of a prisoner who has escaped from the house of silence, but as he chose subjects which have always interested me intensely, he gave as much pleasure as he received, and I became an assiduous visitor of his cell.

He had found an odd retreat. He avoided personalities, and had a happy knack of forgetting any that I vouchsafed on my side, (he forgot my name three times on the first evening that we spent together, and succeeded in repeating this feat over and over again since then), and I never gathered much of his past history. But I believe that "something had happened" many years before, in the prehistoric age of the 'seventies. There had been a break of some sort in the man's life when he was quite young; and so he had left the world and gone to Barnsbury, an almost mythical region lying between Pentonville and the Caledonian Road. Here, in the most retired street of that retired quarter, he occupied two rooms on the ground floor of a big, mouldy house, standing apart from the street and sheltered by gaunt grown trees and ancient shrubs; and just beside the dim and dusty window of the sitting-room a laburnum had cast a green stain on the decaying wall. The laburnum had grown wild, like all the trees and shrubs, and some of its black, straggling boughs brushed the pane, and of dark, windy nights while we sat together and talked of art and life we would be startled by the sudden violence with which those branches beat angrily upon the glass.

The room seemed always dark. I suppose that the house had been built in the early eighteenth century, and had been altered and added to at various periods, with a final “doing up” for the comparative luxury of someone in the ‘tens or ‘twenties; there were, I think, twenty rooms in it, and my friend used to declare that when a new servant came she spent many months in finding her way in the complicated maze of stairs and passages, and that the landlady even was now and then at fault. But the room in which we sat was hung with flock paper, of a deep and heavy crimson colour, and even on bright summer evenings the crimson looked almost black, and seemed to cast a shadow into the room. Often we sat there till the veritable darkness came, and each could scarcely see the white of the other’s face, and then my friend would light two lonely candles on the mantelpiece, or if he wished to read he set one on a table beside him; and when the candles were lighted I thought that the gloom grew more intense, and looking through the uncurtained window one could not see even the friendly twinkle of the gas-lamp in the street, but only the vague growth of the laburnum, and the tangle of boughs beyond.

It was a large room and gave me always a sense of empty space. Against one wall stood a heavy bookcase, with glass doors, solid and of dark mahogany, but made in the intermediate period that came between Chippendale and the modern school of machine-turned rubbish. In the duskiest corner of the room there was a secretaire of better workmanship, and two small tables and three gaunt chairs made up the furnishing. The Hermit would sometimes pace up and down in the void centre of the room as he talked, and if I chanced to be sitting by the window, his shape would almost disappear as he neared the secretaire on his march, and I heard the voice, and used to wonder for a moment whether the man had not vanished for ever, having been resolved into the shadows about him.

I have spent many evenings in that old mouldering room, where, when we were silent for an instant, the inanimate matter about us found a voice, and the decaying beams murmured together, and a vague sound might come from the cellars underneath. And it always seemed to me as if the crypt-like odour of the cellar rose also into the room, mingling with a faint suggestion of incense, though I am sure that my friend never burned it. Here then, with such surroundings as I have indicated, we held our sessions and talked freely and with enjoyment of many curious things, which, as the Hermit would say, had the huge merit of interesting no one but ourselves.

He would sometimes, whimsically, compare himself to Coleridge, and I think that he often deliberately talked in S. T. C.'s manner with delight in the joke. For, I need hardly say that the comparison was not in any way a serious one; he had a veneration for Coleridge's achievement, with a still greater veneration for that which Coleridge might have achieved, which would have caused him to regard any such comparison, seriously entertained, as unspeakably ludicrous. Still, he liked to regard himself as a very humble disciple in Coleridge's school, he was fond, as I have said, of imitating his master's manner as well as he could, and I think that he cherished, in the fashion of S. T. C., the notion that he had a "system," an esoteric philosophy of things; he sought for a key that would open, and a lamp that would enlighten all the dark treasure-houses of the Universe, and sometimes he believed that he held both the Key and the Lamp in his hands.

It is a confession of mysticism, but I incline to think that he was right in this belief. I recall the presence of that hollow, echoing room, the atmosphere with its subtle suggestion of incense sweetening the dank odours of the cellar, and the tone of the voice speaking to me, and I believe that once or twice we both saw visions, and some glimpse at least of certain eternal, ineffable Shapes. But these matters, the more esoteric doctrines of "the system" have entered hardly or not at all into the very imperfect and fragmentary notes that I have made of his conversations on literature.

I should scarcely be justified in calling him a literary monomaniac. But it is true that Art in general, and the art of literature in particular had for him a very high significance and interest; and he was always ready to defend the thesis that, all the arts being glorious, the literary art was the most glorious and wonderful of all. He reverenced music, but he was firm in maintaining that in perfect lyrical poetry there is the subtlest and most beautiful melody in the world.

I can scarcely say whether he wrote much himself. He would speak of stories on which he was engaged, but I have never seen his name on publishers' lists, and I do not think that he had adopted a pseudonym. One evening, I remember, I came in a little before my accustomed time, and in the shadowy corner of the room, a drawer in the secretaire was open, and I thought that it looked full of neat manuscripts. But I never spoke to him about his literary work; and I noticed that he did not much care to talk of literature from the commercial standpoint.

It is perhaps needless to say that I consulted my friend before publishing these notes of his conversations. I had been forced to leave London for some months, and I wrote to him from the country, requesting his permission to give to the world (if the world would have them) those judgments on books which I had listened to in Barnsbury. His reply allowed me to take my own way, “with all my heart, so long as you make me sufficiently apocryphal. I am not going to compete with ‘real’ critics whose names are printed in the papers; but if you can maintain the incognito and allow your readers (supposing their existence) to believe that I am a mere figment of your brain, you can print my obiter dicta ‘with ease of body and rest of reins.’ Here is a suggestion for a title: what do you say to ‘Boswell in Barnsbury’? But I really had no notion that you were taking notes all the time. Remember: keep the secret, and the secrets.”

I regarded this as a very liberal license, and I have tried to set in the best order I could compass the “system” so far as it relates to letters. I do not pretend that I am a verbatim reporter, for I had to trust to my memory, and though I tried to arrange my notes at the time, I fear I have fallen here and there into confusion. Still, I think that the six chapters which follow will seem fairly consecutive in their argument and arrangement, and the “Appendix” — a confession of failure — is, in reality, the result of the “cyclical mode of discoursing,” in which the Hermit jocularly professed to follow Coleridge.

Perhaps indeed Coleridge was deceived, and my dear friend with him, in the hope of real essential knowledge; but even so, these fragments which I propose are evidence that the latter earnestly desired the truth and sought it.

DO YOU KNOW that just before you came in I found something highly significant in the evening paper? I am afraid from your expression that you rather undervalue the influence of the press; indeed, I remember one day when we were out together you swore at an inoffensive boy who tried to allure us with news of all the winners. I think I pointed out at the time that even horse-racing and an interest in “events” are preferable to stagnation, and that there is something august in the universal human passion for gambling. And, after all, the office-boy who “puts on” half-a-crown is really only an example of the love of man for the unknown; the half-crown is a venture into mystery, with that due flavour of commercialism which we in England add to most of our interests. But you see, don’t you? that gambling, even under its most sordid aspects, is not altogether sordid; it’s the mystery, the uncertainty, the hours of “strange surmise” that the smallest bet gives to the bettor that make the real delight of betting. When the office-boy wins and gets ten shillings for the risk of his two-and-six, his delight is not by any means pure love of gain, it is distinguished by a very marked line from the constantly repeated joys of the grocer, who is always buying delicious tea at ninepence and selling it at one-and-six. Here you have commercialism in its simplest form; but our office-boy, though he likes the money well enough, stands on a much higher plane. For the moment he is the man who has succeeded in solving the enigma of the Sphinx, in discovering the unknown continent, in reading the cypher, in guessing at the song the Sirens sang, in unveiling the hidden treasure that the buccaneers buried on the lonely shore; he has ventured successfully into the dim region of surmises. And when he loses, there are always consolations; the Indies have not been discovered on this voyage, certainly, but there have been wonders on the way, he has enjoyed many hours of delicious expectation. The proof that he likes the sport, even when he loses, is that he invariably takes the first opportunity of venturing again in the same manner. And, by the way, perhaps I was a little severe just now on trade, and especially on the grocer’s sugary and soapy enterprise. Perhaps if we were to look with a rather finer vision into the commercial spirit, we might find that it is not wholly commercial, not altogether sordid. Of course if the grocer opens his shop with a certainty, mathematical or almost mathematical, that the public will buy his wares, he is a wicked fellow; he is gambling with loaded dice, betting against a horse that he knows is to be made "all right," playing cards with honours up his sleeve, and I am sure that if this be his enterprise, it will always meet with our sternest disapproval. Casanova died towards the close of the last century, and since then cardsharping has become impossible to a man of taste. But seriously, I suspect that a good deal of the allurement that trade possesses for so many of us is the risk which it almost always implies, and risk means uncertainty, and uncertainty connotes the unknown. So you see our despised grocer turns out, after all, to be of the kin of Columbus, of the treasure-seekers, and mystery-mongers, and delvers after hidden things spiritual and material. I suppose we have here the real explanation of the human trading passion, and the solution of a problem that has often puzzled me. The problem I mean is this: how does it happen that the English are both the greatest poets and the greatest tradesmen of the modern world? Superficially, it seems that keeping shops and making poetry are incompatibles, and Wordsworth and Coleridge, Keats and Shelley, Tennyson and Poe, should have come from Provence or Sicily, from the "unpractical," uncommercial Latin races. But if we trace back the trading instinct to that love of a risk — or in other words to the desire for the unknown — the antinomy disappears, and it will become perfectly natural that the race which has gone to the world's end with its merchandise, has penetrated so gloriously into the further regions of poetry.

But that reminds me of what I was saying just after you had lit your pipe. I think I remarked that I had seen something of very high significance in the evening paper, and the glare of disgust with which you greeted my observation constituted an interruption, and an interruption that had to be dealt with. Now again you seem to hint at doubt with your eyebrows; you would say, perhaps, that I have not made out a very convincing case for journalism? But you must remember that my mental process resembles that of Coleridge; you called on the Seer at eleven o'clock in the morning, and (if young and imprudent) asked him a question. And at the waning of the light Coleridge was still diligently engaged in answering your question for you, having talked without intermission all the summer day. A "cyclical mode of discoursing" the pious Henry Nelson Coleridge called it, and he deals faithfully with certain persons who complained “that they could get no answer to a question from Coleridge.” And you will please to remember this when you think that I am “wandering” — a vice of which Coleridge also was accused. To-night, for example, on the evening paper being mentioned, your face expressed disgust and contempt, which I diagnosed (and rightly, I believe?) as a tribute to the enormous interest taken by the editors of these agreeable journals in the very latest sporting news; an interest which allows but little space for the discussion of pure literature. Hence my remarks on the gambling-spirit; and now I hope you will at least assume a thrill of interest when the boy bawls in your ear “All the winners and S. P.” It is possible you may be thinking of Ulysses or of Keats at the moment, and the interruption may annoy you, but it will do so no longer when you reflect that a burning anxiety as to the running of Bolter is for many thousands the symbol — and the only possible symbol — of the Doom of Troy and the wandering fields of foam, and the Isle of Calypso, and the “strange surmise” of Pizarro and all his men.

But here is the evening-paper in question. Yes, the colour is, perhaps, a little sickly. A kind of pinky-green, it seems, doesn’t it? But it forced itself on my notice in the most extraordinary manner, and I expect you will have to admit, when you have heard the story, that some Powers were at work. Well, I was walking up and down the room, just as it was getting dusk, and every now and then I stopped and looked out of the window. Yes, I was making phrases as usual, and thinking of a new story in the middle of the old one: hence the quarter-deck exercise. I daresay you have remarked that I do not keep my window in a very brilliant condition, and the air this evening, you will remember, was rather misty — October, I always think, wears a peculiar dim grace in Barnsbury — so I hope you will not find my impressions too incredible. I was staring, then, out of the window, when to my vast astonishment, a great pale bird seemed suddenly to shoot up into the air from the road, and to flutter into the garden, where it became entangled in that sapless old laburnum that weeps green tears upon the wall. I saw, as I thought, the beating and fluttering of wings, and I ran out, imagining that I was to secure a strange companion for my solitude. It was the evening paper, not a bird, and I saw at once that it would be impious to let it flutter there unread, so I secured it and brought it in, meditating the adventure, and wondering what strange message was thus borne to my eyes. So I went through its columns patiently, even to the leaderettes, and I will do myself the justice to say that I at once recognised the communication that was addressed to me in this singular and even I may say Arabian fashion. It was a short comment upon some agitation that is now appealing rather strongly to Progressive leaders; but the subject-matter is of no consequence, since the significance lies in the last sentence. Here it is: "We are glad to hear that extensive arrangements have been made for the dissemination of literature."

You don't see the immense importance of that? You surprise me. Let us go into it, then. I told you I was not very precise as to the exact scope of the agitation alluded to — it may be a question of a heavy tax on persons who will say "lady" instead of "lydy," it may be an affair of restricting the franchise to citizens thoroughly ignorant of history; it doesn't matter — but here are men who wish some political change to be effected, and these men are issuing printed matter, the purpose of which is to convince others of the righteousness of this particular "program." And this printed matter is called "literature." You know the sort of thing indicated. It may be a series of arguments, simple and fallacious, it may be in dialogue, it may be in story form, it may assume the guise of parody, it may be a brief history. And now what I want to know is this: here we have a vast body of thought, clothed in words, ranging from the agreeable leaflets that we have been speaking of up to — let us say — the Odyssey, and all this mass is known as literature: what is to be our criterion, our means of distinguishing between the two extremes I have mentioned and all the innumerable links between them? Is the whole mass literature in the true sense of the word? If not, with what instrument, by what rule are we to divide the true from the false, to judge exactly in the case of any particular book whether it is literature or not? Of course you may say that the question is rather verbal than real; that "literature" is a general term conveniently applied to anything in print, and that in practice everybody knows the difference between a political pamphlet and the Odyssey. I very much doubt whether people do understand precisely the distinction between the two, but for the avoidance of verbal confusion I suggest that when we mean literature in its highest sense we shall say (for the present at all events), "fine literature"; and the question will be, then: what is it that differentiates fine literature from a number of grammatical, or partly grammatical, sentences arranged in a more or less logical order? Why is the Odyssey to come in, why is the "literature" of our evening paper to be kept out? And again, to put the question in a more subtle form: to which class do the works of Jane Austen belong? Is “Pride and Prejudice” to stand on the Odyssey shelf, or to lie in the pamphlet drawer? Where is Pope’s place? Is he to be set in the class of Keats? If not, for what reason? What is the rank of Dickens, of Thackeray, of George Eliot, of Hawthorne; and in a word, how are we to sort out, as it were, this huge multitude of names, giving to each one his proper rank and station?

I am glad it strikes you as a big question: to me it seems the question, the question which covers the final dogma of literary criticism. Of course after we have answered this prerogative riddle, there will be other questions, almost without end, classes, and sub-classes of infinite analysis. But this will be detail; while the question I have propounded is the question of first principles; it marks the parting of two ways, and in a manner, it asks itself not only of literature, but of life, but of philosophy, but of religion. What is the line, then; the mark of division which is to separate spoken, or written, or printed thought into two great genera?

Well, as you may have guessed, I have my solution, and I like it none the less, because the word of the enigma seems to me actually but a single word. Yes, for me the answer comes with the one word, Ecstasy. If ecstasy be present, then I say there is fine literature, if it be absent, then, in spite of all the cleverness, all the talents, all the workmanship and observation and dexterity you may show me, then, I think, we have a product (possibly a very interesting one), which is not fine literature.

Of course you will allow me to contradict myself, or rather, to amplify myself before we begin to discuss the matter fully. I said my answer was the word, ecstasy; I still say so, but I may remark that I have chosen this word as the representative of many. Substitute, if you like, rapture, beauty, adoration, wonder, awe, mystery, sense of the unknown, desire for the unknown. All and each will convey what I mean; for some particular case one term may be more appropriate than another, but in every case there will be that withdrawal from the common life and the common consciousness which justifies my choice of “ecstasy” as the best symbol of my meaning. I claim, then, that here we have the touchstone which will infallibly separate the higher from the lower in literature, which will range the innumerable multitude of books in two great divisions, which can be applied with equal justice to a Greek drama, an eighteenth century novelist, and a modern poet, to an epic in twelve books, and to a lyric in twelve lines. I will convince you of my belief in my own nostrum by a bold experiment: here is Pickwick and here is Vanity Fair; the one regarded as a popular "comic" book, the other as a serious masterpiece, showing vast insight into human character; and applying my test, I set Pickwick beside the Odyssey, and Vanity Fair on top of the political pamphlet.

I will not argue the matter at the moment; I would merely caution you against supposing that I imply any equality of merit in the books that I have thus summarily "bracketed." You mustn't suppose that I think Dickens's book as good as Homer's, or that I have any doubts as to the vast superiority of Vanity Fair over all the pamphlets in the world. "Here is a temple, here is a tub," we may suppose a child to say, learning from a picture-alphabet; but the temple may be a miserably designed structure, in ruinous condition, and the tub is, perhaps, a miracle of excellent workmanship. But one means worship and the other means washing, and that is the distinction. Or, to take a better example; the bottom boy in the sixth form may be a miserable dunce compared with the top boy in the fifth; still the dunce is in the sixth form, and the genius is in the fifth. Or, to take a third instance (I want you to understand what I'm driving at), the fact that an English orator is fluent, brilliant, profound, convincing, while a Greek orator is stuttering, stupid, shallow, illogical does not hinder that the former, though he may speak ever so well, still speaks English, while the latter, however badly he may speak, speaks in Greek for all that. Analogies, as you know, are never perfect, and must not be pressed too far; they suggest rather than prove; but I hope you understand me though you may not agree with me.

But before we argue the merits of my own literary solvent, we might very well see what we can do with other tests. I daresay you can suggest a good many. We won't go into the question of printed and not printed, written or not written, because it is obvious that the visible symbols by which literature is recorded have nothing to do with literature itself. In the beginning all literature was a matter of improvisation or recitation and memory, and hieroglyphics, writing, printing are mere conveniences. Indeed the point is only worth mentioning because there are, I believe, simple souls who think that the invention of printing has some sort of mysterious connection with the birth of literature, and that the abolition of the paper duty was its coming of age. But I don't think we need trouble ourselves much about a view of literary art which regards the cheap press as its father and the school board as its nursing mother. Many people think, on the other hand, that literature is to be estimated by its effect on the emotions, by the shock which it gives to the system. You may say that a book which interests you so intensely that you cannot put it down, that affects you so acutely that you weep, that amuses you so immensely that you roar with laughter must be very good. I don't object to "very good," but from my point of view, "very good" and "fine literature" are two different things. You see I believe that the difference between interesting, exciting, tear-compelling, laughter-moving reading matter and fine art is not specific but generic: who would blaspheme against good bitter beer, who would say that because it is good, it is therefore Burgundy?

I am not quite sure that I am not muddling up two things which are in reality distinct. I mean I am in doubt whether the faculty of making the reader cry ought not to be distinguished from the faculty of interesting him intensely. On the whole I think that it would be well to draw a line between the two, especially as "interesting" is somewhat ambiguous.

And you think it a paradox, then, to maintain that the power of exciting the emotions to a high degree is not a mark of fine literature? But just think it over. Suppose that a few yards from this room — in the next house, in the next street — a woman is waiting for the return of her husband and son. A ring comes at the bell, there's a reddish-brown envelope, and inside it the message: "Railway accident father killed." Well, you can imagine the effect that these four words will have on the woman's emotions; she will either faint away, or burst into an agony of tears; she may even die of the shock, and you can't have a more striking emotional result than death, can you? Very well; but is the telegram fine art? Is it art? Is it even artifice? It isn't art because it is true! But if I invented such a telegram and sent it to a woman whose husband and son were away, would it thereby become art? You must see perfectly well that it would be nothing of the kind; and I must ask you to explain how a book which is, virtually, a long succession of such telegrams can rise higher than its origin and source? You must see, I think, that the question of truth and falsity can make no real difference to our (no doubt pompous) high æsthetic standpoint; and if you admit that four words which produce an emotional result are not necessarily art, then it follows that four hundred or four hundred thousand words woven together on the same principle are in no better position. An increased quantity means no doubt an increased artifice, but artifice and art are very different things. We may agree then that it is impossible to measure the artistic merit of a book by the emotional shock that it may give to its readers. I have never read the "Sorrows of Werther"; but if you have read it and it has made you sorrowful you are hereby warned against deducing from this effect any conclusion as to its æsthetic value.

I confess all this seems A B C to me, though I see you are still inclined to think me a little paradoxical — not to say sophistical — but it grows more difficult when one gets to the question of the "interesting" or "absorbing" book. As I said "interesting" seems such an ambiguous word. It may stand for that æsthetic emotion produced, say, by the Œdipus; it may denote the wide-eyed attention of the butcher's wife listening to the story of my landlady as to the love-affairs of the grocer's daughter — and there are many books which are, virtually, "Tales of My Landlady" printed and bound. We must really then omit "interesting" in our account of the possible criteria of fine art; the word as it were cancels itself out, because it may mean on the one hand the possession of the highest artistic value, or on the other it may serve as epithet for a book which gratifies the lowest curiosity. You know there are books which the French have kindly named "romans à clef"; and I suppose there is no more miserable form of book-making. The receipt is easy enough. The grocer's daughter, to whose amours I alluded just now, is really named Miss Buggins, and the gentleman is Mr Tibb. Well, suppose that my landlady, relating their lyric to the butcher's wife, should, with a knowing wink, profess to tell the story of Miss Ruggins and Mr Ribb — she would simply be composing a roman à clef without knowing it. You might say that it is hardly worth while to labour the point, that such "interest" as this is wholly and lamentably inartistic — that it is the very contrary to all true art — but it is not long since a person of some literary note, in criticising the "Heptameron," stated that its chief value lay in the fact that one could identify the persons who tell the stories and those also of whom they were told!

But there is another interest of a much higher kind, and that is the sensational. We have done some excellent books of this sort in England, and perhaps you will understand the class I mean when I say that a novel of this description is hard to lay down, and harder still to take up again when you have once found out the secret. This is not high art; you are always at liberty to put down "Lycidas," but then you are compelled to take it up again and again, and the secret of "Lycidas" is always a secret, and one never fails to experience the joy of an artistic surprise. Still the books I mean sometimes show very high artifice, and in itself, perhaps, the quality that I am talking about, the power of exciting a vivid curiosity, an earnest desire to know what is to come next is not, like the vulgar roman à clef curiosity, in actual disaccord from the purpose of art. Indeed I imagine that this trick of stimulating the curiosity may be made subservient to purely æsthetic ends, it may become a handmaid to lead one towards that desire of the unknown which I think was one of the synonyms I gave you for the master word — Ecstasy. Still, though the trick is a good one, it will not, by itself, make fine art. You may discover so much by reading the "Moonstone," that monument of ingenuity and absurdity. On the face of it all detective stories come under this heading: formally, no doubt, they must all be reckoned as tricks, and they may vary from the infinitely ingenious to the infinitely imbecile, and so far as I remember, the famous French tales of detection verge towards the lower rather than the higher ground. But I am inclined, not very logically, perhaps, to make an exception in favour of Poe's Dupin, and to place him almost in the sphere of pure literature. Logically, he is a detective, but I almost think that in his case the detective is a symbol of the mystagogue. As I say, I should be pressed hard if I were asked to make out my case in terms and syllogisms, but if you require me to do so, I would say first of all that the atmosphere of Dupin — and you must remember that in literature everything counts; it is not alone the plot, or the style that we have to consider — has to me hints of that presence which I have called ecstasy. Listen to this:

"It was a freak of fancy in my friend (for what else shall I call it?) to be enamoured of the Night for her own sake; and into this bizarrerie, as into all his others, I quietly fell; giving myself up to his wild whims with a perfect abandon. The sable divinity would not herself dwell with us always; but we could counterfeit her presence. At the first dawn of the morning we closed all the massive shutters of our old building; lighting a couple of tapers which, strongly perfumed, threw out only the ghastliest and feeblest of rays. By the aid of these we then buried our souls in dreams — reading, writing, or conversing, until warned by the clock of the advent of the true Darkness. Then we sallied forth into the streets, arm in arm, continuing the topics of the day, or roaming far and wide until a late hour, seeking amid the wild lights and shadows of the populous city, that infinity of mental excitement which quiet observation can afford."

And again; in the stories themselves, in the conduct of M. Dupin's detective processes, I find a faint suggestion of the under-consciousness or other consciousness of man, a mere hint, not, I think, expressed in so many words, rather latent than patent, that if you would thoroughly understand the rational man you must have sounded the irrational man, the mysterious companion that walks beside each one of us on the earthly journey. Of course the artifice in the Dupin stories is of the very highest kind, but for the reasons I have given I am inclined to think that there is more than artifice, and the shadow, at all events, of art itself.

But this exceptional case of Poe's detective tales only leads us back to the main proposition — that the power of exciting a very high sensational interest does not, in itself, mark out a book as being fine literature. I think I proved the proposition by my instance of the "Moonstone," but if that does not convince you, we might demonstrate this theorem in the same way as we demonstrated the other one about the "literature" that produces its effect on the emotions. We have only to send out a series of telegrams, or we may even glance at the newspaper, and follow a case in the Central Criminal Court. Or we may affirm, more generally, that life often offers many highly absorbing and highly interesting spectacles, but that life is not art, and therefore, that literature which fails to rise above the level of life, or rather, to penetrate beneath the surface of life, is not fine literature in our sense of that term. A gold nugget may be as pure and fine as you like, but it is not a sovereign; it lacks the stamp; and it is the business of art to give its stamp and imprint to the matter of life.

I really think then that we have disposed of perhaps the most generally received of artistic fallacies — that books are to be judged by their power of reproducing in the reader those feelings of grief, interest, curiosity, and so forth which he experiences or may experience in his everyday life, which he really does experience in greater or less degree every time he talks to a friend, takes up a newspaper, or receives a telegram. It comes to this again and again, doesn't it, that Art and Life are two different spheres, and that the Artist with a capital A is not a clever photographer who understands selection in a greater or less degree.

But before we go on with our work and see what can be done with other literary “solvents” I want to make a digression. I should have made it before, if you had pulled me up at the proper cue, and that was when I spoke of “interest” as a highly ambiguous term, the fruitful parent of “undistributed middles.” You see how the unscrupulous sophist would bend this word to his dark work, don’t you? It would be, I suppose, something like this:

A very high degree of interest [of the artistic kind] is the mark of fine literature.

But, the “Moonstone” excites a very high degree of interest [of the sensational kind].

Therefore, the “Moonstone” has the mark of fine literature.

You note the “paltering” with the word, its use now in one sense, and now in another; and if that sort of thing were allowed we should have Wilkie Collins placed among the Immortals before we knew where we were. But hasn’t it occurred to you that nearly all the terms we are using are patient of the same vile uses? You remember that we began with “literature” itself, as a monstrous example of ambiguity, sheltering as it did both the publications of the Anti-Everything Society and the Song of Ulysses’ Wandering; even now we are trying to track the monster to his den in spite of his manifold turnings and disguises. In the meanwhile, for the sake of clearness, we agreed to prefix the epithet “fine” to the word when we meant the “Odyssey” class, though if we say “fine” so often I am afraid we run the risk of being thought superfine. However one must run all risks in the cause of making oneself understood; and so I say you ought to have pulled me up when I talked about “art” and “books that appealed to the emotions.” My “art” may not be the same as your “art,” and “emotions” are still more dangerous in the same way.

I think I made some attempt to deal with “art” as I was talking. I contrasted it with “artifice,” and my phrase “Artist with a big A” was another hint to you that the word must be handled cautiously. You know that in ordinary conversation we say that bees have “the art” or “an art” of making hexagonal cells of wax, that wasps have an art of making a sort of paper for their nests, that there is an art of logic, an art of cookery, an art in making a gravel path. Now in each of these instances the word really speaks of the adaptation of means to ends. In the case of the bees and wasps there is a slightly different nuance of meaning, because they make their cells and their paper just as a bird builds its nest, through the influence of forces which to us are occult, which we conveniently sum up under the word instinct. In the arts of cookery and pathmaking there is a conscious employment of certain means towards the securing of certain ends; and it is at least possible that the swallow, gathering its materials and shaping them, has at the moment nothing but a blind impulse, similar to that of hunger — we all know when we are hungry and we all know what to do in such a case, but we do not all know the physiology of the stomach and the gastric juices, and perhaps not one of us knows the whole secret of inanition and nutrition. We simply eat because we want to eat, not because we wish to supply ourselves with a certain quantity of peptones; and so perhaps the swallow gathers her nest and shapes it, without the consciousness of the eggs and the little birds that are to follow. But I need not remind you that there are plenty of well authenticated instances of animals who have consciously used means to secure ends, and thus "art" in its common significance is not even an exclusively human faculty. When, for example, the bees find themselves in danger of being left queenless, they administer what has been called "royal food" to a common grub, and that which would have been a worker becomes a queen; and in this case the bees are as much "artists" as the cook who puts a particular ingredient into a dish with the view of obtaining a particular flavour.

Now, then, let us apply all this to our matter. I daresay you have often heard a book praised for its "great art," and if you have read it you will have discovered that its "art" is simply contrivance, the very adaptation of means to ends that we have been discussing. "The art with which the mystery is carefully kept in the background," "the art by which the two characters are contrasted throughout the volume," "the highly artistic manner in which Fernando and the heroine are brought together on the last page" — these, you see clearly, are contrivances, artifices, in no way differing in degree from the contrivances of the man who makes the garden path, of the cook who "dusts in" just a suspicion of lemon-rind, of the bee who administers the "royal food." This "art" then is a totally different thing from our Art with the capital letter, with the epithet “fine,” or “high” before it; and in future when I mean “adaptation of means to ends,” I shall always say “artifice”; while “art” will be retained and set apart for higher uses.

And now as to “emotion.” Here, I think, you ought to have been down on me. You might have said: “You declare that the appeal to the emotions is not a test of fine literature. But to what then does Homer appeal? What is the “Œdipus” but an appeal to the emotions? What is all exquisite lyric poetry but the cry of the emotions, set to music?” I suppose that, as a matter of fact, you understood my real meaning by the instance I gave; the anguish of a wife at the loss of a husband; you saw that what I wanted to say was this: that fine literature does not content itself with repeating, or mimicking, the emotions of private, personal, everyday life. Still, I should have gone into the matter more fully then, and as I did not do so, we had better see what can be done now. And do you know that I believe that the best approach we can make to a rather subtle question will be a somewhat indirect one? Just now I was talking about Poe’s Dupin stories, and I tried, rather vaguely, to justify my tentative inclusion of them in the higher class of letters, by pointing out that Poe seemed to hint at the “other-consciousness” of man, and to suggest, at least, the presence of that shadowy, unknown, or half-known companion who walks beside each one of us all our days. I tried to realise the image of a man, followed or rather attended, by a spiritual fellow, treading a path parallel with but different from his own; and now I want you to carry out this image into the sphere of words. Already you must have a hint of it. One might draw a figure; something like this:

Fine Literature.	“Literature.”
Art.	Artifice.
Emotion.	Feelings.

And before I go into the special question, let me extend the list; it will explain itself.

Romance, romantic.	A “Romantic” Affair in the West End.
Tragedy, tragic.	“Tragedy” in Soho.
Drama, dramatic.	Le “drame” de la Rue Cochon: “Dramatic” Elopement in Peckham.
Interest, interesting [of “Hamlet”].	An “interesting” number of “Snippets.”
Lyric.	The “Lyric” Theatre.
Inebriated.	In an “inebriated” condition.

That almost gives my secret away, doesn’t it? Of course you see the place that the words in the right-hand column take in the scheme. The “Romantic” Affair in the West End really concerned the life of a draper’s assistant, who robbed his master’s till, in order that he might make presents to Miss Claire Tilbury, one of the “Sisters Tilbury” now performing at the “Lucifer.” An unmentionable person cut his throat in some alley off Greek Street; hence the “Tragedy” in Soho. Two peculiarly squalid servants, who beat out their master’s brains, under singularly uninteresting circumstances, acted the “Drama” of the Rue Cochon, and it was a dissolute barmaid who eloped “dramatically” from Peckham in the dog-cart of her employer. The two varying uses of the word “lyric” need not be underlined for you, who know the Elizabethans and the Cavaliers; but perhaps I may say that he who tastes calix meus inebrians will not be in an “inebriated” condition. It would be possible to extend these parallel columns almost to infinity; but I think the list is long enough for our purpose, and “Trench on Words” is a well-known handbook. But you see my right-hand column word, parallel with “Emotion”? You see I have written “Feelings,” and I suggest that it will be convenient to speak of feelings when we mean the things of life, of society, of personal and private relationship, while we may reserve emotion for the influence produced in man by fine art. Thus it will be with emotion that we witness the fall of Œdipus, the madness of Lear, while we feel for our friends and ourselves in misfortune. That seems to make it plain enough, doesn't it; you see now, clearly, what I mean by saying that the power of producing an emotional shock cannot be a test of fine literature. Art must appeal to emotion, and sometimes, no doubt, with a shock; but it must always be to the emotion of the left-hand column, never to the "feelings" on the right hand. So you must never tell me that a book is fine art because it made you, or somebody else, cry; your tears are, emphatically, not evidence in the court of Fine Literature.

I daresay it may have struck you that the tests we have considered hitherto have been, in the main, popular tests. No doubt many persons calling themselves critics have praised the art of a book because it has drawn tears from eyes, or because it has not suffered itself to be put down, or because it contains easily recognisable portraits of well-known people, but such critics are to be spelt with a very small initial letter, and, as I said, I don't think we want to extend that list of parallels. There is another test that I had forgotten: I suppose there really are people who believe that a book is fine "because it will do good," but I don't think we'll argue with them, though I once knew a liberally-educated man who said a certain book was fine because it tended "to raise one's opinion of the clergy." So we will reckon our "popular" tests as done with, and proceed to the more technical solvents that are proposed by professed men of letters.

Three of these more literary criteria occur to me at the moment, and I believe we shall understand them and the position which they represent better if we take them, at first, at all events, in a mass. I can conceive, then, that many persons whose opinion one would respect would state their position in literary criticism somewhat as follows:— "If a book (they would say) shows keenness of observation, insight into character, with fidelity to life as the result of these capacities; if its art (we should say, artifice) in the design and 'laying out' of the plot, in the contrivance of incident is confessedly admirable, and finally if it is written in a good style: then you have fine literature. Fine art, in short, is a clear mirror, and the artist's skill consists in arranging and selecting such parts of life as he thinks best for his purpose of reflection."

Well, now, as to the first point: fidelity to life, clearness of reflection, the selection being taken for granted, as no one out of an asylum would maintain that a book must mirror the whole of life, or even the millionth part of one particular man's life. Come, let us apply the test in question to one or two of the acknowledged excellencies — to the "Odyssey" for instance, to the "Morte D'Arthur," to "Don Quixote." Is the story of Ulysses, in any accepted sense of the phrase "faithful" to life as we know it? Is it "faithful," that is to say, with the fidelity of Jane Austen, of Thackeray, of George Eliot, of Fielding? Is there anything in our experience answering to the episodes of the Lotus-Eaters, Calypso's Isle, the Cyclops' Cavern, the descent of the Goddess? Is the "reflection" even a reflection of Homer's own experience? Had he escaped from the cave under the belly of a ram? Had he been in the world of one-eyed giants? Were his friends in the habit of talking in hexameter verse? We may go on, of course, but is it worth while? It is surely hardly necessary to demonstrate the fact that the author of the "Morte D'Arthur" had never seen the Graal, that such a character as Don Quixote never existed in the natural order of things. We might have gone more sharply to work with this "fidelity" test: we might have said that poetry being, admittedly fine literature at its finest, and (admittedly also) being unfaithful to life as we know it both in matter and manner, that therefore the test breaks down at once. If fine literature must be faithful to life, then "Kubla Khan" is not fine literature; which, I think we may say, is highly absurd.

I daresay you think I have dealt rather crudely, in a somewhat materialistic spirit, with this criterion of "fidelity to life." I admit the charge, but you must remember that I am dealing with very bad people, who understand nothing but materialism. And when these people tell you in so many words that it is the author's business clearly and intelligently to present the life — the common, social life around him — then, believe me, the only thing to be done is to throw "Odyssey" and "Œdipus," "Morte D'Arthur," "Kubla Khan" and "Don Quixote" straight in their faces, and to demonstrate that these eternal books were not constructed on the proposed receipt. Of course if I were treating with the initiated, if I were commentating and not arguing, I should handle the great masterpieces in a much more reverent manner. I mean that for those who possess the secret it skills not to bring in the Cyclops (who for us is not a giant but a symbol); we have only to bow down before the great music of such a poem as the Odyssey, recognising that by the very reason of its transcendent beauty, by the very fact that it trespasses far beyond the world of our daily lives, beyond "selection" and "reflection," it is also exalted above our understanding, that because its beauty is supreme, that therefore its beauty is largely beyond criticism. For ourselves we do not need to prove its transcendence of life by this or that extraordinary incident; it is the whole spirit and essence and sound and colour of the song that affect us; and we know that the Odyssey surpassed the bounds of its own age and its own land just as much as it surpasses those of our time and our country. You look as if you thought I were fighting with the vanquished, but let me tell you that great people have praised Homer because he depicted truthfully the men and manners of his time.

But as I was saying, all this would be too subtle for the enemy, for the people who maintain that fine literature is a faithful reflection of life, and think that Jane Austen touched the point of literary supremacy. With them, as I said, we must be rough; we must ask: Did Sophocles describe the ordinary life of Athens in his day? No: very well, then; since the works of Sophocles are fine literature, it follows that some fine literature does not reflect ordinary life, and therefore that fidelity to nature is not the differentia of the highest art.

I wonder whether I ought to caution you again against the ambiguity of language? We are dealing easily enough with such words as "life" and "nature," and from what you know of my system you may perhaps have seen that I have been using these words as the people use them, as those use them who would say that "Vanity Fair" is a faithful presentation of life. I thought you would understand this, but I may just mention in passing that words like "nature," "life" and "truth" or "fidelity" have also their esoteric values, that (by way of example) the truth of the scientist and the truth of the philosopher are two very different things. So it may turn out by and bye that in the occult sense, "fidelity to life" is the differentia of fine literature; that the aim of art is truth; that the artist continually mirrors nature in its eternal, essential forms; but for the present moment, it is understood, is it not, that these words have been used in their common, everyday popular significance? The "Dunciad" is a study of man, and Wordsworth's "Ode on Intimations of Immortality" is a study of man, and the literary standpoint that we have been attacking is that of Pope and not that of Wordsworth.

If I remember, the next test we have to analyse is that of artifice, often and improperly called art. But I think we have already demolished this criterion. In distinguishing between art and artifice I pointed out that the latter merely signifies the adaptation of means to an end, and has no relation whatever with art properly so-called; it is simply the mental instrument with which man performs every task and every work of his daily life; it consists in the rejection of that which is unfit for the particular purpose in view, and in the acceptance and use of that which is fit for the desired end and likely to bring it about. It concerns not creation but execution, and it is I need hardly say as indispensable to the author as are his pen and ink, and (I might almost say) is as little concerned as these with the essence of his art. Of course in works of the very highest genius we may declare that, in a sense, art has become all in all, that the necessary artifice has been interpenetrated with art, so that we can hardly distinguish in our minds between the idea and the realisation of it. In such cases, artifice has been lifted up and exalted into the heaven of art, and it remains artifice no longer; but in the view that we are considering it is merely the adaptation of means to an end, a clever choice of incident, the knack of putting in and leaving out. The faculty may, as I said, be glorified and transfigured by genius, but every newspaper reporter must have more or less of it, and it is clear enough I think (perhaps I may mention Wilkie Collins once more) that in itself it cannot establish the claim of any book to be fine literature.

And lastly we have to deal with style; and here again I must have recourse to my distinctions. What is a good style? If you mean by a "good" style, one that delivers the author's meaning in the clearest possible manner, if its purpose and effect are obviously utilitarian, if it be designed solely with the view of imparting knowledge — the knowledge of what the author intends — then I must point out that "style" in this sense is or should be amongst the accomplishments of every commercial clerk — indeed, it will be merely a synonym for plain speaking and plain writing — and in this sense it is evidently not one of the marks of art, since the object of art is not information, but a peculiar kind of æsthetic delight. But if on the other hand style is to mean such a use and choice of words and phrases and cadences that the ear and the soul through the ear receive an impression of subtle but most beautiful music, if the sense and sound and colour of the words affect us with an almost inexplicable delight, then I say that while Idea is the soul, style is the glorified body of the very highest literary art. Style, in short, is the last perfection of the very best in literature, it is the outward sign of the burning grace within. But we must keep the systematic consideration of style for some other night; it's not a subject to be dealt with by the way, and

I have only said so much because it was necessary to draw the line between language as a means of imparting facts (good style in the sense of our opponents) and language as an æsthetic instrument, which is a good, or rather a beautiful style in our sense. In the latter sense it is the form of fine literature, in the former sense it is the medium of all else that is expressed in words, from a bill of exchange upwards.

It seems to me, then, that we have considered one by one the alternative tests of fine literature which have been or may be proposed, and we have come to the conclusion that each and all are impossible. It is no longer permissible, I imagine, for you or for me to say: "This book is fine literature because it makes me cry, because it was so interesting that I couldn't put it down, because it is so natural and faithful to life, because it is so well (plainly and neatly) written." We have picked these reasons to pieces one by one, and the result is that we are driven back on my "word of the enigma" — Ecstasy; the infallible instrument, as I think, by which fine literature may be discerned from reading-matter, by which art may be known from artifice, and style from intelligent expression. At any rate we have got our hypothesis, and you remember what stress Coleridge laid on the necessity of forming some hypothesis before entering on any investigation.

I believe we began to-night with the evening paper, and the strange glimpse it gives us, through a pinky-green veil, through a cloud of laborious nonsense about odds and winners and tips and all such foolery, into that ancient eternal desire of man for the unknown. And that, you remember, was one of the synonyms that I offered you for ecstasy; and so in a sense I expect that we shall have the evening paper close beside us all the way of our long voyage in quest of the lost Atlantis.

II

I THINK IT is a horrible thing to have such a good memory as that. I recollect, now that you remind me, that I did lay down “Pickwick” v. “Vanity Fair” as a sort of test case of my theory of literature; but you surely do not expect me to work out the arguments in detail? Of course if I were giving a series of lectures I should “set a paper” after each one; but I expect you to content yourself with the suggestion, with the skeleton map, as it were. Besides, if we take that special case of two eminent Victorian novels as a concrete instance of the abstract argument, don’t you see that we are answering the particular question all the while that we are investigating the general proposition? Surely if you recollect all that we said about fine literature in general, you won’t have much difficulty in adjudicating on the claims of Thackeray. Don’t you see that he never withdraws himself from the common life and the common consciousness, that he is all the while nothing but a photographer; a showman with a set of pictures. A consummately clever photographer, certainly, a showman with a gift of amusing, interesting “patter” that is quite extraordinary, an artificer of very high merit. But where will you find Ecstasy in Thackeray? Where is his adoration? You may search, I think, from one end of his books to the other, without finding any evidence that he realised the mystery of things; he was never for a moment aware of that shadowy double, that strange companion of man, who walks, as I said, foot to foot with each one of us, and yet his paces are in an unknown world. And (unless you have got any fresh arguments) I think we decided last week that the book which lacks the sense of all this is not fine literature.

I hope you don’t think I am abusing Thackeray. I am always reading him, and I chose his “Vanity Fair” because it strikes me as such a supremely clever example of its class. I suppose there is nothing more amusing than the society of a brilliant, observant man of the world. Well, Thackeray was brilliant and observant in excelsis, and besides that, he understood the artifice of story-telling, and he could write a terse, clean-cut English which was always sufficient for his purpose. He contrives the corporal overthrow of the Marquis of Steyne, he shows you that bald old nobleman sprawling on the floor, and the words that he uses are his brisk, willing, and capable servants. He has observation, and artifice, and "style" in that secondary sense which we distinguished from the real style; from those "melodies unheard" which I called (I think rather picturesquely) the glorified body of the highest literary art. But these qualities, we found out, are not, separately or conjointly, the differentia of fine literature as we understand the term; and consequently, with all our admiration and all our interest we are compelled to place Thackeray in the lower form, simply because he is clearly and decisively lacking in that one essential quality of ecstasy, because he never leaves the street and the highroad to wander on the eternal hills, because he does not seem to be aware that such hills exist.

Of course I have only taken Thackeray as the representative of his class, and I chose him, as I remarked, because, for me, he is the most favourable representative of it. I am thinking, really, of the "plain man" whom we have engaged in so many forms, and of his "plain" argument which comes to this — "for me a great book is a book that amuses me greatly and that I enjoy reading." And I say that Thackeray amuses me greatly and that I enjoy reading his books immensely, but that, with due respect to "common sense," such an argument fails to prove that "Vanity Fair" is fine literature. Other people would, no doubt, have chosen other books; many would have selected Miss Austen, and I daresay they would have a good deal to say for their choice. Undoubtedly there is a severity, a self-restraint, a fineness of observation, a delicacy of irony in "Pride and Prejudice" which are unmatched of their kind (the Thackeray of the caricatures, of those queer woodblocks, comes out now and then in the books, and digression occasionally goes beyond due bounds); but I named "Vanity Fair" because, personally, I find it more amusing than "Pride and Prejudice." In neither of these books is there art in our high sense of the word, and in preferring the one over the other I am simply saying that I prefer the company of a brilliant and witty cosmopolitan to that of a very keen and delicate, but very limited maiden lady, who lives in a remote country town and understands thoroughly the reason why the vicar bowed so low when a certain carriage rolled up the high street, and why that pretty, prim girl crossed over the way when the handsome gentleman from the Hall came out of the chymist's. Yes, the cosmopolitan at the club window certainly fails a little in his manners now and then, and the country gentlewoman's breeding is perfect of its kind, but the circles in which Pendennis moved are (to me) so infinitely the more entertaining of the two.

You see, I think that the question of liking a book or not liking it has nothing whatever to do with the consideration of fine art. Art is there, if I may say so, just as the Tenth Commandment is there; and if we don't like them, so much the worse for us. I may find Homer very dull reading, I may covet your ox and your ass and everything that is yours, but my limited and somewhat commonplace brains, and my envy of your prosperity won't alter the fact that the "Odyssey" is fine literature and that covetousness is wicked. But when we once leave the utterances of the eternal, universal human ecstasy, which we have agreed to call art, and descend to these lower levels that we are talking of now, it seems to me that the question of liking or not liking counts for a good deal. Not for everything, of course. We must still distinguish: between plots stupid or ingenious, between observation that is close and keen and observation that is vague and inaccurate, between artifice and the want of it, between sentences that are neatly constructed and mere slipshod. All these things naturally reckon in the account, but when they have been estimated and allowed their value, you will usually find that you are influenced still more by your mere liking or disliking of the subject-matter, and it seems to me quite legitimately. For, if you look closely into the whole question, you will find that you are judging these secondary books as you judge of life, as you choose the scene of your holiday, as you read the newspaper. One man may say that he prefers to talk to artists, another, quite legitimately, may love the society of brewers; you may think Norway perfection, I am going to Constantinople; A. turns at once to the quotation for Turpentine at Savannah, B. folds down the sheet at the Police News. It is not a question of art, but of taste, that is of individual humour and constitution; you frequent the company that suits you, you go to the place you like, you read the news that happens to be most interesting from your special standpoint. And in the same way, if I find the conversation of Miss Becky Sharpe, as reported by Mr W. M. Thackeray, more amusing than the conversation of Miss Elizabeth Bennett as reported by Miss Jane Austen; it seems to me that there is no more to be said. Elizabeth's remarks are more skilfully reported? Very likely, but, granting that, I had rather listen to the record, imperfect, if you please, of the other lady's conversation. Here is a speech on Bimetallism, given at great length, and (let us presume) with great accuracy; here is a short summary of Professor

L.’s “Lecture on the Eleusinian Mysteries,” very badly “sub-edited.” But, you see, I happen not to care twopence about Bimetallism, so I turn away from the careful report, growling; while I cut out that wretched summary of the Lecture with the purpose of pasting it in my scrap-book, since every word about the Eleusinian Mysteries has a vivid interest for me.

It often amuses me to hear people quarrelling about the rival “artistic merit” of books which have, in most cases, no artistic merits at all. A. writes a book about greengrocers, and you, who find something singularly piquant and entertaining in the manners, speech, and habits of the class in question, pronounce A. to be a “great artist” who has written a masterpiece. I love dukes, and B’s. novel of the peerage strikes me as a marvel of artistic accomplishment, while I pronounce the work that has charmed you to be as stupid and tiresome as the class it represents. Each of us is talking nonsense; there is no art in the question, which is purely a matter of individual taste. The Stock Exchange column interests one man, while the latest football news absorbs the other. That is all.

Of course, as I said, artifice counts for something: there is a pleasure in seeing the thing neatly done, and I suppose it is this pleasure that has secured Miss Austen her fervent admirers. It is a little difficult to treat this form of pleasure quite fairly; a musician perhaps would find it difficult to answer the question whether he would rather hear Palestrina badly rendered or Zingarelli executed to perfection. In the latter case there would certainly be the charm of exquisite voices in perfect order and accord, though the music were nothing or worse than nothing; still, our musician might say, on the other hand, that Palestrina martyred was better than Zingarelli triumphant. I am afraid I can imagine myself saying: “Limited country-people, as seen by Jane Austen, are so ‘slow’ that they rather bore me, though the author has portrayed them with wonderful skill,” but I can hardly fancy myself affirming that Becky Sharpe is such an interesting personage that she would still delight me, even if the author of “Ten Thousand a Year” had written her history. On the other hand I believe that the plot of “Jekyll and Hyde” would still have had some fascination, though it had been treated by the veriest dolt in letters. But that is not a good example, since “Jekyll and Hyde” is certainly in its conception, though not in its execution, a work of fine art. Let us take the “Moonstone” again as an example; I believe then, that if the events related in it had caught our eyes in a brief newspaper paragraph they would still have interested.

It seems to me that, after all, this question of artifice, of "how the thing is done," comes under the same category as liking and disliking. I mean it is largely a matter of the personal equation, about which no very strict laws can be laid down. You might say, for example, that Becky would entertain you in any hands, however indifferent, provided that her "facts" were preserved, and I don't see that I could argue the point with you. It reminds me again of the way in which men choose their friends; one lays stress on pleasant manners, another on sterling goodness of character, a third on wit, a fourth on distinction of some kind; and argument is really voiceless. "Here is a book-case," you may say, "look how exquisitely it is made." Yes, but I don't want a book-case; whereas that table, ricketty as it is, will be really useful. But if you were to say: "Look at Westminster Abbey," you can hardly imagine my answering: "Bother Westminster Abbey; I want a pig-sty." You see how, here again, we come to the generic difference between fine literature and interesting reading matter. We read the "Odyssey" because we are supernatural, because we hear in it the echoes of the eternal song, because it symbolises for us certain amazing and beautiful things, because it is music; we read Miss Austen and Thackeray because we like to recognise the faces of our friends aptly reproduced, to see the external face of humanity so deftly mimicked, because we are natural. The question of our preference for one over the other, is, making due allowance for analogy, the question of our preference for a table over a bookcase or vice versâ, and the workmanship in each case is largely a matter of detail. And the great poem may be equated with the great church: each is made for beauty, the one is ecstasy in words, the other ecstasy in stone. But the church and the pig-sty, on the other hand, are not to be compared together: incidentally, no doubt, the former is rainproof or in ill repair, has good or bad acoustic properties, while the latter may be either an æsthetic pest in the back-yard, or an agreeable looking little shed enough. Still, the essence of the church is beauty, ecstasy; of the sty utility, the safe keeping of pigs. It would be absurd, you see, to say: "I prefer an abbey to a pig-sty," and it would be equally absurd to say: "I prefer the 'Œdipus' to 'Pride and Prejudice'" or "I prefer the Venus of the Louvre to the wax-figures in the exhibition." Of course these are only analogies, and you mustn't press them, but they may help to make my meaning clearer, to enforce the vast distinction between art and artifice. Please don’t think that I wish to establish a proportion: as a pig-sty is to an abbey, so is Jane Austen to Sophocles. In her case you would have to substitute a neat Georgian house for “pig-sty” and then I think you would have a very fair proportion. But all that I wanted to do was to draw the line between things made for use, to occupy some definite place in relation to our common daily life; and things made by ecstasy and for ecstasy, things that are symbols, proclaiming the presence of the unknown world.

And I chose “Pickwick” as the antithesis to “Vanity Fair” deliberately. Thackeray (in my private judgment) is the chief of those who have provided interesting reading-matter; Dickens is by no means in the first rank of literary artists. I think he is golden, but he is very largely alloyed with baser stuff, with indifferent metal, which was the product of his age, of his circumstances in life, of his own uncertain taste. Just contrast the atmosphere which surrounded the young Sophocles, with that in which the young Dickens flourished. Both were men of genius, but one grew up in the City of the Violet Crown, the other in Camden Town and worse places, one was accustomed to breathe that “most pellucid air,” the other inhaled the “London particular.” The wonder is, not that there are faults in Dickens, but that there is genius of any kind. I am not going to analyze “Pickwick” any more than I analyzed “Vanity Fair,” but of course you see that, in its conception, it is essentially one with the “Odyssey.” It is a book of wandering; you start from your own doorstep and you stray into the unknown; every turn of the road fills you with surmise, every little village is a discovery, a something new, a creation. You know not what may happen next; you are journeying through another world. I need not remind you how glorious all this is in the Odyssey, which of course is so much more beautiful than “Pickwick,” as that glowing Mediterranean Sea, whose bounds on every side were mystery, is more beautiful than the muddy, foggy Thames, as those rolling hexameters are more beautiful than Dickens’s prose; and yet in each case the symbol is, in reality, the same; both the heroic song of the old Ionian world and the comic cockney romance of 1837 communicate that enthralling impression of the unknown, which is, at once, a whole philosophy of life, and the most exquisite of emotions. In varying degrees of intensity you will trace it all through fine literature in every age and in every nation; you will find it in Celtic voyages, in the Eastern Tale, where a door in a dull street suddenly opens into dreamland, in the mediæval stories of the wandering knights, in “Don Quixote,” and at last in our “Pickwick” where Ulysses has become a retired city man, whimsically journeying up and down the England of sixty years ago. You talk of the “grotesquerie” of “Pickwick,” but don’t you see that this element is present in all the masterpieces of the kind? Remember the Cyclops, remember the grotesque shapes that decorate the “Arabian Nights,” remember the bizarre element, the almost wanton grotesquerie of many of the “Arthur” romances. In all these cases as in “Pickwick” the same result is obtained; an overpowering impression of “strangeness,” of remoteness, of withdrawal from the common ways of life. “Pickwick,” is, in no sense, or in no valuable sense, a portrayal, a copy, an imitation of life in the ordinary sense of “imitation,” and “life”; Pickwick, and Sam, and Jingle, and the rest of them are not clever reproductions of actual people, (is there any more foolish pursuit than that of disputing about the “original” of Mr Pickwick?); the book is rather the suggestion of another life, beneath our own or beside our own, and the characters, those queer grotesque people, are queer for the same reason that the Cyclops is queer and the dwarfs and dragons of mediæval romance are queer. We are withdrawn from the common ways of life; and in that withdrawal is the beginning of ecstasy. There are sentences in “Pickwick” that give me an almost extravagant delight. You remember the lines about the Lotus-Eaters.

τῶν δ’ ὅστις λωτοῖο φάγοι μελιηδέα καρπὸν,
οὐκέτ’ ἀπαγγεῖλαι πάλιν ἤθελεν οὐδὲ νέεσθαι
ἀλλ’ αὐτοῦ βούλοντο μετ’ ἀνδράσι Λωτοφάγοισιν λωτὸν ἐρεπτόμενοι μενέμεν νόστου τε λαθέσθαι.

Well, do you know there is a brief dialogue in “Pickwick” that seems almost as enchanted, to me. The scene is the manor-farm kitchen, on Christmas eve.

“‘How it snows,’ said one of the men, in a low voice.

“‘Snows, does it?’ said Wardle.

“‘Rough, cold night, sir,’ replied the man, ‘and there’s a wind got up that drifts it across the fields, in a thick white cloud.’

“‘What does Jem say?’ inquired the old lady. ‘There ain’t anything the matter, is there?’

"'No, no, mother,' replied Wardle; 'he says there's a snow-drift, and a wind that's piercing cold.'"

You know this is the introduction to the Tale of Gabriel Grub, an admirable legend which Dickens "farsed" with an obtrusive moral. But I confess that the atmosphere (which to me seems all the wild weather and the wild legend of the north) suggested by those phrases "a thick white cloud," and "a wind that's piercing cold" is in my judgment wholly marvellous. But Dickens, of course, is full of impressions which never become expressions. You remember that chapter about the lawyer's clerks in the "Magpie and Stump"? It is always quite pathetic to me to note how Dickens felt the strangeness, the mystery, the haunting that are like a mist about the old Inns of Court, and how utterly unable he was to express his emotion — to find a fit symbol for his meaning. He takes refuge, as it were, behind Jack Bamber, who tells two very insignificant legends as to the mystery of the Inns. Dickens feels that these legends are insignificant, and throws in one that is pure burlesque, and then changes the subject in despair; the vague impression has refused to be put into words; probably, indeed, it had stopped short of becoming thought. But I am afraid that if I once begin to talk about the defects and faults of Dickens I shall run on for ever, and I think you will be able to find out his laches quite well for yourself. What I want to insist on is his sense of mystery, his withdrawal from common life, and, finally, his ecstasy. I have not proved my case up to the hilt by a thorough-going analysis of "Pickwick," but I think I have suggested the "heads" of such an analysis. There is ecstasy in the main idea, in the thought of the man who wanders away from his familiar streets into unknown tracks and lanes and villages, there is ecstasy in the conception of all those queer, grotesque characters, reminders each one of the strangeness of life, there is ecstasy in the thought of the wild Christmas Eve, of the fields and woods scourged by "a wind that's piercing cold," hidden by the thick cloud of snow, there is ecstasy in that vague impression of the old, dark, Inns, of the "rotten" chambers that had been shut up for years and years. In a word: "Pickwick" is fine literature.

Well, you've got what you wanted; some sort of analysis of my case: "'Pickwick' v. 'Vanity Fair'"; but it must be clearly understood that I'm not going to "work out" every example. However, I am not sorry that I have been led to go into this particular case rather fully, because it is a typical one, and we shall not be obliged to go over the same ground again. I mean, that having witnessed the dissection of Thackeray, you will have no need to come to me for my judgment of George Eliot, or of Anthony Trollope, or — to make a very long list a very short one — of about ninety-nine per cent of our modern novels. Yes, you have mentioned a great name, and I, like you, take off my cap to the man who has gone on his way, without caring for the "public," or the "reviewers," or anything else, except his own judgment of what is right. But, frankly, if you pass from the man and come to his work, my plain opinion is this: that he has written about ordinary life, regarded from an ordinary standpoint, in a style which is extraordinary certainly, but very far from beautiful. It is not a beautiful style, since a fine style, though it may carry suggestion beyond the bourne of thought, though it may be the veil and visible body of concealed mysteries, is always plain on the surface. It may be like an ingeniously devised cryptogram, which may have an occult sense conveyed to initiated eyes in every dot and line and flourish, but is outwardly as simple and straightforward as a business letter. But in the works of the writer whom we are discussing obscurities, dubieties of all kinds are far from uncommon; and in many of his books there are passages which hardly seem to be English at all. The words are familiar — most of them — the grammatical construction often offers no very considerable difficulties — it is rarely, I mean, that one has to search very long for the nominative of the sentence — but when one has read the words and parsed them, one feels inclined to think that after all the passage is not in English but in some other language with a superficial resemblance to English. Style is not everything? Certainly not; a book may fail in style, and yet be fine, though not the finest literature. You have only to open Sir Walter Scott to have highly conclusive evidence on that point. But the writer we are considering not only fails in the body of art but even more conspicuously in the soul of it. Just think for a moment of his story of the very earnest Jew who fell in love with the baroness who was not very earnest. There was a false female friend, you remember, and social complications perturbed the hearts of the curiously assorted lovers, and finally the Jew was shot in a duel by another, less "detrimental," courtier. Can you conceive anything more trivial than this? Don't you see that from such a book as that the idea, the soul of fine literature, is completely lacking? Great books may always be summed up in a phrase, often in a single word, and that phrase or that word will always signify some primary and palmary idea. To me the only "idea" suggested by the plot I have outlined is unimportance; and, as in the case of Thackeray, ecstasy is entirely absent both from this and from all other of the author's books. You say that, after all, the plot in question is a plot of the love of a man for a woman, and that that is an idea in the highest sense of the word, and an idea which is the most of all fit for the purpose and the making of the finest literature. I agree with you in the latter clause of your sentence, but I must point out that the book is not the story of the love of a man for a woman, it is the story of the flirtation of a baroness with a German Jew Socialist — a very different matter. In a word, it is a tale of the accidental, of the particular, of the inessential; it is completely the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet omitted, and the greatest stress laid on the minor characters.

It is quite true that when an author writes a romance containing a hero and a heroine he must tell you who they are, he must give, briefly and succinctly, the necessary details — names, ages, conditions and so forth — but if he is a great author he will do this incidentally and make us feel that such details are incidental. In short, he must poise his feet on earth, but his way is to the stars. Think of the "Scarlet Letter," open it again and see how admirably Hawthorne has omitted a world of unessential details that a lesser man would have put in. He has left out a whole encyclopædia of useless and tedious information; there is the dim, necessary background of time and place, but in reality the scene is Eternity, and the drama is the Mystery of Love and Vengeance and Hell-fire. Of course fine literature must have its gross and carnal body, we must know "who's who," for I don't think an old-fashioned receipt that I remember was ever very successful. Oh, you must have read some of the tales I mean; they used to flourish in the old "Keepsakes," and the hero was boldly labelled "Fernando" for all distinction and description. One might surmise that Fernando was domiciled on the continent of Europe, but that was all. It was not successful, this well-meaning school of fiction, and I repeat that the finest literature must have its accidents — it cannot exist as shining substance alone. It is just the same with the art of sculpture, with the art of painting. You cannot look at a Greek Apollo without looking at that part of the body which conceals the bowels, but I imagine you don't want to treasure this thought or to insist on it? And I suppose a geologist, looking at a picture, could tell you whether those wild and terrible rocks were volcanic or carboniferous; but really one doesn't want to know. Bowels, geological formation, in sculpture and painting, the social position of the characters and all other such details in fine literature are inessential; and the great artist will, as I said, make us feel that they are inessential. If you want an instance of what I mean read a book which is very comparable with the German-Jew-Baroness tale that we were talking about. I mean “Two on a Tower” by Mr Hardy. In that you have the contrast of social ranks: the “two” are the Lady of the Manor and an educated peasant, but how utterly all thought of “society” (in any sense of the word) disappears from those wonderful pages, as you advance and find that the theme is really Love. Why even the accidents are glorified and are made of the essence of the book. The old tower standing in the midst of lonely, red ploughlands far from the highway, is at first only the convenient place where the young peasant studies astronomy; but as you read you feel the change coming, the tower is transmuted, glorified; every stone of it is aglow with mystic light; it is made the abode of the Lover and the Beloved, it is seen to be a symbol of Love, of an ecstasy, remote, and passionate, and eternal, dwelling far from the ways of men. Compare these two books, I say again, and you will know the chief distinction between fine literature and reading matter. To me, I confess, the “Jew-book” has not even interest of the lower sort, not by any means the interest of Thackeray, or Jane Austen or even of poor, dreary, draggle-tailed George Eliot; but if you are amused by it, I have no objection to make. You may be amused by the plates of the “Spring and Summer Novelties” in the lady’s paper, if you please; but for heaven’s sake don’t come here and tell me that on the whole you prefer Botticelli’s Primavera! Nay, but the fashion-plates are sometimes very nicely done, and they put in backgrounds, and they are trying to give the faces some character. Do get it into your head — firmly and fixedly — that the camera and the soul of man are two entirely different things.

You think the “photographic” comparison unfair, in this and other instances, because of the mechanical element in photography, because of that camera I have just mentioned? Well, I suppose that it is a little misleading. The sun and the camera between them certainly do your picture for you, and as you urge, there is more of artifice in the merest Sunday-school tale than in the best of photographs. Still, you must remember that photography too has its artifice, its choice of the right and the wrong way, and its exercise of judgment; there is a great deal in it that is not mechanical; and in its essence it is of the same class as the books I have been alluding to. The means employed are different, and a higher and finer artifice is required for making books than for taking photographs, but the end of each is the same, and that end is to portray the surface of life, to make a picture of the outside of things. It is on this ground that I defend my use of the analogy, and you must understand me to speak only of the object which is common to each, when I compare the secondary writer to a photographer. The writers, to be sure, have invention in a greater or less degree, but you will remark that the artists in literature have the power of creation, a totally different process. Invention is the finding of a thing in its more or less obscure hiding-place; creation is the making of a new thing, the invocation of Something from Nothingness. Don Quixote is a creation; the clergyman in "Pride and Prejudice" is an invention, Colonel Newcome is, in all probability, a composite portrait, while the Jew-Socialist who fell in love with the Baroness is simply a portrait of Ferdinand Lassalle.

You must remember that while the two classes — fine literature and reading matter — differ the one from the other generically, the individuals of each class differ from each other only specifically. Thus the difference in merit between the "Odyssey" and "Pickwick" is enormous, but it is a specific difference. In the same way it is hard to measure with the imagination the difference between "Madame Bovary" and that famous Sunday-school story "Jackie's Holiday": the former is immensely clever, the latter is immensely silly; but the two are, emphatically, of the same genus. In each case the effort of the author is to "describe life," the aim of Flaubert is absolutely identical with the aim of Miss Flopkins, and their results differ only as the Frenchman differs from the Englishwoman, the one being a serious and patient artificer while the other is a bungling idiot, who obtrudes her very empty personality and her very trashy ethics instead of studiously concealing them. Still: a photograph taken in the most famous studio in London is still a photograph equally with the spotted and misty effort of the amateur, and no amount of "touching-up" or "finishing," however patient it may be, will turn a photograph into a work of art. And, in like manner, no labour, no care, no polishing of the phrase, no patience in investigation, no artifice in plot or in construction will ever make "reading-matter" into fine literature.

III

I SEE THAT I shall be obliged to keep on reiterating the difference between fine literature and “literature,” or in other words between art and observation expressed with artifice. I am afraid, that in your heart of hearts, you still believe that the “Odyssey” is fine literature, and that “Pride and Prejudice” is fine literature, though the “Odyssey” is “better” than “Pride and Prejudice.” It is that “better” that I want to get out of your head, that monstrous fallacy of comparing Westminster Abbey with the charming old houses in Queen Square. You would see the absurdity of imagining that there can be any degree of comparison between two things entirely different, if I substituted for “Pride and Prejudice” some ordinary circulating-library novel of our own times. At least I hope you would see, though, as I told you a few weeks ago, I doubt very much whether many people realise the distinction between the “Odyssey” and a political pamphlet. The general opinion, I expect, is that both belong to the same class, though the Greek poem is much more “important” than the pamphlet. I think we succeeded in demonstrating the falsity of this idea, in showing clearly and decisively that fine literature means the expression of the eternal human ecstasy in the medium of words, and that it means nothing else whatsoever. Words, it is true, are used for other ends than this: they are used in sending telegrams to stockbrokers, for example, but why should this double office create any confusion? A tub and a tabernacle may each be made of wood, but you don’t mix the two things up on that account? The other day you gave me a most amusing account of your landlady’s quarrels with her servant girls. I remember that I laughed consumedly, and at the moment, that solemn preconisation of the servant Mabel to the effect that her mistress, Mrs Stickings, was not a “lydy,” was more to my taste than the recitation of the “Ode on a Grecian Urn.” But you surely didn’t think that you were making literature all the while? Or that the history of Mrs Stickings and Mabel would have mysteriously become literature if you had written it down and got somebody to print it? Or that it would have been literature if some of the details had been a little exaggerated (I thought you had embroidered here and there); or if you had made the whole story up out of your own head? Exactly, you were, as you say, amusing me by the relation of facts a little altered, compressed, and embellished, and I am glad that you see that no process of writing or printing, no variation in the proportion of truth and invention, even to the total lack of all truth, could have changed an amusing presentation of the Stickings ménage into fine literature. But, surely, it is so very obvious. Did any cook ever think that he could change a turkey into a bird of paradise by careful attention to the farse and the sauce? The farmer might as well expect to breed early phœnixes for Leadenhall Market by the simple process of lighting a bonfire in the farmyard. The young ducks would jump into the blaze, and the transformation would be the work of a second! There is no more madness in that notion than in the other one — that one has only to print an amusing, interesting, life-like, or pathetic tale to make it into fine literature.

Yes; but what I am afraid is still lurking somewhere in your skull is this: that if only the stuffing is extremely well made, if only the sauce is an exquisite concoction, the turkey is, somehow or other, changed into a bird of paradise. That is, to translate the analogy, if only the plot is very ingenious, if only the construction is well carried out, if the characters are extremely life-like, if the English is admirably neat and sufficient, then reading-matter becomes fine literature. Make the bonfire high enough and your young ducks will be burned into phœnixes fast enough; let the artifice be sufficiently artificial and it will be art. Indeed you might as well maintain that a wooden statue, if it be really well carved, is thereby made into a gold statue.

Well, I remember saying one night that you were here that ecstasy is at once the most exquisite of emotions and a whole philosophy of life. And it is to the philosophy of life that we are brought, in the last resort. You know that there are, speaking very generally, two solutions of existence; one is the materialistic or rationalistic, the other, the spiritual or mystic. If the former were true, then Keats would be a queer kind of madman, and the “Morte d’Arthur” would be an elaborate symptom of insanity; if the latter is true, then “Pride and Prejudice” is not fine literature, and the works of George Eliot are the works of a superior insect — and nothing more. You must make your choice: is the story of the Graal lunacy, or not? You think it is not: then do not talk any more of turning glass into diamonds by careful polishing and cutting. Do not say: Mr A. spends five years over a book, and therefore what he writes is fine literature; Miss B. polishes off five novels in a year, and therefore she does not write fine literature. Do not say, Mr Shorthouse has got the name of a man who kept a private school in the time of Charles I. quite right; therefore "John Inglesant" is fine literature, while the archæological details in "Ivanhoe" are all wrong, therefore it is not fine literature. Good Lord! You might as well say: but my landlady's name is Mrs Stickings, and the girl (who left last month) was really called Mabel; therefore that story of mine was fine literature. What's that about sustained effort? Can you turn a deal ladder into a golden staircase by making it of a thousand rungs? What I say three times is right, eh? and if I tell the tale of Mrs Stickings so that it extends to "our minimum length for three volume novels," it becomes fine literature.

Well, I really hope that we have at last settled the matter; that fine literature is simply the expression of the eternal things that are in man, that it is beauty clothed in words, that it is always ecstasy, that it always draws itself away, and goes apart into lonely places, far from the common course of life. Realise this, and you will never be misled into pronouncing mere reading-matter, however interesting, to be fine literature; and now that we clearly understand the difference between the two, I propose that we drop the "fine" and speak simply of literature.

But I assure you that, even after having established the grand distinction, it is by no means plain sailing. Everything terrestrial is so composite (except, perhaps, pure music) that one is confronted by an almost endless task of distinguishing matter from form, and body from spirit. Literature, we say, is ecstasy, but a book must be written about something and about somebody; it must be expressed in words, it must have arrangement and artifice, it must have accident as well as essence. Consider "Don Quixote" as an example; it is, I suppose, the finest prose romance in existence. Essentially, it expresses the eternal quest of the unknown, that longing, peculiar to man, which makes him reach out towards infinity; and he lifts up his eyes, and he strains his eyes, looking across the ocean, for certain fabled, happy islands, for Avalon that is beyond the setting of the sun. And he comes into life from the unknown world, from glorious places, and all his days he journeys through the world, spying about him, going on and ever on, expecting beyond every hill to find the holy city, seeing signs, and omens, and tokens by the way, reminded every hour of his everlasting citizenship. “From the great deep to the great deep he goes”: it is true of King Arthur and of each one of us; and this, I take it, is the essence of “Don Quixote,” and of all his forerunners and successors. Then, in the second place, you get the eternal moral of the book, and you will understand that I am not using “moral” in the vulgar sense. The eternal moral, then, of “Don Quixote” is the strife between temporal and eternal, between the soul and the body, between things spiritual and things corporal, between ecstasy and the common life. You read the book and you see that there is a perpetual jar, you are continually confronted by the great antinomy of life. It seems a mere comic incident when the knight dreaming of enchantment is knocked about, and made ridiculous; but I tell you it is the perpetual tragedy of life itself, symbolised. I say that it is, under a figure, the picture of humanity in the world, that you will find the truth it represents repeated again and again throughout all history. You know that if one goes back resolutely to the first principles of things, one finds oneself, as it were, in a place where all lines that seemed parallel and eternally divided meet, and so it is with this tragedy symbolised by the Don Quixote. It is, you may say, the tragedy of the Unknown and the Known, of the Soul and Body, of the Idea and the Fact, of Ecstasy and Common Life; at last, I suppose, of Good and Evil. The source of it lies far beyond our understanding, but its symbol is shown again and again in Cervantes’s page.

Then, there is a third element in the book. The author intended to write a burlesque on the current romances of chivalry; and he wrote, I suppose, the best burlesque that has ever been written, or ever will be written. If you unhappily so choose, you can shut your eyes to everything serious and everything beautiful, and read merely of Amadis and Arthur “taken off,” of the highest ideals turned into nonsense, of the best motives shown to be, in effect, mischievous. You will read how the knight, in the approved manner of knights, helped the oppressed and the wretched, and how he usually worsened their condition tenfold. You may lend your ear to Sancho, grumbling and quoting “common-sense” proverbs all the road, as he rides on his ass, and if it were not for the wit and the comedy, you might fancy yourself in a suburban train bound for the city. Why, if you so please, “Don Quixote” is the Institute of cynicism, the reduction of every generous impulse to absurdity.

Finally, the knight is the mouthpiece of Cervantes himself, especially towards the end of the second part, where the armour and the fantasy drop off, piece by piece, and shred by shred, on that mournful, homeward journey. At last, I say, Don Quixote is almost simply Cervantes, commenting on men and affairs in Spain, and I think that in those final chapters the art has vanished together with the armour and the ecstasy. Yes, I always dread the ending of "Don Quixote." A star drops a line of streaming fire, down the vault of the sky, and perhaps you may have seen the ugly, shapeless thing that sinks into the earth.

But this very brief and imperfect analysis of a great masterpiece of literary art may give you some idea of the extraordinary complexity of all literature. As it is I have omitted one most important item in the account; I have said nothing of the style, because, I am sorry to say that I have no Spanish, and Cervantes speaks to me through an interpreter named Charles Jarvis. But, omitting style, you see that we have, in this particular case, five books in one; we have the utterance of pure ecstasy, the strife between ecstasy and the common life, the burlesque of chivalry, the institutes of cynicism, and the comments on affairs. Each of these different themes is managed with consummate ability, and (always excepting the last chapters of the book), each keeps its due place, so that it really rests with the reader, in a manner, to choose which book he is to read.

And then, there are other elements which must be accounted for if one is to judge a book as a whole, fairly and thoroughly. I may be so charmed with the writer's rapture, with the wonder and beauty of his idea, that I may forget the fact that the artist must also be the artificer; that while the soul conceives, the understanding must formulate the conception, that while ecstasy must suggest the conduct of the story, common-sense must help to range each circumstance in order, that while an inward, mysterious delight must dictate the burning phrases and sound in the music and melody of the words, cool judgment must go through every line, reminding the author that, if literature be the language of the Shadowy Companion it must yet be translated out of the unknown speech into the vulgar tongue. Here then we have the elements of a book. Firstly the Idea or Conception, the thing of exquisite beauty which dwells in the author's soul, not yet clothed in words, nor even in thought, but a pure emotion. Secondly, when this emotion has taken definite form, is made incarnate as it were, in the shape of a story, which can be roughly jotted down on paper, we may speak of the Plot. Thirdly, the plot has to be systematised, to be drawn to scale, to be carried out to its legitimate conclusions, to be displayed by means of Incident; and here we have Construction. Fourthly, the story is to be written down, and Style is the invention of beautiful words which shall affect the reader by their meaning, by their sound, by their mysterious suggestion.

This, then, is the fourfold work of literature, and if you want to be perfect you must be perfect in each part. Art must inspire and shape each and all, but only the first, the Idea, is pure art; with Plot, and Construction, and Style there is an alloy of artifice. If then any given book can be shown to proceed from an Idea, it is to be placed in the class of literature, in the shelf of the "Odyssey" as I think I once expressed it. It may be placed very high in the class; the more it have of rapture in its every part, the higher it will be: or, it may be placed very low, because, for example, having once admired the Conception, the dream that came to the author from the other world, we are forced to admit that the Story or Plot was feebly imagined, that the Construction was clumsily carried out, that the Style is, æsthetically, non-existent. You will notice that I am never afraid of blaming my favourites, of finding fault with the books which I most adore. I can do so freely and without fear of consequences, since having once applied my test, and having found that "Pickwick," for example, is literature, I am not in the least afraid that I shall be compelled to eat my words if flaws in plot and style and construction are afterwards made apparent. The statue is gold; we have settled that much, and we need not fear that it will turn into lead, if we find that the graving and carving is poor enough. Once be sure that your temple is a temple, and I will warrant you against it being suddenly transmuted into a tub, through the discovery of scamped workmanship.

Well, suppose we begin to apply our analysis. Let us take the strange case of Mr R. L. Stevenson, and especially his "Jekyll and Hyde," which, in some ways, is his most characteristic and most effective book. Now I suppose that instructed opinion (granting its existence) was about equally divided as to the class in which this most skilful and striking story was to be placed. Many, I have no doubt, gave it a very high place in the ranks of imaginative literature, or (as we should now say) in the ranks of literature; while many other judges set it down as an extremely clever piece of sensationalism, and nothing more. Well, I think both these opinions are wrong; and I should be inclined to say that “Jekyll and Hyde” just scrapes by the skin of its teeth, as it were, into the shelves of literature, and no more. On the surface it would seem to be merely sensationalism; I expect that when you read it, you did so with breathless absorption, hurrying over the pages in your eagerness to find out the secret, and this secret once discovered, I imagine that “Jekyll and Hyde” retired to your shelf — and stays there, rather dusty. You have never opened it again? Exactly. I have read it for a second time, and I was astonished to find how it had, if I may say so, evaporated. At the first reading one was enthralled by mere curiosity, but when once this curiosity had been satisfied what remained? If I may speak from my own experience, simply a rather languid admiration of the ingenuity of the plot with its construction, combined with a slight feeling of impatience, such as one might experience if one were asked to solve a puzzle for the second time. You see that the secret once disclosed, all the steps which lead to the disclosure become, ipso facto, insignificant, or rather they become nothing at all, since their only significance and their only existence lay in the secret, and when the secret has ceased to be a secret, the signs and cyphers of it fall also into the world of nonentity. You may be amazed, and perplexed, and entranced by a cryptogram, while you are solving it, but the solution once attained, your cryptogram is either nothing or perilously near to nothingness.

Well, all this points, doesn’t it, towards mere sensationalism, very cleverly done? But, as I said, I think “Jekyll and Hyde” just scrapes over the borderline and takes its place, very low down, among books that are literature. And I base my verdict solely on the Idea, on the Conception that lies, buried rather deeply, beneath the Plot. The plot, in itself, strikes me as mechanical — this actual physical transformation, produced by a drug, linked certainly with a theory of ethical change, but not linked at all with the really mysterious, the really psychical — all this affects me, I say, as ingenious mechanism and nothing more; while I have shown how the construction is ingenious artifice, and the style is affected by the same plague of laboured ingenuity. Throughout it is a thoroughly conscious style, and in literature all the highest things are unconsciously, or at least, subconsciously produced. It has music, but it has no under-music, and there are no phrases in it that seem veils of dreams, echoes of the “inexpressive song.” It is on the conception, then, alone, that I justify my inclusion of “Jekyll” amongst works of art; for it seems to me that, lurking behind the plot, we divine the presence of an Idea, of an inspiration. "Man is not truly one, but truly two," or, perhaps, a polity with many inhabitants, Dr Jekyll writes in his confession, and I think that I see here a trace that Mr Stevenson had received a vision of the mystery of human nature, compounded of the dust and of the stars, of a dim vast city, splendid and ruinous as drowned Atlantis deep beneath the waves, of a haunted quire where a flickering light burns before the Veil. This, I believe, was the vision that came to the artist, but the admirable artificer seized hold of it at once and made it all his own, omitting what he did not understand, translating roughly from the unknown tongue, materialising, coarsening, hardening. Don't you see how thoroughly physical the actual plot is, and if one escapes for a moment from the atmosphere of the laboratory it is only to be confronted by the most obvious vein of moral allegory; and from this latter light, "Jekyll and Hyde" seems almost the vivid metaphor of a clever preacher. You mustn't imagine, you know, that I condemn the powder business as bad in itself, for (let us revert for a moment to philosophy) man is a sacrament, soul manifested under the form of body, and art has to deal with each and both and to show their interaction and interdependence. The most perfect form of literature is, no doubt, lyrical poetry which is, one might say, almost pure Idea, art with scarcely an alloy of artifice, expressed in magic words, in the voice of music. In a word, a perfect lyric, such as Keats's "Belle Dame Sans Mercy" is almost pure soul, a spirit with the luminous body of melody. But (in our age, at all events) a prose romance must put on a grosser and more material envelope than this, it must have incident, corporeity, relation to material things, and all these will occupy a considerable part of the whole. To a certain extent, then, the Idea must be materialised, but still it must always shine through the fleshly vestment; the body must never be mere body but always the body of the spirit, existing to conceal and yet to manifest the spirit; and here it seems to me that Mr Stevenson's story breaks down. The transformation of Jekyll into Hyde is solely material, as you read it, without artistic significance; it is simply an astounding incident, and not an outward sign of an inward mystery. As for the possible allegory I have too much respect for Mr Stevenson as an artificer to think that he would regard this element as anything but a very grave defect. Allegory, as Poe so well observed, is always a literary vice, and we are only able to enjoy the "Pilgrim's Progress" by forgetting that the allegory exists. Yes, that seems to me the vitium of "Jekyll and Hyde": the conception has been badly realised, and by badly I do not mean clumsily, because from the logical, literal standpoint, the plot and the construction are marvels of cleverness; but I mean inartistically: ecstasy, which as we have settled is the synonym of art, gave birth to the idea, but immediately abandoned it to artifice, and to artifice only, instead of presiding over and inspiring every further step in plot, in construction, and in style. All this may seem to you very fine-drawn and over-subtle, but I am convinced that it is the true account of the matter, and perhaps you may realise my theory better if I draw out that analogy of "translation" which I suggested, I think, a few minutes ago. I was passing along New Oxford Street the other day, and I happened to look into a shop which displays Bibles in all languages, and I glanced at the French version, open at the seventh chapter of the Book of Proverbs. I saw the words "un jeune homme dépourvu de bon sens," and then, lower down, "comme un bœuf à la boucherie," and it was some considerable time before I realised that these phrases "translated," "a young man void of understanding," and "as an ox goeth to the slaughter." Now you notice that these are in every way commonplace examples; there is nothing extraordinarily poetical in either phrase as it stands in the Authorised Version. I might have made the contrast much more violent by choosing a passage from the Song of Songs or Ecclesiastes; and I wonder how "Therefore with Angels and Archangels" would go into French. But isn't the gulf astounding between "void of understanding" and "dépourvu de bon sens"? Yet the meaning of the French is really the same as the meaning of the English; logically, I should think, the two phrases are exactly equivalent. And yet … well, we know perfectly well that "dépourvu de bon sens" in no way renders that noble and austere simplicity that we reverence in the English text.

Now, I think, you ought to see what I have been trying to express about the gulf that may open always between the conception and the plot, or story, that does divide the conception from the plot of "Jekyll and Hyde." Of course the analogy is not perfect, because the magnum chaos that yawns between the unformulated Idea and the formulated plot, between pure ecstasy and ecstasy plus artifice, is much vaster than the distinction between English and French, indeed between the two former there is almost or altogether the difference of the infinite and the finite, of soul and body; still, you see how a book is a rendering, a translation of an Idea, and how a very fine idea may be embodied in a very mechanical plot.

You remember the “Socialist and Baroness” novel that we were talking about the other night. We placed it outside of literature firstly and chiefly because it was not based on ecstasy, on an idea of any kind, and secondly, and by way of consequence, because in its execution and detail it was so thoroughly insignificant, because it played Hamlet with the part of the Prince omitted. Now I think that it is strong evidence of the soundness of my literary theory that we are enabled by it to take two books so utterly dissimilar in manner and method, in story and treatment, and to judge them both by the same scale. For this is what it really comes to: we say that the “Tragic Comedians” is not literature because it simply tells of facts without their significance, because it deals with the outward show and not with the inward spirit, because it is accidental and not essential. And in just the same way we say that “Jekyll and Hyde” (its conception apart) is not literature inasmuch as it too has the body of a story without the soul of a story, the incident, the fact, without the inward thing of which the fact is a symbol. For if you will consider the matter you will see that a fact qua fact has no existence in art at all. It is not the painter’s business to make us a likeness of a tree or a rock; it is his business to communicate to us an emotion — an ecstasy, if you please — and that he may do so he uses a tree or a rock as a symbol, a word in his language of colour and form. It is not the business of the sculptor to chisel likenesses of men in marble; the human form is to him also a symbol which stands for an idea. In the same manner it is not the business of the literary artist to describe facts — real or imaginary — in words: he is possessed with an idea which he symbolises by incident, by a story of men and women and things. He is possessed, let us say, by the idea of Love: then he must write a story of lovers, but he must never forget that A. and B., his actual lovers in the tale, with their social positions, their whims and fancies, their sayings and doings are only of consequence in the degree that they symbolise the universal human passion, which in its turn is a copy of certain eternal and ineffable things. If A. and B. do not do this then they are nothing, and worse than nothing, so far as art is concerned. “But my tree is like a tree,” says the dull painter, and “my anatomy is faultless,” says the bad sculptor, and “my characters are life-like,” says the novelist.

And one can apply exactly the same reasoning to Mr Stevenson’s ingenious story. I do not know whether there is, or has been, or will be a salt in existence which can turn a man into another person; that is of not the slightest consequence to the argument. The result of the powder, as it is described in the book, is an incident, and it makes no difference to the critical judgment whether the incident is true or false, probable or improbable. The only point, absolutely the only point is this: is the incident significant or insignificant, is it related for its own sake, or is it posited because it is a sign, a symbol, a word which veils and reveals the artist's ecstasy and inspiration? The socialist fell in love with the baroness: it is true, you say, it really happened so in Germany some twenty-five years ago. But in the book it is insignificant. The doctor took the powder and became another man; it is probably untrue. But it is also insignificant; and to the critic of art in literature the one incident stands precisely on the same footing as the other.

And, do you know, I am glad I have made this comparison between "Jekyll and Hyde" and the "Tragic Comedians," because it has struck me that what I have been saying about the essential element of all literature might be open to very grave misunderstanding. I have been insisting, with reiteration that must have tired you, that there is only one test by which literature may be distinguished from mere reading matter, and that that test is summed up in the word, ecstasy. And then we admitted a whole string of synonyms — desire of the unknown, sense of the unknown, rapture, adoration, mystery, wonder, withdrawal from the common life — and I daresay I have used many other phrases in the same sense without giving you any special warning that it was our old friend again in a new guise. But it has just occurred to me that with all this wealth of synonyms, I may not have made my meaning perfectly clear. For example, while I was laying down the law about Dr Jekyll's powder and its effects, you might have interrupted me with the remark: "But I thought you said the sense of wonder was characteristic of literature; and surely the change from Jekyll into Hyde is extremely wonderful." Or again, when I was belauding the "Odyssey," dwelling on the voyage of Ulysses amongst strange peoples, you might have put in some modern tale of strange adventure, and requested me to distinguish between the two, to justify my praise of the old, and rejection of the new. And we have mentioned Sunday-school books, always, I think, with a certain nuance of contempt; but Sunday-school books usually deal with religion, and religion and adoration are almost synonymous. And so one could go on with the list, making out, on our premises, with our own test, a plausible case for books which we know very well are neither literature nor anything remotely approaching it. And that would look rather like the collapse of our literary case, wouldn’t it?

Well, the solution of the difficulty seems to me to be sought for in the remarks I was making just now about “facts” in art. I said, you remember, that in art, facts as facts have no existence at all. Facts, incidents, plots, simply form the artistic speech — its mode of expression, or medium — and if there is no idea behind the facts, then you have no longer language but gibberish. Just as language is made up of the letters of the alphabet, arranged in significant words and sentences; so is the artistic language made up of plots, incidents, sentences which are informed with significance. If I heap up letters of the alphabet, and arrange them in an arbitrary collocation, without meaning, I am forming gibberish, and not a language; and so if I pepper my pages with extraordinary incidents, without attaching to them any significance, I am writing, it may be, an exciting, absorbing, interesting book, but I am not making literature. Indeed, some of the books that might be mentioned in this connection remind me of a man swearing: he uses the holiest names but he does so in such a manner that he excites not reverence and awe but disgust and repulsion. Tell the bare “plot” of the Odyssey to one of these writers, and hint that it might be made into a “successful Christmas book for boys,” and he will produce you a book which will contain the Lotus-Eaters, and Calypso and the Cyclops, but which will have just the same relation to literature as blasphemy bears to the Liturgy. That seems to me the explanation; one must say again that mere incident is nothing, that it only becomes something when it is a symbol of an interior meaning. And, turning this maxim inside out, as it were, we shall sometimes find that a book which seems on the surface to be “reading matter” is really literature, and incidents, apparently insignificant, may turn out, on a closer examination, to be significant and symbolic in a very high degree. So I don’t think our literary criterion is in any way invalidated by the occurrence of surprising incidents in very worthless books. Look at “Mr Isaacs” for example. In a sense it is a “wonderful” book, inasmuch as it contains incidents which are far removed from common experience; but you have only to read it to discover that the author had not been visited by any inspiration of the unseen. One may trace some acquaintance with theosophical “literature,” but not even the dimmest vision of “the other things.” The “other things”? Ah, that is another synonym, but who can furnish a precise definition of the indefinable? They are sometimes in the song of a bird, sometimes in the scent of a flower, sometimes in the whirl of a London street, sometimes hidden under a great lonely hill. Some of us seek them with most hope and the fullest assurance in the sacring of the Mass, others receive tidings through the sound of music, in the colour of a picture, in the shining form of a statue, in the meditation of eternal truth. Do you know that I can never hear a jangling piano-organ, contending with the roar of traffic without the tears — not of feeling but of emotion — coming to my eyes?

And that instance — it is grotesque enough — reminds me that I think I have an explanation of another puzzle that has often perplexed me, and I daresay has perplexed you. Do you remember the books that you read when you were a boy? I can think of stories that I read long ago (I have forgotten the very names of them) that filled me with emotions that I recognised, afterwards, as purely artistic. The sorriest pirate, the most wretchedly concealed treasure, poor Captain Mayne Reid at his boldest gave me then the sensations that I now search for in the "Odyssey" or in the thought of it; and I looked into some of these shabby old tales years afterwards, and wondered how on earth I had managed to penetrate into "faëry lands forlorn" through such miserable stucco portals. And you, you say, extracted somehow or other, from Harrison Ainsworth's "Lancashire Witches," that essence of the unknown that you now find in Poe, and I expect that everybody who loves literature could gather similar recollections.

Well, it would be easy enough to solve the problem by saying that the emotions of children are of no consequence and don't count, but then I don't think that proposition is true. I think, on the contrary, that children, especially young children before they have been defiled by the horrors of "education," possess the artistic emotion in remarkable purity, that they reproduce, in a measure, the primitive man before he was defiled, artistically, by the horrors of civilisation. The ecstasy of the artist is but a recollection, a remnant from the childish vision, and the child undoubtedly looks at the world through "magic casements." But you see all this is unconscious, or subconscious (to a less degree it is so in later life, and artists are rare simply because it is their almost impossible task to translate the emotion of the sub-consciousness into the speech of consciousness), and as you may sometimes see children uttering their conceptions in words that are nonsense, or next door to it, so nonsense or at any rate very poor stuff suffices with them to summon up the vision from the depths of the soul. Suppose we could catch a genius at the age of nine or ten and request him to utter what he felt; the boy would speak or write rubbish, and in the same way you would find that he read rubbish, and that it excited in him an ineffable joy and ecstasy. Coleridge was a Bluecoat boy when he read the "poems" of William Lisle Bowles, and admired them to enthusiasm, and I am quite sure that at some early period Poe had been enraptured by Mrs Radcliffe, and we know how Burns founded himself on Fergusson. When men are young, the inward ecstasy, the "red powder of projection" is of such efficacy and virtue that the grossest and vilest matter is transmuted for them into pure gold, glistering and glorious as the sun. The child (and with him you may link all primitive and childlike people) approaches books and pictures just as he approaches nature itself and life; and a wonderful vision appears where many of us can only see the common and insignificant.

But all this has been a digression; it has come by the way in a talk about worthless and insignificant books. But I think that we should by this time have brought our testing apparatus into working order; we should be able to criticise any given book on some ground or principle, not on the rule of thumb of "it sent me to sleep," or "it kept me awake." And I think that what I have already remarked about the subconscious element in literature should have answered that question about "books with a purpose." As a matter of fact I believe that they are mostly trash, but it is not a case for à priori reasoning; you must test each book by itself. Mr Stevenson was, I believe, an artist at heart, but we have seen how the artificer overcame the artist in "Jekyll and Hyde," and in like manner there have been cases of people who were artificers, and even preachers, at heart, who were forced to succumb to the concealed, subconscious artist, when pen touched paper. For example; first logically analyze "Lycidas"; you will be disgusted just as Dr Johnson, who had no analysis but the logical, was disgusted. Forget your logic, your common-sense, and read it again as poetry; you will acknowledge the presence of an amazing masterpiece. An unimportant lament over an unimportant personage, constructed on an affected pseudo-pastoral plan, full of acrid, Puritanical declamation and abuse, wantonly absurd with its mixture of the nymphs and St Peter; it is not only wretched in plan but clumsy in construction, the artifice is atrocious. And it is also perfect beauty! It is the very soul set to music; its austere and exquisite rapture thrills one so that I could almost say: he who understands the mystery and the beauty of “Lycidas” understands also the final and eternal secret of art and life and man.

IV

DOYOU KNOW THAT when we last talked belles lettres the whole evening went by (or at least I think so) without my saying anything about “Pickwick”? I hope you noted the omission in your diary, if you keep one, because I find it difficult to talk much about literature, without drawing some illustration from that very notable, and curious, and unappreciated book. Yes, I maintain the justice of the last epithet in spite of circulation, in spite of popularity, and in spite of “Pickwick ‘literature.’” You may like a book very much and read it three times a year without appreciating it, and if a great book is really popular it is sure to owe its popularity to entirely wrong reasons. There are people, you know, who study Homer every day, because he throws so much light on the manners and customs of the ancients, and if a book of our own time is both great and popular, you may be sure that it is loved for its most peccant parts, just as nine people out of ten will recall the “Raven” and the “Bells” if the poetry of Edgar Allan Poe is mentioned.

After all, I needn’t have excused myself for my constant references to Dickens’s masterpiece, since I have already informed you that, like Coleridge, I love a “cyclical” mode of discoursing; and I honestly think that if you want to understand something about the Mysteries or the Fine Arts (which are the expression of the mysteries) it is the only way. A proposition in Euclid is demonstrated and done with, since nothing can be added to a mathematical proof; but literature is different. It is many-sided and many-coloured, and variable always; you can consider it in half-a-dozen ways, from half-a-dozen standpoints, and from half-a-dozen judgments, each of which will be true and perfect in itself, and yet each will supplement the other. Two or three weeks ago I think I tried to show you what a complex organism any given book reveals, if one examines it with a little attention, and if one specimen be so curiously and intricately fashioned, you may imagine the complexity of the whole subject.

But I have a more particular reason for turning once more to the "Posthumous Papers." We have noted that that which at first sight seems significant, may turn out to be insignificant, and I think that in passing I hinted that the reverse was sometimes the case. Very good; and the especial instance that is in my mind is the enormous capacity for strong drink exhibited by Mr Pickwick and all his friends and associates. Of course you've noticed it; perhaps you have thought it a nuisance and a blemish from the artistic standpoint, just as many "good people" have found it a nuisance and a blemish from the temperance or teetotal standpoint. You may have felt quite certain that a set of men who were always drinking brandy and water, and strong ale, and milk-punch, and madeira, who constantly drank a great deal too much of each and all of these things, would be extremely unpleasant companions in private life; I daresay you have been thankful that you never knew Mr Pickwick or any of his followers. You know, I expect, by personal experience, that a man whose daily life is a pilgrimage from one whiskey bar to another is, in most cases, an extremely tedious and unprofitable companion; and it is undeniable that the "Pickwickians" rather made opportunities for brandy and water than avoided them. And in an indirect manner, you feel that all this makes you like the book less.

But (I can no more miss an opportunity of digression than Mr Pickwick could keep on the coach if there were a chance of drinking his favourite beverage) do you know that there are really people who make their liking or disliking of the characters the criterion of literature — of romances, I mean? We touched on this some time ago, and I remember saying that in the case of such secondary books as Jane Austen's and Thackeray's, it was permissible enough to go where one was best amused, that one had a right to say, "Yes, the artifice may be the better here, but the characters are much more amusing there, and I had rather talk to the cosmopolitan whose manners are now and then a little to seek, than to the maiden lady in the village, whose decorum is so unexceptionable." But I confess that at the time it had not dawned upon me that there are people who try to judge fine art — the true literature — on the same grounds. I believe, however, that such is the case; I believe, indeed, that the egregious M. Voltaire was dimly moved by some such feeling when he wrote his famous "criticism" of the prophet Habakkuk. What (he must have said to himself) would they think in the salons of a man who talked like this: —

And the everlasting mountains were scattered,
The perpetual hills did bow:
His ways are everlasting?

Evidently Habakkuk could never hope for a second invitation; and therefore he wrote rubbish. And I believe, as I said, that there are many people who more or less unconsciously judge literature by this measure, by asking, “Would these people be pleasant to meet? would one like to hear this kind of thing in one’s drawing-room?” And this is well enough with secondary books, since they contain nothing but “characters,” and “incidents,” and “scenes,” and “facts”; but it is by no means well in literature, in which, as we found out, all these things are symbols, words of a language, used, not for themselves, but because they are significant. Remember our old definition — ecstasy, the withdrawal, the standing apart from common life — and you will see that we may almost reverse this popular method of judgment, and turn it into another test, or rather another way of putting the test, of art. For, if literature be a kind of withdrawal from the common atmosphere of life, we shall naturally expect to find its utterance, both in matter and manner, wholly unsuitable for the drawing-room or the street, and its “characters” persons whom we cannot imagine ourselves associating with on pleasant or comfortable terms. Neither you nor I would be very happy on Ulysses’s boat, we should soon become irritated with Don Quixote, we should hardly feel at home with Sir Galahad. It is true that all the good there is in men is this — that at rare intervals, in certain lonely moments of exaltation they do feel for the time a faint stirring of the beautiful within them, and then they would adventure on the Quest of the Graal; but as you know few of us are saints, fewer, perhaps, are men of genius; we are sunk for the most part of our days in the common life, and our care is for the body and for the things of the body, for the street and the drawing-room, and not for the perpetual, solitary hills. So you see that if you read a book and can say of the characters in it: “I wish I knew them,” there is very strong reason to suspect that the book in question is not literature, though it may well be a pleasant picture of pleasant people.

Yes, I was expecting that question. I should have been sorry if your sense of humour had not prompted you to ask whether the drinking of too much milk-punch constituted a withdrawal from the common life, a profound and lonely ecstasy. But don’t you remember that when we were discussing “Pickwick” before, and comparing it with the “Odyssey,” I suddenly deserted Homer, and brought in Sophocles? I think I contrasted, very briefly, the education of the dramatist with the education of the romance writer, the London of the ‘twenties and ‘thirties with the city of the Violet Crown, the fate of him, ἀεὶ διὰ λαμπροτάτου

with that of the other who tried to find the way through the evil and hideous London fog.

Well, you might have been inclined to ask, why Sophocles? But do you remember for whose festivals, in whose honour the Greek wrote his dramas and his choral songs? It was the god of wine who was worshipped and invoked at the Dionysiaca, in the praise of Dionysus the chorus sang and danced about the altar, and all the drama arose from the celebration of the Bacchic mysteries. So you get, I think, a pretty fair proportion: as the Athens of Sophocles is to the Cockneydom of Dickens, so is the cult of Dionysus to the cult of cold punch and brandy and water. The interior meaning is in each case the same; the artistic expression has lamentably deteriorated, in the degree that the artistic atmosphere on the banks of Fleet Ditch, the “mother of dead dogs,” was inferior to the artistic atmosphere on the banks of the Ilissus.

I expect you have gathered from all this talk the point I want to make: that the brandy and water and punch business in “Pickwick,” which at first sight seems trivial and insignificant and even disgusting, is, in fact, full of the highest significance. Don’t you notice the insistence with which the writer dwells on drinking, the unction and enthusiasm with which he describes it? We have admitted the poverty of the “materials” with which Dickens works, and of course it would be as idle to expect him to write a choral song in honour of Dionysus as it would be to expect him to write in Greek. He expressed himself as best he could, in the “language” (that is with the incidents and in the atmosphere) that he knew, but there can be no possible doubt as to his meaning. In a word, I absolutely identify the “brandy and water scenes” with the Bacchic cultus and all that it implies.

This is “a little too much for you” is it? Well, let us take another well-known book, the “Gargantua” and “Pantagruel.” You know it well, and I have only to remind you of the name to remind you that as “Pickwick” has been said to “reek with brandy and water,” so does Rabelais assuredly reek of wine. The history begins: —

“Grandgousier estoit bon raillard en son temps, aimant à boire net,” it ends with the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, with the word and I refer you to the allocution of Bacbuc, the priestess of the Bottle, at large. “By wine,” she says, “is man made divine,” and I may say that if you have not got the key to these Rabelaisian riddles much of the value — the highest value — of the book is lost to you. You know how they drink, those strange figures, the giants and their followers, you know the aroma of the vintage, the odour of the wine vat that fills all those marvellous and enigmatic pages, and I tell you that here again I recognise the same signs as in “Pickwick,” the same music as that of the dithyrambic choruses in honour of Dionysus, which were eventually amplified into that magnificent literary product, the Greek drama. And if we wish to penetrate the secret we must not forget the Hebrew psalmist, with his calix meus inebrians quam præclarus est. And remember, too, if you feel inclined to shudder at the milk-punch, that the words which I have just quoted might be rendered, “how splendid is this cup of wine that makes me drunk!” and we may say that, in a manner, poor Dickens did so render them, since, as I have reminded you he belonged, after the flesh, to the Camden Town of the ‘twenties, and was forced to use its unbeautiful dialect because he knew no other.

And after all, then, what does this Bacchic cultus mean? We have seen that under various disguises the one spirit appeared in Greece, in the France of the Renaissance, and in Victorian England, and that in each instance there is an apparent glorification of drunkenness. The Greeks, indeed, a sober people by necessity, as all Southerners are, impersonated the genius of intoxication, and made excessive drinking, as it would seem, an elaborate religion, with rites and festivals and mysteries. The Tourainian, whose personal habit was that not of a drunkard, but of a learned physician and restorer of ancient letters, who probably drank very much in the manner of the good curé I once knew (“My God!” he said to me, after the third small glass of small white wine, "'tis a veritable debauch!"), has, on the face of it, dedicated all his enormous book to the same cause, so that to read Pantagruel is like walking through a French village in the vintage season, when the whole world, as Zola unpleasantly and nastily expresses it "pue le raisin." Thirdly, Dickens, who loved to talk of concocting gin-punch, and left it, when concocted, to be drunk by his guests, shows us Mr Pickwick "dead drunk" in the wheel-barrow. And, for a final touch of apparent absurdity, you remember that the Dionysus myth represents wine as a civilising influence! You may well think of the public-house at the corner, and ask yourself how strong drink can contribute to civilisation.

Well, that is, in very brief outline, the problem and the puzzle; and I may say at once that to the literalist, the rationalist, the materialist critic, the problem is quite insoluble. But to you and me, who do not end in any kind of ist, the enigma will not be quite so hopeless. Let us get back to our maxim that, in literature, facts and incidents are not present for their own sake but as symbols, as words of the language of art; it will follow, then, that the incidents of the Dionysus myth, the incidents of "Pantagruel" and "Pickwick" are not to be taken literally, but symbolically. We are not to conclude that the Greeks were a race of drunkards, or that Rabelais and Dickens preached habitual excess in drink as the highest virtue; we are to conclude that both the ancient people and the modern writers recognised Ecstasy as the supreme gift and state of man, and that they chose the Vine and the juice of the Vine as the most beautiful and significant symbol of that Power which withdraws a man from the common life and the common consciousness, and taking him from the dust of the earth, sets him in high places, in the eternal world of ideas. And, after all, I cannot do better than quote at length the sermon of Bacbuc, priestess of the Dive Bouteille.

"Et icy maintenons que non rire, ains boire, est le propre de l'homme: je ne dis boire simplement et absolument, car aussi bien boivent les bestes: je dis boire vin bon et frais. Notez, amis, que de vin, divin on devient: et n'y a argument tant seur, ni art de divination moins fallace. Vos academiques l'afferment, rendans l'etymologie de vin lequel ils disent en Grec ΟΙΝΟΣ, estre comme vis, force, puissance. Car pouvoir il a d'emplir l'ame de toute verité, tout savoir et philosophie. Si avez noté ce qui est en lettres Ioniques escrit dessus la porte du temple, vous avez peu entendre qu'en vin est verité cachée."

You see how that passage lights up the whole book, and you see what Rabelais meant in the Prologue to the first book by that reference to "certain little boxes such as we see nowadays in apothecaries' shops, the which boxes are painted on the outside with joyous and fantastic figures … but within they hold rare drugs, as balm, ambergris, amomum, musk, civet, certain stones of high virtue, and all manner of precious things." I do not know whether you have read any of our English commentators on Rabelais, if not, I would not advise you to do so, unless you take pleasure in futility. For instance they take the passage from the prologue, and seeing the hint that something is concealed, try by some complicated chain of argument to show that Rabelais veiled his attacks on the Church under a mask of "wild buffoonery." Of course the attacks on the Church (the "secondary" and comparatively unimportant element in the book, fairly answering to the attacks on books of Chivalry in the Don Quixote) are as open as any attack can well be, and anyone who finds a veil drawn between Rabelais' dislike for the clergy and his expression of it must have a very singular notion of what constitutes concealment, and a still more singular misapprehension of the motive-forces which make and shape great books. Art, you may feel quite assured, proceeds always from love and rapture, never from hatred and disdain, and satire of every kind qua satire is eternally condemned to that Gehenna where the pamphlets, the "literature of the subject," and the "life-like" books lie all together. In "Don Quixote" one perceives that Cervantes loved the romances he condemns, and the satire is therefore good-humoured, and, one may say, does his book little harm or none at all; but Rabelais had been harshly treated by the friars, and his consequent ill-humour, his very violent abuse are in disaccord with the eternal melodies which may be discerned in "Pantagruel," noted there under strange symbols. Yes, the satire in Rabelais is an "accident," which one has to accept and to make the best of; some of it is amusing enough, "joyous and fantastic," like the "apes and owls and antiques" that adorn the little boxes of the apothecaries, some of it is a little acrid, as I said; but let us never forget that the essence of the book is its splendid celebration of ecstasy, under the figure of the vine.

You know I have not opened the door; I have only put the key into your hands, in this as in other instances. There are things, which, strange to say, are better left unsaid, and this, no doubt, Rabelais perceived when he devised his symbolism and set many traps in the paths of the shallow commentator. It was not from dread of the consequences of attacking the clergy that he devised curious veils and concealments, since, as I have noted, his hatred of the church is quite open and unconcealed. He chose the method of symbolism, firstly because he was an artist, and symbolism is the speech of art; and secondly because the high truth that he prophesied was not, and is not, fit for vulgar ears. The secret places of the human nature are not heedlessly to be exposed to the uninitiated, who would merely profane this occult knowledge if they had it. By consequence the "Complete Works of Rabelais" are obtainable in Holywell Street, and many, seeking the libidinous, have found merely the tiresome, and have cursed their bargain.

No, I will positively say no more. The key is in your hands, and with it you may open what chambers you can. There is only this to be mentioned: that, if I were you, I would not be "afraid with any amazement" should Mr Pickwick's overdose of milk punch prove, ultimately, a clue to the labyrinth of mystic theology.

There are, however, one or two minor points in Rabelais that may be worth notice. I might, you know, analyze it as I attempted to analyze "Don Quixote." There is in "Gargantua" and "Pantagruel" that same complexity of thought and construction: you may note, first of all, the great essence which is common to these masterpieces as to all literature — ecstasy, expressed in the one case under the similitude of knight-errantry, in the other by the symbol of the vine. Then, in Rabelais you have another symbolism of ecstasy — the shape of gauloiserie, of gross, exuberant gaiety, expressing itself by outrageous tales, outrageous words, by a very cataract of obscenity, if you please, if only you will notice how the obscenity of Rabelais transcends the obscenity of common life; how grossness is poured out in a sort of mad torrent, in a frenzy, a very passion of the unspeakable. Then, thirdly, there is the impression one collects from the book: a transfigured picture of that wonderful age: there is the note of the vast, interminable argument of the schools, and for a respond, the clear, enchanted voice of Plato; there is the vision, there is the mystery of the vast, far-lifted Gothic quire; and those fair, ornate, and smiling châteaux rise smiling from the rich banks of the Loire and the Vienne. The old tales told in farmhouse kitchens in the Chinonnais, the exultation of the new learning, of lost beauty recovered, the joy of the vintage, the old legends, the ancient turns of speech, the new style and manner of speaking: so to the old world answers the new. Then one has the satire of clergy and lawyers — the criticism of life — analogous, as I said with much that is in Cervantes, and so from divers elements you see how a literary masterpiece is made into a whole.

But now, do you know, I am going to make a confession. You have heard me say more than once that in art, in literature properly so called, liking and disliking count for nothing. We have understood, I think, that when once amusing reading matter has been put out of court, the question of how often, with what absorption one reads a work of art, matters nothing. Well, I want to contradict, or rather to modify that axiom; we have been speaking of three great books, each of which I believe firmly to be true literature— "Pickwick," "Don Quixote," and "Pantagruel." Here is my confession. I read "Pickwick," say, once a year, "Don Quixote," once every three years, while I read Rabelais in fragments perhaps once in six years. You might suppose that I have indicated the order of merit? Well, I have, but you must reverse the order, since I firmly believe that "Pantagruel" is the finest of the three. We will leave Dickens out of account, since we are agreed that though the message was that of angels, the accent and the speech were of Camden town; he, that is to say, approaches most nearly to the common life, to the common passages in which we live, and hence he, naturally, pleases us the most in our ordinary and common humours. But, of the other two, I confess that Cervantes pleases me much the more; the vulgarity of Dickens is absent or rather it is concentrated in Sancho, in a much milder form than that of "Pickwick," for a Spanish peasant of the sixteenth century, with all his "common-sense," and practical reason, is less remote from beauty than the retired "business man" of the early nineteenth century; just as poor Mr Pickwick, an honest, kindly creature, is vastly superior to the blatant, pretentious, diamond-bedecked swindlers who represent the city in our day. But Cervantes, who lacks, as I say, the "commonness" of Dickens, has something of the urbanity, the cosmopolitanism of Thackeray, he is, to a certain degree, a Colonel Newcome of his time, but he has seen the world more sagaciously than Colonel Newcome ever could. So while Rabelais appals me with his extravagance, his torrents of obscene words, I am charmed with the good humoured and observant companionship of Cervantes.

And hence I conclude that “Pantagruel” is the finer book. It may sound paradoxical to say so, but don’t you see that the very grotesquerie of Rabelais shows a further remove from the daily round, a purer metal, less tinged with the personal, material, interest than “Don Quixote.” Mind you, I find greater deftness, a finer artifice in Cervantes, who I think expressed his conception the more perfectly, but I think that the conception of Rabelais the higher, precisely because it is the more remote. Look at the “Pantagruel”; consider those “lists,” that more than frankness, that ebullition of grossness, plainly intentional, designed: it is either the merest lunacy, or else it is sublime. Don’t you remember the trite saying “extremes meet,” don’t you perceive that when a certain depth has been passed you begin to ascend into the heights? The Persian poet expresses the most transcendental secrets of the Divine Love by the grossest phrases of the carnal love; so Rabelais soars above the common life, above the streets and the gutter by going far lower than the streets and the gutter: he brings before you the highest by positing that which is lower than the lowest, and if you have the prepared, initiated mind, a Rabelaisian “list” is the best preface to the angelic song. All this may strike you as extreme paradox, but it has the disadvantage of being true, and perhaps you may assure yourself of its truth by recollecting the converse proposition — that it is when one is absorbed in the highest emotions that the most degrading images will intrude themselves. No; you are right: this is not the psychology of the “scientific” persons who write hand-books on the subject, it is not the psychology of the “serious” novelists, of those who write the annals of the “engaged”; but it happens to be the psychology of man.

I don’t know that very much can be made of the signification of the characters in “Pantagruel,” as I hardly think that Rabelais was anxious to be systematic or consistent in delineating them. I believe that there are two reasons for the gigantic stature of Pantagruel, or perhaps three. The form of the whole story came from popular legends about a giant named Gargantua, and that is the first and least important reason. Secondly the “giant” conception does something to remove the book from common experience; it is a sign-post, warning you not to expect a faithful picture of life, but rather a withdrawal from life and from common experience, and you are in a position to appreciate the value of that motive, since I have never ceased from telling you that it is the principal motive of all literature. And, thirdly, I hesitate and doubt, but nothing more, whether the giant Pantagruel, he who is “all thirst” and ever athirst, may not be a hint of the stature of the perfect man, of the ideal man, freed from the bonds of the common life, and common appetites, having only the eternal thirst for the eternal vine. Candidly, I am inclined to favour this view, but only as a private interpretation; it may be all nonsense, and I shall not be offended or surprised if you can prove to me that it is nonsense. But have you noticed how Pantagruel is at once the most important and the least important figure in the book? He is the most important personage; he is the hero, the leader, the son of the king, the giant, wiser than any or all of his followers: formally, he is to Rabelais that which Don Quixote is to Cervantes. And yet, actually, he is little more than a vague, tremendous shadow; the living, speaking, impressive personages are Frère Jean and Panurge, who occupy the stage and capture our attention. Doesn’t this rather suggest to you the part played by the “real” man in life itself; a subordinate, unobtrusive part usually, hidden very often by an exterior, which bears little resemblance to the true man within. You know Coleridge says that: — > “Pantagruel is the Reason; Panurge the Understanding — the pollarded man, the man with every faculty except the reason. I scarcely know an example more illustrative of the distinction between the two. Rabelais had no mode of speaking the truth in those days but in such form as this; as it was, he was indebted to the king’s protection for his life.”

I must cavil at the last sentence, in which Coleridge seems to hint that Rabelais was in danger because he had hinted the distinction between the Reason and the Understanding. With all respect to Coleridge, Rabelais might have gone to the limits of psychology and metaphysics without incurring any danger; he was threatened on account of his very open satire of the church and the clergy, which, as I have pointed out, is as plain spoken as satire well can be. Still, I think that Coleridge, using the technical language of German philosophy, had a glimpse of the truth, and Mr Besant’s remark that Panurge is a careful portrait of a man without a soul is virtually the same definition in another terminology. As I have already said, I don’t think that Rabelais kept his characters within the strict limits of consistence — they are only significant, perhaps, now and then — and I want to say, again, that I speak under correction in this matter, not feeling at all sure of my ground. But I am inclined to think that Pantagruel, Panurge, and the Monk are not so much three different characters, as the representative of man in his three persons. Frère Jean is, perhaps, the natural man, the "healthy animal," Panurge is the rational man, and Pantagruel, as I said, is the spiritual, or perfect man, who looms, gigantic, in the background, almost invisible, and yet all important, and the three are, in reality, One. If I may apply the case to our own subject, I may say that while Pantagruel conceives the idea, Panurge writes the book, and Brother John has the courage to take it to the publishers. The first is the artist, the second the artificer, and the third the social being, ready to battle for his place in the material world. The giant is always calm, since his head is high above earth — vidit nubes et sidera — but the other two have to face the compromises of life, and suffer its defeats. All this may be purely fantastical; and at any rate I am sure that anyone who knows his Rabelais could pick many holes in my interpretation. For example, I said that the monk was the "healthy animal," and Panurge the rational man; but there are occasions when Panurge assumes the character of the unhealthy beast, the hairy-legged, hybrid, creature of the Greek myth, who uses the superior human artifice for ends that are wholly bestial or worse than bestial. Still; is this a valid objection? Are there not such men in life itself? Is it not, perhaps, the peculiar and terrible privilege of humanity that it may, if it pleases, prostitute its most holy and most blessed gifts to the worst and most horrible uses? And does not each one of us feel that, potentially, at all events, there is such a being within him, not yielded to, perhaps, for a moment, yet always present, always ready to assume the command. The greatest saints, we are told, have suffered the most fiery temptations; in other words — Pantagruel is always attended by Panurge diabolicus. I have talked once or twice of the Shadowy Companion, but one must not forget that there is the Muddy Companion also; a being often of exquisite wit and deep understanding, but given to evil ways if one do not hold him in check.

But, in any case, I think I have shown that the Pantagruel is one of the most extraordinary efforts of the human mind, full of "Pantagruelism"; and that word stands for many concealed and wonderful mysteries.

It is not in the least a "pleasant," or a "life-like," or even an "interesting" book; I think that when one knows of the key — or rather of the keys — one opens the pages almost with a sensation of dread. So it is a book that one consults at long intervals, because it is only at rare moments that a man can bear the spectacle of his own naked soul, and a vision that is splendid, certainly, but awful also, in its constant apposition of the eternal heights and the eternal depths.

V

I HAVE BEEN waiting for that question for a very long time, and I only wonder that you have been able to restrain yourself so well — through such a series of what I know you believe to be paradoxes, though I have assured you that I deal merely in the plainest truth. But, after all, your question is quite a legitimate one, and I remember when I first began to think of these things I went astray — simply because I did not recognise the existence of the difficulty that has been bothering you, ever since that talk of ours about the haulte sagesse Pantagrueline — et Pickwickienne, and perhaps before it.

Yes, I will put the question in its plainest, crudest form, and I will make you ask, if you please, whether Charles Dickens had any consciousness of the interior significance of the milk-punch, strong ale, and brandy and water which he caused Mr Pickwick and his friends to consume in such outrageous quantities. It sounds plain enough and simple enough, doesn't it, and yet I must tell you that to answer that question fairly you must first analyze human nature, and I needn't remind you that that is a task very far from simple. "Man" sounds a very simple predicate, as you utter it; you imagine that you understand its significance perfectly well, but when you begin to refine a little, and to bring in distinctions, and to carry propositions to their legitimate bounds, you find that you have undertaken the definition of that which is essentially indefinite and probably indefinable. And, after all, we need not pitch on this term or on that, there is no need to select "man" as offering any especial difficulty, for, I take it, that the truth is that all human knowledge is subject to the same disadvantage, the same doubts and reservations. Omnia exeunt in mysterium was an old scholastic maxim; and the only people who have always a plain answer for a plain question are the pseudo-scientists, the people who think that one can solve the enigma of the universe with a box of chemicals.

But all this is a caution — necessary I suppose — that you need not expect me to give you a plain, cut and dried answer to your question whether literature is a conscious production — or, in more particular form — was Dickens aware that by milk-punch he meant ecstasy? I shall "ask you another" in the approved Scotch manner. You were telling me that as you came along this evening you had to stop for five minutes at the corner of the Caledonian Road to watch the exquisite grace of two slum-girls of fourteen or fifteen, dancing to the rattling tune of a piano-organ. You spoke of the charm of their movements — motus Ionici, some of them, I fear — of the purely æsthetic delight there was in the sight of young girls, disguised as horrible little slatterns, leaping and dancing as young girls have always leapt and danced, I suppose, from the time of the cave-dwellers onwards. Well, but do you suppose that this charm you have remarked was conscious? Do you think that Harriet and Emily realised that they were of the kin of the ecstatic dancers of all time, that they were beautiful because they were naturally expressing by a symbol that is universal, the universal and eternal ecstasy of life? Look back in your memory for illustrations; I, as you know, am rather the enemy of facts, and it is rarely that I am able to support a theory by a systematic catena of instances and authorities. But, if one had the industry and energy, one might make a most curious history of the dance. Remember the Hebrew dances of religious joy, of ecstasy in its highest form, remember that strange survival of the choristers' dance before the high altar in Spain on certain solemn feasts, a survival which has persisted in spite of the strong Roman influences which make for rigid uniformity. Think of the Greek Menads and Bacchantes, of the Dionysiac chorus in the theatre, of our old English peasants "treading the mazes," and dancing round the maypole, of dances at Breton Pardons, of the fairies, supposed to dance in the forest glade beneath the moon. Why, dancing is as much an expression of the human secret as literature itself, and I expect it is even more ancient; and Harriet and Emily, leaping on the pavement, to that jingling, clattering tune, were merely showing that though they were the children of the slum, and the step-children of the School Board, they were yet human, and partakers of the universal sacrament.

But if you ask, were they conscious of all this, it will be very difficult to give a direct answer. I need hardly say that they could not have put their very real emotion into the terms I have used — nor perhaps into any terms at all — and yet they know the delight of what they do, as much as if they had been initiated in all the mysteries. If someone with the genius of Socrates for propounding searching questions could "corner" Harriet and

Emily, and face and overcome that preliminary, inevitable “garn,” it is possible that he might find that they were fully conscious of the reasons why they danced and delighted in dancing; just as Socrates demonstrated to the slave that he was perfectly acquainted with geometry; but failing a Socrates, and using words in their usual senses, I suppose we must say that they are not conscious. They dance and leap without calculation, as they eat and drink, and as birds sing in springtime; and very much the same answer must be given to the similar question as to literature.

I said that to answer the riddle fully and completely, one would have to make an analysis of human nature; and, in truth, the problem is simply a problem of the consciousness and subconsciousness, and of the action and interaction between the two. I will not be too dogmatic. We are in misty, uncertain and unexplored regions, and it is impossible to chart all the cities and mountains and streams, and fix with the nicety of the ordnance survey their several places on the map — but I am strangely inclined to think that all the quintessence of art is distilled from the subconscious and not from the conscious self; or, in other words, that the artificer seldom or never understands the ends and designs and spirit of the artist. Our literary architects have all, I think, builded better than they knew, and very often, I expect, the draughtsman who sees the triumph and enjoys it in his manner, takes all the credit to himself, and ludicrously imagines that it is his careful drawing and amplification of the sketch, and following the scale, that have created the high and holy house of God. There is a queer instance of what I mean in Dickens’s preface to the later editions of “Pickwick” — I put the book up on a high shelf the other day, and I can’t be bothered getting it down and verifying the quotation — but I believe the author, after telling us that the original design was to give opportunities to the etcher Seymour, goes on to recapitulate, as it were, the achievements of the book, and his list of triumphs is much more amusing than any list in Rabelais. The law of imprisonment for debt has been altered! Fleet Prison has been pulled down! The School-Board is coming! Lawyers’ clerks have nicer manners! Parliamentary elections are a little better, but they might be better still! and one wonders that he does not announce that, in consequence of the publication of “Pickwick,” medical students have given up brandy for barley-water. It is evident, you see, that Dickens thought (or thought that he thought, for it is very difficult to be exact) that his masterpiece of the picaresque, his epitome of Pantagruelism, was written to correct abuses, and looking back, many years after its publication, he congratulates himself that most of these abuses have been corrected, and (one can almost hear him say) ergo, it is a very fine book. He was impelled to write this nonsense of the preface because he was, by comparison, "educated"; Harriet, the dancer, would probably tell you, if you succeeded in penetrating beyond "garn," that she danced because she liked it; but, granting that the poisoning process had been carried out more successfully in the case of Emily, she might, conceivably, reply that she danced "becos it's 'elthy, and Teacher says as 'ow it cirkilates the blood." Emily, you see, obtained the prize for Physiology, as well as for French and the Piano-Forte; she is thus enabled to give "reasons," and they are quite as valuable as the "reasons" of Dickens, explaining the merits of "Pickwick." You know that pompous old fool Forster, who took in Dickens at times, sniffed a little at "Pickwick," and thought the later books, with their ingenious plots, and floods of maudlin tears, and portentous "character-drawing," immense advances, and I suppose the master felt obliged to justify himself for that first enterprise — to show that he had not really been inspired, but had written a useful tract! You remember he "explains" Stiggins; he warns you not to be under any misconceptions, not to suppose that Stiggins satirises a, b, or c, since he is only aimed at x, y, and z. Can you conceive that a mediæval artist in gurgoyles, having perfected for our eternal joy, a splendid grinning creature, lurking on the parapet, and having endowed him, greatly to our oblectation, with the tail of a dragon, the body of a dog, the feet of an eagle, the head of a bull in hysterics, with a Franciscan cowl, by way of finish, should afterwards explain that no offence was intended to Father Ambrose, the prior over the way?

So it seems fairly plain, doesn't it, that in the case of Dickens, at all events, there was no very clear consciousness of what had been achieved, and I believe that you would find the rule hold good with other artists in a greater or less degree. With Dickens it holds in a very high degree, just because there was that tremendous gulf I have so often spoken about between his inward and his outward self; because, with the soul of rare genius, his intelligence lived in those dreary, dusty London streets, because the artificer, even while he carried out the artist's commands, understood very little what he was doing. But one can trace the same working in other cases. Take the case of Mr Hardy, for instance. You remember what I said about his "Two on a Tower"; I praised it for its ecstatic passion, for that revelation of a great rapture, for its symbolism, showing how one must withdraw from the common ways, from the dusty highroad and the swarming street, and go apart into high, lonely places, if one would perceive the high, eternal mysteries. I did not say so in so many words, but you no doubt saw that I was indicating that which is, in my opinion, valuable in Mr Hardy's work, that which makes his books literature. And I am sure he would most decidedly and entirely disagree with me, and if you want to know why I am sure, I refer you to his later books, to his "Tess" and "Jude." You know how the "Tess" was talked about, how it remade the author from the commercial standpoint, simply because it contained, with many beautiful things, many absurd "preachments," much pseudo-philosophy of a kind suited to the intelligence of persons who think that "Robert Elsmere" is literature. If Mr Hardy had been a conscious artist, if he had understood, I mean, what makes the charm and the wonder of "Two on a Tower," he could never have adulterated the tale of "Tess" with a free-thinking tract, he would never have turned "Jude" into a long pamphlet on secondary education for farm labourers, with agnostic notes. It is pathetic in the latter book amidst much weary and futile writing to come across a passage here and there that shows the artist striving for utterance, longing to sing us his incantations, in spite of the preacher, who howls him down. Think of that distant vision of Oxford from the lonely field, of all those clustering roofs and spires, wet with rain, suddenly kindling into glancing, and scintillant fire, at the sunset; and then remember, with what sorrow, that this is but an oasis in a barren land of blundering argument. It is almost as if literature had become "literature" — the "literature of the subject" — and one must only rejoice that the artist still lives even if the enemy has shut him up in prison. You can trace the struggle all through the book: "Sue" was an artistic conception, a very curious but a very beautiful revelation of some strange elements in the nature and in the love of women; but how difficult it is to detect this — the real Sue — underneath the surface, which makes Sue seem the prophetess of the "Woman Question," or whatever the contemporary twaddle on the subject was called. Conceive the "Odyssey" so handled that it seems like a volume in a "technical series" dealing with "Seamanship and Navigation," think what might have happened if the Rabelais who had been put in the dark cell of Fontenay-le-Comte had completely gained the upper hand, and had silenced that other Rabelais — that solitary and rapturous soul who had seen as in a glass the marvellous face of man. Well, the five books of the “Pantagruel” would have conveyed to us, no doubt with some eloquence and vigour, the highly unimportant fact that François Rabelais, runaway Franciscan friar, did not like Franciscan friars; and now that the centuries have gone by we see how (comparatively) worthless such a book as that would have been. Fortunately Pantagruel was too strong for the forces of Panurge and Frère Jean combined, and so they have been able to do little harm to the book.

And how one wishes that it might be so with Mr Hardy! It is not as if he had no “body” for his conceptions; his studies of peasant folk do very well as backgrounds for his dramas, though, of course, his work in this way, good as it is, is not his element of real value. But it is inoffensive always, sometimes amusing, and it might well suffice him in his more material moments, when he feels the necessity of descending from the solitary heights into the pleasant, populous valleys and villages of common life. But his true work is — as it is the work of all artists — the shaping for us of ecstasy by means of symbols; and for him the symbol which he understands is, no doubt, the passion of love, and with it the symbol of red, lonely ploughlands, of deep overshadowed lanes that climb the hills and wander into lands that we know not, of dark woods that hide a secret, of strange, immemorial barrows where one may have communion with the souls of the dead. The passion of love, the passion of the hills — no artist could desire more exquisite or significant symbols than these, nor need he seek for more beautiful forms for the expression of the perfect beauty. And Mr Hardy has chosen to be a pamphleteer, to voice for us our poor, ignorant contemporary chatter: it is as if an angel’s pen were to be occupied in inditing “Society Small Talk!”

But it proves the unconsciousness of Mr Hardy’s art; and here, by the way, I am moved to revert to the case of Rabelais. How far, you may ask, was he conscious of what he was saying, and I see you remember that passage I quoted from the last book — the splendid declaration of the Priestess Bacbuc that “by wine is man made divine.” That passage, and indeed many other passages in the final chapters, would seem to show that the author had worked consciously, and I certainly think the point worth our consideration. You will remember that I stated my rule without bigotry; I rather proposed it as a pious opinion — to the effect that in literature the finest things are not designed. And I confess, that at first sight, this matter of Bacbuc and her allocution looks rather like an exception to the rule, a proof that Rabelais, at all events, understood clearly what he was doing.

Well; it may have been so; for Rabelais was, as I think I have shown, a very exceptional man, whom it would be difficult to place in any class. But I hardly think this is an instance of the proverbial (and fallacious) exception that proves the rule. In the first place I believe that some French editors have grave doubts whether Rabelais wrote the fifth book at all; but I am not inclined to press this point. My point is that the allocution of Bacbuc and all those chapters which describe the Oracle of the Holy Bottle are the last in the book — the last words of the author; and I am in no way concerned to defend the position that an author must always remain unconscious of the work that he has done. As a matter of fact I think that always, or almost always, he is unconscious while he is writing; but I see no reason why the revelation may not come to him afterwards, especially in such a case as the “Pantagruel,” which was the affair of many years — of a lifetime, indeed. In the beginning of production, in the youth, the springtime of artistic work, the creative influence prevails, and this, it seems to me, always or almost always operates secretly; but in later years the critical spirit is apt to assert itself, and this will lead, very naturally, to the artist’s understanding more plainly the nature of his accomplishment. Rabelais had a long, wonderful career; his life was full of incident, of violent breaks, and his books were produced at intervals, and it seems to me very possible that, towards the end, he may have reflected on what he had done, and have understood in part, at all events, the sense of the amazing message that he had delivered. This, I think, is the explanation of the “Holy Bottle” chapters, and you will note that, admirable as criticism, they are inferior as art to those astounding early pages where there is no hint of conscious workmanship, but rather evidence of a man for whom the world has been transformed, who has been visited by an astounding vision. He takes an old, popular story about a giant, he takes the vine that flourishes in his native Chinonnais, he takes the New Learning that seems to him like the New Wine, he takes the gross tale of the farmhouse and the tavern, the rank speech of the people, and with these elements, with these “facts,” he symbolises the revelation that he has received. He writes, he writes on, he writes madly, and every line is written in a fury of delight; but, I think I may say, there is at the moment of writing, no conscious apperception of all that that torrent of words conveys and implies. That may well come later; one may well begin with legend:

"Grandgousier was a good drinker," and end with the interpretation: "All truth and every philosophy is contained in wine"; but I believe that if Rabelais had perceived this at the beginning he would have been not an artist but a philosopher.

Well; if you are content with this comment on Bacbuc, I should like to give you a very curious instance of our own day, in which the unconscious artist has been subdued by the conscious preacher. You remember those very notable books: "Keynotes" and "Discords"? I have not seen them for some time, so I am afraid my criticism will be very loose and general, but I think that the two volumes mark very well the fatal descent from the higher to the lower ground. In the first, it seems to me, there is a somewhat slight, but very genuine, note of ecstasy; I mean that you can collect a certain distinct image of real womanhood — not the laboured, foolish, inane psychology of Mr Meredith and those who work with him — not the analysis of the surface, of the "society" woman, belonging to a particular grade, and a particular period, but of the very woman who remains really the same in all social grades and in all ages. I remember thinking when I read "Keynotes" that it was a "lonely" book; it hinted, I think, a soul apart, and afar from the secondary, tertiary problems of an organised civilisation, and though there was an undertone of "preaching" and arguing, the total impression was curiously and beautifully artistic. I found, if I remember rightly, that subordination of the accidental to the essential that I praised in "Two in a Tower," and I am the more convinced that this is so by my own recollections. I have forgotten all about social conditions, if any such things are indicated; I only think of women and of men, of the true, inalterable human nature; and here, it seems to me, you have a very high achievement. But the next volume "Discords" took distinctly lower ground. The artifice was better, the stories, as stories, were told with more skill and more deftness than anything in "Keynotes"; but there was no more literature; there was only the "literature of the subject." The incidents were no longer symbols of an emotion; they had become the basis of an agitation, concerning which my curiosity never led me to inquire further: and there you see another proof of the unconsciousness of art. If the author of "Keynotes" had understood her achievement "Discords" would never have been written. One might continue the catena almost ad infinitum: would not Wordsworth, supposing him to have been a conscious artist, have rather cut off his right hand than have suffered such a magisterium as the "Ode on Intimations of Immortality” to have the companionship of the enormous mass of futility and stupidity which constitutes the greater part of the “Complete Works”?

Well, there is the evidence that must guide us in answering the question you propounded, and it shows, conclusively enough, I think, that art is not, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, a conscious product. Perhaps it would be a perilous dogmatism, on the other hand, to definitely pronounce it to be unconscious; and I expect we had better take refuge in the subconscious, that convenient name for the transcendental element in human nature. For myself, I like best my old figure of the Shadowy Companion, the invisible attendant who walks all the way beside us, though his feet are in the Other World; and I think that it is he who whispers to us his ineffable secrets, which we clumsily endeavour to set down in mortal language. I think that while the artist works he is conscious of joy and of nothing more; he works beautifully but he could give no rationale of the process, and when he endeavours to explain himself, we are often perplexed by this strange spectacle of a man wholly ignorant of his own creation. Consider again the grotesqueness of that preface to “Pickwick”; it is really as if a great sculptor, congratulated on his achievement, should answer that his Venus was indeed beautiful — because it tended to improve the marble industry and the general knowledge of anatomy.

And after all the conclusion does return to us from other than literary sources. You cannot conceive a builder of the fourteenth century hesitating as to the respective merits of Romanesque, Norman, First and Second Pointed; to him there was only one possible method, and he built, as he spoke, without calculation and without conscious effort, only knowing the joy of his work. So indeed we all speak and live when we are not bound by convention and acquired usages and manners, and you see that art, properly so called, takes its place in the great scheme of things; it is no studied contortion, no strange trick acquired by the late ingenuity of man, but as “natural” (and as supernatural) as the blossoming of a flower, and the singing of the nightingale. Art, indeed, is wholly natural, artifice is more or less acquired, the creature of reason, of experiment, of systematised intelligence. It is doubtful, I suppose, whether the natural, untaught man has of himself, by endowment, any artifice at all; doubtful, perhaps, whether, in the beginning, his artifice was not the product of his art; whether he did not learn to speak with artifice because he had received from nature the art of singing; certainly the child, entering the world, has not the inborn artifice of the swallow and the bee. This artifice, it seems, man has been forced to acquire by slow and painful degrees, and perhaps it only differs from the artifice of animals in that it has been aided and reinforced by imagination, that is by art, that is by the power the human soul possesses of projecting itself into the unknown, and adventuring in the realm of nothingness. Man, I mean, could never have invented the telephone, had he not first created it, had he not conceived the possibility of its existence, when as yet, it was non-existent, and so his artifice will always be progressive, and distinguished from the artifice of animals.

But art is born with man, and is of the essence, the very differentia of man. It is of his very inmost being, and therefore, I suppose, is removed from his consciousness simply because it is within and not from without. You may say that I have been vague, that I have not solved the problem I propounded, that I have not clearly explained whether the Greeks knew what they did when they worshipped Dionysus, whether Rabelais was conscious of an inner meaning in his praise of wine, whether Dickens understood the value of his punch and brandy. But if I have been vague it is because man, in the last analysis, is a tremendous mystery, because he is a complex being, because he is at once Pantagruel, and Panurge, and Frère Jean, because he is both Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. In some cases Pantagruel and Panurge seem to speak a common language, to be able to communicate the one with the other: if Rabelais wrote the "Dive Bouteille" chapters, he certainly understood much of that which he had expressed in symbols. Sometimes the two seem like foreigners in one home, Pantagruel dictates, and Panurge the scribe writes down his words, hardly or not at all comprehending the magic symbols that he expresses. So Dickens ludicrously misinterprets his own "Pickwick." And, doubtless, this understanding of the artificer of the artist varies in an almost infinite chain of nuances: there have been artists, perhaps, who have worked like men under the influence of haschish, who have opened their mouths and prophesied, and then recovering from the possession, have sat up and stared, and asked where they were, and what they had been doing. Indeed, it may be that this was the condition of the working of art in the very dawn of human life, for this, no doubt, is the explanation of that old equation in which bards, magicians, seers, prophets, and madmen ranked all together as men who spoke and worked miracles, things unintelligible to the "common sense," to the understanding which regulates and arranges the affairs of the common life. All these were alike men of the mountains, men who withdrew from the camp, and went apart into high solitary places, into the lonely wilderness, into the forest, and in such retirements and cells they uttered the voices that came to them, speaking words that were unintelligible to themselves.

On the other hand there may have been artists in whom the two persons have been happily reconciled, who have not only the "gift of tongues" but also the gift of the interpretation of tongues. Even these, I think, are always "possessed," ecstatic, rapt from their common nature at the moment of inspiration, but afterwards, when the magic song is done, they awake and return and remember, and understand, in a measure at least, the meaning of their prophecies. They never wholly understand, they are never able to express in rational terms the whole force of the message, for the good reason that the language of the soul infinitely transcends the language of the understanding; because art is, indeed, the sole channel by which the highest and purest truth can reach us. You may, perhaps, succeed in giving a Boer "some notion" of a Greek chorus through the medium of the "Taal," but it would be vain to dream of translating almost perfect beauty into that poor medium, framed for the temporary and corporal necessities of rough and illiterate farmers. And so, however well an artist or those who appreciate his work may "understand" his meaning, they do but "understand" a little; since the tongue of art has many words which have no rendering in the speech of the understanding.

Here, then, is another form of our text which enables us to separate art from artifice, literature from reading matter. Artifice is explicable; you remember that someone has said Thackeray was simply the ordinary clubman plus genius and a style. We must correct his phrases: but if you substitute an "immense talent of observation" for genius, and a "great gift of expression" for style, I think the definition admirable. Thackeray, in short, is the clubman of heightened faculties; he differs not in quiddity but in quality and quantity from his neighbour at the window; he looks more closely than Tom Eaves, and he can give you the result of his inspection in better phrases and with a better system, but he looks at the same things from the same standpoint, and you and I can admire his work and be amused and delighted by it, but we have no sense of miracle, of transcendent vision and achievement. We simply see a man who does the things that we do, but does them with a far greater dexterity: you may watch an acrobat with an immense admiration, but you recognise that you, too, are potentially an acrobat, that with a little training you, too, could hang by the heels, though not with such grace, nor for so long a time.

But art is always miraculous. In its origin, in its working, in its results it is beyond and above explanation, and the artist’s unconsciousness is only one phase of its infinite mysteries.

VI

I AM AFRAID that at our last conversation I rather spoke to you "as if you were a public meeting." Not precisely in that manner, perhaps, since no public meeting that I can imagine would have stood me for a moment, but I fear that I was what is called "high-flown." And yet how can one avoid that reproach? Look here: let us suppose an examination paper, and the following questions set.

1. Explain, in rational terms, the "Quest of the Holy Graal." State whether in your opinion such a vessel ever existed, and if you think it did not, justify your pleasure in reading the account of the search for it.

2. Explain, logically, your delight in colour. State, in terms that Voltaire would have understood, the meaning of the phrase, "the beauty of line."

3. What do you mean by the word "music"? Give the rational explanation of Bach's Fugues, showing them to be as (1) true as Biology and (2) useful as Applied Mechanics.

4. Estimate the value of Westminster Abbey in the Avoirdupois measure.

5. "The light that never was on land or sea." What light?

6. "Faery lands forlorn." Draw a map of the district in question, putting in principal towns, and naming exports.

7. Show that, "heaven lies about us in our infancy" must mean "wholesome maternal influences surround us in our childhood."

You say that is all nonsense? that one cannot express art of any kind in the terms of rationalism? Well, I agree with you that it is nonsense; that the tables of weights and measures give no æsthetic guide to the value of Westminster Abbey; but if we agree on this I am afraid that we must be content to be called high-flown. Having once for all settled that "common sense" has nothing to do with literary art, we must be, I suppose, uncommon, and (apparently) nonsensical if we want to talk about it to any profit. That is what it comes to, after all. If literature be a kind of dignified reporting, in which the reporter is at liberty to invent some incidents and leave out others, and to arrange all in the order that pleases him best; then, let us have as much "common sense" and "rationalism" as you please, and the more the better; but if literature is a mysterious ecstasy, the withdrawal from all common and ordinary conditions — well, I suppose, we had better be mystics when we discuss the subject, and frankly confess that with its first principles logic has nothing to do. I suppose that there are only two parties in the world: the Rationalists and the Mystics, and one's vote on literature goes with one's party. One might leave the matter there, and amiably agree to differ with the other side, but I, personally, have the ferocity to insist, that my side, the mystical, is wholly right, and the other, the rationalist, wholly wrong, and moreover I shall be so indecent as to prove the truth of my position. But, I have done so, and with that "Examination Paper" I just read out to you. For if rationalism be the truth, then all literature, all that both sides agree in thinking the finest literature is simple lunacy, and all the world of the arts must go into the region of mania. Take the lowest, the simplest instance. Here is a knife with a wooden handle, and the handle has certain curious carved designs on it, which do not enable it to be held better. Why is this knife better, more to be valued, than that other knife, which is not decorated at all? It does not cut better; it does not justify its existence and purpose as a knife more than the other; where is its superiority? Because I find pleasure in seeing those designs? But why do I find any pleasure in ornament? What is the rationalistic justification for that pleasure? By logical definition a knife is an instrument for cutting, and nothing else; the plain cuts as well as the ornate; why then are you sorry if you lose the one, while you don't care twopence for the loss of the other? You have at last to answer that you have a joy which you cannot in any way define in the purely decorative pattern; and with that answer the whole system of rationalism topples over. Rationalism may say to you: Either give a definite reason for going to Mass, or leave off going. You have only to answer: Your command is based on the premiss that one should do nothing without being able to give a definite reason for it. But I can give no definite reason for liking — the Odyssey or a curiously carved knife — and yet you confess that I am right in liking these things. Then I have proved the contradictory of your premiss, as you have admitted that there are things that one may do without being able to give a definite reason for doing them: ergo, I shall not neglect the "parson's bell."

Of course, all this is altogether outside of my business; but I confess I am fond of carrying things to their limits. You remember how poor S. T. C. used to talk, humbly and yet proudly, of "my system," though I am afraid "my system," never emerged from the state of fragments and disjecta membra. And I too, though I have only broken morsels and ruinous stones to show for the splendid outlines and indicated arches of Coleridge, still like to follow up an argument whithersoever it will lead me, regardless of consequences; and this, I am sure, should count for righteousness with our friends the rationalists. I love to start a sorites, something as follows: I admire that odd but beautiful little decorative scheme on the seventeenth century chest, and therefore, I think poetry, as poetry, finer than prose, as prose. Hence I approve of "Ritualism" in the service of the church, and from the same premiss I draw the conclusion that Keats was a poet and that Pope was not. Pope not being a poet, it follows that to "intone" is in every way better than to "read" the Liturgy and the Offices, and "reading" the service being wrong, you will easily infer that I dislike Mr Frith's pictures. And after learning that I do not care for the "Derby Day," you will scarcely require my opinion as to the (theoretical) righteousness of the first Reform Bill, and from my attitude towards Lord John Russell's measure, you can, of course, guess my opinion on the respective merits of the French and English languages as literary instruments. And French being vastly inferior to English, it necessarily follows that the English Reformation was a great (though perhaps unavoidable) misfortune. Hence, you see, admiring certain lines cut in an old oaken box, I am led by the strictest logic to dislike the religious policy of Edward VI., with all the other consequences in order; and on the other hand if I saw no sense in that rude ornament I should be an Atheist, or at the mildest, an attendant at Pleasant Sunday Afternoons, with George Eliot for my favourite reading.

Yes, I like my theories to "work through," and I confess that my belief in the truth of "my system" is very much strengthened by the fact that it does "work through," that it seems to me justified by the facts of life. I mean that the premiss which enables me to declare Keats to be a poet and Pope not to be a poet does really enable me to pronounce democracy to be a bad system in theory; and the premiss baldly stated is simply this: that logic does not cover life, or in other words, that life cannot be judged by the rules of logic, of common sense.

But yet I am using logic all the time, you say? Certainly, but I am using it in its right place, to do the work for which it is competent. If I say that a scythe is not exactly the instrument for performing a surgical operation, I am not therefore bound to have my meadow mown with a bistoury? A microscope is good and a telescope is good, but it is the microscope that one uses in bacteriology. You know, don't you, that ever since that unhappy Reformation of ours people have been talking nonsense about the Aristotelian logic, and fumbling, in the most grotesque manner, for some "new" logic. Our great false prophet Bacon (a wretch infinitely more guilty than Hobbes) began it in England with his "Novum Organum"; and if you wish to really estimate "educated" folly, to touch the bottom of the incredible depths to which a man of information may sink, read Macaulay's comparison of the "old" philosophy and the "new" philosophy. The essayist says that the "old" philosophy was no good, because it never led up to the steam-engine and the telegraph post. Isn't it almost humiliating to think that we have to acknowledge ourselves of the same genus as that "brilliant" Macaulay? But if I told you that the Greek Alphabet was no good because it has never grilled a single steak you would probably get uneasy and make for the door, and if you were charitable you would tell the landlady that I ought to be "taken care of." But such a remark as that is no whit more lunatic than Macaulay's "comparison" between philosophy, properly so called, and physical science applied to utilitarian purposes. Well, all the portentous stuff that has been written about logic is nonsense of exactly the same kind. The scholastic logic, people said, won't discover the truth. That is perfectly true, but then the scholastic logic was not intended to discover truth. It will draw conclusions from truths already discovered, from premisses granted, but it wont make premisses any more than a scythe will make grass. And, it is, curiously enough, the very class of people who despise the formal logic, who insist on your giving logical reasons for actions and emotions which are altogether outside the jurisdiction of logic. With one breath they say: Aristotle is useless, because the "Organon" could never have led men to discover the stomach-pump; and with the next breath they ask you what you mean by admiring the "Ode on a Grecian Urn" if you can't give any logical reason for your admiration. Your religion doesn't rest on a logical foundation, they say. But does anything of any consequence rest on a logical foundation? Can you reduce the "Morte d'Arthur" into valid syllogisms in Barbara, can you "disprove" Salisbury

Cathedral by the aid of Celarent. What is the "rational" explanation of our wonder and joy at the vision of the hills? Are a great symphony, the swell and triumph of the organ, the voices of the choristers, to be tested by the process of the understanding? But perhaps I am misjudging the people who ask these questions. When they say that logic does not discover truth, they doubtless mean by logic that formal analysis of the ratiocinative process that is rightly so called; but I am inclined to think that when they condemn religious or artistic emotions because they are "illogical," they mean by "illogical" that which does not conduce to the ease and comfort of the digestive apparatus or the money-making faculty. They are terrible fellows, you know, some of these persons. For example, I asked, with a tone of undue triumph, I am afraid, for the "reason why" we experience awe and delight in the presence of the hills. But in certain quarters my problem would be very quickly solved. I should be told, more in sorrow than in anger, that my emotion at the sight of certain shapes of earth was due to the fact that hill air was highly ozonised, and that the human race had acquired an instinctive pleasure in breathing it, greatly to its digestive profit. And if I tried to turn the tables by declaring that I experienced an equal, though a different delight in the spectacle of a desolate, smoking marsh, where a red sun sinks from a world of shivering reeds, I suppose I should hear that some remote ancestor of mine had found in some such place "pterodactyls plentiful and strong on the wing." And if I like the woods, it was because a monkey sat at the root of my family tree, and if I love an ancient garden it is because I am "second cousin to the worm."

There: I confess it is difficult to keep one's temper with these people, but one must try to do so. Do you remember how Trunnion's marriage was delayed? The bridegroom set out bravely with his retinue for the parish-church, where the bride waited a whole half hour — in vain. A messenger was sent who saw:

"The whole troop disposed in a long field, crossing the road obliquely, and headed by the bridegroom and his friend Hatchway, who finding himself hindered by a hedge from proceeding farther in the same direction, fired a pistol and stood over to the other side, making an obtuse angle with the line of his former course; and the rest of the squadron followed his example, keeping always in the rear of each other like a flight of wild geese.

“Surprised at this strange method of journeying, the messenger came up … and desired he would proceed with more expedition. To this message Mr Trunnion replied, ‘Hark ye, brother, don’t you see we make all possible speed? Go back, and tell those who sent you, that the wind has shifted since we weighed anchor, and that we are obliged to make short trips in tacking, by reason of the narrowness of the channel; and that, as we lie within six points of the wind, they must make some allowance for variation and leeway.’ ‘Lord, sir!’ said the valet, ‘what occasion have you to go zig-zag in that manner? Do but clap spurs to your horses, and ride straight forward, and I’ll engage you shall be at the church porch in less than a quarter of an hour.’ ‘What! right in the wind’s eye?’ answered the commander. ‘Ahey! brother, where did you learn your navigation?’”

You see Commodore Trunnion’s “logic” was perfect, only it was the logic of seamanship and not of riding to church on horseback. There are a good many people at the present day who are quite unable to get to church in time, for “reasons” as valid as Trunnion’s; and when I hear of “the scientific basis of literature” I am always a little reminded of those scarecrows straggling in short tacks from one side of the lane to the other on their way to the wedding. The moral is, you know, that they didn’t get there.

I tackled a materialist once on very similar lines. He began by saying that time and thought devoted to religion (they never see that art and religion stand or fall together, religion being the foundation of the fine arts) were an utter waste of time as they only diverted us from consideration of the present world, which we ought to study to the utmost; and he went on to praise some saying of Confucius on the folly of troubling about the future things. Then I went for him. He had to admit that agriculture is good, and I pointed out to him that England was changed from a savage wilderness into a pleasant garden by the monastic houses. He agreed that to found and endow hospitals and alms-houses was not precisely a waste of time, and I showed him that such institutions were begun by the religion of the past and carried on by the religion of the present. Then he allowed, in response to my Socratic question, that painting was something, and I demonstrated that all painting arose from the religious impulse, that the greatest paintings in the world were meant to adorn churches. Then he admitted the value of architecture, and he got the Parthenon, all the mediæval cathedrals, and the wonderful mound temples of Ceylon right at his head. He granted me that travel civilised, and I rubbed in the pilgrimage; he confessed that he liked to read the Latin and Greek classics — sometimes — and he received from me information as to the monastic scriptorium, and its part in the preservation of the old literature. As for the blessedness of forming one's character on the teaching of Confucius; there happened to be an article in the morning's paper on the Mandarin class! Well, my rationalist hadn't anything to say to it at all, with the exception of some vague remark that the Romans made roads, which, considering the state of England in the sixth century, was about as helpful as the somewhat similar remark of Mr F's. Aunt — that there are milestones on the Dover Road. I told him that the only Roman civilisation which contributed to the making of our country was that brought over by St Austin; and he had to allow that his statement that religion was a waste of time, an elaborate form of idleness, was, to put it mildly, not proven. Then he said kindly but firmly that religion wasn't rational, and I used up most of the arguments that I have used to-night; I mean, I showed him that it is good to paint pictures, to write poems, to devise romances, and to compose symphonies, and that it is also good to meditate and enjoy all these things. Hence, he was forced to admit, that his suppressed premiss had been disproved, and that he must no longer say: "that which is not rational is absurd."

And then, I think, the fun really began. I carried the war into the very camp of the enemy; that is, into actual, observable life, into the every day world of fact and experience. You talk about "reason," I said, and I presume you won't mind if I substitute, occasionally, "common sense" for reason, as I think that in your phraseology the two terms are very fairly equated. Very well, then, don't you think that there is a good deal of common sense in many of the actions of animals? Take the case of the small birds who mob an owl all day, in order that their enemy may be kept awake, and so unable to hoot at night. Take the case of the ants, who milk the aphides, and go slave-hunting. Take the bees, who rise to an emergency, and remedy, with singular contrivance, the threatened lack of a queen. Take the dog, who brought a wounded fellow to the hospital where he had been cured. All these are instances of common sense, aren't they, as rational as the telegram "Sell Cobras at once"? Very good; animals, then, have a plentiful supply of reason, and not of a mere mechanical reason, but of reason that can rise to the height of unforeseen cases, and remedy unexpected evils. When the experimenter tilted the bees' house to one side, so that the equilibrium was in danger, a sufficient number of bees climbed up, and placed themselves on the other side so that they constituted a balance; here there was no mechanism, but a calculated and rational contrivance. Animals, then, have reason and its effect artifice; the adaptation of means to secure ends. But, then, how about instinct? By what motion does the swallow make her nest in spring? Can the bee demonstrate the advantages of the hexagon cell? Does the fly, laying its eggs, here and there, in this or in that according to its kind, in meat or in dung, or in the crevices of a wall, rationally foresee that it is providing for the future grub its only possible food? No; but then animals, even, perform "irrational" actions; though they have common sense they do things which must be troublesome to them, at some instance, which is not common sense. But if a bluebottle lays her eggs in my beef, and knows not why, perhaps I, a man, may sing the Sanctus, and pray that I may be joined cum angelis et archangelis, cum thronis et dominationbus, Cumque omni militiâ cælestis exercitus.

And consider our own human life; the great coups of war, commerce, diplomacy, of all the conduct of life, are often, or usually, the result of "intuitions," that is of irrational and inexplicable mental processes, which elude all analysis. If the knowledge, the successful and triumphant knowledge of men and affairs and strategy were a "rational" product; then, indeed, Carlyle's dictum were true, and each one of us were, at choice, a man of genius in diplomacy, or business, or battle. We know that it is not so, and that no man by taking thought can make himself, say, a Stonewall Jackson. And we have all heard of the "woman's reason"— "I don't know why I am sure that x = a, but I am sure" — and this extremely irrational process often corresponds with the truth. So, I finished up, your "reason" far from being the despot of the world, turns out to be a humble, though useful, deputy-assistant councillor-general, and is by no means a prerogative force, even in affairs of common, everyday existence. Why, "reason," alone and unassisted, won't enable you to make a decent living by selling ribbons and laces, and you have been trying to make me accept its dictation in the highest affairs of the soul. You have been appealing from the King's Majesty in Council to the Magistrates of Little Pedlington in Petty Sessions assembled!

Then my rationalist made a point. You know, he said, that some men seem to have an almost miraculous skill in solving mathematical problems:

would you, therefore, give up teaching the ordinary arithmetic? I was not alarmed; I pointed out that the analogy was not quite perfect. The case, I said, was this. A certain number of "problems" were, confessedly, beyond the jurisdiction of the "ordinary arithmetic" altogether, but offered no difficulties to the "lightning calculator," who obtained results that were demonstratively correct, and I therefore thought it well to trust to him in all problems of a similar character, even though the "ordinary arithmetic," confessedly incompetent, assured me that his answers were wholly unreliable — a case of a schoolboy, well on in Colenso, scouting the Binomial Theorem because one couldn't prove it by Practice or the Rule of Three. I left then, unanswered, and I suppose my friend passed the rest of the evening in showing that Salisbury Cathedral was "opposed" to the facts of Biology, and that Sisters of Charity are to be classed with criminal lunatics.

But, you know, I was the real lunatic. You would not have "argued" with me if I had disparaged the Greek alphabet, because it never grilled a single steak; I hinted the course you would probably have pursued if I had chanced to make such an alarming remark. And why should I argue with the sect of Macaulay, with the tribe which utters such stuff as this:

"Assuredly if the tree which Socrates planted and Plato watered is to be judged of by its flowers and leaves, it is the noblest of trees. But if we take the homely test of Bacon — if we judge the tree by its fruits — our opinion of it may be less favourable. When we sum up the useful truths which we owe to that philosophy, to what do they amount…. But when we look for something more — for something which adds to the comfort or alleviates the calamities of the human race — we are forced to own ourselves disappointed."

No; there is, really, nothing to be said. If the Learned Pig found voice and articulate speech and expressed his scorn of the poet's art, since it added nothing to the pleasures of the wash-tub, we might wonder but we should not argue; and it were idle to contend with a Laughing Jackass, contemptuously amused by the chanting of the cathedral choir.

And, perhaps, you are wondering what all this talk of mine has to do with our main subject — literature? But don't you see that all the while I have merely been reiterating our old conclusions in a new phraseology? I may have appeared to you to be the last of the Cavaliers, gallantly contending for the rights of Holy Church, but, in reality, I have been showing, at every step, that Jane Austen's works are not literature. Yes, but it is so. If the science of life, if philosophy, consisted of a series of mathematical propositions, capable of rational demonstration, then, "Pride and Prejudice" would be the highest pinnacle of the literary art; but if not, but oh! if we, being wondrous, journey through a wonderful world, if all our joys are from above, from the other world where the Shadowy Companion walks, then no mere making of the likeness of the external shape will be our art, no veracious document will be our truth; but to us, initiated, the Symbol will be offered, and we shall take the Sign and adore, beneath the outward and perhaps unlovely accidents, the very Presence and eternal indwelling of God.

We have tracked Ecstasy by many strange paths, in divers strange disguises, but I think that now, and only now, we have discovered its full and perfect definition. For Artifice is of Time, but Art is of Eternity.

APPENDIX

POE WAS NOT altogether right in saying that the object of poetry was Beauty as distinguished from Truth. I don’t for a moment suppose that his meaning was amiss, but I hardly like his expression of it. I should contend, on the other hand, that poetry κατ’ ἐξοχήν, and literature, generally, are the sole media by which the very highest truth can be conveyed. Poe, no doubt, meant to state a proposition which is true and self-evident — that poetry has nothing to do with scientific truth, or facts, or information of any kind, and I say that that proposition is self-evident, because we have already seen that in literature, facts as facts, have no existence at all. They are only “words” in the language of literary art, and are used as symbols of something else. That A. is in love with B. is a “scientific truth,” a fact; but if it be not also a symbol, it has no literary existence whatever; and this of course is what Poe wished to say — literature is not a matter of information.

But I doubt, after all, whether Poe had quite grasped the theory of literature, of all the arts. You remember that he says that he yields to no man in his love of the truth; and unless he meant the highest truth the statement is almost nonsensical. No one, I should imagine, surely not Poe, would express his enthusiasm for facts as facts, would adore correct information in the abstract. You remember what Rossetti said — that he neither knew nor cared whether the sun went round the earth or the earth round the sun — and so far as art is concerned this is, no doubt, the expression of the true faith, which, from what we know of Poe, would be his faith also. We should therefore conclude that by truth he meant philosophical truth, the highest truth, the essential truth as distinguished from the accidental, the universal as distinguished from the particular. Yet in the next breath he contrasts this Truth with Beauty, being clearly under the impression that they were two different things. Of course he was completely mistaken. In the last analysis it is entirely true that “Beauty is Truth and Truth Beauty”: they are one and the same entity seen from different points of view. You will see how this fits in with all we have been saying about literature lately: how we can if we please put our test of literature into yet another phraseology. For instance:

“Vanity Fair” is information, while “Pickwick” is Truth; the one tells you a number of facts about Becky Sharpe and other people, while the other symbolises certain eternal and essential elements in human nature by means of incidents. And, as I said, it is doubtful whether truth in this, its highest and its real significance, can be adequately expressed in any other way. All the profound verities which have been revealed to man have come to him under the guise of myths and symbols — such as the myth of Dionysus — and truth in the form of a mathematical demonstration or a “rational” statement is a contradiction in terms. Yet note the profound vice of language; we are obliged to use the same word to imply things which are separated by an immeasurable gulf. It is “true” that Mrs Stickings sent away Ethelberta to-night (you imparted that interesting fact, and I rely on your testimony), and the “Don Quixote” is “true”: that is, it conveys to us by means of symbols the verities of our own nature.

But Poe had not grasped the essential distinction between literature and “literature.” He thought that poetry alone should be beautiful, or as we should say, ecstatic; he did not see that the qualities which make poetry to be what it is must also be present in prose if it is to be something more than “reading-matter.” Poetry of course is literature in its purest state; it is, as I think I once said, almost the soul without the body; at its highest it is almost pure art unmixed with the alloy of artifice. And to carry on the analysis, the finest form of poetry is necessarily the lyrical. Where you get the element of narrative, you are apt also to get the element of prose; there have to be passages linking the raptures together, and these will, probably or indeed necessarily, run on lower levels.

Of course primitive man had moods in which rapture seemed to embrace everything, to invest every detail of existence with its own singular and inexplicable glory. A meal by the seashore, the dry wood flaming and crackling on the sand, the roasting goat’s flesh, the honey-sweet wine, dark and almost as glorious as the sea itself — a mere dinner of half-savages, one might think it, but it too seems to have its solemnity and its inner meaning. I believe this element in the early poetry has often been noticed; people have wondered at the naïve delight with which the writers describe the work of man’s hands, and they are, I think, inclined to account for it on the ground that then everything was new. This might pass, perhaps, since as you, no doubt, perceive, “everything new” means “everything unknown” (that which is known is no longer new), but I hardly think that the explanation can stand in its present form. I am not at all up in the theories which assign this or that age to the appearance of man on the earth, but I presume that on the gentlest and most antiquated computation man must have long known the world before Homer wrote; so one scarcely sees that human skill and art, the knack of making things and the gift of adorning them, could have been novelties, or in any sense, “things unknown.” I repeat I know nothing or next to nothing about these dates in anthropology, but one has heard something about the neolithic age, and the palæolithic age, about the very early man who scratched the rude likeness of a reindeer on the brute’s own bone, and so there hardly seems room for this theory of novelty. And besides, as we have seen, the rapture is universal or all but universal; it colours the whole of life, including the meal by the seashore; and there, we see, there was no possibility of invention or sense of newness. No; the theory is tempting, and it would fall in perfectly, as I daresay you see, with all that we have concluded about literature, but I really think that it must be definitely abandoned. No; it seems to me that primitive man, Homeric man, mediæval man, man, indeed, almost to our own day when the School Board (and other things) have got hold of him, had such an unconscious but all-pervading, all-influencing conviction that he was a wonderful being, descended of a wonderful ancestry, and surrounded by mysteries of all kinds, that even the smallest details of his life partook of the ruling ecstasy; he was so sure that he was miraculous that it seemed that no part of his life could escape from the miracle, so that to him every meal became a sacrament.

It is the attitude of the primitive man, of the real man, of the child, always and everywhere; it may be briefly summed up in the phrase: things are because they are wonderful. This, of course, is the atmosphere in which poets ought to live, and in which poetry should be produced. Formerly it was natural to all men or almost all; now, perhaps, it has to be regained by a conscious effort; and the difficulty of the effort, the impossibility of sustaining it for long, explain the supremacy of lyrical poetry. If you lived in a world that could regard a common meal as a sacrament, you could be supreme in narrative poetry; but, that atmosphere wanting, we have to be content for the most part with the lyric, with the simple incantation, without any description of the circumstance or occasion.

Yet prose, though it yields in much to the world, must still keep the same ideal before it as poetry. I say, distinctly, that the only essential, defining difference between the two is to be sought in the "numbering" of poetry, in the fact that art, in its intensest raptures, in its most truly "natural" moment, desires and obtains the strictest and most formal laws. It is, I suppose, immaterial what these laws are, rhyme, assonance, accents, feet, alliteration, all testify to the important and essential rule that freedom is chiefly free when it is most bound and bounded by restrictions which we should call artificial, which are, in truth, in the highest sense, natural. And this, I am sure, is the only possible distinction that can be established between such a book as the "Odyssey" and such a book as the "Morte d'Arthur." Neither is "prosaic" in the common sense of the word; each is "poetical"; but the Greek book is poetry because it is numbered, and the English is prose because it lacks number. Of course there are difficult cases; hybrids, as there always are, whatever laws one may lay down.

That word "natural" is another of the many traps that language sets us. I think that its real meaning has become almost reversed. Take the average man to church, and ask him his opinion of the "intoning," and in nine cases out of ten he will say that it may be pretty, but that it is very unnatural. He means, of course, that speaking is natural, and that singing— "numerosity" of tone — is not natural, is, in a word, artificial. He is utterly wrong. It is artificial to speak in the ordinary manner, while the priests' chant, and every chant are purely natural. For the proof of this you have only to read a little — a very little — about primitive, or "natural" peoples, or, more simply, to listen to children at play. You will always find that where convention has not cast out nature, some kind of "sing-song," some sort of chant is the entirely natural utterance of man in his most fervent, that is, his most natural moments. Listen to half-a-dozen children (children, you must remember, are all "primitives" and therefore natural) playing some game, learning their lesson at school. Their voices are pretty sure to fall into a very rude, but a distinctly measured, chant. The Greek drama was intoned, the Koran is intoned, the Welsh preacher of to-day at the impassioned height of eloquence begins to chant, the Persian passion-plays are recited in a sing-song. Nay, but listen only to our great tragic actor. Quite unconsciously, I am sure, he has elaborated for himself a distinctly musical and measured utterance, so that a skilful musician, provided with scored paper, could note

Irving’s delivery of many passages, as if it were music. The Chinese language, I am told, depends largely on the tonal variations which distinguish the meaning of one word from that of another; you will find the same thing in the Norwegian; and the Jewish “cantillation,” which is “sing-song” in a very simple form, bears witness to the truth — that “speaking” is acquired, conventional, and artificial, while “singing” is natural. All this would be perfectly clear in itself, would require no demonstration of any kind, if it were not for the fact that we have, somehow or other, got into the way of making the very impudent assumption that man is only natural when he is doing business on the Stock-Exchange or reading leading-articles. It seems almost too nonsensical an assumption to put into words, but I really do believe that “at the back of our heads” there is a sort of vague, floating idea that there never were any real men at all till the period of the first Reform Bill, and I suppose that before very long Lord John Russell will be pushed back into the region of myth, and the foundation of the School Board will be the era of true humanity. I say, this sounds too ridiculous, but examine yourself and see whether you don’t dimly believe that before the advent of trousers the whole world was really “play-acting,” that existence in the days of laced coats was, in a way, a kind of phantasmagoria, and that a man who wore chain-mail was hardly a man. I believe it really is so, and you will find the same nonsense influencing religious opinion. Take your average Protestant, and I am much mistaken if you do not discover that he believes some grotesque preacher, in his greasy black suit, mouthing platitudes at his conventicle to be somehow more “natural” than the priest, clad in the mystical robes of his office, chanting Mass at the altar. But in literature — why this perversion of the word influences the whole of criticism. Jane Austen, we say, is natural, and Edgar Allan Poe is unnatural, or as it is sometimes expressed, inhuman. Of course, if you wish for the truth, the proposition must be reversed, unless you are willing to believe that a Company Prospectus is, somehow, more natural and more human than, say, Tennyson’s “Fatima.” If you think that the real man is the stomach, there is, of course, an end of the discussion; but then we should have to admit that all the greatest artists of the world were maniacs. But you see clearly, don’t you, that all these questions as to what we shall get for dinner, and whom shall we meet at dinner, and in what order shall we go into dinner, and how shall we behave at dinner, are in no sense natural, since they are all so purely temporary, since they will be answered by one age in a manner that will seem wholly “unnatural” to the next. That, I think, is truly natural which is unchanging, which belongs to men always, at all times, and in all ages. In this sense, ecstasy is natural to man, and it finds expression in the arts, in poetry, in romance, in singing, in melody, in dancing, in painting, in architecture. Many animals have sufficient artifice to shelter themselves from the weather, no animal has architecture, or the art of beauty in building; many animals, or all animals, have the faculty of communicating with one another by means of signs, but man alone has the art of language.

Has it ever struck you while I have been talking of ecstasy in books, that it is nearly always a question of degree, of more or less? I think I indicated as much while I was talking about “Pickwick”; I showed how the ecstatic conception had been alloyed with much baser matter, in other words that there was much in “Pickwick” that was by no means literature. And, I daresay, though I am not sure, that if you were to go through your Meredith you might succeed in finding some passages and sentences which are literature, and for all I know there may be hints of rapture between the lines of “Pride and Prejudice.” Still, we do not call a man poet on the strength of a single line.

But sometimes one is confronted with books which are really very difficult to judge, and this sometimes happens because the ecstasy, the true literary feeling, supposing it to be present, is present not here or there, not in a phrase or in a particular passage, but throughout, in a very weak solution, if one may borrow the phraseology of physical science. We read such books, and are puzzled, feeling that, somehow, they are literature, only we can’t say why, since on the face of it they seem only to be entertaining reading. Do you know that I can conceive many people who would find something of this difficulty in Mark Twain’s “Huckleberry Finn”? Here you have a tale of the rude America of forty or fifty years ago, of a Mississippi village, full of the most ordinary people, of a boy and a negro who “run away.” I don’t think anyone with the slightest perception of literature could read it without experiencing extraordinary delight, but I can imagine many people would be a good deal puzzled to justify the pleasure they had received. The “stuff” of the book is so very common and commonplace, isn’t it, it seems so frankly a rough bit of recollection drawn up from the author’s boyish days with jottings added from the time when he was a pilot on one of the river-boats — it is all so apparently devoid of “literary” feeling that I am sure many a reader must have felt greatly ashamed of his huge enjoyment. To me “Huckleberry Finn” is not a very difficult case. That flight by night down the great unknown, rolling river, between the dim marshy lands and the high “bluffs” of the other shore comes in my mind well under the great “Odyssey” class; it has, indeed, the old, unquenchable joy of wandering into the unknown in a more acute degree than “Pickwick,” which, as we have seen, is to be reckoned under the same heading. In a word it is pure romance, and you will note that the story is told by a boy, and that by this method a larger element of wonder is secured, for even in this absurd age children are allowed to be amazed at the spectacle of the world. In the mouth of a man the tale would necessarily have lost somewhat of its “strangeness,” since partly from affectation, partly from vicious training, partly from the absorption of the “getting-on” process, grown-up people have largely succeeded in quenching the sense of mystery which should be their principal delight. You have only to read the average book of travels to see how this affectation (or perversion of the soul) has deprived the seeing being of his sight. Dip into a book — say a book on China — and you will probably find that Pekin streets are dusty in summer and muddy in winter, and that the author caught cold through imprudent bathing. So it is well for us that Mark Twain put his story in the mouth of an “infant,” who is frankly at liberty to express his sense of the marvels of the world. Later, there is an introduction of the “literary” feeling; those chapters about Jim’s “Evasion” are very Cervantic in their artifice and method, but, to my thinking, they have lost the spirit, though they preserve the body. They are most amusing reading, but they are burlesque and nothing more than burlesque; and from them one can almost imagine what “Don Quixote” would have been if it had been written by a very clever man, by an artificer who was not an artist. But the earlier chapters are wonderfully fine, and I think that it would be difficult to find a more successful rendering of the old “wandering” theme with modern language.

But there is another writer who is much more difficult to account for — I mean Miss Wilkins. I confess I find her tales delightful, and I often read them, but as you know I am not content to rest on my own pleasure in literary criticism. We are no longer talking of the great masterpieces, of the gigantic achievements of such men as Homer, Sophocles, Rabelais, Cervantes; we agreed that when we spoke of these great, enduring miracles of art, it was best to lay aside all question of liking or not liking, of reading often or reading seldom. But when one comes to modern days, to books which have yet to prove their merit by the test of their endurance, it is pardonable if one is sometimes a little confused, if one fails to discriminate at once between the merely interesting and the really artistic. I may be so delighted with a book for reasons that have nothing to do with art, that, by an unconscious trick of the mind, I persuade myself that I am reading literature while there is only reading-matter. And at one time I was inclined to think that I had "confused" Miss Wilkins in this manner. For, on the surface, you have in her books merely village tales of New Englanders, tales often sentimental, often trivial enough, and sometimes, it would seem, of hardly more than local interest. Hardly can one conceive the possibility of any ecstasy in these pleasant stories; for they deal, ostentatiously, with the surface of things, with a breed of Englishmen whose chief pride it was to hide away and smother all those passions and emotions which are the peculiar mark of man as man.

Yet, I believe that I can justify my love of Miss Wilkins's work on a higher ground than that of mere liking. In the first place I agree with Mr T. P. O'Connor, who pointed out very well that the passion does come through the reserve, and occasionally in the most volcanic manner. He selects a scene from "Pembroke," in which the young people play at some dancing game called "Copenhagen," and Mr O'Connor shows that though the boys and girls of Pembroke knew nothing of it, they were really animated by the spirit of the Bacchanals, that the fire and glow of passion, of the youthful ecstasy, burst through all the hard crusts of Calvinism and New England reserve. And we have agreed that if a writer can make passion for us, if he can create the image of the eternal human ecstasy, we have agreed that in such a case the writer is an artist.

But I think that there are other things, more subtle, more delicately hinted things in Miss Wilkins's tales; or rather I should say that they are all pervaded and filled with an emotion, which I can hardly think that the writer has realised. Well, I find it difficult to express exactly what I mean, but I think that the whole impression which one receives from these tales is one of loneliness, of isolation. Compare Miss Wilkins with Jane Austen, the New England stories with "Pride and Prejudice." You might imagine, at first, that in one case as in the other there is a sense of retirement, of separation from the world, that Miss Austen’s heroines are as remote from the great streams and whirlpools of life as any “Jane Field” or Charlotte of Massachusetts. But in reality this is not so. The people in the English novels are in no sense remote; they are merely dull; they cannot be remote, indeed, since they are not human beings at all but merely the representatives of certain superficial manners and tricks of manner which were common in the rural England of ninety years ago. “Remoteness” is an affection of the soul, and wicker-figures, dressed up in the clothes of a period, cannot have any such affections predicated of them; and consequently though Emma or Elizabeth may appear very quaint to us from the contrast between the manners of the ‘tens and the ‘nineties, they cannot be remote. But that does seem to me the quality of those books of Miss Wilkins’s; the people appear to be very far off from the world, to live in an isolated sphere, and each one lives his own life, and dwells apart with his own soul, and in spite of all the trivial chatter and circumstance of the village one feels that each is a human being moved by eminently human affections.

It seems to me that one of the most important functions of literature is to seize the really fine flavours of life and to preserve them, as it were, in permanent form. When we were talking about “Huckleberry Finn,” for example, I remember that I spoke of it as the story of a boy who “runs away.” But what a curious magic there is in these words “runs away.” Doesn’t it, when you come to examine the phrase, exhale the very essence and spirit of romance? Some time ago I reminded you that the essential thing is concealed under all manner of grotesque and unseemly forms, that one can detect a veritable human passion under the cry of the news-boy, shouting, “All the winners!” So I think that phrase, “run away,” carries to us its meaning and significance. For, after all, what did all the heroes of romance do but “run away”? They left the region of the known, the familiar fields or the familiar shores, and adventured out in the great waste of the unexplored, into the forest or upon the sea. Here, perhaps, you have the true interpretation of the phrase “divine discontent,” for surely only that is divine which revolts from the commonness of the common life, which is conscious of things beyond, of better things, of a world which transcends all daily experience. I said once, I think, that the English passion for trading goes very well with the supremacy of English poetry, since poetry and shop-keeping are but different expressions of the one idea; and here again you find confirmation of the theory in that very marked English characteristic — the desire of wandering, of "going on and on" in the manner of a knight errant or a fairy tale hero. Of course, in practice, this really divine impulse is corrupted by all kinds of earthly, secondary motions; and just as the love of a venture which is at the root of trade often or always ends in a very vulgar wish to make money and more money and to set up a brougham and confound the Smiths, so the great joy of exploration, of running away from the mapped and charted land has for its issues the "development of markets," the "progress of civilisation," the profitable sale of poison, and all manner of base and blackguardly manœuvres. But, of course, one expects all this; it is the inevitable mixture of the lower with the higher which characterises all our human ways. Still the higher motive dwells within us — I suspect, indeed, that if it were not for the higher the lower could hardly flourish — and so when you hear that a boy has run away to sea or elsewhere I wish you to think kindly of him as a survival of the most primitive and important human passions. Yes, I think I am right in saying that the lower things of humanity only flourish in consequence of the existence of the higher. Take the French nation, for example. It is infinitely more bent on gain for the mere sake of gain than the English; it is ready to work harder, to give more time, to live more unpleasantly, to eat less and to drink less than the English; and all in the pursuit of money. Rationally, in short, the French should be infinitely better men of business than the English; and yet we know that this is not so, that the English is, par excellence, the business nation. Seriously, I believe, that this is so because the French are money-grubbers and nothing more, because they hate a "risk" of any kind, because they abhor any kind of mercantile venturing into the unknown. In other words, they engage in money-making simply for the sake of making money: they have no joy of the hazard, they will never deserve the title of "merchant adventurers," and, therefore, they remain in truth a nation of shopkeepers and of second-rate shopkeepers. Sir, a man of acute intelligence would, in the seventeenth century, have deduced the future state of French and English commerce, of French and English colonization from a comparison between Shakespeare and Racine. I have no doubt that the Phœnicians were shopkeepers of the French kind, and hence their extinction, their shadowy survival merely in the history of their conquerors.

You think the Roman Empire a formidable objection to my theory, because Roman literature and Roman art show, in general, so little of the imaginative, adventurous faculty? I think the objection is formidable, but I believe that it can be redargued, as Dominie Sampson used to say. The Roman Empire was such a purely military settlement, wasn't it? it was, if one may say so, a garrisoning of the world, not in any way a real colonizing in the Greek and the English sense. And in the second place, do you know that I have grave doubts whether we know very much of the Roman spirit from the Roman literature. How far into the English character would the works of the excellent Dr. Johnson carry us? One hardly finds Chaucer, the Elizabethans, the Cavalier poets, Keats or Wordsworth in "Rasselas" and "The Rambler," and I have always suspected that Latin literature was in a great measure "Johnsonized," periwigged, hidden and perverted by the irresistible flood of Greek culture. It may be a paradox, but I have a very strong conviction that the Missal and the Breviary tell us more about the true Latin character than Cicero and Horace. But we must be thankful that in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries England stood aloof from the continent of Europe, and that when it did borrow it transformed and transmuted so that the original entirely lost its foreign character. I always think that change of Madame de Querouaille into Madam Carewell such a wonderful instance of our nationalism — our transforming force! If it had been otherwise, if we had grovelled before the literature of France or Spain or Italy, as Rome grovelled before the literature of Greece — well, perhaps, English literature would have meant "Chevy Chace" and a few old ballads, and the eighteenth century! I hate the Reformation, but perhaps it saved our literature, simply by isolating the nation.

I claimed, I think, literary merit for Miss Wilkins because her books give out an impression of loneliness. I think that is so, but I should like to point out that "loneliness" is merely another synonym for that one property which makes the difference between real literature and reading-matter. If you look into the French literature of the last two hundred years and complain of its elegant nothingness, of its wholly secondary character, I would point out that it is second-rate because it is the expression, not of the lonely human soul, like a star, dwelling apart, but of society, of the ruelles, of the salon, of polite company, of the café and the boulevard. I am not making an accusation, I am adopting the terms of the eminent M. de Brunetière, who tells us, I think, that French literature is beautiful because it is firstly sociable, and secondly because it is a kind of a long "talk to ladies." I hardly think that I need go into the merits of the question; you and I, I take it, are convinced of the vast immeasurable inferiority of Racine to Shakespeare (with these two names one sums up the whole debate), but I am quite sure that M. de Brunetière has given the true reason of the French literature being on the distinctly low level. It is always Thackeray, it is always Pope, it is always Jane Austen; it is, in our sense of the word, not literature at all, though, to be sure, its artifice is often of the most exquisite description. Of course I do not speak of the ultimate reason — that is to be sought, I presume, in the mental constitution of the nation — but when one reads M. de Brunetière's account of the formation of modern French letters, and notes his insistance on the social element as the chief factor, one may be pretty sure that this social factor is responsible for the pleasant nullities which we all know. You may feel pretty certain, I think, that real literature has always been produced by men who have preserved a certain loneliness of soul, if not of body; the masterpieces are not generated by that pleasant and witty traffic of the drawing-rooms, but by the silence of the eternal hills. Remember; we have settled that literature is the expression of the "standing out," of the withdrawal of the soul, it is the endeavour of every age to return to the first age, to an age, if you like, of savages, when a man crept away to the rocks or to the forests that he might utter, all alone, the secrets of his own soul.

So this is my plea for Miss Wilkins. I think that she has indicated this condition of "ecstasis"; she has painted a society, indeed, but a society in which each man stands apart, responsible only for himself and to himself, conscious only of himself and his God. You will note this, if you read her carefully, you will see how this doctrine of awful, individual loneliness prevails so far that it is carried into the necessary and ordinary transactions of social life, often with results that are very absurd. Many of the people in her stories are so absolutely convinced of their "loneliness," so certain that there are only two persons in the whole universe — each man and his God — that they do not shrink from transgressing and flouting all the social orders and regulations, in spite of their very strong and social instinct drawing them in the opposite direction. You remember the man who vowed that under certain circumstances he would sit on the meeting-house steps every Sunday? He kept his vow — for ten years I think — and he kept it in spite of his profound horror of ridicule, of doing what other people didn’t do, in spite of his own happiness; but he kept it because he realised his “loneliness,” because he saw quite clearly that he must stand or fall by his own word and his own promise, and that the opinions of others could be of no possible importance to him. The instance is ludicrous, even to the verge of farce, and yet I call it a witness to the everlasting truth that, at last, each man must stand or fall alone, and that if he would stand, he must, to a certain extent, live alone with his own soul. It is from this mood of lonely reverie and ecstasy that literature proceeds, and I think that the sense of all this is diffused throughout Miss Wilkins’s New England stories.

You ask me for a new test — or rather for a new expression of the one test — that separates literature from the mass of stuff which is not literature. I will give you a test that will startle you; literature is the expression, through the æsthetic medium of words, of the dogmas of the Catholic Church, and that which in any way is out of harmony with these dogmas is not literature. Yes, it is really so; but not exactly in the sense which you suppose. No literal compliance with Christianity is needed, no, nor even an acquaintance with the doctrines of Christianity. The Greeks, celebrating the festivals of Dionysus, Cervantes recounting the fooleries of Don Quixote, Dickens measuring Mr Pickwick’s glasses of cold punch, Rabelais with his thirsty Pantagruel were all sufficiently Catholic from our point of view, and the cultus of Aphrodite is merely a symbol misunderstood and possibly corrupted, and if you can describe an initiatory dance of savages in the proper manner, I shall call you a good Catholic. You say that “Robert Elsmere” is not literature, and you are perfectly right, but I hope you don’t condemn it because it contains arguments directed against the Catholic Faith? These, from our own standpoint, are simply nothing at all, not reckoning either way. We pass them over, just as we should pass over a passage on quadratic equations pleasantly interpolated by an author into the body of his romance. The conscious opinions of a writer are simply not worth twopence in the court of literature; who cares to enquire into the theology of Keats? But when we find not only the consciousness but also the subconsciousness permeated by the impression that man is a logical, “rationalistic” creature and nothing more, when the total impression of the human being gathered from the book is of a simply demonstrating and demonstrable animal; then, we may be perfectly assured that we have not to deal with literature. It is the subconsciousness, remember, alone that matters; and (to put it again theologically) you will find that books which are not literature proceed from ignorance of the Sacramental System. Thackeray was an unconscious heretic, while George Eliot was a conscious one, but each was ignorant of the meaning of Sacramentalism, and so, making allowance for the fact that the one was a clever man, while the other was a dull, industrious woman, you have from each a view of life that is substantially the same, and entirely false. Each was profoundly convinced that there are milestones on the Dover Road, and each, in his several way, was so intent on the truth of this proposition (and it is a perfectly true one) that the secret of the scenery and the secret of Canterbury Cathedral are altogether to seek in their books. Certainly the gentleman is a delightful companion, and the milestones seem few indeed while we are on the way, while with the other guide we feel like a girls' school, compelled to listen to the "now, young ladies" and the "lessons" which every object on the road suggests. Still, the total view is much the same, the same in genus if not in species, and you may add Flaubert to your companions on the road and you will be in the same case. But read a chapter of "Don Quixote"; you will not be aware of the existence of the milestones, since your gaze is fixed on the mystery of the woods, and you are a pilgrim to the blissful shrine beyond. Don't imagine that you can improve your literary chances by subscribing the Catechism or the Decrees of the Council of Trent. No; I can give you no such short and easy plan for excelling; but I tell you that unless you have assimilated the final dogmas — the eternal truths — upon which those things rest, consciously if you please, but subconsciously of necessity, you can never write literature, however clever and amusing you may be. Think of it, and you will see that from the literary standpoint, Catholic dogma is merely the witness, under a special symbolism, of the enduring facts of human nature and the universe; it is merely the voice which tells us distinctly that man is not the creature of the drawing-room and the Stock Exchange, but a lonely awful soul confronted by the Source of all Souls, and you will realise that to make literature it is necessary to be, at all events, subconsciously Catholic.

Have you noticed how many of the greatest writers, so far from desiring that compliment of "fidelity to life" do their best to get away from life, to make their books, in ordinary phraseology, "unreal?" I do not know whether anybody has compared the facts before or made the only possible inference from them; but you remember how Rabelais professes to derive his book from a little mouldy manuscript, found in a tomb, how Cervantes, beginning in propria persona authoris, breaks off and discovers the true history of "Don Quixote" in the Arabic Manuscript of Cid Hamet Benengeli, how Hawthorne prologises with the custom-house at Salem, and lights, in an old lumber-room, on the documents telling him the history of the "Scarlet Letter." "Pickwick" was a transcript of the "Transactions" or "Papers" of the Pickwick Club, and Tennyson's "Morte D'Arthur" shelters itself, in the same way, behind the personality of an imaginary writer. There is a very profound significance in all this, and you find a trace of the same instinct in the Greek Tragedies where the final scene, the peripeteia, is not shown on the stage, but described by a "messenger." The fact is that the true artist, so far from being the imitator of life, endures some of his severest struggles in endeavouring to get away from life, and until he can do this he knows that his labour is all in vain. It would be amusing to trace all the various devices which have been used to secure this effect of separation, of withdrawal from the common track of common things. I have just pointed out one, the hiding of the author, as it were, behind a mask, and in the Greek Play the analogous talking of what has happened in place of visibly showing it, but there must be many more. From this instinct I imagine arises the historical novel in all its forms, you make your story remote by placing it far back in time, by the exhibition of strange dresses and unfamiliar manners. Or again you may get virtually the same effect by using the remoteness of space, by playing on the theme "far, far away" which really calls up a very similar emotion to that produced by the other theme of "long, long ago," or "once on a time," as the fairy tale has it. Briefly we may say that all "strangeness" of incident, or plot, or style makes for this one end; and of course you see that all this is only the repetition of our old text in another form. It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to give the caution that, on the principle of corruptio optimi, there is nothing more melancholy than the book which has the body of fine literature without the soul, which uses literary methods without understanding. You needn't ask for proofs of that proposition; our memories are aghast with recollections of futile "historical novels," of the terrific school of the "two horsemen," and every Christmas brings its huge budget of those dreadful "boys' books," which carry commonplace to the very ends of the earth, and occasionally penetrate to the stars. And in style, too, what can be more depressing than the style which is meant to be "strange" and is only flatulent? In many cases of course such books as I have alluded to are mere survivals of tradition, conventions of bookmaking which bear witness to the fact that pirates and treasure-hoards were once symbols of wonder, and the extravagancies of style are probably to be accounted for in the same way. At some remote period it may, possibly, have been effective to call the sun, "the glorious orb," and even now some minds may be made to realise the strangeness of great flights of birds by the phrase "the feathered Zingari of the air"; but if one is a little sophisticated one feels the pathos and the futility of such efforts. The writer has felt and experienced the wonder of things — the beauty of the sun and the hieroglyphic mystery of the figures that the birds make in the air — and he feels, quite rightly, that to describe wonders one must suggest wonder by words. Unfortunately, he breaks down at this point, and falls back on unhappy phrases that give the very opposite impression to that which he wishes to excite. Here you have the whole history of "poetic diction." The instinct is in itself an entirely right one, and I need hardly say that the masters — those who have the secret — can use archaic forms, obsolete constructions, conventional phrases even, with miraculous effect. But the beginner would do well to be wary of these things, and to turn his face resolutely away from "flowery meads" and all the family of inversions. How is one to know when such phrases may be used? If I could give you the answer to that question I should be also giving you the secret of making literature, and from all our talks I expect you have gathered this much at all events — that the art of literature, with all the arts, is quite incommunicable. Many kinds of artifice, even, are unteachable — I could not write or be taught to write one of those George Eliot novels that I have been abusing with such hearty good will — but art is by its very definition quite without the jurisdiction of the schools, and the realm of the reasoning process, since art is a miracle, superior to the laws.

I. Protestantism and Preserved Meat — Moral and Political Dignity of the United States of America,

I HAVE BEEN watching for some time past, and with considerable anxiety, the discussion of the so-called “Meat Packing Scandals in America. You, as an earnest Liberal and as a Free Churchman, must have seen the reports to which I allude, for I am sure you agree with me that the rivers of printer’s ink are not the least amongst those which, the Inspired Writer tells us, make glad the City of God. No; you are right; I am far from using the phrase in any of the superstitious senses dear to the mediævalists or pseudo-primitive writers. Holy Writ, as has been well observed, is not only a kernel but a shell, not only an eternal message, but a local and (shall we say?) a temporary pronouncement. The author of these words was, no doubt, thinking of Jerusalem, a city whose largely imaginary glories would not compensate a modern thinker for the lack of the elements of sanitation and of democratic government. The dogmas of the writer were no doubt clearly enough defined — to us, of course, they would be impossible — but we have no reason to suppose that his drains were in the like case. Indeed, it is highly improbable that such things existed in any form at the period in which these words were written, and I need scarcely remind you that the sense of Liberalism and of the Free Churches is not uncertain on the point of Dogma versus Drains. The “City of God” then, as the Inspired Writer viewed it, was, probably, something very different from the City of God to which modern progress is daily approximating; and I need scarcely say that the visions of mediæval dreamers, of men who lived in the heated opium den of Catholicism and Feudalism, are still less likely to image forth the Model City of to-day. The old Hebrew who used the phrase thought of Jerusalem, the centre of Jewish Patriotism, the seat of the Temple with its Holy of Holies, its hidden rites performed by a sacerdotal hierarchy; the writer of the Middle Ages had in his mind some pinnacled and climbing town that rose roof by roof, gable by gable, spire by spire to the vast far-lifted towers of the cathedral, where the idolatrous mass was daily offered: we, wiser far than Jew or Catholic, read the words and think of Manchester or Leeds or Sheffield. Why do you start? You are surely not deluded by what has been called the superstition of antiquity, by the false glamour which a few writers have unfortunately woven about past centuries and forgotten arts? The mediæval city was dirty and insanitary in a high degree, liberty was unknown, cruelty was rampant, a degrading superstition had usurped the place of true religion, Free Churchmen were unheard of. Can such a place as this symbolise to us the City of God? Surely not. Again, I say, Manchester must present a far more appropriate image of that ideal to which creation moves. Flourishing and prosperous, surrounded by the princely mansions of those whom honest toil, business instincts, and enlightened piety have raised to a high place, watered by streams whose refreshing blackness testifies that they no longer minister to the selfish pleasures and the cruel sports of the feudal lord; this, surely, is the true Civitas Dei to which the old Hebrew unconsciously looked forward. The aesthete will tell you Manchester is smoky. It is true that it is veiled, but so was the Temple of Jerusalem. The jets of steam that shoot out from apertures in those sturdy walls whisper to me the names of Cobden and Bright, Cobden and Bright; and these, let me tell you, were truer and holier saints than any that Rome commemorates in her storied calendars. Jerusalem was on a hill; it was aristocratic; Manchester stands on a democratic plain. Walk through her ways, note how street is a facsimile of street and house of house. No proud castle scowls from its sullen battlements on the peaceful citizens, no flaunting spire rises high above every roof denying with each stone the great Evangel of Equality; even Owen's College does not oppress the humble workman with a superhuman (and therefore offensive) sense of beauty. On every side the busy hum of labour; to our ears more solemn than the rolling organ, holier than the sound of the harps in the strange vision of the Jewish fakir which closes our Bibles; more solemn and more holy because every rattle of the improved machinery tells us that some supporter of enlightened policy and Liberal religious organisations is getting richer and richer every moment. Here, indeed, we have the true City of God; and this is the city which, as I observed, is made glad by those inky rivers which flow through the columns of a free press.

And this brings me back to the point from which I set out. I took it for granted that you are a diligent student of the newspaper, and such being the case you must have followed the reports of what are called the Chicago Packing Scandals; and I hope I shall convince you of the very bad effect those reports must have had. I may surprise you by saying that I wish it had been found possible to suppress or at least to minimise the whole affair. I may perhaps surprise you still more by saying that I wish with still greater fervour that a body of representative Free Churchmen could be appointed to regulate in some measure the publication of news and comment that is likely to be harmful to the best interests of the people. The Freedom of the Press! My dear friend, do not let us be slaves either to a phrase or to a false appearance of consistency; do not let us be the slaves of anything or anybody, but "Liberals," Free Men, in deed and word. I agree with you with all my heart in reprobating any system which remotely resembles the censorship of the press and of that free speech which is every Englishman's birthright. Remember that every Free Churchman is a descendant of Milton; I rejoice in it, I make my boast of it all the day long, but remember also that the great Milton, that "mighty-mouthed inventor of harmonies," that prophet who saw the day of the Divorce Court from afar off and was glad; remember, I say, that Milton served a Government — England's noblest Government — that made the recitation of the Prayer Book, the "mass in masquerade," a penal offence. You see, don't you, the wide distinction between the censorship of tyrants and bigots such as Charles and Laud, with their detestable Star Chamber, and the wise restraints of England's great Captain Cromwell? But I am afraid that if you are not quite clear upon this point you must have failed to grasp those basic principles which lie at the root of all true Liberalism and Protestantism. Let us go a little farther back in the past: the ordinary observer sees, perhaps, but little difference between Queen Mary's executions by fire and Queen Elizabeth's executions by tearing tne heart from the living man. But if we are Protestants we know that the former were the monstrous cruelties of devils in human form, while the latter were entirely justifiable punishments. Again, the Liberal knows that the severities of the feudal law in France were the work of fiends, while the so-called massacres in the prisons during the Revolution were a melancholy necessity, and the wholesale executions under what has been called "The Terror" in reality deeds of mercy. I hope I have convinced you of the need of being on your guard against confusing things which are really essentially distinct in spite of surface similarities. Perhaps a more modern instance may be helpful: your blood must often have boiled at the way in which the late government packed the magistracy with Tories. But you surely do not see any resemblance between this most flagitious proceeding and the efforts of the friends of the present administration to ensure that Liberalism shall be efficiently represented on the Bench? Good; then I hope you will not confuse my proposition for a Board of Press Overseers with the tyrannical and abominable system of the censorship.

Besides, we have already the elements of such a system worked in a rough and ready way by the editors themselves. You must have noticed that few Liberal journals devote much space to meetings of Tories and Churchmen, and every effort is very properly made to minimise the importance of such gatherings — a proceeding which, I need not tell you, is entirely different from the boycotting tactics of the Conservative Press. I say, then, that this most salutary system should be extended and regulated; and I do not think that Englishmen need be afraid to entrust the liberties of the press to the hands of a committee chosen from the Free Church Council, seeing that they have virtually already entrusted their whole destinies to the care of the great Evangelical bodies.

This granted, then, I want to shew you what infinite harm might have been avoided if such a committee had been in existence lately, for I cannot doubt that it would have reduced the reports of the so-called scandals of Chicago to a very modest compass — if indeed it allowed any mention of this most unfortunate matter to appear at all. You think these reports were for the general good, that their publication tended to check the poisoning of the public, that the "Trusts" which make vast fortunes by selling indescribable filth as food should be "shown up"? Are you quite sure that you see the direction in which you are tending? Where did these alleged scandals take place? In America. And what is the government of that favoured land? You surely cannot be ignorant of the fact that it is perhaps the only country in existence which enjoys the inestimable blessings of a pure democracy. France, it is true, is Republican; but France is an old country bound by the galling chains of history and tradition, bound still more grievously by the chains of that accursed system of clericalism which, as one of our most respected leaders observed the other day, is indeed "the enemy." In spite of the crowning mercy of the Revolution, in spite of the work accomplished by such heroes as Danton, Marat, Robespierre, one must fear that the past is not altogether blotted from the National Memory; the chimerical glories of knights and nobles and kings still linger, I am afraid, in the minds of the people; those great decorated rubbish-heaps called cathedrals still cumber the land, witnesses to the hypocrisy and superstition and wastefulness of the past; and cunning bigoted priests such as Francis of Sales and Fénélon, with hysterical women of doubtful character like Joan of Arc, still have their deluded votaries. England, certainly, has many blessings — at the present moment her destinies are practically guided by our good friend Dr. Clifford, and a Sunday afternoon in London is always a cheering and a helpful spectacle — but how much of what I have said of France applies to our own country. We, too, have our wretched traditions of kings, and knights, and “saints,” we too have our cathedrals and our churches, survivals from a Reformation that was far too lax in its work, and I am afraid I must add, we have a sovereign who countenances that awful institution called the Turf. No; it is in America alone that one may observe the fine flavour of democracy, untainted, and unalloyed. The great States have no history of rapine, plunder, adultery, and cruelty to dazzle their eyes under the specious name of chivalry. No “kings” or “knights” freed that happy country; but stern men of business with an eye to the main chance. Nay; let us go further back into history: in Mexico and in South America the poor Indian still survives to bear witness to the Popish cruelty which was exercised on his ancestors; but vainly will you seek for the nation of the Massachusetts in the neighbourhood of Boston; the Pilgrim Fathers scorned to use the “devildoms of Spain,” and saw that swift extermination was the greatest mercy to the unhappy race of whose country they had taken possession. The Englishman blushes, unless he is a flunkey, at the “Dieu et Mon Droit” which denies Democracy from the walls of every Police Station. How much nobler were the device: “Simple Bible teaching and the London County Council how much nobler is the American motto: “The Spoils to the Victors.” Ah! there are no murderous Edwards or Henrys, no tyrant Charleses or Jameses on the roll of American Presidents: there you see names like Jackson and Pierce and Buchanan, which make the cheek glow and the heart beat high. They talk of the statesmanship, of the power of kings: what statesmanship, what power can compare with Lincoln’s great action when with a stroke of the pen he transmuted a race of ignorant, incapable, “impossible” negroes into free American citizens with votes to give or to sell, with heads which, though woolly, were as high as the heads of any white man? I know that there is a legend to the effect that the negroes turned the Legislatures into orgies, and ruined the finances of the Southern States for years; but I need scarcely point out that this cannot be true, since if it were so, all men would not be equal — which is absurd, and a proposition which would land us in the inexpressibly grotesque conclusion that there may be something to be said for our House of Lords.

Well, we all know what a great country America is; and we know that it is great because it is at once Protestant and Democratic. It is great because in place of our parasitical Establishment it has a powerful Oil Trust under the control of a professed member of the Baptist Church, it is great because instead of a hereditary monarch it has a President who relies on no ancestral claims or storied pedigree, but on judicious arrangements with the benevolent Trust I have mentioned. It is great because instead of a corrupt House of Lords it has a Senate and a Congress composed entirely of professional politicians whose incomes depend on the acuteness of their business instincts; it is great because it produces a larger proportion of lunatics than any country on earth; and if you have read your Wendell Holmes you will remember that a high lunacy rate is an unfailing test of a country's intellectual supremacy. You are right; all Protestant countries shew their mental superiority to Popery in this striking and convincing manner. And what a moral dignity the Americans have! You remember how the whole land rose in its righteous indignation over the long martyrdom of the unhappy Cubans. There was no counting of the cost, no dread of the haughty power of Spain; it was enough for America that the Cuban rebels were not given exactly what they wanted, and at such devilish cruelty as this the heart of the States grew hot. What do you say of the Filipinos? Don't you know that they had groaned for centuries under the hideous Spanish yoke, and that America set them free? My dear friend, if you doubt such a proposition as that, you will end by doubting that every monastery communicated by a secret passage with a nunnery, you will deny the well-known fact that in these nunneries the walling-up of live nuns was a part of the daily routine of the establishment, you will hesitate to say that every confessor is a monster of cunning and debauchery. Do you know or do you not know that the San Francisco earthquake and the Tory Press are alike the work of the Jesuits; whose motto is, as you are aware, "the end justifies the means"? Well, that being so, I repeat that America freed the Filipinos from Spanish tyranny. They didn't want to be free after the American pattern of freedom? So much the worse for them. What they want is not of the slightest consequence to anybody. Haven't you seen it laid down by a consensus of Liberal journalists and politicians that the Chinese coolies in South Africa are miserable slaves who pant for freedom? It is true that the coolies themselves decline to be free; but that, as you will have seen, does not affect the question in the least. So, if the Filipinos, as you say, object to be free citizens of the greatest country in the world, they must be convinced of their error by such methods of suasion as are available. But I do not believe for a moment in the report that the American soldiers tortured their prisoners; and if large quantities of water were poured down the throats of these misguided persons with the very laudable object of gaining important information, I am sure that the water in question was of very superior quality to any fluid used in a somewhat similar manner in the dungeons of the accursed Inquisition. In fact you may depend upon it that the Inquisitors never employed anything so innocent as water in their devilries. The great Temperance Movement has never flourished (how could it?) under the Upas Tree of Romanism, and I should not be surprised to hear that many a martyr's torments were aggravated by the diabolical refinement of compelling him to swallow enormous quantities of the best sherry.

But we were considering the moral dignity of the United States of America. I don't think there is anything grander in history than the American People rebuking Russia for its cruel treatment of the Jews. Let me tell you there is no common or customary greatness here. You have doubtless read the very interesting accounts of the summary executions of negroes in the Southern States— "lynchings" I think they are called in the purer, more vivid English of the Great Republic. Well, I have no doubt that these summary executions are a necessity, though perhaps a painful one. Indeed, they must be both necessary and justifiable, for they are the will of the people. You know the adage: Vox populi vox Dei, you know as well as I do that the People are always right. It is for that reason that we are Liberals, that we base all our principles upon the absolute, eternal, infallible supremacy of the people's will. Ergo, as the old logicians say, if the people of America choose to burn negroes alive with what some would call refinements of slow and lingering torment: then the people of America must be right in doing so. But mark: while the left hand, as it were, of this great nation dribbles a little more kerosene on the slowly carbonizing form of its free and equal (but coloured) citizen, the other, raised aloft in all the awfulness of intense moral dignity rebukes the cruelties of guilty Russia and takes the poor hunted Jew under the protecting folds of the banner of the Great Republic! Am I not right? Is not such a picture unique in the world's history?

The Higher Criticism teaches us that the collection known popularly as "Isaiah" was in reality written by fifty-two persons of the same name, who all prophesied many years after the event. But could the whole fifty-two, with the assistance of "Ezekiel" and "Jeremiah," ever have reached such a splendid height of denunciation as that to which I have drawn your attention?

I do not know whether I need elaborate the greatness of this splendid Democracy. You know what the marriage law of America is like: there are variations, of course, in the different States, and I am told that in one commonwealth divorce is as restricted as the cunning priests would have it in England. Still, in most States the law stands as though Milton had framed it. The good sense, the inspiration rather, of the people has triumphed, and vice has shrunk back affrighted to her accustomed haunts of clericalism and reaction: for who would be a libertine in a land where a divorce is as easily obtainable as a dog license, who would risk the shame, the moral degradation, the expense of keeping a mistress when all the worldly advantages of such a course can be obtained by going through a holy and harmless ceremony? You understand now the moral altitude of every American; you comprehend the height from which the citizen of New York and of San Francisco looks down on the deplorable corruption of our effete aristocracy. The fellow-countrymen of Tweed and Oakey Hall carry their own moral atmosphere with them; they would perish else when they condescend to visit the gilded infection of our House of Lords.

Yes! America is Democracy triumphant; the goal to which we are pressing here, the ideal towards which all noble hearts are striving. But — how long can we proclaim the glad tidings of liberty if the offensive and doubtless exaggerated details to which I have alluded are made public in the press? You and I are staunch, I know; I am sure that there is not a member of the Free Church Council who would not see his Dr. Stiggins: ib friends eating ordure, poisoned rat, preserved Lithuanian packer, spittle, diseased meat, and noxious chemicals gladly, joyfully, thankfully; knowing, as he would know, that Protestantism was making a handsome profit, that the Eagles of the Great Republic were laughing consumedly. Yes, yes; the Free Churches have always been on the side of Free Trade, and I am sure that they always will be. Cobden and Bright did not live and work in vain, and so long as a mixture of glucose and vitriol is called beer, while tallow and beastliness in general is sold as butter, while thousands of superfluous babies fall yearly victims to interesting and complicated chemical formulae disguised as milk, while gangrened sausages shew the way to glory (and a pretty profit) — so long shall their names be "freshly remembered" in flowing bowls of substitutes. "Adulteration is a form of competition": the man who denies that great axiom is certainly a Tory, and probably a Churchman or a Romanist. Those were the words of honest John Bright; and so long as England emblazons them on her banner all will be well 'with her.

But how about the thoughtless masses? Have they the self-sacrifice, the moral strength, the confidence in Liberal principles that are requisite in such a crisis? Can we not imagine them declaring that if democracy implies the poisoning and adulteration of every conceivable article of food and drink they would rather be without democracy? Here, they may say, is a great free nation, a great commonwealth of sovereign citizens; without king or lords or Established Church; a government for the people, by the people, through the people. And the result seems to be that the sovereign citizens in question have to feed on dung, poisoned rat, and tuberculous cow; while the representatives of the sovereign citizens aforesaid grow rich on the bribes administered by the purveyors of these delicacies. Cannot you see the deplorable results that may follow from this specious though fallacious reasoning? I am older than you, and I have learned to dread the devilish strength of the forces of reaction. Believe me, the enemy is always on the alert; there are not wanting those who have read the annals of Popery and Tyranny with, I am afraid, no honest aims. In the bad old days, in the ages described so justly as dark, they tell us that adulteration was a crime, that "making a corner" was a felony, that our worthy friends in Chicago would certainly have been hanged to the nearest tree. Ah, I see you shudder, and you do well; but have you forgotten the fleshpots of Egypt, after which some writer (who lived many centuries after the probably mythical Moses), tells us the children of Israel lusted? Believe me, the old Hebrew Book has not lost its freshness; here in England, as in some possible desert which could not have been near Sinai, we have many who are willing and ready to lust after the fleshpots, to clamour for beef which is not tuberculous, to scorn the poisoned but spicy rat, to murmur against fragments of their brother men appearing on the breakfast table under the comely disguise of chicken and tongue. The fleshpots of Egypt! Yes, my friend, even though the Higher Criticism should inform us that Egypt in the traditional sense never existed, that the Red Sea is a forgery of P1 J2 L* and P6, that Moses was either a Stone Pillar or the Midnight Sky (all of which conclusions seem to me, I confess, infinitely nobler than the traditional view): even then how true the moral remains. Yes; now, as then, the people are a stiff-necked generation, ready, as ever, to place their carnal appetites above their eternal gain. The so-called Israelites in the old fable wearied of the Heavenly Manna, and forgot the Promised Land: and so the mob to day may weary of the gifts of Packingtown: formaldehyde has ceased, they may say, to charm our palates, glucose is sweet for us no longer, oil of vitriol and gangrened pork will not serve our dainty and luxurious taste, we are weary of the dung of rats. We should like healthy beef, not potted Scandinavian, we want real milk in our tea, we wish for beer with our dinner, not chemical reactions, we are anhungered for pork which is not green with gangrene — in a word, for the flesh-pots of Egypt. And at last they may declare that if Chicago and its products are the results of Liberalism and Protestantism then they would rather not be Protestants or Liberals!

Ah! that old writer who could not have been Moses knew the human heart; knew the terrible appeal of fleshly lusts. Before the eyes of the wandering tribesmen the tempter dangled the Egyptian feasts: can we be sure that he will not repeat his infernal artifice in our day? There are prophets of Baal who are only too ready to insinuate their praises of old English beef and beer, home-grown and home-brewed (the vile Protectionists!) who dispute the well-known fact that in the Dark Ages the people were cowed, half-starved slaves by their stories of yeomen who fought at Crécy, Poitiers, and Agincourt (trust me the Devil never lacks an argument); who fill foolish ears with mischievous fables of some imagined time when honey was made by the bee, butter of milk, and bread of wheat. Nay, some of them go further still, and picture to their dupes, say, the Spanish peasant living in content on the produce of his garden, drinking the light red wine from his own vineyard; indifferent to the mineral wealth of his country, not anxious to live in Manchester, careless as to doing business, happy in an atmosphere almost devoid of sulphur and carbonic acid gas, unwilling to be a Baptist, not clamouring for tinned products, crossing himself when he passes the village crucifix — sunken, in fact, in every conceivable degradation, as you and I know. Yes, there are men who are willing to compare this poor unhappy wretch with the blest denizens of Chicago, who dare to dispute the glories of democracy; and who shall say whether such insidious arguments as these may not prevail?

And now, I think, I have made you understand my regret at the publication of these deplorable details. I am convinced that this so-called scandal is the work of the forces of reaction; I suspect a conspiracy between the Jesuits and the English Church Union. I demand the immediate passing of two short Acts — one to make it a penal offence to manufacture or to sell any pure article of food or drink, the other for the humanising and liberalising of all churches and cathedrals belonging to the Anglican and Romanist denominations — half of them to become places of meeting for the Free Churches, the other half to be converted into miniature Packingtowns. Dr. Clifford shall preach in St. Paul’s Cathedral, and rivers of putrid lard shall make glad the idolatrous pile at Westminster.

II. History must go — A little Christian’s thoughts of Heaven.

HAVE YOU REALISED, do you think, the full extent to which we poison the streams at the very fountain-heads? Listen to this: —

“The history of England has been too often written in the ‘drum and trumpet style,’ and that of the English people too much neglected. Numberless books have been written, and the imagination racked to idealise in visionary style the doubtful deeds of a class who were quite apart from the real life of the nation. Romanticists deal with episodes in the careers of that class, adopt artificial standards of virtue and morals, and by their genius cast a glamour of greatness and nobility over deeds which, judged by a righteous standard, are little short of ruffianism.”

Excellent, you say, but again I ask, do you quite see where these admirable sentiments should lead you? It is easy enough to say that history should be recast, that it has been too long in the hands of the Tories and the Churchmen; but the question arises, how is this to be done? Consider the origins of our history.

Were the early Britons Protestants? Truth forces us to declare that they were Pagans, and not merely Pagans but subject to that most revolting of all influences, a sacerdotal caste — the famous or infamous Druids. Little, I believe, is known of this priestly order; still there is enough for our purpose. We know that it was not permissible for any Briton without education, without training, without authority to rise and proclaim himself as good a Druid as any of those beings who celebrated their mysterious rites in the groves of Mona; we know that the priests kept education in their own hands and exacted elaborate trials from their neophytes; we know that the practice of human sacrifice was only too common. What is all this system but the Church of England in an undeveloped state, exacting its tale of infant souls to be bound up and sacrificed in the rigid framework of dogma, proud of its pompous ordinations, arrogant in repelling the claims of better men to the full privileges of the Gospel. Look again to the organisation of the State; what do we hear but stories of chieftains and princely families, of Caractacus and Boadicea? Why is there nothing said of Caractacus's cook? Why is history silent as to Boadicea's lady's maid? Always the same story; the people are neglected; and when Britain was invaded, have we a list of the private soldiers' names? No, indeed, this island was invaded by Julius Caesar, as if the patient legionaries were nothing — and so the story goes on; a roll of so-called "great men," while the mass of the people is forgotten and despised. I declare to you that the reading of history makes my blood boil: century after century tells the same story, in sickening monotony illustrious name follows illustrious name on the slavish page, saint and hero, king and poet and knight, in an endless repetition, till one is forced to cry out in indignant remonstrance, to ask the historian whether he has forgotten that the English People ever existed.

Yet this is the farrago that we teach our children, this is the food on which we expect to rear good Free Churchmen and Liberals. Only the other day my little boy came home from school, as I could see, in a state of perplexity and distress. At first I was inclined to think that the master (who I believe to be a Jesuit in disguise), had been revolting the child's mind with the fetichism of Infant Baptism, or with some such degrading dogma, but I found that I was mistaken. The child had been learning about the Norman Conquest, and as he told me the story he burst into tears, and said at last: "But, papa, why didn't the County Council pass a resolution forbidding that bad man to conquer England? and was Mr. John Burns away for his holiday when they did it?" What could I say to the poor boy? I have brought him up in the belief that the County Council, the Free Churches, and John Burns have made England what it is, and was I to try his childish faith by confessing that none of these was in existence in the year 1066? I do not know whether I was right or wrong, but, right or wrong, I told him that the Norman Conquest was the result of the Tories being in office, and with that answer he was content.

But you see my point: the whole trend of history is absolutely undemocratic; it falsifies modern and enlightened principles on every page and in every chapter. The tendency of modern thought goes to show that the people are everything. To them the wisdom of the nation has given the supreme power; from them, we believe, all inspiration in things political and ecclesiastical proceeds. We scoff, and we scoff rightly, at the old aristocratic-sacerdotal idea that all good gifts are from above, that the universe is a hierarchy, an ordered system of graded functions and powers, in which there are varied excellencies and functions, one star exceeding another star in glory, the oak having one splendour, the daisy another. On the contrary: we affirm that all good gifts are from below, we say that wisdom is to be found in great masses of people after due preparation by political agencies, that the ministerial functions are delegated by the populace. With all due reverence, we decline to consider the lilies; we prefer to consider the cabbages and the Spanish onions. Lilies are picturesque? I daresay they are; some people have found the monarchy and the papacy picturesque; but have these things benefited the people? We refuse then this analogy in to to, as we used to say at college; we declare that daisies make excellent timber, that the blossom of the potato surpasses the proudest blooms in aristocratic gardens, that the oak is a shameless and useless consumer of the soil. Yes; but with what heart can we go on preaching these truths while at the same time we allow our children to read the so-called History of England, which diametrically opposes every one of these conclusions? We might bear to read of the conquest of England, if it were described as an irresistible popular movement; how can we honestly teach our children that this fair land was subdued by William the Conqueror?

You ask my remedy. It is a simple one enough: I would abolish history. Nay; why do you start? Is the world always to be the slave of the past? Is generation after generation to be bound fast in the swaddling bands of antiquity? There was a worthy Puritan in the seventeenth century who proposed that the new order should be consolidated by the burning of all the records of England, and I heartily wish that this most sensible suggestion had been carried out. I confess I grind my teeth when I pass the Record Office; for what is it but a great storehouse of evil precedents; an armoury from which the enemy draws arguments to support his infamous and absurd conclusions. A Romanist Cardinal once said that the appeal to history was treason to the church; I say it is treason to the people and the people’s cause. We know that all Kings were remorseless tyrants; the antiquary with his wretched parchments proves many of them to have been eminently human beings, brave, courteous, and wise. We know that the Church is and always has been a conspiracy against the human race; “we are confronted with documents shewing how the Church fed the hungry and clothed the naked. Nay; the minds of the people are poisoned from the same source with tales of old time merriment, of kindly traffic between rich and poor, of days when there were more spires than factory chimneys, of charity given with love and received without shame. *

I say, once for all, in the words of our classical professor, Delenda est Carthago — history must be abolished. After all, our part is in the future, is it not? We are not placed in this world to delve in the graves of the past, that our minds may be enslaved by ghosts of the bad old days that are gone for ever, that in poring over the inflated records of an imaginary chivalry we may forget our Burns and our Bannerman, our Clifford and our Macnamara. Let us take example by our brothers across the ocean, who have given the world such a wonderful lesson in progress and virtue. The American child's lessons in history are simple enough; he is briefly taught that all Kings are bad, that all aristocrats are bad, that all priests are bad; that the dawn of the world's true history begins with the Declaration of Independence, and that the Kingdom of Heaven is a picturesque way of alluding to the United States. See that great nation freed from all the toils of tradition, from all the bigotry and tyranny of the past; and consider what we should be if we could escape in like manner from our dismal roll of conquests and victories, of battles and pageants, of kings and warriors, of saints and bishops. Soon, I hope, we shall have done a great deal; we shall have substituted for the unintelligible utterances of an obsolete dogmatism called creeds the simpler, more human profession of:— "I believe in the County Council Syllabus"; but how much more remains to be accomplished. Let us, I say, shut up the poisonous wells, let the springs of history be condemned, let us begin our textbooks with the simple sentence:— "Once upon a time there was a very good man named Campbell-Bannerman."

And why should not this system be carried right through the books we give our children. I can remember an old geography book from which I learned the lesson that all Protestant countries were prosperous and that all Popish ones were poor, shewing that Protestantism is true Christianity, since Protestants have naturally inherited all the blessings pronounced on the very rich in the New Testament. Thus we children were shewn how everywhere Protestants had overcome the world in accordance with the Gospel precept, and I remember my good mother telling me that Romanists never had anything better to eat than frogs or potatoes. Surely there is a good deal to be said for such a system of education as this; surely it ought to be the basis of all our education if England is to maintain that Protestant character which has made the nation what it is. We know (for Miss Corelli has told us) that a great conspiracy is on' foot, that Romish gold is being lavished throughout the country, that most of the parsons are in direct correspondence with the Vatican. Indeed, it is impossible for the most casual observer to avoid the impression that mischief is in the air; as one passes along the streets one sees church doors open on every side, the mutter of the confessional sounds like the hiss of some venomous snake through the wholesome turmoil of business, and only the other day a friend of mine pointed out to me that a piano-organ in the street was playing a Popish anthem called Gloria in excelsis. Are we not to strike a blow for our homes and hearths? Are the men of England asleep? Unless we are beware we shall wake up too late, and find the monasteries have replaced factories, that the brave glow of the blast-furnace has given way to the infernal fires of the Inquisition.

I ask, then, for a scheme of education permeated by Protestantism. A little child was once asked why John was such a good man, and the answer came swiftly: "Because he was a Baptist." That is the right spirit, and I want to see it diffused through all that we teach our children. I want the children to grow up with the love of the healthier England of to-day; I would sternly restrain the teachers who proposed to bewilder those infant minds with the catalogue of crimes and villainies which masquerade as history. It may be necessary for them to learn these things, when they are older; when in the poet's words "shadows of the penitentiary" close around them; it is, unfortunately, necessary that we should make ourselves acquainted with many forms of evil as we descend through the vale of life. But why should we perplex and distress these tender little souls with the "deeds which are little short of ruffianism" — to use the words of the author I quoted a little while ago? We do not teach the little ones the story of Charles Peace or of Sixteen-String Jack, we do not force them to acquire the technique of coining or of forgery, and I have yet to learn that the Newgate Calendar is an indispensable volume in our Sunday School Libraries. Then why should we insist on these little vessels being defiled with tales which are even more flagitious and disgraceful to our common humanity? Why should books be placed within reach of the young which can only minister poison? Why should their minds, at the most impressionable age, be forced to batten on such horrors as Crécy, Poitiers, Agincourt, Trafalgar and Waterloo, on the (probably imaginary) achievements of the Black Prince and the Duke of Wellington? Why should we stain their imaginations with accounts of the landing of Augustine and his gang of idolatrous monks? You talk of the love of country; we know only too well what a chapter of iniquities that phrase covers, and for my part I heartily wish that the phrase and all that it implies could be forgotten. It may be necessary, as I say, that, later on, they should acquire some knowledge of these things; some wise and tender friend, perhaps the mother, may break to them by degrees the orgie of abominations, the roll of shame which we call the history of England. Then, with but little danger, they may learn how their misguided and brutal forefathers fought and died for their country, how they drank pure beer and ate beef all the year round, how they were plunged in darkness, superstition, and ignorance till the "Gospel light first shone from Boleyn's eyes," as someone beautifully expresses it. Then they may be informed of the terrible fact that there were no Free Churches in the Dark Ages — no Free Churches, no processions of unemployed, no workhouses, no East End, no submerged tenth, no margarine, no great factories, none of the things that make us so happy in these better days that we live in. Then they may hear — and I am sure they will hear with horror — that there are things called bishops still suffered to pollute the air, that in every parish a sham-priest still hides his head from the scorn of honest men — but with the poison will come the antidote, for they will be old enough to understand that the darkness of the Dark Ages was due to the absence of all the blessings I have enumerated; their principles will have been firmly established, and they will be fired with a holy zeal to complete the good work that has been so well begun.

But let them not be taught all this while they are young; not while they are lisping at their mothers' knees their little hymns, their undenominational prayers, their simple Bible teaching about "a good man who lived long ago." No; I would have all children taught as I have taught mine. The past with all its horrors is veiled from their eyes; they know that God loves them and that the County Council cares for them; that though Earth hath many a noble city Battersea doth all excel; and last but not least they know that Mr. John Burns is always near them. For them these simple streets about us are all the world, and though I have heard Lavender Dale called monotonous I am sure it is not so to them. The architecture of the Baptist Church to which my ministry is given represents to them the last word of beauty in building; its combination of cast-iron tracery, classic columns in stucco, and fancy design in vari-coloured bricks will always remain in their minds as a vision of celestial loveliness. Last Sunday I had been telling the little ones about Heaven, and after the lesson my boy Albert came up to me with his eyes brimming over with tears, and his lip trembling. I asked the little man what was the matter. “Oh, father,’ he sobbed, “I’ve been thinking of what you told us, and I’m sure I know what heaven will be really like.” I was a good deal touched, and patting the brave little fellow on the head, I answered: “Are you, my son? Will you tell father about it?” Gulping down his tears, he replied: “I think it will be like Battersea Park, only ever so much larger. And there won’t be any games at all going on, and all the gentlemen and ladies, and little boys and girls will be dressed like they are on Sunday. The gentlemen will all be in such beautiful shiny black clothes, with bright silk hats and white shirts, every one of them, and the young ones will have fair moustaches and small chins and bright blue silk ties, and all the old gentlemen will have white beards like fringes all round their throats, and every one will have a Bible in one hand and an umbrella in the other, though the sun will shine just as it did at Clacton when we went on the Sunday School excursion last summer. And the ladies will be in lovely dresses like mother’s best; red and blue and green, all new, like the parlour curtains, with large roses in their hats, and all the little boys and girls will be in velveteen and lace. And the flowers in the beds will be ever so much larger than they are now; there will be geraniums as big as breakfast cups, and double dahlias bigger than my hat, and all sorts of flowers, as bright as they were at the Wesleyan Flower Show at Clapham Rise, and much brighter than any of the flowers that the bad rich people have in their horrid hothouses. And Gawd will sit on a great white throne in the middle, almost as fine as the Albert Memorial that I saw when you took us to Hyde Park, and Dr. Clifford will tell everybody how bad the Tories were, and Mr. John Burns will talk about the House of Lords, and everybody will be so happy that they will say ‘cheers,* and ‘laughter,* and 4 hear, hear’ for ever and ever. There won’t be any bishops or priests or popes there, because they are all burning in the bad place, and very bad people like Father Damien you told me about when I was naughty will be burnt worse than anybody, because they tried to deceive the good people, only the nice, good Presbyterian minister found him out. There will be thousands and thousands of angels, like ladies in nightgowns, with very large wings, flying about everywhere as if they were so happy they didn't know what to do; but they will talk a good deal to the ministers, who will all be there. And there will be ever so many harmoniums, and American organs, all playing beautiful hymns, and the little children will give services of song in a large beautiful building just like our church; all about the Kings of Israel and Judah and the Hittites and the Hivites and the Amorites, which will make people feel very good. Then some very nice gentlemen from America will come in and say they come from God's own country, which is almost as good as heaven, and all the angels and the ministers will sing the Glory Song, and then everybody will have tea, with lots of jam."

Do you know that I could scarcely answer my little son? I do not know whether it is a father's partiality, but it seemed to me that in these few simple words, bubbling up from the child's heart, there was more spiritual truth than in all the works of foreign Romanist poets whom it seems the fashion to praise nowadays. I have looked into the works of Dante — you know the book to which I allude — a book oddly, and I cannot but think irreverently, entitled the Divine Comedy. The title, with its theatrical associations, could not fail to jar upon me, as you may imagine, but when I came to examine the work itself I confess I was astonished that such a book should be so openly and widely circulated. You have heard my little son's vision — for so I dare to call it — and you must have been struck, I think, by the total absence of dogma, of that passion for definition which has been the plague of Christianity in the past, and is so still. God sits on a great throne, good men inculcate the duties of citizenship, all raise the voice of praise to the accompaniment of rare and exquisite music, there are services which delight the emotions and instil a knowledge of Bible History. Nay, the picture may be in a sense fanciful, it may not in all respects correspond to the latest conclusions of philosophical thought; but at all events there are no creeds here, no cramping, disturbing dogmas, no pseudo-scientific "theology," no arrogant assumption of authority. And, after all, criticism apart, the English Sunday that our good Puritan ancestors won for us is, to my mind at all events, no bad symbol of that heavenly home for which we are all bound. A child may do much worse than think of heaven as an eternal Pleasant Sunday Afternoon. This, then, I say is the result of the teaching that I would give to the little ones; you will notice that there is no thought of kings or saints or heroes in the child’s mind, no pompous cathedral stuns and dwarfs his imagination, popes and priests are present only as vague embodiments of evil, destined to final punishment; he thinks of the good people about him, of the simple music he has heard Sunday after Sunday, of the eloquent discourses of which I have told him, and thus forms a picture which for all I know, is as “inspired” as the vision of John. I do not understand why Battersea should not be as holy as Patmos, and a Christian child in the England of to-day may, for all I know, have a clearer vision than the Eastern solitary of the first century.

But when I turn from little Albert’s simple story to the so-called Divine Comedy of Dante; what a gulf yawns between them!

But this opens up a new vista before us, and I think I will defer my remarks on this subject to some succeeding afternoon.

III. A Popish Poet — Democracy the Touchstone of our Faith — Free Churches in Heaven

I THINK THAT when you were last kind enough to come and see me I promised, rashly enough, perhaps, to offer some remarks on the Vision of the Italian of the thirteenth century, as contrasted with the Vision of a little child in the England of to-day. I have been considering the subject with some care in the interim, and I hope I shall redeem my promise to your satisfaction, but before I do so I want to say that my phrase, "kind enough to come and see me" is no mere idle compliment. You have been so good as to promise to do your best to put my views before the world, and I assure you that I regard this as a very great service. For, I have long felt that we Free Church ministers have pushed the virtues of modesty and humility so far that in us they have almost become vices. You remember the parable of the Talent in the Napkin? Well, I am not quite sure whether, in the classic phrase, we ministers ought not to say de nobis fabula narratur; we have shrunk so sedulously into the shade, we have so strenuously avoided the pitfalls of advertisement, that I am really afraid that we are in danger of hiding the Talent and concealing our Light. I am not speaking at haphazard, for the question has been before me for some time, and I have gone rather carefully through the files of the leading Liberal organs for the past few weeks. What is the result? Here is my analysis of the paper which is said to be most closely identified with the cause of the Free Churches. You see that in the last three weeks Dr. Clifford's name occurs but twenty-five times, and that the total number of times that other Free Church ministers' names are mentioned is only two hundred. The case is much the same with this other journal which is also popularly supposed to be a supporter of Liberalism and the Cause of Humanity in politics and religion; and I do not wonder that some of our friends are beginning to suspect the existence of wire-pulling and to hint at a deliberate boycott. I say I do not wonder at the existence of such a state of feeling, and I must say that I have known a very good case made out on feebler evidence than this. For what do we find in these papers? Here is "News from the Vatican" occurring three times in three weeks; here is “The Pope’s Health” twice; here, and here again is a “Pronouncement of the Most Holy Synod,” and here we have “Pastoral Letter of the Patriarch of Jerusalem”; a valuable piece of news which you will find in three papers which call themselves Liberal. “Liberal”; save the mark! What, I ask, has the health of that unhappy old man, the selfstyled “Prisoner of the Vatican,” to do with Protestant Englishmen? Did Hampden die, did the stern, sure justice of England lead the wretched Laud to the block, in order that the degenerate Englishmen of to-day should be informed as to the pronouncements of him whom our sturdy ancestors called “the Man of Sin”? You have read how our good old Puritan forefathers abolished the semi-Pagan, semi-Popish, wholly superstitious observance of Christmas, how good men, even in our day, have refused to allow the accursed thing, plum pudding, to enter their doors, you know what an example of serious household discipline the great Milton set to the world, how the unutterable infamy of pleasure on the Sabbath was prohibited, how the plague-spot of the theatre was stamped out by those stout Commonwealth’s men. And, I ask, was all this done that Englishmen and Protestants should be regaled with the doings of Cardinals, with the movements of a person calling himself Merry del Val? Merry del Val! What a name for a professing Christian! There is offence in the very sound of it; it seems to suggest to the densest ear the noise of the unholy revelries of the Vatican, surpassing the worst orgies of Nero and Tiberius; it reminds me of the book of which I shall shortly speak more fully — Dante’s Divine Comedy. Rome is unchangeable; the Papist of the thirteenth century writes a Divine Comedy, and the Cardinal of the twentieth century is named Merry del Val Î Verb sat sap.

And again, what have we to do with “most Holy Synods,” with the decrees of decayed and corrupt churches, which are well known to have remained in a state of absolute immobility since tne sixth or seventh century, to be fossilised relics, as it were, of the darkest ages, when the very elements of modern science were unknown, when the possibilities of steam had not dawned on the minds of the wildest dreamers? What has Jerusalem or its “Patriarch” to say to Battersea? Are we to be instructed in the simple religion of the Gospel by a city which has not the elements of popular government, which has never heard of the Nonconformist Conscience, which would regard a Church Tea on the day called Good Friday as an outrage? Let Jerusalem shew us the rude beginnings of progress, the mere outlines of civilisation, before we listen to her dictates. What manufactures can that once proud city now display? I am aware of none, save of superstitious objects made of cedar wood growing on a hill which is traditionally called the Mount of Olives, and therefore, of course, cannot be anything of the kind. Is there anything remotely resembling our Boards of Guardians at Jerusalem, are there electric trams, is there even an efficient service of steamboats run on the brook Kishon? We know there is not, and I tell you that my blood boils when I see so-called Liberal journals devoting their space to the utterances of the "Patriarch" of such a decayed village as this, while the proceedings of the Evangelical Churches in Protestant and Progressive Battersea are slighted and neglected. Only a week ago the female workers of my own church were entertained at tea by Mr. Josiah Gupp, one of my principal deacons, and a wealthy manufacturer of imitation leather. The proceedings were of the most interesting kind; we all drove over to Mr. Gupp's palatial villa at Clapham, and I assure you that I have never seen a more pleasant sight than the innocent mirth of our maidens — they had brought a few gentlemen friends with them — as they sported in the shade of Mr. Gupp's back-garden. Tea was served in the parlour, with ham and tarts galore, and afterwards all joined in the singing of the grand old psalm: —

Ten thousand at thy right,
But none shall harm thee not at all.

Nor nothing thee affright.

Then there were the speeches; a gentleman told us about the hardships of a missionary's life in the South Seas, of the bitter persecution to which he himself had been subjected by a Popish Power, for the "offence" of causing a law to be passed by which drawing water on the Sabbath Day was made punishable by hard labour for life. Then a young gentleman, a student, I believe, of the Guildhall School, and evidently a person of great talents, sang us "The Holy City," and I said a few words on "Institutional Christianity: or, It Doth not Appear what we shall be," words which I trust may not be altogether fruitless. Your interest is very kind: I merely demonstrated that we had good reasons for believing that Christianity, which in the earliest days was a pleasant social club on a liberal basis, would probably return to these lines after centuries of error, and find its centre in the social tea, the true sacrament of our enlightened times, the Agape of the Protestant Christian. Well; to return to this especial gathering; harmless games were resumed by the young people in the dusk of the evening, the garden resounded with their simple mirth, and so a happy day came to a close. Will you believe me, I searched the morning papers in vain for any account of our proceedings; and yet in one paper there was a long review of some work on the Early Fathers by a Dean of the Establishment, while another contained an article not only advocating Socialism, but (by sly hints), dogmatic Christianity Î Are you surprised, then, that some of us suspect wheels within wheels, and a carefully organised scheme for the suppression of Free Church news? The instance which I have cited might seem to many evidence almost conclusive of the existence of such a dastardly plot; and when I tell you that a few weeks ago I was present at a meeting of the Peckham Congregational Church, which unanimously passed resolutions demanding the immediate dethronement of the Czar, the Sultan, the Shah, and the Empress of China, at the same time requiring the whole of British India to be handed over to the Bengali Baboos and the Grand Lama of Tibet; when I tell you that merely the briefest references to this most important and representative gathering appeared in two or three papers, you will not, I imagine, be far from a conviction that the boycotting hypothesis is proven up to the hilt.

And yet, I do not myself believe that this is the case. I cannot think that convinced Christians, as the editors and staffs of Liberal journals of course must be, would lend themselves to any such nefarious schemes; I have come to the conclusion that we ourselves, the ministers of the Free Churches, are to blame, and as I told you just now it seems to me that we have shrunk too long in obscurity. Everyone is aware that the Establishment has long since cast dignity to the winds in this matter, that every country parsonage is a centre of bold and blatant self-advertisement. That being so, we must meet them on their own ground; we shall not, I hope, descend quite so low as "Father" Lowder, "Father" Mackonochie, or "Father" Dolling; still, we must make our voices heard, and in no uncertain tones. It is for this reason that I welcome your presence here, that I thank you for your promise to make my opinions known to the world.

Now, at last, then, we can begin to consider the subject to which I invited your attention. I told you the other day how my little Albert described to me his simple vision of the heavenly country, and I mentioned the shock it gave me to turn from his simple undenominational piety to the work of the Popish poet, Dante. Oh! what a change. See; I open the volume at haphazard. What does my eye light on? The scene is in Hell, and Dante hears the sighs:

> "That tremble made the everlasting air * * rising from a great multitude of people. His guide informs him that none of these persons had sinned:

" — and if they merit had, 'Tis not enough, because they had not baptism, Which is the portal of the Faith thou holdest." But what is this but the sacramentalism of the Church Catechism? To what end have we strained every nerve and sinew to put a stop to the teaching of such doctrine as this in the People's Schools if we are to encourage our young men and maidens to subject themselves to the same contagion in another form, under the specious pretext that this work we are examining is a literary masterpiece. But the fact is that from beginning to end this Divine Comedy literally bristles with dogma and dogmatic definition. One is absolutely amazed at the glib manner in which the words of the Great Book are taken in their crude, material signification, as for example in the passage I have just quoted; and there is another passage, a whole canto indeed, in which the woman Beatrice is made to discourse of the Incarnation, the Immortality of the Soul, and the Resurrection of the Body, each of these dubious and questionable terms being understood in its literal sense; apparently in utter ignorance of the higher spiritual meaning that a liberal theology has shewn to be latent in such phrases as these. Definition is piled on definition, dogma on dogma; nay, Tests of all kinds are rampant, for in three Cantos Dante is examined by Peter, James, and John upon Faith, Hope, and Charity! And the whole poem is permeated by the spirit of the deplorable and ridiculous scholastic philosophy which enslaved Europe for so many centuries, which discussed such questions as "How many angels can dance upon the point of a needle?" by the spirit of the idolatrous mass, by quotations from Popish hymns and from the Romish version of the Psalms. All this may be Christianity, but it is certainly not the Christianity of Battersea! I have been informed that there was a Dean of the Establishment who devoted his life to the study of this Dante; I can only say that I can quite believe it! One can understand that such a man would be a rancorous opponent of Simple Bible Teaching in the People's Schools.

And now the question I ask is this — and you will pardon me if I ask it with indignation — how long are the Protestant People of England going to bear the free circulation of this book? Are the efforts of Free Churchmen and Liberals to be stultified, is our great success at the polls to be nullified by teaching such as I have indicated, not only sown broadcast throughout the land, but recommended by persons in high places, and enforced by the shadowy terrors of an imposing reputation? Is England Protestant and Undenominational or not? If it claims these titles, and I think it has done so in no doubtful manner, let there be an end of all this; let us not suffer the Evil Thing which we are pitching out of the school windows to come in again by the study door. It is of little use, believe me, to insist on Simple Bible Teaching at one moment, and to teach the Baptismal Figment at the next, even though this pernicious doctrine appear on the pages of an Italian Poet. As for Freedom, I suppose you do not wish for freedom to sell poisons, freedom to vend arsenic and strychnine? If we are Protestants the Divine Comedy should be suppressed. Is not the spirit — the immortal soul — of higher import than the perishing and transitory body? Shall we shut the public-house door, and open the leaves of this book, which reeks of Catholic Dogma from the first page to the last?

I think that the rock on which you and many others are inclined to split is a very dangerous one, and I believe it would be as well if I "charted" it once for all, so that you and those who think with you may avoid the peril for the future. The rock in question is this: you and indeed many excellent people have, I think, some vague and ill-defined idea to the effect that License, misnamed Toleration, is, or should be, one of the special marks of Liberals and Protestants. I do not quite know how this idea originated, possibly from such phrases as "the intolerance of Rome,"

"the tyranny of kings and nobles," which are often used, and very properly used, by Liberals and Evangelical writers. Of course, all kings and nobles are tyrants, and cruel tyrants to boot; but you surely would not have their opponents, the oppressed people, endeavour to govern by the methods of the jelly fish? We know that the Czar of Russia and the bureaucrats are remorseless tyrants, guilty of the most infamous cruelties; but do you suggest that their miserable victims should throw bombs charged with rosewater?

At any rate, if you search history you will find no justification for this very curious theory of yours. I don't think there was much "tolerance" about Bluff King Hal when he had to deal with recalcitrant abbots and friars; Queen Elizabeth, unless I am mistaken, stamped out Popery without much hesitation, as Tyburn Tree could bear witness, and the triumphant and glorious Puritans of the seventeenth century (sturdy followers of good old John Knox), suppressed the idolatrous worship of Rome and Canterbury under the sanctions of death and transportation. Again, in France, during the Revolution I fear you would miss your favourite virtue (as you think it), in the actions of the Revolutionary Government, in the so-called "massacres," in the prisons, in the thousands of executions which took place under the very insignia of triumphant Liberty. And to-day, in the United States, the freest country in the world, perhaps the only country which is truly free, I am told that there are not wanting certain instruments of coercion which can be applied, if need be, to those who deliberately set themselves against popular sentiment. It is not many weeks ago since I saw the very interesting account of the proceedings taken by Mr. Comstock and the Society for the Suppression of Vice against a certain Art Club which had committed the gross indecency of making studies from the nude. Now the American People (very wisely, in my opinion) does not approve of Art, suspecting, and rightly suspecting, that the word in nine cases out of ten is used as a veil for obscenity; the consequence is that the disgusting publications of this selfstyled "Art Club" have been seized, and the members of the society bound over for prosecution. Again, you will have noted the case of Maxim Gorky. Sacerdotalists have said hard things about the American Marriage Laws, which indeed breathe the genial spirit of an advanced and liberalised Christianity, and are, therefore, naturally unacceptable to our friends the priests. Yet, there is a moral sentiment in America which puts us to the blush, and the Russian having outraged that sentiment, found himself homeless — in the freest country in the earth.

Well, you see my point, do you not? I hope I have convinced you that at no time and in no country has the prevalence of Protestant and Liberal opinions been accompanied by that languid acquiescence in evil which masquerades under the name of “tolerance”; we are not “tolerant” now we never have been “tolerant,” and unless under compulsion, we never will be. We fight for the Good and the True, and (as Liberal leader-writers say when a Liberal Government is in office) wars cannot be made with rosewater. I trust that by this time I have quite convinced you that there was nothing inconsistent with Liberal and Protestant principles in my demand for the suppression of the works of Dante.

I do not wish to stifle a reverent curiosity as to the Future Life. Far from it; I have told you how my boy’s anticipation of his Heavenly Home touched and pleased me, and, as I said, why should not the vision of an English child, attached to a Free Church, a member of a well-governed community, be as acceptable and as probable as that of the old time seer, who must have lived under conditions that we should deem revolting? At all events, to the earnest Christian there are many sources of information open; let him read “The Gates Ajar,” for example; a touching anticipation that life in Heaven will be extremely like life in the smaller villages of the United States of America. And, if we consider the matter seriously, can we find much amiss in such an anticipation? I have often felt that many of my brothers are unduly timorous when speaking on this subject; modern, enlightened, and advanced in most matters, they seem, if I may say so, still somewhat under the bondage of ecclesiastical tradition when they approach the question of eschatology. They use, I mean, the figures and the symbols which John uses, which no doubt may have appealed forcibly enough to the uneducated, unscientific Christians of the early centuries; to men whose eyes were dazed, as it were, with the barbaric pomp of the Temple services, or with the gorgeous pageantry of pagan Rome. Of course, this is a subject which requires delicate handling, but perhaps you will remember that I have already pointed out to you that in Holy Writ (which I need not say is the Life and Inspiration of all Evangelical Churches), one must, it may be, be prepared to recognise certain elements as local and temporary in their scope. Nor do I think this view need present much difficulty to the earnest enquirer; it is surely not an impossible task to disentangle the great Basic Principles of Christianity from the setting of brilliant Orientalisms which, no doubt, recommended these principles to the particular audience to which they were first addressed. Shall I give you my test? Well, it seems simple enough. Ask yourself these questions: — Does such or such a doctrine or utterance appeal to me personally as finely Christian? Is it in accord with the modern spirit? Can I imagine such an utterance being received with "loud and continued applause" at a Liberal meeting? Would this doctrine satisfy the ethical demands of a modern man of science? Can I conceive of such a rite as this suggesting itself spontaneously to a representative assembly of Free Churchmen? And perhaps best of all — the final and conclusive test — Is this a doctrine on which the party could go to the country, with the certainty of being returned by a triumphant, a "thumping" majority? I do not claim this test as an absolute discovery; indeed, I am very glad to be able to call the testimony of a distinguished brother minister, the Rev. C. H. Kelly, ex-president of the Wesleyan Conference, who in his charge to the newly-ordained ministers, is reported to have said that ‘‘they had to preach to an age that was antagonistic to formality. Men would not listen to doctrinal statements unless they were practical. It was a democratic age. Crowns and lawn sleeves did not count for much to-day. If Paul or Wesley returned to the earth now, they would have to act differently. If Martin Luther came back to Germany, he would have to act differently, if for no other reason than from the fact that the Kaiser was living."

Yes; there does seem some slight inconsistency between the sentence about "crowns" and the sentence about the Kaiser; but that apart, note how the preacher goes to the root of the matter, how he gives in practice the same rule that I have given in theory. "Tell the democracy what the democracy wants to hear," is the Rev. C. H. Kelly's message: "Test the Bible by the judgment of the democracy," is mine. How far and how well we have travelled from the spirit of the text (no doubt adapted to Syrian modes of thought) which bids us beware when all men speak well of us, and tells us to rejoice in being evilly spoken of, maltreated, persecuted, imprisoned, put to death! The preaching of Paul brought him bonds, and beatings, and execution; Luther no doubt ran great risks, even Wesley was pelted, insulted, reviled. How different the stories of such men from the career of the late venerated Pastor of the City Temple! Yes, Democracy and Protestantism have led us far.

Well; to apply our test to the particular matter under consideration. I said that my brother ministers seemed to be unduly bound by obsolete ecclesiastical tradition in discussing the sublime subject of our future eternal happiness; and I should like to ask some of them whether they honestly think they would be really happy in such a heaven as John (if it be

John) describes for us. You know the vision: the description of the glowing and bejewelled Court of Heaven, the elders in white robes with crowns of gold, the seven lamps of fire, the vials full of odours (incense, I am afraid, were the truer translation), the prostration and adoration of the elders, the angel with the censer to whom was given much incense. If we are quite sincere, we must confess that all this is a description of a gorgeous and elaborate ceremonial; and I must add that it reads much more like an account of "High Mass" in a Romish or Ritualistic Church than anything else with which I am acquainted. I need scarcely say that neither I, nor any Free Church minister known to me, would be at all happy or even comfortable during the performance of such a ceremonial as John describes. Taking into consideration the fact that we spend our whole lives in denouncing such ceremonial, in warning our people against its insidious, meretricious, and theatrical attractions (whoredoms of the Scarlet Woman, our plain-spoken forefathers called such rites), considering that our Puritan ancestors fought and bled and died and feared not even kings, so that such abominations should be swept out of the land, considering that even in these days stout John Kensit was martyred for his efforts to make all such idolatries impossible; considering all this, I say, is it not a little ridiculous that we should bid our people look forward to certain things as the perpetual joys of heaven, while, with what seems to me startling inconsistency, we order them to shun these very things like the pestilence on earth? é Why should we not be candid? Why do we not confess that John's symbols are ill-chosen and dangerous, for our times at all events; that the Congregationalists of Peckham, the Baptists of Battersea, the Wesleyans of Tooting have long passed beyond the spiritual region which was occupied by half-clad, ignorant, uncivilised fellahin and fakirs in the Syria of the first century. But do we quite realise this? Are we not, even the best of us, bound by that superstitious reverence for the past which has been responsible for so much mischief and error, which has enslaved and still enslaves the souls and bodies of men? Would it not be as well if we realised, once for all, that the average seventh standard boy or girl from the school over the way is in many respects the superior of the whole body of the Apostles? I believe there are persons, even in this age, who despise or pretend to despise modern progress, who assert that main drainage, pure water, electric trams — in fact, all the results of applied science — are entirely unimportant. But we are not concerned with the pseudo-mediævalists, but with the British

Democracy, and I think it is time that we appealed to them on their own ground, that we shewed ourselves not merely spiritual but also practical, when we wish to set forth the Reward that is in store.

I heard a story once that pleased me. An American Revivalist was endeavouring to excite the devotion of his congregation by dwelling on the heaven of John. In the midst of his most eloquent passage a sturdy, ringing voice came from the back of the hall: “What’s the matter with Kentucky? It’s God’s own state, anyway, and that’s good enough for me!” I cordially sympathise with the utterer of that sentiment; I sympathise too with a little American boy in a somewhat similar story. The child came crying to the Sunday School Superintendent, and said he didn’t want to go to heaven because his teacher had told him that there would be no chewing-gum there, nor any Britishers to whip.

My good friend, we shall all say, if we are sincere, “what’s the matter with Kentucky” (or Battersea!); we shall all demand our chewing-gum and our Britishers to whip. For otherwise, do we not confess that we are ashamed of our daily occupations, of our daily interests in life; do we not, in fact, plead guilty to leading lives that are essentially wrong and distorted? Unless we are ready to join the Eastern fakir and the Western monk in their miserable blasphemy, we are far from pleading guilty to any such accusation. On the contrary, we say boldly that we are placed in this world to use it, to get on in it, to better its condition by healthy political activities, to make money in it by the judicious exercise of the faculties that have been given us. The world has always worshipped success, and the world has been right; and I have no doubt that these goodly activities in which we have joined together below will be prolonged eternally in heaven. We cannot say how it can be so, but we know that it will be so, and in perfect measure. There will be no violent break, no sudden dislocation of all our interests and all our activities, as John imagined, and as many excellent but mistaken people imagine to this day. The respectable suburban citizen, who has read “Self-Help” to advantage, who has realised the inner meaning of the Parable of the Talents, has amassed an honest fortune by his successful handling of some useful product, and has been the prop and stay of some excellent Evangelical cause — a man like this will not be hurled suddenly into a world to which business methods are altogether unknown, in which the simple Gospel service of the Free Churches is replaced by complicated and mysterious rites, which seem to outvie the impious splendours of Popery. No; “Work without worry” will be, I think, the motto of the Heavenly City. Even the Romish Monk realised in his dark and contracted fashion something of the limitations of this earthly sphere: —

Brief life is here our portion,
Brief sorrow, short-lived care:

Though, of course, his is a pessimism coloured by the gloomy superstition of Rome. Yet, in spite of the advances that have been made, we must confess that the faithful Christian has still many trials, many difficulties to overcome. I once knew a good man who was interested in milk, arid I am sure that his life was as innocent and simple as the product in which he dealt. He is now, I trust, in the enjoyment of glory; his heirs are certainly in the enjoyment of considerable affluence. The father was a Christian man; his descendants, I regret to say, have attached themselves to the Establishment. Well, I have known this worthy gentleman come to me with tears in his eyes while he recounted the annoyances and hindrances that were thrown in his way by the harassing and un-English methods of the Government Inspectors.

“What do they want, doctor?” I have heard him say: “What will satisfy them? That’s what I want to know. We have a poor fellow in our employment who has been consumptive for the last three years; he’s a handy man, and naturally I don’t pay him full wages, as he’s getting rather weak now. You can’t expect a man to pay a full day’s wage for a half-day’s work — at least, not out of the Parables. After all, if you only give a man a penny a day it’s hardly worth while paying a fellow to keep the time-sheet. You don’t often find out the Good Book in a mistake, do you, doctor? But I wish I knew how the owner of that vineyard managed to keep down wages as he did. The unions wouldn’t stand it now for a moment. But I suppose we shall know all about it when we get to heaven.”

My friend was a shrewd man-of-the-world, and I often derived great benefit from listening to such keen commentaries as these on the Scripture story. But on this occasion to which I am referring, he grew almost beside himself with indignation as he told me that he was threatened with “trouble” because he persisted in keeping on his unfortunate assistant, who was slowly dying of consumption. “Do they want me to throw the poor fellow out into the street?” he exclaimed. I sympathised with him to the best of my ability, and then he went on to say that this was the least of his worries. There was trouble about the comparatively harmless chemicals that he used to preserve the lacteal fluid in its pristine freshness, there was trouble about a case of typhoid occurring in a cottage adjoining the dairy, and an impertinent person who had made a kind of domiciliary visit to the cowsheds had gone away talking of “disgusting substances from diseased, udders” finding their way into the milk. Then there was the question of attenuation; my poor old friend pointed out that milk* “stuffed with cream” (as fie put it) wasn’t wholesome. “The public don’t want it,” he said, “they wouldn’t look at it if they got it; any more than they’d drink beer made out of malt and hops, whiskey made of malt, or brandy distilled from wine.”

I comforted him, as I say, and when I reminded him of that stream which waters Paradise and makes the angels sing, suggesting that he might be placed in charge of its source, and that there would be no sighing or sorrow there, he looked more cheerful. He knew that there would be no Inspectors among the Shining Ones. Yes; earthly Trusts may be threatened; but no powers of evil will be suffered to break the everlasting “Corners” of our Heavenly Mansion.

There will be no break, no solution of continuity. Science has wiped the dimness from our eyes; we no longer look for the instantaneous scene-shifting, if I may use the expression, which seems to have characterised earlier and less enlightened views — views which seem to have regarded heaven as a transformation scene in a celestial pantomime. The trumpet will not sound; we shall not all be changed in the twinkling of an eye, for Science teaches us that the Divine Process is a gradual one, and heaven is, after all, but the grand goal of Evolution. Trumpets, of course, are quite impossible, and out of the question.

And need I say that the principle applies (as how should it not) to the religious world as to the secular. Here again I am inclined to think that some of my brother ministers are a little inconsistent. Again and again I have heard sermons and read papers which seem to look forward to a final abolition of all denominational ties, to a union of all into one vast and eternal denomination. We are asked to imagine a heaven in which there will neither be Baptists or Methodists, Congregationalists or Bible Christians, where Presbyterians will be unknown, and Sandemanianism will be sought for in vain. But if this is the ideal, why do we not try to realise it on earth? If such is the goal to which we are moving, to what purpose the labour and expense involved in building churches and administering the affairs of the three hundred denominations which make such a brave show in the useful Whittaker? If we are to be One (in this mechanical sense), hereafter, why do we not endeavour to be One now and on earth? I must say that the inconsistency is too apparent to escape remark.

The truth is, of course, that a merely mechanical unity is not recommended to us on earth, nor promised as a reward hereafter. Let us leave such unity as that to slaves and priests: Christianity is not a thing to be governed by the cast-iron rules of the mathematicians, and in the purely spiritual order in which Evangelical Christians move and have their being, two and two are constantly making five. In this spiritual sense, in the vital sense (the only one which really matters), all the Free Churches are already One, as the Enemy has found to his cost, as the polling booths testified not very long ago. As for the phrase, “our unhappy divisions,” I repudiate it altogether. Our divisions are most happy; they are but another witness to the infinite Diversity in Unity which characterises the whole of Creation. Do we wish that all flowers had been roses, all trees oaks, all metals gold, all places of worship exactly like the City Temple, all pastors perfect duplicates of Dr. Clifford, all hills Primrose Hills, all suburbs Batterseas? No, a thousand times no! Not in this dull mechanical sense was the great Aspiration for Unity uttered, and so far am I from deploring the divisions amongst us, that I wish that I could read each morning of the rise of a new denomination — of a new and dewy bud, as it were, shooting forth from the parent stem, with the freshness and innocence of the dawn still lingering like a glory about its yet unopened petals, rare with the prospect of future usefulness and beauty, promising a rich crop of churches to add still fresh graces to our imposing streets, to delight the world with more unheard of discoveries in the art of architectural ornament. No: many are the colours, the lights and the shades that go to the painting of a great picture— “The Doctor” is not of one uniform hue — and each Protestant Denomination is but a varying pigment in the Great Masterpiece which will at last be exhibited to the angels.

As in earth, so in heaven. We may alter a hymn which has always pleased me, because though written, I believe, in the Dark Ages, it offers a fine witness to the sanctity of the Sabbath. Still, for the moment, let us read it thus: —

O what the joy and the glory must be,
Endless Free Churches the blessed ones see!

Nay, if England alone, this little island in the Northern Sea, can shew to-day Three Hundred distinct denominations, how vast, how aweinspiring will be the Infinite Divisions of Eternity i

IV. What is true Patriotism? — Our Corrupt Stage — Superstition in the Newspaper.

HAVE YOU EVER noticed the strange persistence with which a calumny, oft-times refuted, is again and again repeated? How often, to take a modern political instance, has it been boldly, nay, shamelessly asserted that the advanced wing of the great Liberal Party (to which I have the honour to belong) is indifferent, or indeed, hostile to the British Empire, its fame and its prosperity. We have seen this slander refuted each time it has been advanced, for from the dark days of the Boer War, to the recent troubles in South Africa and Egypt, who but the Advanced Liberals have come forward on every occasion to denounce the Mother Country, to heap well-deserved shame on the British Empire, to prove their countrymen invariably in the wrong, greedy, cruel, rapacious, murderous? And in what better way than this can we prove our intense pride and joy in England? Was Cæsar an enemy to his wife when he declared that she must be above suspicion? Am I the foe of my little ones when I lovingly correct them for their childish faults? What do we call the parent who suffers his infants to have their own way in all things; to torment animals, to annoy the neighbours, to swear, to drink, to steal? Surely such parents are not friends to their children, but rather their deadliest foes; and surely we do well not to keep silence over the misdeeds of our wandering sons. Which is the worse, think you; to pull the kitten's tail or to cut off the heads of the hapless Mahdi, of the deeply-wronged Bambaata, victims both of English lust for gold? Which is the Blacker crime, for my little boy to annoy the bald old gentleman in the next garden by his sportive exercises with the pea shooter, or for the English jingoes and maffickers to annoy our good friends at Berlin by the persistent building of vast ships armed with guns of great power? The other day I was walking down a neighbouring street when my attention was arrested by shrill screams from over the way. I crossed over, and was shocked to find that my little Helen, aged seven, had succeeded in evading domestic supervision, and was endeavouring to wrest a small doll from a child of much tenderer years. I administered suitable castigation to my erring child there and then, and on her return to our roof she received a chapter from the Book of Kings to learn by heart. This course of action I considered, and consider still, to have been dictated by true regard for the welfare of my offspring; and yet — look at the map of the British Empire, like a great stain of blood upon the fair face of the world! I corrected my child for the attempted theft of a paltry doll; shall we not also correct our vagrant children who have stolen, not a child's toy, but whole continents? From the Maori and the Blackfellow, from the African Negro and the myriad tribes of India, from tne Red-skinned native of Canada and the poor down-trodden Egyptian, there goes up an exceeding bitter cry that pierces our hearts as the wail of the infant in the street pierced mine; and are we to remain silent? I say no; punish we must, though we punish with love; and for this are we to be branded as enemies of our country? And yet the vile slander is repeated at each instance of our tender love of these our erring children; and one of us who was not afraid to lift his voice in horror and reprobation of the vile massacre that followed the death by sunstroke of an English officer is held up to execration, forsooth, as a traitor to his country!

Yes; calumny seems a monster which revives from the ashes of its funeral pyre, like the fabled Phoenix of Arabia; and I know of no more abominable calumny than that which ascribes to the Puritan an ignorance of the arts, and indeed a detestation of them.

In answer to this, let me point out once and for all that it is we and we alone who make any artistic success possible in the England of to-day. Of course, there are more or less unclean cults and cliques which lurk in certain byeways and back-alleys of English life, hidden away, happily, from the most of us, and nauseating all right-thinking people by their rare appearances in the public streets. But I must say that on the whole the Press of England understands its duty where such persons are considered. A little sharp ridicule will often affect wonders where more serious rebuke would be inefficient, and I have not yet forgotten my delight when our great comic journal greeted the work of a certain notorious imitator of the old Popish painters with just this comment:— "Burne Jones? Burn Jones!" Then there was a person called Rossetti (a very un-English name it seems to me), and a man named Whistler, and I believe I have heard of an unhappy lad named Beardsley, who was cut off in the midst of his sins. But I am not speaking of these "aesthetes"; I do not wish to discuss a subject which is, to say the least of it, an unsavoury one. What I say is that the artist who wishes to succeed in England must win the affections of the English People, and the English People are, as has been often observed, Puritan to the backbone. Consider the popularity of such pictures as the “Railway Station,” the “Derby Day,” and that eloquent series called, I think, “The Road to Ruin.” Note the humanity, the appeal to our best instincts in all of them, the gratification of that eminently worthy instinct that demands that every picture should tell a story. Note, too, the moral appeal; who, however thoughtless, or, it may be, criminal, would wish to go to the great gambling carnival after gazing at Mr. Frith’s vivid picture? Take a more modern example, the wonderful “Doctor”; how it tends to raise our opinion of the whole medical profession, to excite our sympathies for the anxious parents! Take that class of pictures which are often so admirably reproduced in the Christmas numbers of the illustrated journals. The pictures in question may not be, perhaps, pretentious, though some of them seem to me to shew very high power; but how delicate is the chord struck. A litle girl with golden hair holds up a piece of meat, at which a fox-terrier is jumping; meanwhile pussy, who is perched on the child’s shoulder, slyly extends a paw in the direction of the dainty morsel. One wonders what will be the end of the story: will the fox-terrier secure the meat by some extraordinary exertion, or will the artful cat succeed in her design, and devour the toothsome prize before Jack’s very eyes? Again, there is the humorous catastrophe which befalls the fishmonger’s lad, too intent on the (certainly very fascinating), pages of Tit-Bits, so that this time pussy, who has had her eye on his tray, succeeds in carrying out her felonious schemes.

Nay, the catalogue of such excellent works is practically endless, and the fame and fortune which the admirable artists have achieved is due, let me remind you again, to the appeal which their works make to the great mass of the British Nation, which is, as I have said, in profound sympathy with the aims and ideals of the Free Churches.

Again; consider the Drama. Who, if it was not the great Puritan middle class, made the fortune of such a masterpiece as “The Sign of the Cross?” I remember watching the immense crowds that waited patiently outside the Lyric Theatre, and thinking that the tide had at last turned, that it was no longer necessary for the sincere Christian to leave the playhouse severely alone. I seemed to foresee a time when at every theatre in London plays of like nature should be produced, and as the mass of thoughtless pleasure seekers became gradually leavened, it might, perhaps, be possible to strike out more boldly still, and practically to transform the whole character of the stage. It has been said, perhaps with no very complimentary intention, that some of our Sacred Songs are not far removed from the region of Negro Minstrelsy; why, I thought, should not we bridge over our differences and cause Negro Minstrelsy to speak, as it were, the tongue of Zion? Then it seemed to me that I saw in a Pisgah Vision the Opera itself transformed; no longer the resort of a thoughtless aristocracy, assembled to listen to the vocal gymnastics of foreigners and Romanists, but a rallying point for all lovers of homely and innocent English Music. Why, I remembered, the oratorio itself developed from services held in an oratory or chapel in Rome; why should not the Service of Song, which has long been such an attraction in our churches, develop in its turn and become the great musical form of the English People; so that instead of the over-dressed and under-dressed (alas! that I must say it), who throng the opera-house to listen to exotic, un-English, and, I am afraid, unwholesome music, we might have great gatherings of sober, decent, earnest people, clad in their "go-to-meeting" clothes (to use a good old phrase), and rapt to tears and laughter by such masterpieces of the true musician's art as "Little Abe" and "The Oiled Feather."

And I went farther. At present, I said to myself, there is every reason to fear that the ordinary English play is a thoughtless and frivolous production at best, while many are known to be much worse than thoughtless. The scene is laid in gilded halls, in the drawing-rooms of a brainless and effete aristocracy, the dialogue is compounded of idle and pointless jest and repartee; even when the title — such as "The Importance of being Earnest" — promises better things it is to be feared that no real good is intended, that the serious name serves but as a mask to cover the writer's thoughtless gaiety. Why, I thought, should not all this be changed? As one who has seen the lights and shadows of Sunday School life under very favourable conditions, I have often wondered that such a field of intense dramatic interest should be neglected and passed over. Take the career — it is no exceptional one — of a young man who has been long known to me. I remember him as a tiny boy repeating his texts in that shrill clear voice which touches every father's heart; I remember his voice rising shriller yet in the hymn: —

Oh tell me about the Sheep,
Oh tell me about the Fold;
I want to hear ‘bout the Ninety-and-nine,
And the One that was lost in the cold.

Still I remember the pathos on that little face, when the child’s teacher, whose suspicions had been aroused by a strong odour, found half-a-score of tiny packets of peppermint lozenges, which the lad had brought to school, in the hope of disposing of them at a penny a packet. Many such incidents as these come to my memory, and in the last scene there are wedding bells and an extremely prosperous business in Wandsworth, and I am amazed, as I say, that such a story as this has not appealed to any of our rising dramatists. From such sources as these, I thought, will the play of the future be constructed; playwrights will have realised that there is no need for them to pry into the dark corners and unsavoury recesses of the human mind, since there are innocent and engrossing subjects all around them. What should we say of a man who, not content with plucking fruit and flowers from the orchard and the garden, should reject the wholesome and delicious pear, the dewy roses exhaling their odours under the bright sun, and explore the evil-smelling depths of the dustbin and the rubbish-heap?

Well; I often wonder when I shall see my vision realised, when the theatre will be as innocent and as helpful as the Revival Meeting, and the actors will rank with Church Workers in the public estimation. The time is not yet; but after what I have said I do not think you will require any further proof of my intense interest in the English Drama. True, I, and those who think with me, would see the Stage reformed, we would banish from the boards themes which suggest the Penitentiary or the Lunatic Asylum. Nothing would give me greater pain than to witness the murder or madness of my best friends, and I fail to see that such subjects make profitable and pleasing spectacles, even though the dramatis personæ are kings and queens whose very existence is doubtful. But I do not think that an attitude such as this can be described as one of hostility to the drama. If you, in a sudden fit of frenzy, were to take off your clothes and propose to walk to Westminster in a state of complete nudity, I do not believe that on coming to your right senses you would characterise my firm but kindly restraint as "hostility and, following the analogy, it seems a little hard that Free Churchmen should be held up to public contempt and execration because they object to plays which contain scenes in a duchess's bedroom after midnight, scenes in which champagne is produced, scenes of which the dialogue is far from edifying. Many of us are the fathers of families, of boys and girls whom we are training up with anxious care, whose young lives are precious in our sight. There is nothing more sacred than that ingenuous shame which the growth of civilisation has fostered as a guarding instinct against the violation of the mind. I make no fight for prudery, but I stand for cleanliness and decency, and there are certain dark places into which I would never have my children introduced. And yet, let us consider one of the so-called "classics" of the English Stage, a piece which, I am sorry to say, seems to enjoy an infamous immortality. Its plot (I do not care to name it), turns on the unsavoury topic of an old man married to a young wife — a theme which, as I daresay you are aware, has always been a favourite with the purveyors of indecency and moral garbage. About these two unhappy persons revolves a crowd of dissolute, idle, and luxurious people of fashion, whose only employment seems to be the circulation of ill-natured and preposterous rumours about each other. The dialogue, I may add, is written in a style which is evidently intended to be brilliant, but which strikes me personally as most unnatural. I may say that my social opportunities have been rather larger than is general; I have known almost intimately two of the most respected Liberal Peers, I have visited the palatial residence of Sir Josiah Smeech, who has raised himself from poverty and obscurity to his present great position, I am naturally, welcome at the tables and in the drawing-rooms of the principal members of my congregation, some of them extremely wealthy men, and I have long been acquainted with the leaders of the Free Church Party in the House of Commons. I think you will admit, then, that I am not without experience in the conversation of men of light and leading; but I can earnestly and truthfully assure you that on no occasion have I heard anything remotely resembling the dialogue in the play I am discussing. Scene after scene proceeds with this stream of empty, irreligious chatter — in another play by the same author there is a character who swears "by the mass" — and we gather by degrees that there are two brothers, one of whom is held up to our admiration, but who seems to me the worse character of the two — if there be degrees of turpitude where all is of the vilest of the vile.

The favourite brother, I must tell you, is portrayed as a spendthrift, a drunkard, a gamester, and a libertine, and he is surrounded by a gang of dissolute and insolent servants and of noisy, ill-bred boon companions who are as bad as himself. Honesty, I need scarcely say, forms no part of this person's composition; he is represented as deliberately refusing to pay his tailor's bill, preferring to spend the money in a deed of so-called charity, which happened to appeal to the false sentiment which ran riot in his maudlin, ill-regulated brain. Now we come to the climax of the piece. The brother of the young spendthrift forms a plot against the honour of the woman who is, I suppose, the "heroine" of the story, and entices her to visit his rooms on an errand of no doubtful purport. And then, in full view of the audience, we have represented the attempted seduction of this foolish and thoughtless wife, whose levity of character brings her to the very brink of destruction. On the one side are all the arguments that a specious and abandoned hypocrite can muster, on the other retorts which we are supposed to accept as wit, and so the scene proceeds to its most unpleasant termination. The worst, it is true, does not happen; but all but the worst happens; and this is the "classic" English Drama, this deliberate and elaborate representation of lust, debauchery, and the lowest and most degraded passions in poor human nature.

You will scarcely believe me when I tell you the defence that has been made for this most disgusting piece of prurience and indecency. It is simply this: we are told, forsooth, that there is no harm in it because it is a "Comedy of Manners," because the whole thing is an elaborate jest! It is a comedy of very bad manners assuredly, and I suppose that you or I would not have much difficulty in stringing together disgusting phrases collected from the drunken revellers of the pot-house and the gutter. As for the theory that the actor is at liberty to depict the vicious and abandoned lives of wicked people, to utter before an audience which may, and probably does, contain a considerable proportion of young people sentiments of the most horrible and disgusting nature, to portray at other times vice in its most alluring character; to do all this without reproach because his dress is of the eighteenth century fashion and not of the twentieth: I say that such a theory is monstrous. Sin is sin, and vice is vice in bloom-coloured satin as in black broadcloth, and a lustful heart is no less odious under lace ruffles than under plain linen. So much for the theory of "the Comedy of Manners." As for the other defence that has been proposed it is even more monstrous and offensive to the common sense of humanity. I cannot conceive how anybody in his sober senses can defend plays such as this because they are supposed to be quite unserious, to treat human nature, both good and evil, as a vast jest. My dear sir, this defence is itself an accusation and a heavy one. Are we sent into this vale of tears to laugh and make merry over ourselves and our destiny? Is the Life of Man, that great Drama which is being performed before the dread audience of High Heaven matter for quip and retort, for senseless and thoughtless merriment? We know that the architects of the Dark Ages thought so; bewildered with superstition, they defiled even their own idolatrous holy places, and sculptured grotesque infamies by the very horns of the altar; while the wretched monks mingled obscene jokes with the would-be sacred mummeries that they called Mystery Plays. All this need not surprise us, for the world was then drunk with the wine of the fornications of Rome; but that so-called men-of-letters, men of education and presumably sharers in the enlightenment which since those dark old days has blessed the earth should deliberately put forward such a theory in modern times is more than surprising; it would be unthinkable if it were not, unhappily, true. Life is real, life is earnest, said the poet; life is a futile but amusing jest say the apologists for these dreadful plays. Adultery is an amusing situation, theft is the odd humour of a comic servant, the debauchery of young men is the theme of endless merriment, drunkenness will set the whole house in a roar, the dishonest debtor is a charming and entertaining hero, slander and lies and calumny make a capital scene, and finally, the only person in the play in question whose sentiments approach the verge of decency and good behaviour is held up to execration as the villain of the piece.

Is it any wonder that amongst earnest Christians such terms as "art" and "classic" are at least terms of suspicion? Is it any wonder that when we hear people singing the praises of the "exquisite art" of this or that volume, when play or poem or picture is awarded the palm of "classic merit," is it wonderful, I say, that we simple Puritans are apt to take alarm, to imagine, and not, as you will confess, without reason, that "classics" are mostly museums of indecency, and that "art" means either Popery or immorality, or both?

I am told, and I am afraid it is true, that at the present time in London there are places of public entertainment where young women counterfeit at all events, the action of taking off their clothes, of undressing, in fact, upon the stage; while in one case a woman has been found who is indecent enough to exhibit herself before thousands in what is, practically, a state of nature. You may note, by the way, that in the latter case the exhibition is supposed to be sanctioned by the name of "art," to be "classic" in so much as the unhappy female in question assumes, I believe, the appearance of some of the statues which have survived to us from heathen times. Now, as you may imagine, no voice will be raised higher than mine against these and all similar exhibitions. The prurient hypocrisy of shewing an audience a naked woman and of pretending at the same time that the sight is "classic" needs no comment from me. But bad as this is, I am quite sure that it is not so bad as the terrible scene from the "classic" comedy which I outlined for you. For, after all, clothes are a convention; a convention of decency and seemliness it is true, but still a convention and not an eternal law. An African woman, clad in a bead girdle, may be, and very likely is, as modest, or much more modest, than an Englishwoman dressed for a great dinner according to the latest dictates of the prevailing fashion. Clothes, I say, are a convention and a convention that affects the body only; how much more important is the clothing of the mind? Conceive the effect on the average young man and woman, while this heroine of the play is being tempted and approached before them; are not the priceless veils of maiden modesty torn, not from the body of the person on the stage, but from the souls of those who gaze at this awful spectacle?

I suppose you will ask me if I expect the writers of such things to address themselves exclusively to the Young Person — if I intend to tie their soaring genius to the pinafores of my children. I say in answer to that query, that it is not I who chose the medium through which these persons have chosen to reveal their genius to the world, I say that having chosen that medium for themselves, they cannot rightly ignore certain responsibilities which the choice imposes on them. The field of art is a very spacious pleasure-ground indeed, and you may legitimately lay out in it almost any sort of garden plot or plantation, and may erect in it almost any sort of palace or cottage or mansion. As in Battersea Park, there are wide spaces in this field of art, and within the limits of reason and decency you may play whatever games you choose. But it is an open space, and it is dedicated to the delectation of the public. The operating theatre, the dissecting room, and the precincts of the divorce court are out of place there, and most out of place of all possible exhibitions is the exhibition of man’s lust and women’s temptation. We referred a little while ago to the mediæval carvers of grotesque obscenities; and I would say here once for all that I do not recognise the right of any maker of such things first to carve revolting shapes, and then to plump them down in the public pleasure-ground for any unsuspecting wayfarer to sicken at!

So far I have been thinking chiefly of the theatre, and I hope I have convinced you that if Free Churchmen distrust the theatre as it is they have reason for their distrust. At the same time I hope you see that it is as irrational to accuse us of a hatred of the Drama, as it would be to accuse the physician who should prescribe plentiful doses of quinine to some poor victim of malaria of hating his unfortunate patient. It is not hatred which causes the surgeon to cut off the gangrened limb, it is not hatred which makes me caution my little ones to shun the fever-stricken slum, and it is not hatred which impels us to denounce the horrors and the indecency of the so-called “classic” drama, and to take care that those we love shall not enter the halls of so deadly a contagion.

But before I pass from my consideration of the Drama to that of other forms of art, I should like to say a word on the outrageous licence which some persons who write for the public press seem to allow themselves. A friend of mine, a man of rather lax views, is in the habit, I am sorry to say, of taking in regularly, week by week, a well-known Sunday paper, which is partly concerned with the subject which we have been discussing — the Drama — and partly with the degrading and destructive topic of horseraces. I have noticed also some columns which appear to be of a jocular nature, but as the jests they contain are couched in a language which to me is quite unintelligible, and as these jests appear in some way or another to have become mingled with advertising matter, I shall say no more about the columns in question. I have often reproached my friend for taking in this paper; I have pointed out that the Fourth Commandment is not only binding in its strictest, most literal sense on all Christian people, but also prohibits every kind of relaxation or amusement, and it is relaxation and amusement, as I have urged on him, that the Sunday Paper is intended to supply. Again, I spoke briefly but firmly on the dreadful evils of betting; I reminded him of cases, known to both of us, in which whole households had been involved in awful, irretrievable ruin through the mania for gambling on race-horses: of the young fellow with good prospects and talents, with an excellent situation in a business house, tempted by these lists of odds to ruin, disgrace and imprisonment; of the sober middle-aged man, prosperous and beloved by his wife and family, yielding to a form of excitement that is worse than dram-drinkirfg, losing and betting to retrieve his losses, losing again till, his wife dead, his children in misery, he himself at last, found rest in a pauper's grave. I could mention scores of such cases, they are known to everyone who cares to interest himself in the subject, and I asked my friend if he thought it right to encourage a journal, published on the Sabbath, which made a special feature of this horrible pest of all classes in England, from the duke to the errand boy. His answer surprised me: he said he never read a line of the sporting intelligence, not knowing, as he remarked, one race from another; he was solely interested, he observed, in the front page, which, according to him, was filled by a writer of singular ability, who discoursed on the most important and weighty subjects. Indeed, my friend had such an opinion of this author that he had pasted a number of his articles into a large scrapbook, and he insisted on my accepting the loan of the volume. I took it home with me, expecting moderate entertainment, and perhaps instruction; but what was my surprise and disgust to find the greater number of these essays devoted to a credulous consideration of the darkest superstitions. I could scarcely believe my own eyes; I found a difficulty in imagining that the pages before me had been written by an apparently educated man in the twentieth century, in Protestant England. I asked myself whether my senses were not playing me false, whether these lucubrations were not in fact the gibberings of some old woman in the Dark Ages, of some pretended seeress who had collected together the myriad delusions of her equally foolish and benighted predecessors. There were tales of Ghosts and Apparitions, of Dreams and Omens and Visions, of mysterious rappings, of "clairvoyance" and "clair-audience," of Divination and Astrology; in a word, I had before me the great rubbish heap of human fatuity, a museum, as it were, of all the miserable debasing superstitions that have haunted man for centuries and have ministered to the artful devices of charlatans and priests. I assure you that I was thunderstruck, and as I looked through this encyclopaedia of imposture, imbecility and hallucination, I could scarce persuade myself that the whole series was not a translation from some journal published in the interior of Africa for the benefit of the local fetich-worshippers and medicine-men. But no; I was reading extracts from an English Newspaper; and, indeed, before long I perceived that wherever possible the Bogies and Turnip-Spectres of the writer were dressed up as far as might be in imposing scientific, or rather, pseudo-scientific terms, with the object, no doubt, of still further bewildering and bemusing the unfortunate reader; and this depth of absurdity was, as I knew, beneath even the intelligence of the superstitious negro.

There was a dear old minister whom I knew years ago, during my pastorate in the hills of Wales. We were discussing the credulity and self-delusion of mankind in these matters one night, and with a shake of his wise old head, he said: "Superstition is a wild beast, look you, that lives in each one of us, and a wild beast that grows very quick indeed, to be sure." No doubt, he was quite right; the wild beast Superstition, bred in the dark caves and dens of the earth when man was in his childhood, still dwells in our hearts, and exercises, it may be, more influence over our actions than we would care to admit. I myself, I am ashamed to say, have been perturbed to find myself sitting down with twelve fellow-guests, I have shuddered inwardly at the sight of spilled salt, and I always avoid going under a ladder. But I do not blazon these infirmities in the open day; I do not, perhaps, starve my "wild beast" as thoroughly as I could wish, but I try to keep him unseen and lonely in his den. I will not take money to make a show of him; I decline to put him on exhibition either for praise or pudding. Each of us must confess that within our souls these obscene terrors exist, and that if we cared we might publish the ghastly and horrible visions that at times come to all of us. I dare say we all know that we could, if we liked, make a very decent (and most indecent) living out of the monster that dwells within us; but for my part I decline to set the Beast on view for the gratification of a prurient vanity.

But what are we to say of a man who seems to have deliberately set himself to make a living by the ostentatious reproduction and exhibition of all that sane and decent people are willing and desirous to forget, who, week by week, is willing to pocket his wages, knowing that they have been earned by this needless and offensive resurrection of the buried plagues of heathendom and Popery? I cannot, of course, admit for a moment that these articles are written because the writer takes an especial interest in this particular subject (though I hardly see that his case would be much the better if I made such an admission); I am forced to conclude that he works, as I say, for the gratification of a prurient vanity, and for the pence of the purchaser. Does he reflect, I wonder, on what he is doing? A cheap newspaper is not in the same class as a book. About the purchase of the latter, some care is usually exercised; the subject-matter at least is more or less ascertained, criticisms in all probability have been read before the volume is placed oil our tables. Even then, should the work prove to be undesirable in its tendency, the parent or master may lbck up the offending pages, so that our boys and girls may not be injured by their perusal. But a newspaper is in a different category; there is a convention that it will contain nothing that is beyond all question corrupting to young people, and so it is bought carelessly and suffered to lie about our rooms within reach of all, both young and old. I wonder whether the author of these articles ever meditates upon the number of young lives he must have ruined, whether he gloats over the thought of the seeds of madness and delusion that he has planted in the hearts of the little ones. Has he ever thought, as he counts his gold, of the little children who cower with horror in the dark, as they recall his tales of hauntings; of the young lives which are growing up hopelessly astray, their attention and their energies misdirected, and misdirected by him, from the safe and sunny highway into the dark and pestilent dungeons beneath the house of man; of the young men and women, starting on life’s journey, who have been lured by him into the obscene thickets of madness and delusion and terror, into those unsavoury caves where half-forgotten superstitions still lurk, ready to claim their victims? A child, it may be said, would not understand such things. Possibly not, but the germ has been implanted, and in due course, the half-remembered, halfunderstood words will have their effect, and will stimulate into rampant growth a whole host of morbid and deleterious fancies that otherwise might have died of inanition.

I had thought that the final blow had been given to this most deplorable side of our human nature, that mysteries and masses, ghosts and goblins, crystal gazings and astrologies had been definitely relegated to the museum of the follies and horrors of the past. It seems that I was wrong; that the quack and the charlatan are still amongst us, anxious and willing to corrupt and deceive both youth and old age; and that an English journalist is not ashamed to make his living by pandering to some of the most noxious delusions that have haunted and enslaved the race of man.

V. Immoral Sculptures — The Domesticated Critic — The Right Place for Shakespeare.

OUR LAST CONVERSATION was, I think, in the main, devoted to the Drama; and I believe I succeeded in showing you that while we Free Churchmen object to the stage as it is at present conducted, we are so far from being hostile to the theatre, that one of our dearest wishes is to see it reformed, re-edified, and made an instrument of innocent and wholesome delight. In touching on the question of the drama, I could scarcely avoid dealing to some extent with literature, but before I go more fully into that great subject, I should like to say a word about an art which is not so generally in the public view; I mean sculpture.

Now I will say in the first place that there are certain aspects of this art which seem to me wholly laudable. When I pass through the public spaces and squares of our great metropolis and see the splendid statues of deceased statesmen — mostly, I am glad to say, of the Liberal persuasion — my heart thrills, and I feel that I am indeed a citizen of no mean country.

Those stately figures, proud and erect, clad in no unmeaning or obsolete finery, but in the homely trousers and tight-fitting frock-coat of the modern Englishman, go far to justify the sculptor’s art, and we feel that the side-whiskers and nose of such a man as Cobden deserved to be commemorated in the enduring marble. Here, too, on that shelf, you will have noticed the bust of a distinguished fellow-minister: how the brow glows with thought, how well the artist has rendered the fine flowing locks, swept back, it seems, from the forehead in some sudden access of inspiration. Nay, there are humbler walks of the art which are at least innocent; the monkey in terra-cotta swinging on his rope will certainly afford harmless amusement, and perhaps may inculcate kindness to animals; while the head of the grinning negro boy may stimulate an interest in missionary enterprise.

But here, I think, we must draw the line. We may be held up to derision as prudes and fanatics, the oft-quoted motto, honi soit qui mal y pense, may be hurled at our heads, we may be styled prurient, unclean, and I know not what else; but in spite of all clamour and all abuse we must say once for all that we cannot tolerate the making and the display of likenesses, in marble or bronze, in ivory or terracotta of the naked human form. There is a point at which all modern peoples divide the endurably coarse from the intolerably indecent and abominable. Every civilised man has a limit beyond which he will not permit himself to be carried; and, what is of at least equal importance, he has a limit beyond which he will not knowingly allow those innocences, ignorances and inexperiences which are under his guardianship or control to travel. I say that this limit is overstepped when in defiance of every principle of modesty and decency our eyes are confronted with this spectacle of nudity. A nude picture is, indeed, bad and vicious in the extreme, but what is it to the sculptured form of a large, well-shaped woman, offending our eyes with the blatant realism of bronze or marble?

I was once being entertained by one of my deacons, a comparatively wealthy tradesman. He had moved into a larger house, and was kind enough to invite me to be present at the consequent festivity. Much of the furniture, ornaments, pictures, etc., was new, and to most of it no exception could be taken. But, on looking round the drawing-room I was horrified to perceive a group of statuettes in white marble; the statuettes in question being nothing more or less than the representations of three young women, not one of whom had on a stitch of clothing. Now, as it happened, my host had three daughters, all of them modest and Christian girls, aged from sixteen to twenty-two. I had watched their progress in our Sunday School, and knew them well. So after supper I took Mr. Laskin aside, and said:

“I have a suggestion to make, which I think you will find calculated to add to the pleasure of the delightful evening we have all spent.”

“What is it, doctor?” he said. “Let’s hear about it, by all means.”

“Well,” I said, “I daresay you have heard of tableaux vivants, as they are called; the idea is that people should group themselves in such a way and in such costume as to suggest some well-known, picture or event. Now, I propose that your three daughters, Minnie, Lizzie and Muriei should take off all their clothes and see How well they can remind us of that pretty group I notice on the side-table.”

You may imagine my host’s consternation at this proposal, and it was some time before he was convinced that I had not fallen a victim to a sudden attack of mania. At last, however, my real meaning dawned upon him, and I could see that he was a good deal ashamed. The statuettes were no longer in the drawing-room on my next visit.

Would that I could persuade the world to act as promptly and as sensibly as good Mr. Laskin Yet our Art Galleries and Museums, when they are not filled with the representations of Popish Virgins and Martyrs, teem with so-called works of art such as I have just described. I sometimes see ministers of religion, schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, even mothers and aunts, conducting bands of children round the establishments’ which the nation is wasteful and wicked enough to support; and I confess’ that I view such a sight with very great misgiving, or rather, with horror. How can that be right in art which is admittedly wrong and monstrous in life? If I am not to gaze at the nude and exposed forms of the lady Sunday School teachers, why in heaven’s name should this great Protestant and Christian nation subsidise exhibitions which contain dozens of such forms, forms, moreover, which in many cases add to the offence of their nakedness by the representation of lascivious and alluring attitudes and gestures? I do not see that the antiquity of many of these objects is in any way in their favour, or excuses in the slightest degree their exhibition to the public. Indeed, I should have thought that in a professedly Christian country the pagan origin of these statues would be an additional argument in the contrary direction. But if we are to be told that we are to look with respect and admiration on every relic of antiquity, as such; then of course the path is clear, and we shall revive in our midst all the unspeakable abominations that in remote times defiled the earth. We shall see re-enacted the horrid orgies of Nero, Tiberius, and Heliogabalus; shameless processions will promenade our streets, and the last shreds of decency will depart from our nation. But on the other hand, if we do not wish to see such a state of things, we shall turn a deaf ear to those who prate to us of antiquity, we shall decline to offer up the modesty of our young men and maidens at the shrine of heathen gods and goddesses. Shew me a man who puts forward the plea of “art” in this connection; I will ask him in return how he would like to see the image of his mother in a state of nudity exposed to the gaze of grinning multitudes.

And now we must enter on the consideration - of a question which is more complicated and perhaps of more importance; I mean the question of literature. Here I hardly think I need defend myself or my friends from the charge ot detesting or despising an art which is and has been cultivated with such success by so many members of the Free Churches. The'names or Milton and Emma Jane Worboise, of Bunyan and Hocking, of Baxter and the Rev. E. P. Roe are, I think, sufficient testimony to the contrary. In poetry and fiction, in allegory and exposition we have taught the world the way of excellence, and we might be content with the testimony that such names as these afford. But we have done much more than this. Who can read such works as John Halifax Gentleman, Adam Bede, and Robert Elsmere — to name the masterpieces of the last century — and not acknowledge that these great books are Puritan to the backbone? I can never look into certain of these pages without my mind being carried back to the days of my youth, when I worshipped in an old-fashioned church situated in a great manufacturing town in the north. It was not a beautiful and ornate building such as that to which my ministry is now given; for it bore on its grey stone front the inscription — Ebenezer, 1809 — and in those days the sturdy Independents of the north were not much given to architectural adornment or aesthetic superfluity. No, it was a stern and rugged building, with plain windows and square doorway; but the memory of it is still sweet to me, and I shall never forget a series of sermons preached there, sermons about "Men who got on." The preacher took such examples as Jacob, David and Jehu; and he told the old-world stories with such simple directness in his plain Yorkshire speech that to me at all events they became no mere chronicles of dead and buried kings and patriarchs, but the living histories of living men, whose careers offered as important lessons as the careers of the good citizens of Leeds itself. One was taken from the semi-mythical, wholly oriental atmosphere of the old records right into the life and bustle of modern streets; one heard the busy hum of machinery, the rattle of the loom, the tread of hurrying and eager feet. The preacher shewed us that these old heroes of the Jewish nation were in fact very near to us, that then, as now, strict attention to business, to the business in hand, was bound to ensure success, in Leeds as in Jerusalem, in Yorkshire as in Syria. Even now I can remember the glow of satisfaction that seemed to radiate from the congregation when the good minister told us that Jacob "was a good Yorkshire lad at heart. He knew well enough if you want to get on you must start well, whether it’s in God’s service or in man’s service. Jacob was not a man for compliments and soft sawder — he had no time for that any more than we have at Leeds — he had the Pottage and the Skins ready when they were wanted, and so he became the father of a great people. He stuck to his business, and so his business stuck to him.” It was to such heart-lifting discourses as this that I listened in the old grey chapel thirty years ago, and still the preacher’s tones, the faint aroma of hair-oil and peppermint, the listening faces of the sturdy, well-to-do congregation, and the sweet notes of the hymn return to me when I open the leaves of John Halifax.

So it is in a greater or less degree with the works of the other writers I have mentioned. I should like to see on the title-pages of George Eliot’s wonderful books three well-known words — Beth-el Vll raise. In formal theological belief, perhaps, she was severed from us; none the less does one gather from her pages the aroma of the good, old-fashioned “meetinghouses” of the Midlands, of placid, gentle, undulating scenery, of plain red-brick country-towns, and above all of the Free Churchmen of the time and place, typical Englishmen and Englishwomen. It has been said that in all those books there is not a single idea; but I do not think that idealism offers many attractions to plain, Protestant England. When an Englishman wants to go from London to Manchester he does not take a balloon, he takes a — I - ticket at Euston, content with his comfortable corner of the railway carriage, and not envying the adventurous aeronaut. True; the balloon is nearer to the stars; but our traveller wishes to get to Manchester!

And so the tale goes on. English fiction of the worthier, greater kind owes a debt that can never be repaid to the influence of the Puritans and their descendants; even when its authors are not mechanically of us, spiritually they are very near to us indeed. Indeed, I know of books whose authors would have disclaimed, perhaps with indignation, both Puritan sources and Puritan influence, and yet these books are among the best representatives of our moral atmosphere. Miss Yonge, for example, was technically, I believe, a member of the Establishment, and her pages are here and there tainted with Anglican doctrine. And yet I know of no work which is more distinctly representative of our principles than hers. Those doctors and ministers in the country or in country towns, always with enormous families, the daily round of life under such conditions so faithfully and patiently described, without haste, without rest, are as good in their way as anything that George

Eliot accomplished, and as remote from the fever-heated and unwholesome atmosphere of Romanism and Ritualism and “art” as can be well imagined. We smell no fumes of incense here, our eyes are not dazzled with the sheen of strange vestments, with the complexities of antique architecture — for I have always felt quite sure that the church built by Ethel at Cocksmoor would have been one in which, with few alterations, I could have gladly ministered. Even when the peculiarities of the Establishment are mentioned, we suffer no shock, no repulsion. Richard, it is true, takes “Orders,” but he enters the church with the quiet piety and sense with which a good Free Churchman would open a shop; whatever Miss Yonge’s personal opinions may have been we do not gather from her page that she conceived of this character as called “to the awful and tremendous hierurgy of the Unbloody Sacrifice” — to use the phrase of a dreadful book which I once opened. Again, it is true that there is a “Bishop” who “consecrates” the church at Cocksmoor; but I do not think the most bigoted anti-Episcopalian need be alarmed by his appearance. Here is no mitred, mystic figure, armed with powers from worlds beyond our ken, no claimant to an imaginary apostolic succession, no maker of “sacrificing priests”; but a quiet, kindly old gentleman, who says a few pleasant words to the children; as simple and as Christian a soul as any Sunday School Superintendent. Thank heaven for it, there is no sense of mystery in Miss Yonge’s work, no dark oppression of the sacramental system in the air, nothing that might serve to cherish in the young mind the workings of a vague and fantastic imagination.

Without haste, without rest, must, as I said, have been the motto of this admirable writer. She has that sense of the importance of the infinitely little which is so characteristic of the highest genius; mark how patiently she traces the daily life of each of her child characters step by step, almost hour by hour, till we rise from the book with the delightful impression of having been inhabitants of Dr. May’s nursery for many years. Not a detail is withheld; a childish complaint is an episode, and the escapade of a boy at school has in it all the matter of a great tragedy, while a small practical joke comes near to wrecking one of the young lives in which we grow so absorbed, till, as I say, we seem to hear the energetic screaming of the younger children, the pleasing bellow of the sailor-lad, the incessant (and most edifying) oratory of Ethel, and the grave voice of the good Richard. If I may parody a passage from a very different writer, Miss Yonge has painted for us an eternal tea-table, and the hissing urn seems to whisper that the tea is not too strong. And then note the landscape which serves as a background to these deeply interesting events. There are no bottomless vales and boundless floods, no shoreless seas or sacred rivers, no cedarn caves or Titan woods — none of the distorted and unhealthy landscapes that presented themselves to the opium-drugged minds of the unhappy Edgar Poe and the ill-fated Coleridge. Just as I am sure that there were no magic casements In Dr. May’s most comfortable residence, so I feel convinced that one might seek in vain within a large radius from the agreeable country town in which he practised for anything remotely resembling fairy lands forlorn. No, we seem to look from solid red-brick houses over placid meadows, watered by gentle and sluggish streams, bordered by well-trimmed hedges’with all the gates and stiles in excellent repair. The wildest place mentioned in the book is Cocksipoor; and one understands the exquisite symbolism by which this ragged and unkempt; heath stands for the wild, strange impulses and r s r; / - Oi -V!’.M \ — ° — , / dreams which sometimes haunt and disturb the best of us, whlich we are to trim and tame at * V*f — eu.’— ‘.)[i,n.’ vis-; -:j any cost, at any sacrifice.

I have dwelt perhaps too long on a work which has always fascinated me by its truth and its simplicity, but I have demonstrated, at all events, my admiration for really fine literature, and J think I have shewn you that a Free Church minister is by no means the tasteless boor that his enemies have pictured. Now, I am sorry to say that my task will be a less pleasant one; for it is my duty to declare that much which passes under the name of literature should, in my opinion, be ruthlessly suppressed. I will not allow that perfection in the presentation makes the nature of the thing presented of little consequence; I will not allow that the deadliest poisons may be vended openly so long as the phials containing them are curiously and “artistically” shaped; I will not allow that venomous serpents should be encouraged in our back gardens for the sake of the iridescent colours which their scales display. There are those who would suffer putrid and stagnant water to collect in our highways for the pleasure of observing the green scum which gathers over such places; but against such madness as this I, at least, will never cease to raise my voice in horror and detestation.

And I must say that on the whole modern criticism has taken this view, which I maintain to be the only possible one. After all, even the most enraged mediævalists, the most atrabilious opponents of every kind of progress are obliged to confess that the present age is an ethical one It is by the standard of ethics that we form our judgment of most things. Dogma may be on the wane, for as the worthy ex-president of the Wesleyan Conference so truly affirmed, dogma is not practical, and the twentieth century is nothing if not practical. As Dr. Forrest, a notable example of the fine scholarship and literary culture of Presbyterianism, has observed in a recent and stimulating work:

“It is preposterous to call a state religious according as it does or does not make a formal profession of religion; for example, to call Spain Christian and America godless, as if, so long as the dogmatic of Christianity is preserved, it does not much matter about the ethic.” Considering what we know of the ethical code of America in social, commercial, and political affairs, considering the severity with which any infringement of this high moral standard is punished, especially in the Southern States; it seems to me that the illustration is almost too extravagant for Dr. Forrest’s purpose, but it serves my turn, inasmuch as it insists on the supreme importance of ethics. Ethics, of course, are the natural development or a free commercial state; we are not surprised therefore to note that in the Dark Ages, when the Feudal System and the Church of Rome Held down the world under a terrorism of blood and fire, there were, in our sense, no morals at all. But in commerce morals are essential, trade could not exist for a day without them, and the great commercial systems which have transformed the world from an armed camp into a peaceful factory would perish, unless sustained by a lofty ethical basis.

The world of to-day, then, is peculiarly and essentially a moral world; there is no doubt that if a Syrian Christian of the first century could revisit this earth, and compare the London and Chicago of to-day with Jerusalem of old he would be astonished at the contrast. And the moral code which governs us is itself peculiar to our age. No doubt it represents through a process of growth and development the ethics of the New Testament, but this identity is not to be discovered on the surface. Nor need this surprise us: the gigantic oak tree bears no resemblance to the acorn, and the splendid blooms in our gardens are very dissimilar from the tiny grains which we entrusted to the soil. Who, without minute and delicate observation, could identify the splendid butterfly, clad in all the colours of the rainbow, with a loathsome caterpillar crawling on the ground? So, it must not surprise us if we find in the Inspired Volume that deliberately to hurt another man's feelings is denounced to be a most capital and deadly sin, that poverty is held up to our admiration as a highly-privileged state, that the possessor of a flourishing business and an immense fortune is considered as occupying much the same position as that of a man on the brink of a frightful precipice, that the saving of money and a careful consideration of future contingencies are regarded as both imbecile and wicked. We must not be surprised again when we find the Master studiously shunning the company of what we should call the respectable classes, and associating with persons, male and female, whom we should describe as drunkards, tavern-haunters, wastrels, and "Bohemians." At the same time, I need not point out to you that this is not precisely the code of to-day. We pride ourselves on our commercial prosperity, we do not wish to imitate the Popish "saints" in their superstitious views of poverty, we regard a successful and wealthy business man as a highly enviable and laudable individual, we applaud economy and prudent foresight in business matters, and, speaking for the Free Churches, I need scarcely say that we are devoted adherents of the great cause of Temperance. With the utmost stretch of my imagination, I cannot conceive of a minister of any respectable denomination drinking in a common public-house, with actors, painters, authors, or musicians, who, I am afraid, are rarely men of very sober habits; nor can I for a moment admit that it would be possible for myself, or for any of my brethren, to cultivate the society of the unhappy women who have been branded with the shameful stigma of the Divorce Court.

But ours, as I have observed, is an ethical age, and I cannot sufficiently praise the manner in which the chief literary critics of the time have absorbed the great moral principles which are, as I have said, the backbone of the modern commercial state. I do not know any of these gentlemen personally, I am sorry to say, but if we may judge from their writings, it must be, indeed, a blessed privilege to have their acquaintance, to imbibe, as from the fountain head, those precious streams of high ethical instruction which must well out alway from their lips. And they are by no means the mere pedants of the dull old days, the dry scholars with their quaint interest in purely literary theories, with their puzzle-headed and minute knowledge of antique and dusty tomes such as Chaucer and Shakespeare, learned in occult and useless lore of poesy, gravely discoursing of sonnets and epics, of rhymes and alliterations, acquainted, very likely, with the languages of ancient Greece and Rome. No; the modem critic is far from being of this grim old fellowship; as witness Mr. Arnold Bennett, who says in the columns of a great Liberal newspaper: —

“Money talks. A litterateur who, having made a profound study of fiction, can tell you the colour of the dress in which Charlotte Bronte was married, will command a higher H remuneration (because he interests more people) than the critic who can but chatter amiably of tEe differences between the philosophy of Browning and the philosophy of Algernon Charles Swinburne.”

This is sound sense, not literary pedantry; and it is a combination of sound commercial sense with a high moral standard that has made our English criticism what it Is: the resolute guardian of our homes, determined at all hazards to ward off the prowling bands of so-called “stylists,” “artists,” “mystics,” and all other dabblers in the dark caverns of impurity and disease. I am a father myself, and it has always pleased me to think of our English critics as fathers also, as writing their profound and yet attractive essays in the midst of a laughing throng of merry, happy children; pausing now and then, perhaps, and gaining inspiration and (who knows?) ideas from the cheerful prattle of the little ones. I love to think of these men who guide the great destinies of English Literature as interested in all the details of innocent child-life, as more learned, perhaps, in the shape and uses of the tiny garments of extreme infancy than in the arid history of the masterpieces, as taking a greater interest in Nelly’s doll than in the author of Don Quixotey as giving greater thought to the quarrel between Phillis and Jacky (who is always naughty), than to the debates of the Tassoisfs and Ariostoists. Indeed, I feel sure than this fancy of mine must correspond to the truth, for in no other way can I explain the enthusiasm for the cause of youth which has so often edified me in the writings of these excellent gentlemen. Only fathers could identify themselves so absolutely with’ the childish mind, only fathers would perceive with such sure instinct the weak places, as it were, in the nursery wall and appreciate the need of guarding against the latent taste for decadent literature, so prevalent in infantine minds. This principle — that no book should be written or published which may, conceivably, do some harm to some young person or other — is a great one; it has been the salvation of our simple English shelves, and I hope that our criticism will always and without flinching maintain this splendid canon — that the book which is not fit to enter the nursery and the schoolroom is not fit to exist at all. The field of the novelist and the poet, like that of the playwright, is an open space, a Board School playground, if you please, and I contend that the man who would defile and degrade such a paradise with his grinning deathsheads, his grotesque and frightful gurgoyles, is a villain indeed.

Yes, the Principle of the Nursery, as I think I may call it, is a principle of such vital and tremendous importance, that, for my part, I often wonder why it is not extended beyond the region of literature, in which its application has been found to have such beneficent results. Why do we not regulate our whole lives by regard to the little ones, for whose physical and spiritual welfare we are directly responsible?

For example: Why should we have any newspapers? I have said something already on this topic, when I was pointing out to you the terrible harm that must be caused to the young by a person whom I will not name, writing in a journal the title of which I do not care to give. But supposing this person saw the error of his ways, and desisted from appealing to the most morbid and dangerous sides of our nature, supposing his newspaper with its contaminating betting news and reports of stage-plays ceased to exist; how should we be the better off? Take the average daily paper; what is it in the main but a catalogue of horrors, a compendium of all the degrading and abominable vices and crimes to which man is subject? If you had children, would you wish them to be posted in the last divorce case, in the unspeakable details of the unsavoury scandal of the day? Would you wish your boys and girls at the most impres* sionable period of their lives to be familiar with all the degrading vice of the West End, with the aspect of Piccadilly Circus at midnight, with the proceedings of so-called “clubs,* * which in reality deserve a much harsher appellation? Would you have these young minds interested in the careers of murderers and assassins, in the story of their crimes, forming pictures (no doubt, of ghastly realism) of murdered women concealed in cement, of a libertine’s mistress buried in a back garden, of some hapless wretch hacked to pieces by her butcher, of the dying agonies of the poisoned? The paper can be kept out of the way? Yes, but that is the excuse and the defence of the provider of moral garbage in literature, and we are agreed that such a proposition is both monstrous and futile. I leave it to your conscience as to how far you are justified in purchasing a copy of the Times to-morrow morning; for myself I have no doubt at all that the scandal of the daily paper should not be suffered to exist another day. I withdraw what I said as to the press on a former occasion; led by an irresistible argument I have been forced to see that the newspaper horror cannot, must not, be allowed to continue.

And again; why do we have fires, why do we boil water? It may be speciously urged that the little ones should be kept away from both; but I have already demonstrated the shallow folly of such a pretence as this; and as a matter of fact, it is only too common for young children to perish in terrible agony, burned or boiled alive, offered up in sacrifice to the MolocK of our selfish and abominable craving for strange luxuries, such as tea and chops. Think over this, and decide once for all whether you are prepared to insist on your roast beef at the cost of roast baby; taste, if you ca:t, your cup of tea without detecting in it the flavour of boiled infant.

Of course, we shall be told that such things are necessaries. This I emphatically deny; this, I say, is demonstrably false, a lie that must be nailed to the counter once and for all. Many millions of human beings have lived and died without having heard of these so-called necessaries; and some of the best and most enlightened Englishmen of to-day would shrink in horror from the thought of touching such abominations. The fruits of the earth are not wanting; figs, dates, tomatoes, nuts, and cereals of all kinds are plentiful and cheap, and Mr. Eustace Miles is a standing, living, triumphant example of the superiority of a vegetarian, fruitarian, nutarian, and cereal man over the devourer of roast beef and boiled chicken. The championship of the Tennis Court was won upon cutlets that were made of nuts. Once more, I say, put out your fires, throw your kettles and saucepans into the dustbin. Else you shall have upon your soul the guilt of infanticide, and the cries of boiled and roasted babies shall disturb your midnight pillow. And moreover, if you abstain from the decadent and disgusting in literature, you will doubtless find that the savours of the orgie called dinner no longer allure you; you will put away “strong* * meat and return to your innocent, happy childhood over a diet of “Riscuit” and Grape Guts.

Have not the poets always sung of a fabled Age of Gold, when iron was suffered to remain in the earth, when, in the happy childhood of the world, man found shelter beneath the oaks and ate their simple produce, washed down with water from the sparkling brook? What if this vision shoufd again be realised, if the world, weary of its follies and its crimes, should put them off and gain a second childhood?

Let us all work prayerfully, earnestly, persistently to this glorious end; but before it can be consummated much remains to be done.

I have said that so far as modern literature goes, the gates are on the whole well kept, for modern criticism does its duty with respect to the current productions of the press. But whit* am I to say of the general attitude towards the fiction, the poetry and the drama of the past? I am afraid my verdict cannot be a very favourable one. It fills me with amazement and horror when I read in the writings of authors (who are safe enough where modern work is concerned) a kind of glib, matter of fact acceptance of some of the most monstrous productions of past ages — on the ground that these abominations are “works of genius,* * “works of art,* * and I know not what else. What a monstrous inconsistency lies in the practice of forcing growing lads to acquire a knowledge of the obscenities of Aristophanes; a writer who would most deservedly be sent to gaol if he lived in our days, whom to read would spell the severest punishment, if he had written not in Greek but in plain English. Is this the way to breed English gentlemen, I ask; are we teaching our boys to become earnest and profitable Christians by forcing down their throats this filth of heathendom, this Athenian sewage? No one, surely, can sincerely think that vile and corrupting garbage is any the Setter because it was written more than two thousand years ago. Again, I say, it is not to be wondered at, if to the Free Churchman the word “classic” implies foul and deliberate nastiness. And yet, the very men who are most prompt în correcting any tendency of this kind in the work of to-day, are with the next breath ready to applaud the filth of some scoundrelly heathen, to smack their lips over some new edition of his plays or poems and to congratulate the editor on his notes — notes elucidating matter of which a Hottentot would be ashamed.

The case is much the same with writers who were at all events professing Christians. Take the case of Chaucer. Here is a man much of whose poetry is deliberately and brutally obscene; and not merely obscene in thought, idea, conception, but obscene in words. Not only are the images he presents to us of a profoundly disgusting and immoral character, but the words which he employs are such that if I uttered them in the public street I should with no long interval make my appearance in the nearest police station on the charge of using filtEy and obscene language. And yet, mark you, the works of this writer are not merely on sale, but they are on sale in cheap editions, and for two shillings and eightpence or some such sum you can buy more disgusting language than a magistrate in a low neighbourhood has to listen to in a month. And not merely is this book on sale at a cheap rate; it is actually made a text-book, it is propounded for the study of young men and girls, who are presently examined on their knowledge of one of the grossest and the vilest writers that our country ever produced. Again, I suppose the plea is that perfection in the presentation makes the nature of the thing presented of little consequence; Chaucer, I suppose, was a “stylist” and an “artist,” and all the rest of it; and again I must express my wonder that critics who would indignantly reject this plea in the case of a modern writer are ready to welcome it with applause in the case of a ruffian who has been dead for five hundred years.

I could mention many other instances of this extraordinary indulgence extended to men whose only merit lies in the fact that they wore clothes of a different fashion from those in use to-day. There is the elegant and alluring lustfulness of Boccaccio, the gross vulgarity of Cervantes, the mad obscenity of Rabelais, whose every page is strewn with abominations of thought and expression which are quite unspeakable, which belong rather to a prostitute in Bedlam than to a rational human being. But I pass these over and come to the most notorious instance of all, the universally read, the almost idolised Shakespeare. Nay; I am quite aware of the obloquy I shall encounter, I know that a kind of fetish worship has gathered round the name of this dramatist, that it is accounted a heresy to mention his works save in terms of the most extravagant praise. And I must allow that Shakespeare has written many great and admirable lines; there are whole pages, indeed, in his plays which may be read both with pleasure and profit, for the beauty of expression, the moral lesson, and the fidelity to life. Such for example are the famous soliloquy beginning “To be, or not to be,” and the hardly less famous moralisings of the Melancholy Jacques. But we purchase such gems as these too dearly when we consider what Shakespeare is as a whole, that throughout his works are scattered many passages of an extremely indecent nature, that his language is by no means such as we should tolerate in our drawing-rooms, and that again and again he appeals to some of the worst passions of Englishmen.

How vain is it for us to preach the wickedness of war from every pulpit, if with our next breath we bid our children study such a play as Henry F. We proclaim aloud at every opportunity the blessings of peace, we denounce militarism in high places and in low, we clamour for the reduction of the bloated armaments which suck the life-blood from the English People, and keep the rest of the world in a continual state of irritation and alarm. We resent such festivals as Empire Day, we banish the Union Jack from our schools, we hate and dread the very mention of conscription, and by our ridicule of the “Rifle Club” and similar schemes we do our very best to render our country defenceless in the event of invasion. Military habits — the smartness, the rigid carriage of the Body, the prompt obedience to a superior — all these we consistently look down upon and deride, for they are at once provocative and contrary to the principles of democracy. Nay, as I have said, we have found it our duty in almost every case in which a dispute has arisen between Englishmen and those of another nation to declare our own people absolutely in the wrong, to paint them as a race of savage, sordid, and barbarian robbers. When Englishmen have won victories we allude to them as,Tbrutal massacres of unarmed men,” when Englishmen have been defeated we point out that our own race is effete, rotten, cowardly, and contemptible in every respect, and that the leaders of our armies are too imbecile to fight successfully against men, whatever their prowess may be against women and children. We have done all this, I say, and we crown our work by putting into our children’s hands a book that reeks of Jingoism, Imperialism, and Patriotism; that “mafficks” on every other page, that sings the glories of all the ruffianly kings who bore rule in the Dark Ages, and never fails to applaud their most disreputable military adventures! And when to vices such as thèse we join the immeasurable contempt that the flunkey-soul of Shakespeare felt for the People, when we remember the outrageous and insulting manner in which the Democracy is treated in Coriolanus and Julius Cæsar; above all, when we read that most injurious and shameful attack on the great Cade in Henry VI. Part II., the measure of our just indignation brims over, and we Free Churchmen reluctantly but decisively announce to the world that Shakespeare must go. A few copies of the Works may possibly be allowed to be kept in the strong rooms of the County Council, and may be shewn to such scholars as can satisfy the official custodians that their curiosity is harmless; but the man who by a kind of malignant prophecy at once defiled the memory of the martyr in the people’s cause, and contrived in doing so shamelessly to caricature and degrade the policy of the great Liberal Party of to-day, shall be no guide for our children, for those Liberal citizens of to-morrow, whom we have rescued from parson and from priest.

VI. The Free Churches the heirs of Evolution, and the only Catholic Church of to-day.

I AM ALMOST afraid that in spite of the long talks we have had together I have somewhat neglected what, after all, was to have been the main object of these pleasant afternoons. When you so kindly consented to assist me in giving to the world the views of Free Churchmen, I think there was a distinct understanding that our chief consideration was to be the Free Churches themselves, looked upon as a great body of closely allied Christians who are prepared to offer their system to the world as an alternative to the ecclesiasticism which has in the past usurped the name of Christianity. For many ages, as you must know, the ears of men have been deafened by the clamorous debates of contending sects, who built upon the simple foundations of the Gospel their fantastic and complicated edifices, each widely differing from its neighbour, and each, if but poorly provided with the sanitary arrangements of real Christian piety, amply furnished, at all events, with a bristling armoury of controversial weapons, and with the boiling lead of theological acerbity. Arians and Catholics, Manicheans and Copts, Orthodox Greeks and Basilidians, Armenians and Anglicans raised their voices so loudly against one another that the thoughtful, as I say, were puzzled, and were content to stay without these contending folds (or rather camps), satisfying their religious instincts with the simple charities of the Gospel. And for some time after the Reformation, I am afraid, the Evangelical bodies perpetuated to a certain extent the evil leaven which had been handed down to them, and strove together about questions which seemed to them of vast importance but which we perceive to have been misunderstandings about trifles. Thus Calvin burned Servetus, thus Presbyterian contended with Independent, thus the Baptists were forced to leave Boston, and thus the Orthodox Church of Massachusetts was tempted into courses of some severity against the Quakers. And even in our own time I remember that excellent, though old-fashioned minister Mr. Spurgeon speaking with some severity of what he called the “Down grade” tendency in the Free Church ministry.

Thank Heaven! all that is over; we have perceived, I repeat, that the disputes which agitated the old Catholic and Arian sects and all the other bodies of puzzle-headed and cantankerous metaphysicians, which troubled to a less degree the peace of our Puritan forefathers, we have perceived that these disputes were mere quarrels over a diphthong, mere logomachies over trifles which neither party understood, which it is not important that anyone should understand. The angry battle clouds have been dispersed by the Liberal breezes that have blown from heaven, and in their places we see the great Free Church Denominations, divided, perhaps, mechanically, but really, and spiritually, and vitally united; forming the true Catholic Church of to-day.

It was of this great Body, its aims and its principles that I chiefly desired to discourse to you; but I am afraid that we have delayed so long amongst rather secondary considerations, in the outworks and exterior walls of the Edifice as it were, that I shall be obliged to be somewhat brief in discussing our vital principles — the keep on which our flag floats boldly in the breeze. However, while we talked about the public press, the superiority of America, the study of history, literature, art, the drama, the future life, and other cognate topics, you must have gathered a good deal by the way, and perhaps the omission I have mentioned has been more formal than real.

But, briefly to return to first principles; you will, of course, understand that the Free Churches have but one foundation — the Bible. There is no other foundation on which man can build than on the dear Old Book which for more than three hundred years has been the Englishman's greatest treasure, which to us seems, almost exclusively, an English book. We do not care to discuss with prying ecclesiastical antiquarians the question of the original formation of the New Testament; we just accept the dear old story as the Reformers gave it to us, and by us it shall be defended to the last against the Popish priest and the Ritualist parson. Yes; the Bible is our dearest and best possession, and we would gladly die for it.

But what do we mean by the Bible? Not the dead letter, which, as Paul observes, killeth; not the mere mechanical text? No; we value the book, not the binding; the precious liquor, not the vessel that contains it, the spirit, not the letter; the spirit as interpreted by ourselves, on whom through the liberal and scientific progress of the last century the ends of the world are come. It is an instance of the essential and vital union that exists in the Free Churches, in spite of apparent divisions, that Dr. Forrest, the Presbyterian minister, and Mr. Kelly, the ex-president of the Wesleyan Conference, agree on this great principle — dogma (which is of the letter) is of no consequence. The ethic of a nation is its life, says Dr. Forrest, contrasting America with Spain, the rich and prosperous country with the poor; and Mr. Kelly says the same thing in other words when he told the young ministers that dogma to be tolerated / K must be practical. The age in which men squabbled about the Homoousion and the Filioque clause is gone for ever; and we should receive the Pelagians and the Albigenses to-day with the open arms of Christian fellowship. No, it is not the letter of the Old Book which we revere with such intensity; it is the exquisite spirit which exhales from those wondrous leaves, the spirit which has banished all ugly words and ugly things such as heresy and schism from our hearts and our lives, which makes us One in a sense which the world cannot understand.

And I would have you note that even in the nearly days of Puritanism this great truth was not without its witnesses. Martin Luther himself, the chief of all Protestants, when he denounced the Epistle of James as an “epistle of straw” because he did not agree with its doctrine, spoke in the spirit of a Free Churchman of to-day, though we may not imitate the hearty bluntness of the great Reformer. Milton, too, understood how to transcend the letter when he published his famous manifesto on Divorce, anticipating by more than two centuries the grand liberty of the United States; and even the Anglican reformers saw something of the truth when they quietly dismiss Unction as a “corrupt following of the Apostles., But while the Anglican seems to be endeavouring to bind the chains of the letter more tightly than ever about him, we have become still more free, released at last from that cramping dungeon cell of literal dogma, the spiritual type, and no doubt the efficient cause of the dungeons and racks of the Inquisition.

I have already told you that the Free Church outlook is in the first place ethical, and, in my first conversation, I shewed you that it is in America that our ethic is most fully and completely realised. I have explained that while our moral code is built upon the foundation of the New Testament, it is rather a healthy and consistent development than a mechanical replica of the gospel system of morals. For example, we do not keep the best seats in our churches for beggars, persons in ragged or shabby clothing, or costermongers in their working dress. Our ministry, we conceive, is to the comparatively well-to-do -sheep of the house of England, and my little boy in his touching picture of the future life imaged forth, accurately enough, the kind of congregation that we like to see about us. I daresay you will have observed that Christian Churches are not very plentiful in the really poor neighbourhoods, whose degraded inhabitants we leave to the more degraded — because superstitious — ministrations of parson and priest. Take again the question of celibacy. I daresay several texts will occur to you: there is the "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake," there is Paul's distinct recommendation of celibacy as the higher and better state, there is the weird procession of the Virgins in the Revelation of John. For a man of leisure with an interest in such questions I can conceive of no more agreeable occupation than that of tracing the evolution of the modern Protestant view of the subject from these crude beginnings. You are of course aware that we have always denounced in the strongest terms the celibate vows of priests and monks and nuns, both as highly displeasing to the Almighty, and as leading in practice to the grossest and most abominable vice. We have contrasted the high ideals of the marriage state held in Protestant countries such as America with the notorious and blatant immorality of all Romanist nations; we have not spared the world our views as to priests' "nieces" or as to the internal economy of convents. Truly the ways of Evolution are mysterious; and it should be, as I say, an interesting task to trace the steps by which the bud, as it were, of the Old Gospel has unfolded into the perfect blossom of our faith to-day.

I could give you many other instances of the same kind. Usury, for example, was, I believe, unknown in the early Christian communities, and was forbidden by the grotesque Scholastic Philosophy. I need not argue this point, for since the whole of our great Commercial System hangs on the giving of interest, it would be otiose to point out that any texts which seem to forbid this practice cannot be taken in their literal sense. But there is another point which I cannot pass by, since it is concerned with the very foundation and bed-rock of all that is best and holiest and most secure in the modern Christian State. You will remember such texts as "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's,"

"honour the King," and "be subject into the higher powers, the powers that be are ordained of God"; you will remember, too, David's horror at the thought of laying hands upon the "Lord's Anointed." Leaving for the moment the superstitious fears of the young guerilla chief; I presume you know something of the character and origin of the Roman Emperors in the days we are speaking of. In the first place, supposing that there could be a legitimate title to such a thing as kingship (which I do not admit for a moment), the title of these men was as bad as bad can be, since it was simply founded on carnage and prescription, and on the shameless violation of the Roman Republican Constitution. The first Emperors sailed to power on a sea of blood and terror, and compared with them Napoleon III. appears a harmless constitutional sovereign. Passing from their public to their private characters we find them stained with every cruel and abominable vice, crime, and wickedness of which humanity at its very worst is capable; their lives are, as it were, the epitome of all the evil of the world; and the horrible barbarities which they used to the Christians seem almost a trifle when compared with the unspeakable, almost incredible catalogue of their other vices. Let us remember, then, that these were the "powers that be," of which the apostle speaks, such were the kings that were to be honoured, these the Cæsars to whom tribute was to be given; and let me ask you whether you can imagine a more violent contrast than that which exists between such teaching, and the great vital truths of Democracy in which we live and move and have our being to-day. Frankly, we should be false to all our best and most dearly bought principles if, for example, we rendered to Caesar the things supposed to be Cæsar's, without first enquiring whether the rule of Cæsar was "broad based upon the people's will," whether the tribute proposed had been ratified by the chosen representatives of the people, elected on a liberal franchise, and finally whether the money when collected would be put to uses which we could thoroughly approve. These, or so I have always understood, are the first principles and rudiments of free popular government, "by the people, for the people, and through the people"; and it will be seen that there are no "powers that be" in existence; though there may be delegates chosen for convenience by the sovereign populace. As for government which is not popular, which exists, not by the will of the majority, but in virtue of such a principle as heredity, appealing, perhaps, to imaginary celestial sanctions, and fortified by fetish-ceremonies such as "coronation' * and "unction" bestowed by medicine-men, alias bishops: it is the duty of every free man and every Free Churchman not merely not to be "subject" to such powers, not merely not to honour such kings, but rather to strain every nerve, to use every means (inclyding armed revolution and assassination) to destroy so infamous a tyranny. Unless this be our doctrine nowadays, I am at a loss to understand our attitude towards the Cæsar of Russia and his oppressed and downtrodden people, I am at a loss to understand our sympathy with Garibaldi and Mazzini, with the heroes of the French Revolution, with the Fathers of the great Republic of the United States, and finally with our ancestors, the men who judged and put to death Charles Stuart.

No: "the letter killeth," and it is the spirit and not the letter of the Grand Old Book that we follow in these and in all other instances. We are the heirs of the ages, the products of the grand process of Evolution, and it is thus that we may claim to be the true and earnest disciples of the Inspired Volume. Should we welcome the claim of a Primitive Man, if such a being existed now, to be the only True Man, to be our superior in manhood? Surely not; we should drive the hairy and apelike creature from us with contempt and disgust; and with the same feelings we repel the claims of Tories and Sacerdotalists to be the true interpreters of the Sacred Text.

By analogy, then, you will easily conjecture that as our ethic is evolutionary so also are our dogmatic and our liturgie. Our great dogma, if I may say so, is that dogmas do not greatly matter, or in the words of Pope:

For modes of faith, let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.

Hence the profound gulf which separates us from the Romanists and Ritualists who, it is well known, believe that morals are not of the slightest consequence, that all the commandments may be broken with impunity, so long as certain doctrines are held and certain superstitious ceremonies performed. Needless to say, we do not go to the other extreme; we are free to hold what dogmas we will, so long as they are not displeasing to our friends in other denominations, since we are not at liberty to profess doctrine which practically unchurches" whole bodies of earnest and devoted Christians. We are free, I should rather say, to hold whatever dogmas we please so long as we do not hold them with that "passionate certainty" which has been rebuked by an earnest minister of the Establishment, with that acerbity which is sure to follow such certainty, which brings us sooner or later to the painful and uncharitable pass of denouncing the many good men who are unable to accept the literal doctrine of the Divinity of Christ as not Christians.

For, rightly or wrongly, many of us have long felt that the time is past for fervid discussion, for earnest and vehement affirmation on this and on similar topics. The age is a practical age, an ethical age, as Mr. Kelly and Dr. Forrest have affirmed, and I think we are all inclined to echo the amusing outburst of the minister of the Establishment, to say: “Hang Theology! — and let us tax ground values.” The age is a hurrying and strenuous age, with real work in the world to be accomplished; we cannot afford to discuss the niceties of expression of early Christian metaphysicians while valuable building land is left undeveloped owing to the injustice of the laws.

Besides, are not the times “out of joint” for such questions as these? Do we not all feel in our hearts, if we are honest men, that in the whole atmosphere of the Gospel Story, literally understood, there is something strange, unreal, thaumaturgie? We must remember that the East never changes, that the dreamy, mystical Oriental was much the same in Palestine in the first century as he is in India to-day. And such a man as this was of a very different character from the bustling, energetic citizen of London and Chicago. He was not whirled to and fro morning and evening by train or tram, his mind active and busy with schemes in progress or in contemplation; nor was he compelled to strain every nerve, every capacity of his body through a long day of business; every brain cell alert lest money should not be made, or lest money should be lost. The Syrian peasant, we may almost say, had no healthy interests in life; not only was he totally devoid of business instincts and of all opportunities for using such faculties had he possessed them; but he lacked all the other interests which nowadays go to the making of a good citizen and an earnest Christian. Consider, for example, how much of the time of the energetic man of this age is taken up by politics, both local and general. In America, indeed, so engrossing and so important has this function of life become that it has been found necessary to make it a regular and recognised profession, a profession which has to be learned like any other, for which there are special aptitudes needed, in which hard, intelligent, and patient work is executed, which, like other professions, gives to the successful a great reward. In England we are still hampered by the decaying relics of the Feudal System; yet, in our rather casual, amateurish way the work is done, and many worthy and public-spirited men are found ready to serve the people even on the comparatively humble Board of Guardians without any official fee. How different was it in Jerusalem, in Bethlehem, in Nazareth of oldt The politics of a Syrian peasant consisted chiefly in doing what he was told, and in bearing with what patience he could command the exactions of his superiors. He was told no doubt in words more or less anticipatory of the Anglican Catechism to honour and obey Cæsar and all that were put in authority under him, to submit himself to all his governors, teachers, spiritual pastors and masters, to order himself lowly and reverently to all his betters, and to do his duty in that state of life in which ir had pleased* God to call him.

From such a man as this it would, of course, be as absurd to expect our modern mental and moral activities as it would be to search for such qualities in the mind of a recluse or monk of the Dark Ages; and can we not understand how to these simple peasants, whose days were spent perhaps in a round of dreamy and mystic meditation, the world must have put on the appearance of a weird phantasmagoria? To these men, watching their sheep on the solitude of the Syrian hills, a very ordinary phenomenon might appear to be the opening of the heavens, and the excited imagination of the visionary would readily fill in all appropriate details. We may not dogmatise, we may not positively assert that here lies the explanation of an astounding history; but at all events do not let us be too ready to condemn the earnest and devoted Christians whom such an explanation satisfies. And, if we take this as our keynote, much that has perplexed and grieved devout minds will become clear. We must not, of course, too rigidly prescribe the bounds of nature, for this is not the method of true science, and doubtless the mysterious phenomena of the hypnotic, telepathic and cataleptic conditions will explain many things that have seemed puzzling; but speaking generally, there are very few of the so-called miraculous occurrences in the Gospels that cannot be accounted for by the fact that the Oriental peasant was, and always has been, of a credulous and dreamy nature, prone to view the world as a vision, and to express his experiences in terms of the marvellous. Let us remember, then, that it was by and for such men that the Great Story was written; and while we may heartily acquit the writers of any attempt to deceive, we must not be too harsh towards those who are unable to accept the Gospel narrative with the same profound and literal belief that they accord to the items in their morning paper. After all, we may still show goodwill to men, even if the angels who sang the words only existed in the heated brains of the Shepherds; and if it should be proved that Lazarus was a cataleptic, the lesson would remain, and we would still, I hope, support the work of the great London Hospitals.

* There is a slight mistake here, but I give the phrase in the words of Dr. Stiggins. — A.M.

In all sincerity and humility I must say that it seems to me that this is the safer way of regarding these wondrous old records; if we are to be, as Mr. Kelly advises us, practical, if we are to utter the message that has been entrusted to us, so that it may be understood by the people; for otherwise we become but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. Science, of course, has not uttered her last word; it is possible that that which now seems incredible may be demonstrated in a thousand laboratories; but in the meanwhile let us beware how we estrange the least of these little ones, of these timid and doubting, but earnest and devoted spirits who merely ask us not to confound supernaturalism with religion. Let us remember that, so far, no man of science has pronounced in favour of the resurrection of the dead; let us not, then, turn anxious and enquiring souls away by passionately insisting on belief in such a dogma.

And when we have set aside the strange, the thaumaturgie elements in the story, how immensely valuable is the remanet! The Herald Angels, as I have remarked, will still press on us the duty of goodwill to men, still the Sacred Page will warn us to be as meek and lowly as our social positions permit, still we shall give alms to the poor, not, it is true, after the demoralising and degrading fashion of the East, but in such taxation as a progressive government may think best. And, after all, perhaps, the old ideal of the union of Church and State may receive a new meaning in our day; little by little, it may be, technical, mechanical religion may tend to disappear, and the religion of the future may turn out to be simply a name for enlightened, altruistic, and progressive political energies. It is a strange, a solemn thought that in a hundred years’ time man may find expression for all his feelings of awe and adoration by attending Liberal meetings, and the proceedings of the House of Commons may become the supreme worship of the nation. Then, perhaps, for the first time men will understand the vision of John, who saw the Heavenly City, like a Bride, descending upon earth. We cannot realise it yet; but what if “Order, order, order” were the Sanctus of the future?

But, at all events, after what I have told you of our Ethic and Dogmatic, I need scarcely say that our Liturgie does not profess to be a literal following of any Apostolic system. I know that many of my brethren think otherwise; they assert that a Free Church service is a reproduction of Christian Worship as it was in the earliest ages. But, as I have pointed out, this is a priori unlikely; for if our theory of doctrine and morals differs, as it assuredly does, from the theory of the Syrian Christians; is it not probable that our ideals of public worship will be very different from theirs? Let us remember, if you please, that the first Christians were Orientals, and therefore addicted to an elaborate system of outward forms and ceremonies. Moreover, they were Jews, to whom Ritual’was the very life of religion, whose every hour and action were regulated by ceremonial observances, who were accustomed to regard all the pomp and show of the Temple Services as the appointed and quickening images and patterns of eternal and heavenly realities. We are not surprised, then, to learn that both the Master and His disciples were devout and fervent attendants at these services, that all through the Gospels the Jewish ritual and ceremonial law is treated with reverence and respect. I need not dwell on the sacramental nature of Christianity as it is presented to us in these early documents — on such symbolisms as oil, water, bread, wine, the imposition of hands, the ceremony of breathing, the ceremonial washing ordered in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the elaborate ritual of John’s heaven — for it seems to me that from the nature of the case early Christianity could not fail to be a ceremonial and ritual religion; and such, accordingly, we find that it had become when it emerged from the darkness and the dangers of the catacombs. How should it not be so? If we find a censer in the hands of an angel in the Revelation, why should we be astonished to find a censer in the hands of the Bishop of Jerusalem in the fourth century?

And for the life of me I cannot understand why this truth should perplex and distress earnest and devout Christians. Our morals are a development; are we to expect then that our worship should be an exception and refuse to follow the great law of evolution? Of course John and his fellow disciples were Ritualists, but I have given excellent reasons why we should not follow their example. John no doubt believed that the earth was immovable, that the sun rose and set, and that the Psalms were written by King David — we know that he believed in the existence of "sorcerers" — are we, therefore, to share his belief on these points? And if not, are we to be tied down to his theory and practice of Divine Worship? The question answers itself; and till the Great Consummation that I have hinted at arrives, we shall do well to follow in the steps of Calvin and stout John Knox, and to conduct our services in a manner as remote from the practice and ideals of the Early Christians as are the meetings of a Public Company.

For let it not be forgotten that ritual is the expression of belief. Those old Syrians, with all their piety, were Sacramentalists to the backbone; to them the visible and tangible world was but the symbol of the heavenly realities, and they undoubtedly believed that by a consecrating word, by the touch of blessing the veil might be removed, the dead matter might become quick, and earthly things become the vehicle of celestial virtues. A few years ago, before I received a call to my present ministry, I was induced by an Anglican friend to attend a service in a church of the Establishment. He hoped, I think, that I should be favourably impressed by the "performance" for which the church in question is famous; but I need scarcely tell you that my feelings were those of disgust and horror. The moment I entered the doors of the edifice my nostrils were saluted with the sickening fumes of incense, and unless I am much mistaken there was a vessel containing "Holy Water" inside the church, into which some members of the congregation dipped their hands, making the superstitious sign of the cross upon their breasts with the "consecrated" fluid. The roof was richly and strangely painted; there were carved and gilded images in a side chapel, and across the church ran a screen, surmounted by a Crucifix, beside which there were two more images. The "altar," of course, was decorated with a cross or crucifix, and I was horrified to see four great candles burning in full daylight. All around me people were kneeling down, and, I have no doubt, worshipping the crucifixes and other images. The service began; a strange droning music of a wild and barbarous nature, more like an incantation of savages than the vocal praise of Christians, filled the building and produced in me a feeling of horror and repulsion that I am at a loss to express. I cannot describe these terrible proceedings at length; the strange gestures of the ministers in their Popish vestments, the thick smoke of the incense, the burning lights, and above all the weird rise and fall of that dreadful music made me feel as if I were under the influence of some horrible drug, and I wondered whether if I made an effort I could shake off the oppression of the awful sights and sounds and odours about me, and wake up in my peaceful home in Cricklewood. At last, to my unutterable relief, an old minister (the Dean of Westminster, as 1 was afterwards informed), began to preach. I shall never forget my sense of escape when I heard this excellent man characterise the conduct, of the woman who touched the Master's garment as "superstitious,' * and I was able to witness the rest of tht impious and idolatrous ceremony with something approaching indifference.

But of course the good dean was perfectly Tight; and not only this poor foolish woman but the whole population of the country was nc doubt sunken in the grossest sacramental ism — which is but another name for superstition. These deluded people believed, as we know, that dreams warned them of future events, that lunatics were persons possessed of devils, that the sick could be cured by bathing in holy wells, that the Spirit of God could be given by the imposition of human hands, that the diseased were made well, and the evil spirits expelled by "handkerchiefs and aprons" which had been touched by Paul, who himself credited such superstitions as witchcraft and the Evil Eye.

I need not tell you that such conceptions as these are utterly and completely foreign to all Protestant teaching with which I am acquainted; we no longer believe that the sick in body or mind can be made whole with ceremonies and oils, we no longer believe that we become inheritors of heaven at the touch of a drop of water, and as we have ceased to wash ceremonially before the Ordinance, so we have reduced it from a great, mystic Sacrifice and Sacrament to a touching pledge of Christian goodwill and fraternity. Evolution is justified of her children; we have submitted ourselves gladly and joyfully to her benign sway, while the Ritualist still believes that his child receives divine grace from the pat of an old gentleman called a bishop. He has stopped at the stage which was occupied by those simple and devout but ignorant and superstitious peasants of Syria, nineteen hundred years ago.

But superstitions that may have been edifying or at least harmless, "on account of their ignorance," in the mental backwoods of ancient Palestine are to-day in free, Protestant, commercial England a danger and a disgrace; and those who teach such deadly figments must be opposed relentlessly, incessantly, in season and out of season. It may be that, in the scheme of Evolution, a religion of human sacrifice was the only possible one for our far-off British ancestors; but should we tolerate such cruel and devilish rites now in this happy Protestant country? No: and already I see the lines formed, the men at arms arrayed, the glitter of the weapons and the waving of the banners; I hear the pealing of the trumpets and the heavy roll of drums, as legion after legion closes its ranks; already is begun the great battle between two great hosts — between the armies of Sacramentalism and Anti-Sacramentalism. There are defections, on one side and on the other, as the true issue is apprehended, and now you understand why we Free Churchmen are able to range ourselves with the so-called Atheists of France, with Gambetta and Combes, why we rejoice at the ending in that country of all dogmatic teaching, at the expulsion of monks and nuns and all the brood of darkness from their dens, at the driving forth of the Sisters from the hospitals; why we shall rejoice when the idol temples are closed, the fetish images and monstrances and all the paraphernalia of Sacramentalism are confiscated, and the mouths of priests and bishops effectually gagged. Our war cry is not wanting; Lloyd George proclaimed it to the House of Commons and to the listening world when he uttered the great words: “Clericalism is the Enemy!”

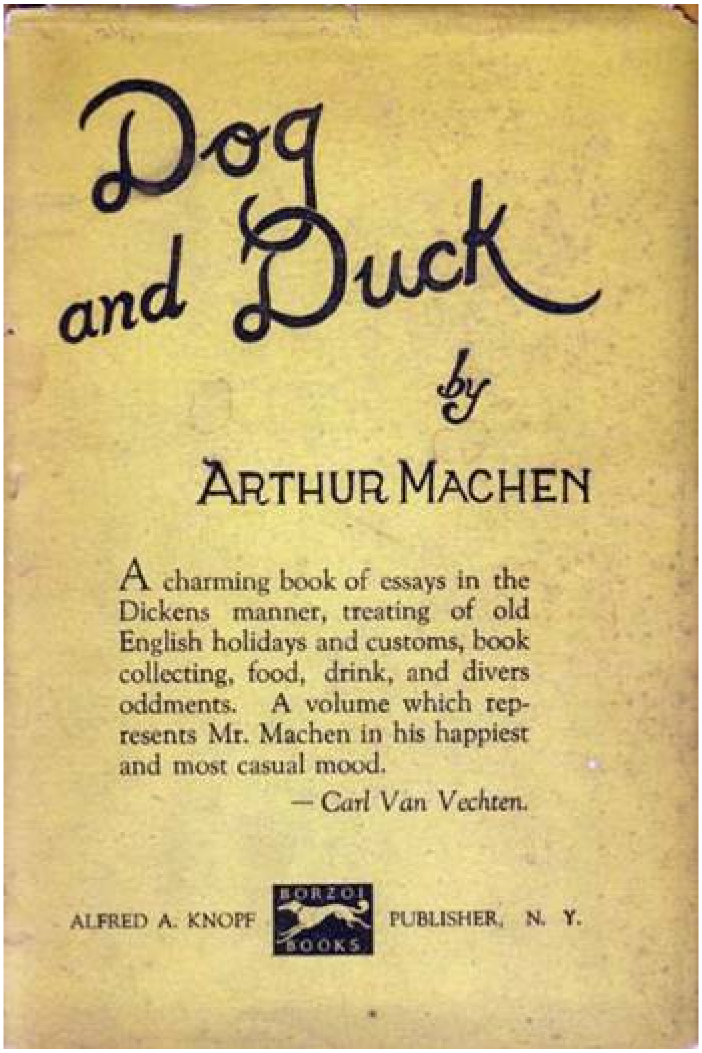
Let every man choose, once and for all, on which side he will fight; and let him remember:hat unless he fight on our side, he will have pronounced that the system called Protestantism is the deadliest and most abominable delusion that has ever fallen, for its sins, upon the world.

THE END

Dog and Duck

This non-fiction work of 1924 is a collection of occasional essays, originally published in various magazines and covering a range of topics, but with a focus on folk customs. The style is the informal ‘chatty’ tone adopted by the popular essayists of the day. It is a pleasant collection that reveals a different side to Machen for those that know him principally as an author of Gothic horror and decadent fantasies.



Dog and Duck

by

ARTHUR MACHEN

A charming book of essays in the Dickens manner, treating of old English holidays and customs, book collecting, food, drink, and divers oddments. A volume which represents Mr. Machen in his happiest and most casual mood.

DOG AND DUCK

NOT LONG AGO, I remember reading that a Stool Ball match had been played at Lord’s Cricket Ground. I said to a man I know, a person learned in games:

‘What is Stool Ball? Is it the same thing as Knurr and Spell?’

He rebuked my ignorance. He explained the two games. He explained further that even to hit the ball at Knurr and Spell a man must be northern born. He said it was one of the most difficult games that had ever been invented.

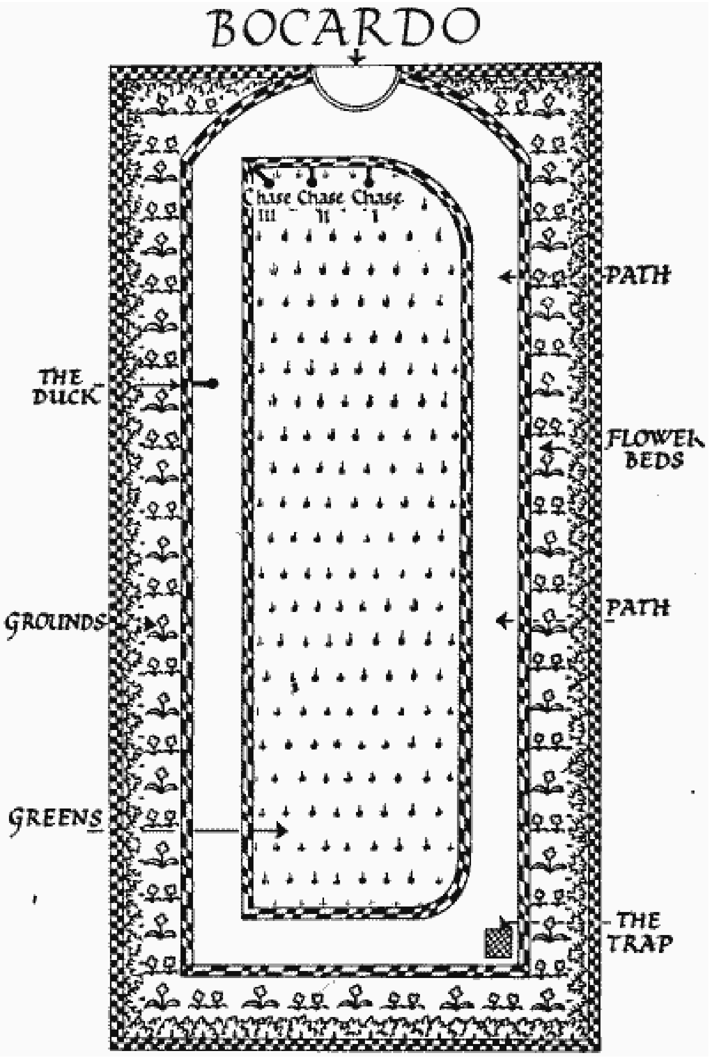
But this is merely by the way; it is an illustration of the fact that many of the old English games linger on, half-forgotten, played vehemently perhaps; but only by a few initiates.

So I dare say that many of my readers will not even have heard of the game of Dog and Duck. Yet, within ten minutes’ walk of Lord’s, the faithful few know where to find the headquarters of the M.D.D.C. — the historic Alley of the Marylebone Dog and Duck Club.

At first sight, entering the alley, one would say that here was a quiet London garden, of the old-fashioned kind, with an old-fashioned house at the back of it. Roughly, the extent of the alley — which includes, as I shall presently explain, the ‘Grounds’ and the ‘Greens’ — is twenty yards by ten. It is overhung by old trees and ivy-covered walls, and seems the very place for an old-world game. Bowls, once the favourite game of the clergy and of dignified and elderly persons generally, used to be played in just such surroundings. And Dog and Duck, like Bowls, is a game for the leisurely, a game of amenities.

I said the alley was like a garden. Well, imagine a lawn, shaped somewhat like a capital D. About it goes what we may call the garden path, this is the actual alley. On the right hand are flower beds — the ‘grounds’ — and to right and left the path is separated from grounds and greens by tiles: these are the ‘walls.’

Note one point. You entered by a door, which may be imagined to be in the middle of the top of the D. Here the alley widens to right and left, making a sort of bay in front of the door. This space, marked off by a white line, is called ‘Bocardo,’ in humorous allusion to a mode of the Fourth Figure in Scholastic Logic. If you got into this figure, you had considerable difficulty in getting out again, in getting back into the more natural first figure. There used to be a prison at Oxford called Bocardo. Facing Bocardo, the lawn, or greens, is marked off by three posts. These are the three ‘chaces,’ or scoring marks.



Now, suppose you are standing in the middle of the green, watching a match at Dog and Duck. The first man to play— ‘first troller’ as he is called — stands in the alley on a slightly raised platform, two feet square, at the right-hand bottom corner of the D. The right foot must be on the platform—

‘the trap’; the left foot on the alley behind. He takes the ball, which is a hollow india-rubber ball of two inches diameter, and begins the ‘bump’: a bump is the delivery of five balls in succession. His object is to bowl, or serve, the ball on the alley as far as possible round the top of the D. If the ball rests between chaces one and two, he scores five. If it rests between the second and third chace, he scores ten. If it turns the corner and rests in the return alley, the trailer’s score is twenty. If it passes the Duck which marks the fourth chace, the player scores forty.

But there are penalties and difficulties. The ball must not leave the alley. It may, indeed, skim on the edge of the tiles, or walls; but if it touches the earth on the right, or the lawn at the left, for a moment, the umpire, standing in the middle of the lawn, calls out ‘grounds’ or ‘greens,’ and the scorer deducts five from the player’s total: ‘lack five.’

Then, there is Bocardo. The ball that stays within the white line which marks Bocardo fails to score.

Here then, are the two great difficulties of the game. The tyro, a cricketer, possibly, possibly a distinguished amateur of bowls, smiles in a superior way as he takes his stand on the trap. He is to bowl a child’s ball round a garden path. Very good! and then, to his astonishment, the ball has jumped ‘walls,’ and is revelling in ‘grounds,’ or more rarely is disporting itself on the lawn.

The fact is that a ball, with sufficient force behind it to round the left-hand corner of the D and score twenty, is apt, save in the hands of the most skilful players, to ‘break alley,’ to ‘go to earth,’ as that famous old professional, Harry Gunter, used to put it. It takes the best part of a lifetime to learn how to impart that peculiar swirling motion to the ball which will carry it down the alley, cause it to impinge on the right wall at exactly the right angle, and then ‘bring it low,’ make it come round the D close to the top wall, and at last swing it triumphantly round the corner, perhaps to Chace IV, the Duck, and a score of forty.

The supercilious beginner comes to grief over walls; Bocardo is the terror of the experienced player. Old James Henry Messiter, who invented the ‘railway service,’ used to groan and say that ‘Bocardo beats all.’ A ball may be well held, well placed, well played, well bungled, and yet some infinitesimal error at the last moment may spoil everything. It may be only the variation of a hundredth of an inch in the ball's position as it leaves the player's fingers. But look, it swings down the alley, a free, a gallant ball; it impinges on the wall low down at the exact spot which the player has marked for it; and then, instead of coming down low it rolls up and abides placidly in Bocardo, and, as Dickens says of another game, the player's score is as blank as his face.

Bocardo lies in wait for every good player, no matter what his service may be. I have seen it bring low the hopes of a distinguished Prebendary of the Church who had studied Dog and Duck under Messiter; and I have seen it foil a well-known actor, who fancied himself extremely, as the sole possessor of the secret of Jack Toplady's 'straight slows.'

Toplady, by the way, was the only player who was ever able to score consistently with the 'white ball.' This, it may be explained, is the ball which never touches 'walls' at all, to left or right, but wheels round the curve of the D in a perfect orbit. Old players who have seen Toplady at work, have assured me that these white balls of his looked as if they were running in tapes.

The game of Dog and Duck — sometimes, in earlier days, known as Chase Mallard — makes its rare appearances in our literature. So far as I know, there has been no scientific treatise on the sport; but there are some odd allusions to it scattered up and down in old half-forgotten books. Thus, in modernized English, the mediaeval poet, traditionally known as Nicholas Scrope — his identity is uncertain — in his House of Mirth:

When men in their dalliance
Would have of mirth some pastance,
Then go they to a fair ground,
With the green tree well get around,
And green grass in abundance
To a place that is a gay pleasaunce.
And there is a pathway measured well,
This is their alley, as they tell.
And so with ball in place of bow,
They chase the mallard that may not go
One jot or whit from his station,
But abideth still in his fashion.

But though alway his stand be stable,
Yet is that ball most variable,
And departeth sudden from his right way
And all gates ever will stray;
Till men cry out, ‘Benedicite,
Ye foul ball, whither will ye flee?’

And then, the seventeenth-century moralist, some ‘seraphical’ divine of King Charles II days, speaking of the vanity of human pursuits and occupations:

So have I seen the sun break forth from the cloudy dungeons of the night and climb high in the heavens, giving gladness to the hearts of men and gently unfolding the blossom of a rose, and affording light for all our toils and salutary labours and exemplary endeavours, that we be justified, if it be but a little, before the evening cometh, and the dull curtain of darkness shut in all our scene, and it is time for a reckoning and strict account of all that we have performed. And yet within this brief allotted space of salvation which may be the last accorded to anyone, his life concluding with the day, and sinking into the gloomy retirements of the grave; yet have I seen men go forth in their madness and unthriftiness, and waste the hours of grace and of the sun, rendering to idleness and wantonness and vain sport and pleasure the sum of all they owe to God and to man. For such proceed to the places of their fond diversion, and chase a painted bird with a painted ball, till the sun vanishes under the cloud of the night, and darkness encompasses all things and the game is ended, and they have their pains for their labours, and the remorse of runagates for their choicest cogitations, and the babble of fools in their ears in place of the comfortable whisper of the angels as they lay them down to rest and to that sleep which is the quotidian prophecy of the tomb.

And so, at about the same period, Davenant doggerelizes over the game in a different spirit:

But Husband grey now comes to stall,
For Prentice notch’d he strait does call;
Where’s Dame, quoth he — quoth son of shop,
She’s gone her cake in milk to sop:
Ho! Ho! to Islington; enough!

Fetch Job my son and hearty stuff.
For there in sport we'll shout for luck,
And cry hay duck, there Dog, hay Duck.

And in the old song-books of ninety and a hundred years ago you may still occasionally come across —

THE TROLLERS' CATCH.

Trowl the ball slowly,
So it pass wholly
The mark where the Duck would catch 'em;
Thus shall it go
Both sure and slow,
And that's the way to match 'em.
Trollollilollilo.

And finally, Dog and Duck makes an odd casual appearance in one of the most remarkable trials of the eighteenth century, the famous case in which Anthony Mullins, citizen and haberdasher, was accused of the wilful murder of Thomas Jenkyns, a retired merchant, living at Enfield Wash. The body of Thomas Jenkyns was found in a pool of blood in a lonely field near Highbury; his throat being cut from ear to ear and, as one of the men who found the body declared: 'We were hard put to it to know what to do, for it seemed as if the poor man's head was almost cut away from his body, and I said to my friend, Richard Staple, who was with me: "Why, Dick," said I, "this is a villainous to-do; for if we make shift to raise the body 'tis a great chance that the man's head will fall apart, and I cannot abide the thought of it." "Why, Tom," says he, "I am much of your mind in the business. What if we leave ill work as it lies and go peaceably home by another way?" But I would not have that neither, lest, as I said, we should both be nabbed for the fact and come to Deadly Nevergreen (Tyburn) at last. And so we made shift to raise the dead man tenderly, I holding his head to his shoulders and trembling a great deal, and in this way brought him as far as Islington without any misadventure, it being late of a dark night without a moon and scarce anyone abroad.'

This murder, naturally enough, became the town talk of the day, the murdered man having many good friends in the city, and being both wealthy and hospitable. It may be mentioned by the way that the business of Mr. Thomas Brown and Mr. Richard Staple, the two men who found the body on that dark moonless night, was more than dubious, and it was conjectured that if the author of Tom Jones had been still alive, he could have furnished some interesting particulars as to their antecedents. However, no one suspected them of the actual murder, since the dead man's watch was on his body and ten guineas were found in his purse, and that was a good defence, so far as Tom and Dick were concerned. But there was a great buzz of rumour everywhere, and more especially in the northern parts of London, and all the taverns were full of strange talk and whispers of those who could tell strange tales, and at last, at the end of the week, Anthony Mullins was arrested and charged with the murder, on the evidence of three persons who swore that they had seen Mullins and the murdered man together on the afternoon of the day on which the crime was committed.

The three witnesses were: Simon Murchison, a Scot, who kept a snuffshop in Norton Folgate; William Frost, a brassfounder, of Clerkenwell; and Abraham Lewis, a clockmaker of Devizes. These three persons, it appeared, met at the Bowl and Sword tavern in Islington, not having been previously acquainted with one another, and, warming over their cups, struck up an acquaintance, and spoke, as they declared, of ill trade and the decay of good old customs and the insolence of apprentices — they were all men in late middle age.

'We all grew to be pretty dismal over the bad times,' said Abraham Lewis in his evidence, 'till at last I said: "Why, neighbours, this will never end it or mend it. Come! let us go and bump it at Dog and Duck, and I will be surety for the first bowl of punch, the lowest score of the three to be debtor for the second." And so we went out into the alley behind the tavern, and Mr. Murchison ordered pipes and a plate of tobacco, and Mr. Frost bade the drawer bring brandy to hearten the bowl, and so we set to. Mr. Frost played the game very well and crossed the Duck three times and won the match, and I was second, so it fell to Mr. Murchison to call for the second bowl. And while we were in the arbour at the side of the alley, drinking our punch and smoking tobacco, and talking of the game, two men came out of the back door of the tavern and sat on a bench by the wall, speaking together very seriously, but not as we could hear what they said. They called for liquor, and drank two glasses apiece, and so went out, and we saw no more of them.'

And the witness swore that of these two men one was Mullins, the prisoner at the bar, and the other Jenkyns, the murdered man.

'I know him,' said Lewis, pointing to Mullins, 'by his great beaked nose, and the dead man I could swear to any day, for as he lifted his glass I saw that his little finger, was crooked back, as if it had been broken; and I saw the body, and the little finger was crooked as I saw it on the live man.'

Lewis's evidence was corroborated in all essential details by his two tavern acquaintances. Murchison had noted that the prisoner had coughed, 'in a soft sort of fashion,' three or four times in the middle of his talk, and everybody in court had observed this peculiarity in Mullins as he stood in the dock. Frost described how he had seen the prisoner read a paper which the dead man had given him, and how Mullins had drawn out a very rich gold and tortoise-shell spectacle-case from his pocket, and had put on his spectacles to read the paper, and just such a spectacle-case, of an uncommon pattern, was found on Mullins, when he was arrested. And then Nancy Wilcox, who was making merry with some gay friends on ale and cheese-cakes at one of the Islington taverns on the way to Highbury Fields, feeling, as she said, a little heavy and stifled with the heat of the place and the number of the company, went out to take the air and stood by the tavern door. And Nancy swore that she saw the prisoner pass close beside her, walking with another man towards Highbury, but she would not swear that the other man was Jenkyns, though she vowed he was much like him.

Those in the court, barristers and spectators alike, were confident that the noose was already tight about Mullins' neck, when the great surprise of the trial startled them all. The prisoner's two clerks, Osborne and Nichols, swore that their master had been with them the whole afternoon, from three o'clock till eight in the evening. And as the evidence of the three men who played Dog and Duck and drank punch, showed that they were at the 'Crown and Bowl' tavern between three and five, while Nancy Wilcox fixed her coming out to take the air as 'just a little after the clock had struck four; for I said out loud, "There goes the stroke of four, and there go four cups of ale too many,"' it became of the utmost importance to the Crown to shake the evidence of Osborne and Nichols.

Osborne, it was explained, sat at a high desk directly facing Mr. Mullins' private counting-house, where he sat apart, in a place glazed in. Nichols' desk was under a window, and looked the other way, towards the door.

'I was busy with a great account,' said Osborne in court, 'but ever and again I looked up from my book, and there sat my master as he was always accustomed, but very still.'

Counsel. 'Was he not used, then, to sitting still in the counting-house?'

Osborne. 'Why, not so. He would rise now and again commonly and walk a littll to and fro, and so sit down again. And twice or thrice in an hour he would come out and speak with us about the occasions of the day.'

Counsel. 'And did he not stir at all on this afternoon?'

Osborne. 'He sat still at his desk and never moved till it was past eight in the evening.'

Counsel. 'And what did he then?'

Osborne. 'Why, he came forth with a very slow step as if he were weary, and stood awhile in the midst of the counting-house gazing about him. And so, looking about him, he saw that Nichols' place was empty, and he spoke to me in a very sunken voice, little louder than a whisper, and said to me: "Where, then, is thy fellow?" Now the truth was that Mr. Nichols had come softly to me where I sat with a candle on my desk, for it began to grow dark, and he said to me, speaking low: "Alas! my heart is very heavy. I know not what it may be, but I am sadly oppressed." I perceived that he shook a great deal as he spoke, and his face was of a pale colour, he being a ruddy man of his habit. So to cheer him, I spoke hearty, but not loud, and said, "Why, Jack, what's this? Never be downhearted. Go you softly to the 'Mitre' and drink a cup of ale and so defy the devil and the dumps." Whereon he looked fearfully to the place where Mr. Mullins sat, with no candle by him, and so crept out. Then, a little while after, when my master came forth and spoke as I have told it, I gave him the truth, that Jack had the black dog on his shoulders and I had counselled him to go out to the "Mitre" and drink some ale to warm his stomach and raise his spirits. "Alas!" said Mr. Mullins, "poor child! He might do worse than drink a cup of ale." And then came Nichols, and we two went away.'

Counsel. 'Did not the prisoner at the bar speak more with either of you?'

Osborne. ‘No word more, but nodded his head as we went out.’

Counsel. ‘And what did you then?’

Osborne. ‘Why, I made such haste as I could away, for I was appointed to meet with one at Marylebone Gardens to view the fireworks, and it was very late.’

Counsel. ‘Did you then part from Nichols?’

Osborne. ‘Aye, for he told me that there was a supper of tripe waiting for him at his lodging by Pedlar’s Acre an hour agone, and he feared lest all should be undone. “And so,” quoth he, “since I won a wager of half a guinea but yesterday over the man that reads in the dark, I’ll e’en take water and begone with all speed.” And so he fell to running very fast, and I saw him no more that night.’

All this was amply corroborated by Nichols. He was quite sure that Mullins had been in the counting-house all the afternoon, for, said he, ‘My place was by the door, and I could not have failed to see him pass, if he had gone forth.’ And then Counsel for the Crown, already hopeless of hanging the prisoner in the face of such evidence, asked him at hazard, what had been amiss with him on the afternoon of the murder. ‘Are such fits common with you?’ asked the Serjeant. ‘You have the countenance of a hearty man.’

‘Why, please you, so I am,’ answered Nichols; ‘and Hockley-in-the-Hole can answer for it. But on this afternoon there came quite suddenly a great trembling upon me, and a dread on my heart and a sickness in my stomach, and I did not know what ailed me, and I feared very much. And so I looked round on my stool, to see if my fellow, Osborne, was in his place, and looking down on the floor of the counting-house, I could have sworn that there was a great pool of blood there, with bubbles of blood in it, and I had almost swooned away for fear.’

Serjeant Munsey asked the witness no more questions, thinking him an idiot most likely, and the jury presently returned a verdict of ‘not guilty,’ and the prisoner, Mullins, was discharged.

There were rumours of an old and very bitter enmity between the murdered man and Mullins; but in face of the evidence of the two clerks that was nothing to the purpose. The murder of Thomas Jenkyns remains to this day as profound a mystery as the Campden Wonder — and that, after all, may be one of the inventions of Daniel Defoe.

Of late years, it is true, our occultists have been investigating the case from their peculiar viewpoint, and are satisfied, as far as I can make out, that Anthony Mullins was in two places at once. While the natural body of Anthony was engaged in committing murder at Highbury, his ‘astral body’ — whatever that may be — sat, or appeared to sit, in the accustomed chair in the counting-house. Possibly; but my own opinion is that the two clerks, Osborne and Nichols, perjured themselves to save their master, to whom, it afterwards appeared, they were much attached.

This must have been Jacob Courland, or Crowland, a foreigner. He had lost one eye in childhood, but possessed, as he declared, the power of seeing and reading in pitch darkness as well as in the brightest light. When in London he gave exhibitions of this singular faculty in a darkened room at the ‘Sir Hugh Myddelton’ tavern, Sadler’s Wells, and afterwards at Salters’ Hall.

WHY NEW YEAR?

WHEN I WAS a boy, which is a good many years ago, there was a very queer celebration on New Year's Day in the little Monmouthshire town where I was born, Caerleon-on-Usk. The town children — village children would be nearer the mark since the population of the place amounted to a thousand souls or thereabouts — got the biggest and bravest and gayest apple they could find in the loft, deep in the dry bracken. They put bits of gold leaf upon it. They stuck raisins into it. They inserted into the apple little sprigs of box, and then they delicately slit the ends of hazel nuts, and so worked that the nuts appeared to grow from the ends of the box-leaves, to be the disproportionate fruit of these small trees. At last, three bits of stick were fixed into the base of the apple, tripod-wise; and so it was borne round from house to house; and the children got cakes and sweets, and — those were wild days, remember — small cups of ale. And nobody knew what it was all about.

And here is the strangeness of it. Caerleon means the fort of the legions, and for about three hundred years the Second Augustan Legion was quartered there, and made a tiny Rome of the place, with amphitheatre, baths, temples, and everything necessary for the comfort of a Roman-Briton. And the Legion brought over the custom of the strena (French, étrennes) the New Year's gift of good omen. The apple, with its gold leaf, raisins and nuts, meant: 'good crops and wealth in the New Year.' It is the Latin poet, Martial, I think, who alludes to the custom. He was an ungrateful fellow; somebody sent him a gold cup as a New Year's gift, and he said that the gold of the cup was so thin that it would have done very well to put on the festive apple of the day.

Well, I suppose the Second Augustan was recalled somewhere about a.d. 400. The Saxon came to Caerleon, and after him the Dane, and then the Norman, and then the modern spirit, the worst enemy of all, and still, up to fifty years ago, the Caerleon children kept New Year's Day, as if the Legionaries were yet in garrison. And I suppose that Caerleon was the only place south of the Tweed where people took any festal notice at all of the first day in the year. For it is not an old English festival at all. It is distinctly Latin in origin. The Latin peoples have always feasted the day; socially, it ranks far above Christmas in France. Where then do we get it? The answer is that we get it from the country where the whisky comes from. It is a Scottish feast. The Scots call it Hogmanay — a word that comes from an old song with the Latin burden, hoc in anno, 'in this year' — and the Scots who dwell amongst us have so popularized the celebration that it flourishes in England, so that we fancy it an old English custom. And the reason why the Scots keep New Year's Eve and New Year's Day with all the solemnities of whisky and good resolutions and elbow-joining and Auld-lang-syneing is that for many hundred years Scotland maintained the closest relations with France. Even to this day, I suppose, there are many Scots who would speak of table-linen as 'napery,' a cup as a 'tassie,' a leg of mutton as a 'gigot,' and a wild cherry as a 'gean.' In France, the guigne is a fruit half-way between the ordinary cherry and the morella, neither as sweet as the one nor as 'dry' as the other. France, indeed, has left all manner of trace on Scottish life. A small country town in Scotland reminds the travelled Englishman strangely of many a dull little town which he has visited in France; the sort of town which the French themselves call 'un petit trou de province.' The small Scots town is not a bit like the small English town; it lacks utterly the smugness, the warm, red brick, comfortable appearance that one finds in such places as Amersham, in Buckinghamshire, Brandon, in Norfolk — or Suffolk? — and Marlborough, in Wiltshire. The county town of Scotland is French, with a certain northern grim ness about it, and if there is an old castle anywhere near, it will have the French tourelles, or 'pepperpot' turrets. And the cakes in the confectioner's shop might be matched in France, but hardly in Bond Street, for their choice elaboration, their appeal, not only to the palate, but the eye. And then the cooking: your lodging may be of the humblest, but your landlady will serve you such dishes in the way of Scots Broth and Collops as you may pray for vainly all England over. And after you have finished your broth, the meat which made it will appear on the table, garnished with its attendant herbs and vegetables; just as in France, in many country houses, the bouilli, the beef that made the soup, is served after the soup plates have been taken away.

Scotland, then, is largely a land of French custom, and thus, ultimately, of Roman custom. The Scots Law is largely Roman Law. They have no coroner in Scotland. The Procurator Fiscal ‘precognoses’ the case as the Procureur de la République makes his ‘instruction,’ his preliminary inquiry in France. And so, Scotland has given us her Latin-French festival of New Year’s Day. And it has ‘caught on’ wonderfully. Not, I think, quite in the true spirit of its native lands, Rome and France and Scotland. I spoke of ‘good resolutions’ as part of the New Year ritual; but that, perhaps, is our grave English contribution to the feast. We speak of a ‘Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year,’ and I believe that no Englishman is quite all mirth as the clock begins to strike midnight on December 31st. He may wish to be purely jolly; but somehow a tinge of solemnity will break in on his jollity. There will never be quite the abandonment of Christmas in our New Year’s mirth. We may be as worldly as we will; but in the last five minutes before the bell of twelve, I believe that a little of the Watch Night spirit of the Methodists finds its way into the cups and strikes a silence about the board.

ON VALENTINES AND OTHER THINGS

IT IS A theory of mine that one very rarely sees the last of anything. In a sense, of course, we have seen the last of the horsed omnibuses of London; we know that we shall never more behold them lumbering along the streets; those vehicles that would look almost like toys to us now, but then seemed great and gay. The last one that I saw at all was quiescent, and not in motion. There is a wharf by the canal somewhere in Camden Town. It looks as if somebody had thought of pulling it down or of turning it into something else, and had then despaired of his endeavour. On this wharf I noted, a few years ago, an old omnibus standing desolate. It is possible that the owner of the wharf had a notion that it would make a good barge: but this fancy also went the way of his other dreams. We have seen the last of the horse-omnibuses in one sense, but who can come forward and declare that he was a passenger in or on the last journey made by the last horse-omnibus in London? The old machine endured, I think, into the war. I tried to keep my eye on one that plied from Somerset House to Waterloo and back; but it faded imperceptibly and was gone. So with the Valentine. Who bought the last Valentine, and when? I can remember very well indeed the days in which the fourteenth of the month of February came with a flutter of excitement to the breakfast-table. There was no knowing what the post might or might not bring in the way of sentiment or comedy. There were the fine and scented Valentines in cardboard boxes, puffy with cotton-wool and the tenderest feelings; things of silk and satin, delicately scented, painted with flowers. And then there was satire of the milder kind, pictures of absurd young men holding crutchsticks and chewing toothpicks and looking foolish. These mortified the more sensitive recipients; and there was always the anxiety of wondering whose hand had sped the dart. The writing on the envelope was of course disguised, or written by some person whose script was unknown to the receiver of the Valentine. Hence the question: was it only that fool Bill; or, alas! was it from the fair adored Hermione?

But there was a third class of Valentine; the kind which the butcher’s boy sent to the cook, which the housemaid dispatched to the young greengrocer whose suit she scorned. No ‘nice’ stationer kept these Valentines. They were to be sought in back streets, near the rag-and-bone shop, close at hand to the broken-down furniture warehouse. They stood in rows in the windows of mean shops; things made of the thinnest paper, about five inches broad by eighteen long. They bore hideous libels on the human form, outlined in black with liberal splashes of coarse red paint, usually determining to the nose. On these things cook, who in real life was a pleasant, comfortable body, would find herself depicted as bloated beyond recognition. Beside her a bottle of brandy, half finished, might stand, and a horrid verse below would sing:

You always find the kitchen dripping handy:
You know the way to turn it into brandy.

Thus insinuating against the poor woman the vice, not only of dishonesty, but inebriety. So the young greengrocer would be counselled to keep his carrots for his own consumption, instead of wasting them on his ass:

To say the least,
If he’s a four-legged, you’re a two-legged beast.

And so on, and so on. The satire was somewhat ponderous, perhaps; but those were hearty days. The butcher boy, in particular, was an irresistible and an easy mark. Here was the opportunity for the red pigment, and plenty of it. The poor lad was depicted as gnawing a huge and bloody bone with loathsome appetite and hideous grimaces, and underneath would run the legend:

You starved so long at home
You went abroad to gnaw a bone.

And all these fine, brave things are gone! It is years upon years since I have seen them hung up in the small shops in the back streets. I think, somehow, that the last of all must have been on view in the purlieus of Hoxton; Hoxton the home of lost causes; the last place to have a genuine theatrical stock company, the last place, I fear, which will make the toy theatre, the delight of so many childhoods that have since turned to dismal old age. And I am wondering whether any collector, wise in time, felt by instinct that the day of the vulgar Valentines was almost done, and so collected them forthwith. Probably such a man arose in the nick of time; a man who specialized in this one subject, and could tell you the very year of the first Valentine depicting that bloated cook and that sanguineous butcher boy, of the firm which had the monopoly of their production. If you know this man he will show you his portfolio of back-street Valentines, and point out the rarer specimens, even the unique Undertaker Valentine, a lachrymose and drunken fellow, shedding hypocritical tears, and illustrating the couplet:

You swab your eyes, but not with grief,
You want more gin for your relief.

There must be some such collection, I am sure, and if it is but given time to age, it will become valuable. For here is one of the most curious things in that complex which we call human nature; age will give merit to anything, or almost anything. The vulgarest abuse scrawled on the walls of Pompeii has a huge interest to us; and the time will come when those old pasquinades of the London slums of twenty, thirty, fifty years ago may give more delight than grave books full of science. For, if one thinks it over, it will appear that science, which has always assumed such great airs, is one of the most fleeting and evanescent of things. It does not last; it becomes perilously near nothing at all. Take a chemistry book of twenty-five years ago, with its dogmas of the intransmutable elements, and the atom as the ultimate of matter. The elements, or some of them, have been transmuted; the atom is a universe of electrons: the chemistry of 1895 is but an idle tale. But old fellows will still chuckle as they draw their bald old heads together in the club window and recall the remark made by the driver of the ‘John Bull’ to the conductor of the yellow ‘Tilling’ in 1895, one fine summer evening.

I think some substitute should be found for the vanished Valentine and its observances. Suppose we made February 14 a day on which we could do what we liked — of course without malice or injury to our neighbours. Suppose we made a regular wild day of it, and insisted on buying chocolate creams — and why not bullseyes? — at 8.15 p.m.; on having another glass of small beer after ten, on buying cigarettes openly at eleven.

Why not — to use a vulgar old expression — go the whole hog on St. Valentine’s Day, and make believe we are Englishmen again, not inmates of a Home of Care and Restraint for the Feeble-minded?

ON SIMNEL CAKES

'MOTHERING SUNDAY,' WE may take it, falls, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, in the month of March. I should not like to be too precise, since the calculation of the date of Easter is a very knotty matter, and the oldest difference to divide Christendom into two camps. Moreover, I have not got the Dominical Letter, the Golden Number and the Epact by me; and you must have all these handy if you would talk about Easter and the dates dependent on it. But, on the whole, I think we may say safely that Mothering Sunday — called also Mi-Carême, Mid-Lent, and Refreshment Sunday — falls in March. We will not go into the question of the origin of the name 'Mothering' — a very pleasant, friendly and homely title. There are certain words in the Epistle for the day which may account for it; at all events, this Sunday has always been celebrated as a feast in the midst of a fast. And I have a very vivid recollection of the manner in which the festival was observed in the west country about fifty years ago. I was not very old then; and the ritual appealed to me highly. I can well remember the aspect of the country town on the Saturday, the market day, before Mothering Sunday. Or, I should say, the aspect of the confectioners' shops in the narrow high street. For they were more gorgeous on this day than on the market day before Christmas. They were full of cakes, cakes for every purse, wonderfully adorned with icing, white and pink; a truly delicious spectacle. For the custom of the country was that on the day following, Mothering Sunday, every child should present his mother with a cake. I believe that farm-servants, in especial, made a great point of this observance. Out of slender savings — five or six or seven pounds a year were their wages in those days — they would buy a cake and beg leave of absence from the farmer on the Sunday, tramping, some of them, ten miles over the hills to the maternal cottage, there to make their offering, and warm their hands at the old hearth before setting out again for the farm by deep lanes and black March woods. A friendly, kindly custom; one of the good observances that smoothed the rough places of life in the old days.

Now these kind cakes were, of course, Simnel cakes, though I do not recollect whether they were prepared according to the usual recipe which so pleasantly puts a layer of almond-paste not only outside the cake but in its very vitals. And, that everything should be pleasant about this mid-Lent festivity, some ingenious person was at the pains to invent an etymology for the word Simnel, which is matchless in its absurdity. Simnel was just mediaeval English for a cake. It comes from the Latin, Simila, which means the finest wheaten flour. Originally, I suppose, the English word was 'simmel,' this became 'simnel' as 'pantomime' becomes — on some lips— 'pantomine.' But about eighty or a hundred years ago, the ingenious person got to work on simnel. I conjecture that he had settled that Charing was, really, chère reine; a touching allusion to Queen Eleanor. He had shrunk from the vulgarity of Rotten Row and had demonstrated that it was a corruption Route du Roi. He had made Birdcage Walk into Bocage Walk, and had explained how energetic apprentices sometimes set the tems, or sieve, on fire. Refreshed by these labours he turned his eye on simnel — and produced his masterpiece.

Once on a time, it appears, there was an old couple, Sim and Nell by name. They were dear old people, with the best hearts in the world, but after many long years of happy married life, they had retained their several individualities. And so, when it came to a question of their having a cake, there was something of a dispute. One — I forget which — wanted it baked; the other would have a cake that was boiled. So, one regrets to say it, they differed and even quarrelled as to this cake; the debate rose to such a pitch that Nell rushed at Sim with the broom. In her violence, she broke some eggs that lay on the table, and this catastrophe brought these nice old people to their senses. They saw that they had been silly. They agreed that, to please both parties, the famous cake should be part baked, part boiled. And to round off all, and to smooth everything over, literally and metaphorically, the smashed eggs should be used to glaze the cake. And so, from this quarrel and reconciliation between Sim and Nell, the cake was naturally called Sim-nel.

There; that is the etymology; and in the words of my favourite classic, 'Get Rich Quick Wallingford': 'Can Limburger smell worse?' But I confess to being curious as to the identity of the inventor of this ridiculous and imbecile fable. Was he one with the inventor of the other etymologies which

I have mentioned, or was he ‘a little syndicate,’ operating in false derivations? — I forgot, by the way, one of the noblest efforts in this kind: the account of how the tavern sign of ‘The Goat and Compasses’ arose from the piety of Puritan days, when the Sour Saints drank their ale under the proclamation, ‘God Encompasseth Us.’ But, as I say, the mental process of the individual, or individuals, who invented the simnel nonsense, and all the other like nonsenses, interests me. Was he a leg-puller, who deliberately made up idiotic tales, chuckling as he reflected that there was no limit to human folly? Or was he merely a solemn ignoramus, with a misdirected zeal for piercing to the root of things, who sat down, as it were, before any word or phrase that he did not understand, and set his weak brains working until they evolved a feeble fable? It will ever be a mystery. In all probability, the person who invented these outrageous tales was a Rationalist, a man with the scientific mind. He perceived that it was all nonsense to talk of setting the Thames on fire; the thing couldn’t be done. He didn’t know that every nation has the proverb, the name of the river being varied. So he made up his ingenious story of the energetic apprentice and his sieve, or whatever the tems may be. And so again; never having heard of simila, fine, sifted flour, he made up the tragi-comedy of Sim and Nell.

APRIL FOOL!

DOES THE RITE of the April fool still survive amongst us? Or has it gone the way of the February Valentine and of the ceremony of the oak-apple on the twenty-ninth of May? I am afraid that if it has not gone it is going fast, like most of the light-hearted observances which our fathers loved.

I can remember the time when on the first of April men ordinarily grave and sedate enough would invent mad errands for the simple. Boys would be sent to the chemist's for a pint of pigeon's milk or to the cobbler's for a certain quantity of 'strap oil'; these April jests were mostly jokes of much the same quality as the actor's trick of sending the beginner to borrow an 'ibid,' a mysterious prop, which had its origin in the list of characters and their costumes at the beginning of the old play books. Thus, the Duke of Otranto — let us say — was to wear a black velvet mantle, black hose and shoes, and a cap with a black plume in the first act. Then, for the second act, he would be set down 'ibid'; that is, ibidem; stage Latin for 'same costume.' The young actor would go forth on his search for the ibid, and be sent from the vaults underneath the stage to the flies, and climb many stairs and peer into many strange dens before he became convinced that he might as well look for an ibis as an ibid; and such was the spirit of the ceremony and quest of the April fool. The whole principle of the business was that you were to send somebody to look for something that didn't exist and moreover wasn't there! Thus, it would be very graceful April Foolery if I were to have a number of cards printed reading like this:

HAMPTON COURT

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS

Requests the honour of your company

AT THE FEEDING OF THE DRAGONS

April 1st.
Eleven o'clock precisely.
Morning dress.

And as I write this nonsense, the conviction seizes me that every hundred such cards sent out would find at least five April fools, and very likely more. The older I grow, the more firmly I am convinced that there is no proposition, tale or statement so monstrous that it will not find some true believers. I feel certain that if I announced an Exhibition of Two-Sided Triangles, I should have numerous inquiries; and I think I could find modern artists who would paint them for me. No proposition is too absurd for belief; I knew hard-headed men of business who grew cross and heated if you hinted some doubt as to those tens of thousands of Russian soldiers who had passed through Ealing Broadway 'last Sunday morning, between ten and eleven; my brother saw them, I tell you.' Why, it is only a few weeks since I saw an odd-looking picture on the back page of a newspaper. It was, like the rest of the pictures on the page, a reproduction of a photograph. Most of it was ordinary enough; it showed a girl standing against a background of leafage. But close to the girl's head there was something not so ordinary; a little winged figure, perhaps six inches long, clothed in some gauzy stuff, appearing to float in the air, in the manner of a butterfly. That little winged figure was a fairy!

This 'fairy' is believed in and commented on by grave men, men of undoubted culture, men of undoubted intelligence — in other matters, at all events. Nay, serious scientific language is brought in to explain these in camera fairies: they are invisible to most mortal eyes, it appears, but the ultra-violet rays perceive them and fix them on the photographic plate. And their intelligence is measured by the experts; it is equal to that of the average Newfoundland dog, or perhaps a little lower. And their business? Skilled and scientific, they build up the molecules which compose the flowers.

There you are! I believe I should have a mob waiting to see the Hampton Court Dragons fed — if I placed my cards with a certain discretion.

And another instance. A dozen years ago or so, an old friend of mine, a musician, was in the artists' room of a provincial concert hall. A concert was going on, and my friend's attention was attracted by the sound of a certain showy but indifferent piece of modern violin music from the platform.

‘What are they playing that thing for?’ he asked somewhat contemptuously of another artist, a lady who was standing by him.

‘Oh, didn’t you hear,’ she replied, in a sort of reverent church whisper; ‘the Holy Grail ordered it to be played.’

The monstrous April Fool story on which this remark hung is much too long to be told here in its full significance. But briefly: somebody a few years ago picked up in a French curiosity-shop a queer saucer-like vessel of blue glass. Somebody else, seeing the thing, remarked: ‘I always think the Holy Grail must have been like that’; and so, by certain elaborate stages, the saucer — a modern imitation of antique glass, said the antiquaries — became the Holy Grail, gave oracles, diffused blessedness, and meddled with concert programmes.

‘This way for the Dragons, ladies and gentlemen!’

And now, as the preacher says, for the application. It seems pretty clear, I think, from these examples, that some of us are April Fools all the year round. There is no tale too outrageous for us to swallow, no quest too absurd for us to undertake. Pigeons’ milk, indeed! We are ready to fetch quarts of it, gallons. And it is possible that the wise men of old, from whom all good customs and strange ceremonies proceed, perceived this abounding folly of the human heart, and devised the rite of the April fool, that thereby we might be purged of absurd credulity by ‘pity and terror,’ as Aristotle has it. ‘Let there be an orgie of folly on one day in the year,’ these sages may have said, ‘so that thereby it may exhaust itself, and learn its own mad excess, and refrain itself for the remaining three hundred and sixty-four days.’ There is, of course, another explanation, known to a few. According to these people, the April Fool business is, like many other popular customs, games, and ceremonies, the remnant of a rite or mystery of the most profound antiquity. This rite, as it is declared, instructed those who had ‘passed the doors’ that most of the business of the world, especially that business commonly regarded as most weighty, important, grave and serious, is a crazy quest, a search for what doesn’t exist and isn’t there. So, say these authorities, the initiated were instructed that most of the reputed great, serious, portentous and weighty men of this world, on arriving in the other world, will be received with undying shouts of mirth and by a voice pealing in an unknown tongue a pretty close equivalent to ‘April Fool!’

THE MERRY MONTH OF MAY

I HAVE BEEN reading about the customs of May Day; of the rising up early and going into the fields and to the borders of the woods, of the gathering of the white blossoming boughs and the bearing of them home again. And of the Maypole also; of the tall tree all bedecked and garlanded and gay; and the men and women dancing round it, in sheer lightness of heart, in sheer delight that the sun is warm once more, and that the earth once more has grown green. I wonder and admire and am quite sure that the age which performed all these happy observances was, so far, infinitely more civilized than ours, which, I believe, observes May Day, so far as it observes the feast at all, by holding demonstrations of a scarlet colour and holloing of Bolshevist anthems. Without going deeply into politics, one can say quite definitely that it is more civilized to bear branches of flowering thorn than to bear the Red Flag. But, having freely admitted this much, I would urge my strong objection to the attempted revival of May Day customs — or of any old customs for the matter of that. What is the use of tying grapes on thorns or figs on thistles? You may make a ghastly and unconvincing imitation of a vine, and a fig, but the fruits will rot and the thorn will remain a thorn, and the thistle a thistle. It is without the slightest enthusiasm that I read of the revival of Morris dancing and the teaching of it; it is as if one taught laughter in the Council Schools. Little pamphlets and magazine articles would be written showing how our old English literature is full of allusions to mirth and laughter, how once upon a time everybody laughed, how an old man had been found in an out-of-the-way hamlet who still laughed, how many eminent physiologists were inclined to think that laughter, in some mysterious manner, promoted digestion. You can imagine the scene: the schoolroom smelling of damp deal boards and inkpots, its walls hung round with maps and charts, the mistress — certificated in Laughter — at her desk.

‘Now, children,’ she begins, ‘I have explained to you how once upon a time everybody laughed a great deal. We don’t quite know why they did so. Some learned men think that laughter was an imitation of a thunderstorm, and that people laughed to bring the thunder and rain and do good to the crops, just as sailors used to whistle when they wanted the wind to blow and make their ship go through the water. You heard all about that the other day in Miss Skimpton's lecture on the Mimetic and Cultural Origin of the Arts. But, whatever the reason for people laughing, it is thought that it was good for them and that it would be good for us too.

'Now, children, imitate me— '

The Mistress — sadly— 'Ha, ha, ha!'

The Children — gloomily— 'Ha, ha, ha!'

The Mistress — miserably— 'He, he, he!'

The Children — despairingly— 'He, he, he!'

Well, it may come to that, if the world goes on as it goes now, and laughter may become a lost art. But it will be of no use to try to 'revive' it. It will be idle to put it into a syllabus and teach it in the schools. And so it is idle and useless to try to revive Morris dancing or May games or Maypoles or any of the ancient customs of our fathers. For these things are effects, symptoms; not causes. You cannot get scarlet fever by painting yourself with red spots; you cannot get a light and happy heart by dancing a Morris or dancing round the Maypole or bringing in the May. The German baron in the story was found jumping over his chairs and tables. He was asked what he meant by it, and he replied: 'Sh'apprens t'être fif — by which he intended to say: 'I am learning to be lively.' But it is quite certain that he remained as heavy as ever. And it is quite certain that we have lost that quality which lay behind all these old merry customs of the May, which was the cause and source of them all. I have called that quality light-heartedness, but I am not sure but that joy is not the real name. It is already becoming something of a mystery to us, as the origin and cause and meaning of laughter had become to our imaginary County Council mistress. It was not a thing that depended upon external good fortune or ill; people had hard times and bad luck in plenty in the Middle Ages, and bad luck of a very ill kind: we may be sure of that. But, as a race, we always had joy, and that in an eminent degree, as is expressed by the phrase, 'Merry England.' We must not confuse this sense of mirth or joy or light-heartedness — whatever it may be called — with the sense of humour. That, I think, we have in a superior degree; all of us, that is, who can relish Dickens and W. W. Jacobs. The mediæval notion of a joke was primitive and practical; there are certain tales in Chaucer which are assuredly funny, but in a rough and ready way, and without the subtler flavours which we have learned to relish and appreciate. But humour has nothing much to do with a light heart; its savour is not far removed from sadness. Humour, we may almost say, is a strange and beautiful and exquisite by-product of a world which is seen to be all wrong; a recognition that its incoherences and even its tragedies have something wildly funny about them. Let us review Mr. Micawber's career as it appeared to the eyes of the world and Mrs. Micawber's family; it was, seriously, rather shocking, disastrous, and not over honest. I don't think the Middle Ages would have seen anything funny in Micawber: they would probably have whippd him. But Dickens, by a happy and marvellous magic, distilled Micawber's shabby disgraces into an elixir of rare humour.

But that quality which we have been speaking of, that quality which made Morris dances and May mirth, which caused grave lawyers to dance solemnly round an imaginary fireplace in Middle Temple Hall as late as the beginning of the eighteenth century — that quality was due to a conviction that in spite of the Black Death and the Hangman and the King's Counsellors the times were on the whole in joint, and not out of joint. Dante wrote of horrors terrible enough, and many of them eternal horrors; yet, surveying the universe, he could call his book, the 'Divine Comedy.' He could afford to be light-hearted. Not only the end, but the whole purpose and scheme, as he saw it, were happy. I think that this joy, this mirth, had departed from the world, or were fast departing from it, when Shakespeare wrote. His outlook on the universe was, I believe, on the whole, a sad one. It was thus that he was able to create Falstaff, that supreme work of humour out of the villainies and cowardices and shameful shifts of one of the most disgraceful old rascals who ever breathed in imaginative literature. To Chaucer, Falstaff would have been merely a 'recreant knight' and 'foul caitiff': but Shakespeare saw him as a fountain bubbling with laughter.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

IT WAS IN April, if I remember, that I said something about fairies. I am afraid I was talking about April fools, and more or less maintaining that they flourished not only in April but all the year round. And one example was the case of the Yorkshire Fairies, as we may conveniently call them. Or, if you like, we will be good journalists and call them the 'alleged' fairies. You know the story. Two young ladies of Yorkshire — one of them, I think, has had some practical and professional experience in the art of photography — were in the habit of taking country rambles and snapshots together. When the plates were developed, strange to say, besides the portrait and the leafage and the flowers there appeared certain forms which were easily recognizable as fairies — as the fairies of a somewhat third-rate artistic conception. Scaling the little figure against the girl's face, I should give the tiny being some nine or ten inches of height. It was draped. It had the familiar wings of the fairies in all the pictures in all the children's fairy-tale books. If you were producing a fairy play for Christmas you would dress your chorus exactly as the photographic fairy is dressed; and the 'principals' would wear a similar, though richer, habit and have like wings, more brilliantly spangled. In a word, the fairy of the photographs is the conventional fairy and nothing else. And that is why I cannot believe in that fairy. For I cannot suppose that the modern inventions of nineteenth-century storytellers, artists and stage managers can have projected themselves into nature; and no such fairies as these deal in have any place in ancient tradition. It is June; the month of the fairies, of the Midsummer Night's Dream; let us occupy ourselves a little with the fair people.

To begin with the conventional fairy, the fairy of the photograph, the fairy that we have been discussing. I trace this little creature back to Shakespeare and Herrick. Queen Mab in Mercutio's speech rode abroad in an empty hazel nut; Herrick's Oberon drinks his wine from a daisy, and his loaf is a grain of wheat. Here are minute entities, indeed. Queen Mab is to be conceived as of about the size of a housefly; Oberon may be almost as huge as a harvest mouse. Hans Andersen, who dealt more in fancy than in folklore, has such fairies in some of his tales; fairies that he concealed in tulips. But, so far as I know, this minute fairy is a purely literary invention. It is first met in Elizabethan literature; it puts on a few inches in the fairy tales of the nineteenth century, chiefly, I suppose, because a fairy queen no bigger than a fly is too small to be handled, either by writer or artist. The children's fairy-tale fairy becomes about the size of the Yorkshire photographic fairy; anything between six inches and a foot high. But, as I say, neither the minute Mab, the tiny Oberon of Herrick, nor the picture-book sprite of modern times has any original in true popular tradition. The fairies were, indeed, the 'Little People,' and hence, perhaps, the poets, exaggerating, thought of Mab small enough to ride in a hazel nut. But the older conception is also illustrated by Shakespeare. The sham fairies who plague Falstaff in 'The Merry Wives of Windsor' are impersonated by Windsor children. They are imagined, then, to be beings from three to four feet high; and such was the traditional height of the 'Little People.' Such is the figure of the Irish Leprechaun — the fairy cobbler with the pot of gold.

There is a very tempting theory which now comes in our way. It has been held that the tradition of the fairies is, in fact, the tradition preserved amongst the Celts of the small, dark race which they supplanted. There is a good deal to be said for this. It is only a few years ago that a certain hill in Ireland was excavated. This hill had been known from time immemorial and was still known as a Fairy Rath. The Little People dwelt within it; the light of their fires had been seen shining from it of dark nights. And the queer thing is that this was perfectly true. Or rather, it had been true — a thousand years ago. For the exploration of the hill showed that the primitive pre-Celtic race had dwelt within it, till the Danes broke into their hiding-place somewhere in the tenth century. And the fairy lights? The blocked-up chimney shaft of the hidden house in the hill was disclosed. No doubt, when the Little People made great fires the flames shot up and flickered on the hill-top; and were seen by some trembling wandering man astray in the wilds and the darkness. What a tale that man told when he found his way at last to friendlier fires; with the door set fast! And the stories of the fair children taken away to live in the hollow hill by the Little People, of the dark, wizened babes, the changelings, left in their place? Likely enough these things happened.

It is probable, then, that the pre-Celtic inhabitants of these islands may account for a great deal of fairy tradition; but not, I think, for all. The fairies are also gods and goddesses of the old time now diminished in dignity but still potent; and, be it remarked, always, or almost always, evil. About forty years ago I was talking of old ways with an elderly Monmouthshire farmer, and he told me that in his youth people used to put the May blossom on the doorsteps of their houses — to keep the fairies out. So, when I was driving eight years ago in the country near Belfast, my friend, a hard-headed Presbyterian man of business, showed me the mountain-ash trees planted by every house — to keep the fairies out. We have come a long way from the fancies of Shakespeare and Herrick, a long way indeed from the benevolent little beings of the children's books. In true popular tradition the fairies are always dreaded; partly, perhaps, because they were old gods and goddesses, accursed by the Christian Faith, partly, because they were the little dark people who lived in the hills and stole away the fair Celtic children from the Christian hearth. There, I think, you have the main strands in fairy tradition. But there are others. A fairy is sometimes an 'elemental,' a spirit of one of the four elements, according to the ancient theory of elements; air, fire, earth, water. The Sylphs were of the air, the Salamanders of the fire, the Gnomes of the earth, the Undines of the water; and I am sorry to say I do not know how far Paracelsus, who made this classification, was deriving from tradition and how far he was inventing or drawing on his reading in queer, forbidden manuscripts. And I am not clear as to the character of these spirits of the elements. Some servants' 'characters' are obscure, and so it is here. But I do not remember to have heard any particular good of Salamanders, considered, that is, as spirits of flame, and insinuating nothing against a harmless lizard of that name or against a cooking utensil which might be used more than it is. But on the elementals, read 'Le Comte de Gabalis,' a singular treatise of the seventeenth century.

Again, you have another kind of fairy; the Robin Goodfellow, Lob-lie-by-the-fire, the Lubber fiend; who would work hard for you at nights and thresh out your corn if you set a great bowl of cream for his refreshment. And last of all there is the Fairy Queen whom mortals sometimes visit, who, as in Walter Map's tale, makes three hundred years seem but the passing of a single night. Such was the lady to whom Thomas of Ercildoune returned at last. I am not sure whether she is the lady whom Tannhauser knew; the lady Venus; but I am certain that she has nothing to do with the Yorkshire fairy on the photographic plate.

JULY SPORT WITH SOME REMARKS ON YOUNG MR. BLUEFACE

ONE JULY PICTURE always remains clear in my mind. A heavy, sweltering heat, a dark sky with darker clouds moving across it, a promise of heavy rain — usually fulfilled — in the still air, a river flowing down from an ancient grey bridge between rich meadows, lawns and gardens and overhanging trees, vanishing beyond a wooded point beneath high leafy hills. Altogether, a beautiful English landscape, improved to my mind by the temple in eighteenth-century classic, which, if I remember, stands among the trees down stream; it is the Thames at Henley.

All the foreground of the river, on the town side, is full of boats, and the boats are full of pretty girls in pretty summery frocks talking to young men in blazers of every device with the arms of all colleges embroidered upon them. And the boats are gay with cushions of all colours, and queer entertainers wearing pink mortar-boards and blue coats and yellow trousers and black faces move up and down the river twanging the banjo and singing; altogether a very lively scene. Then, a gun is heard in the distance by the point, and up come the boats. The men row for their lives — and it is not their fault that in these days of the motor they cannot give the notion of tremendous speed — and the race is decided somewhere opposite to the boats full of pretty girls and blazers.

Now, it has once or twice been my business to be on a stand just at this point, and I have therefore had the opportunity of observing what happens to the crews when the race is over. They do not look happy. Some of them fall backward. Some of them lurch forward, their heads between their knees. Some of them have open mouths, and they gasp for breath after the fashion of fish out of the water. Some of their faces are blue. And there can be no doubt that some of them will suffer from the effects of that boat race for the rest of their lives. And the puzzle of it is that all this is done for fun. They row because they like it; it is not one of the ‘extraordinary punishments’ which the seventeenth-century Puritans accused the Star

Chamber of inflicting; it is no cruel sentence of an arbitrary and oppressive court that has condemned these young men to so many minutes of bodily torture. And let it be remembered that there has been a long period of chronic unpleasantness before the acute agony of the race. All these men have kept a kind of athletic Ramadan. They have gone into training. Their meats and their drinks have been regulated for them, their stomachs have been handed over to the trainer, every muscle of their bodies has been under strict inspection, they have had to rise at abominably early hours and go to sleep soon after the children are put to bed — and, worst of all, their tobacco has been cut off. In fact, these men in the boat have gladly consented to a rule sterner than that of a Benedictine monastery, all for the sake of this final ten minutes of long-pumping, heart-wracking, muscle-burning torment, called a boat race.

There it is; and all done voluntarily, nay, eagerly, for the pleasure, the delight of the thing. It may be said that these rowing men endure what they endure and suffer what they suffer in order that they may win. And, very likely, the men themselves think so; but they are mistaken. The winning of the race, which is, formally and in theory, the object and the reason of the whole thing, is in reality an afterthought, a cunning excuse. Excuse for what?

The priests of Baal, it may be remembered, cut themselves with knives after their manner. They pretended that they behaved in this odd way because they wanted Baal to hear them, just as our young white-robed priests of the Holy Boat pretend they go through all the torments that have been described because they want to have absurd objects called Diamond Sculls and Golden Goblets in their nominal possession for the twelve ensuing months. Both sets of priests lie, as Dr. Johnson would say, or, as we should say, are mistaken. The priests of Baal cut themselves with knives because they liked cutting themselves with knives, and the priests of Henley subject themselves to almost intolerable distress because they enjoy doing so. And it won’t do to say that they turn blue and gasp because of the honour and renown, because the pretty girls in the summery frocks love him that gaspeth, whose face is even of the colour of lead. Watch the after career of one of these men. Likely enough, you may see him in a photograph, a year or two later. The scene is an awful one. All about are hideous desolations of ice and snow. There are black gulfs as horrible as if they were prepared for Titans' graves. There are sheer depths that terrify even in a picture; precipices that your soul will remember in those dreams from which men awake sweating and shrieking. And high over these unutterable frozen wastes, high above four thousand feet of nothingness, a rock juts out precipitous. It is a smooth wall, and it leans, as it were, towards you as you look at the picture. On this sloping rock, stretched out like a spatch-cocked fowl, is young Blueface, late of Henley. He is holding on by teeth and feet and nails to fragments of uncertain stability; the failure of a quarter of an inch will send him plunging through those four thousand feet of empty air to destruction. If he is lucky, he will get to the top of that unpleasant rock and see a frightful landscape, not unlike the horrid lakes and mountains of the moon. He will then turn, and face the equal perils of the descent. And he does all this because he likes it; likes it even better than the induced suffocation and heart-disease at Henley.

And, this time, let it be noted, young Blueface has no admiring audience. There are no pretty, summery girls to be melted. There are no harmless drudges of the Press peering from their stand over the abyss, ready to record his achievement in double-leaded longprimer. There may be a paragraph in the 'Alpinist' — only seen by fellow-fakirs — mentioning briefly Mr. Blueface's successful climb of the Dummerkopf; or another sort of paragraph headed 'Alpine Fatality.' Blueface himself will never speak of the affair willingly. If you apply strong pressure to him you may squeeze out a sort of half-admission that 'the last lap of the old mound was a bit tricky'; and then he will change the subject and ask you if you have heard anything about Bolter and what you fancy for the Cantershire. Again; there it is. The terrors and the horrible dangers and the frightful bodily and mental strain of Alpine climbing are faced freely and voluntarily because they are enjoyed. Nay, take Mr. Blueface in his leisure moments, when he is resting from his acuter pleasures. It is a hot, a very hot afternoon. The thermometer mounts to 87. Existence is just bearable if you keep perfectly still. The logical understanding suggests a hammock or a deck chair in the deepest shade, a curiously compounded drink with ice, in a very long glass, and a placid pipe. What does young Blueface do? He finds another like unto him, and they get into the full blaze of the sun with a net between them, and proceed to hit a ball with a racket in the most violent manner, and to rush to and fro with tremendous speed for the next three hours, till they are as like burning coals as human beings may be.

Long ago a French book was written called A quoi tient la Supériorité des Anglo-Saxones? What is the Secret of Anglo-Saxon Supremacy? So far as I remember, the work in question offered no very helpful solution of the mystery; perhaps, we may venture to say that we owe a great deal to the fact that we have invented an odd ritual, called sport, which gives one of the most deep-seated instincts of humanity an opportunity of gratification.

A THOROUGH CHANGE

TWO HAPPY, MUSTY tags of quotation occur to me as I contemplate this month of August. One is the classic adage which informs you in a grave and ancient manner that you may fork out nature as many times as you like; but back she will come, again and again. The other tag is from the French: Change and change and change again; still the same it will remain. And putting the two together, you have the solution of the problem of the Londoner's holiday. Why is it that when he goes away for a change he looks out for some place that is as like London as possible?

You see? Expel nature with a fork; tell Mr. Londoner that what he wants is a thorough change, that he must be off to the sea-breezes and the sea-bathing of the peaceful little fishing village of Brighthelmstone, on the Sussex coast. In a very few years the Thrales have heard of it, and Jack Wilkes has heard of it, and the Prince has heard of it; and the peaceful little village of Brighthelmstone has become Brighton, a fashionable place, a place with smart shops and smart hotels, in a word, as good an imitation of London as can be knocked up on the bit of coast under the Downs. You can certainly bathe if you like, and you cannot help breathing the good salt air; but the point is that Brighton is the Londoner's home from home. And so, to refer back to the second tag, the more he is ordered change, the more he makes it the same thing, so far as it can be made the same thing.

And this by the way: I often wonder what the Brighton man does when he wants a change. If he be the wealthier sort, the case is, of course, easy enough. He moves from a smart hotel on or near the Brighton front to a smart hotel in or near Piccadilly. And he again is perfectly at home; at Brighton-on-the-Park. But some of us, alas! are not smart, whatever our habitat, and I wonder whether the people who keep lodgings in the back blocks, the up-and-beyond of Brighton, know where to go when they are ordered a complete change. I can tell them. There is a region in London little known. It was once called Spa Fields; now it has no name, or none that I have ever heard. It is to be approached by going up the Gray's Inn Road some way north of Gray’s Inn and then turning to the right. It has its Squares and its Crescents and its Places on the side of a steep hill; it has its dusty little by-streets going off these more important avenues; it has its colonies of small shops, its queer reminiscences and parodies on a small scale of old-fashioned architectural modes; just as in Brighton you come upon the most amusing reproductions of the Pavilion in little. And here is the odd thing. In the back parts of Brighton and of other old-fashioned seaside places, it is only by a strong exercise of the imagination that you can believe that you are near the sea at all. You can’t see it — though your landlady may have advertised that her apartments enjoy a fine view of it. You can’t see it, and nothing around you looks like it. Everything is gritty, urban, suburban, in its aspect. It is only faith, confidence in the scheme of the Universe, and an assurance that the L.B. & S.C.R. would not play a silly trick on you and go round and round London and call Kentish Town Preston Park; it is only a sure faith that prevents you saying: ‘Why, this is Camden Town!’ So, by an odd reversal; it is only faith of the same sort, the knowledge that life is real and life is earnest, as Longfellow said, and not an Arabian Night, that prevents you from looking out for a glimpse of the sea from that London region of which I have been speaking. You don’t expect to see much of it; you know that you are not in the best quarters of the town, where the first floor may run to anything; but you can’t help feeling that there must be a glimpse of the ocean visible from the top windows of that house in Rougemont Square. Actually, I am afraid, you would only have a prospect of St. Pancras Railway Station; still, the impression remains. And hence I say: let the people at the back of Brighton who want a real change, take lodgings up in this east-by-north of Gray’s Inn quarter. They will find it most refreshing; it is so much the same thing.

And, lest I be accused of cheap superiority, let me say that I believe most of these good people, who change to remain the same, are perfectly right. I don’t think that the majority of us are prepared for the real and tremendous changes; I don’t believe that such things would do us any good. I feel no hankerings after St. Helena; I do not wish to take a holiday on the Plains of Alberta, Canada. It is true that most of us are the better for a change; but it must usually be a slight change to be beneficial, and, often, a very slight change indeed. I have been thinking of Guernsey this August, but I shall not go there; for, if I did, I should stay there, which would be out of the question. Guernsey would be a thorough change; and I am not thinking so much of the beautiful old town of St. Peter Port, where you mount a flight of stone steps to get from one street to another, nor of the lovely coast, nor of the sweet airs of the sea. For once I am a political man; I am thinking of the Guernsey Constitution. It seems perfect. The King was there last month, we know, and the royal visit led, naturally, to meditations on Guernsey on the part of the English papers. All of them spoke of the feudal ceremonies that were observed, of the seigneurs who put their hands between the hands of the Duke of Normandy — he also happens to be King of England — and swore to be his liegemen of life and limb, ready to defend him against all manner of folk. And then there was the matter of the lords who had to come through the water to greet their Duke, and of the lord who had to present two mallards, or wild ducks, with gilded bills, on a silver dish; and so with a number of beautiful old rites. But what I heeded was a short leading article in that fairest of papers, the Manchester Guardian. The Guardian was frankly puzzled with Guernsey. The Guardian represents the old school of Liberalism: the school of Bright and Cobden — the school that at its worst was Gradgrind and Bounderby. And here, said the Guardian, was an island, boys and girls — just a little in the M’Choakumchild manner — which is happy, prosperous, loyal, contented. And yet the government of this island is in the hands of a High Bailiff, of the Jurats, elected for life, of the island parsons, and of a few officials. If the High Bailiff objects to a proposed measure, he vetoes it at once, and it is no more heard of. And, what the devil, boys and girls, the Guardian seemed to ask, if it could have used such language, does that island mean by being happy, loyal, prosperous, and contented under such an entirely preposterous Constitution? Now, as it happened, I was talking about the Guernsey Constitution and the Manchester Guardian article to a highly distinguished American. He is not obsolete, he was not born in a hot-bed of aristocratic prejudices. I think I may say he is a live wire. And he said: ‘I only wish we had the Guernsey Constitution in my country. We set out — and we meant well — to have a democracy. What we’ve got is a kakistocracy — a government by the worst men in the country.’

The American spoke on — he was eloquent like many of his countrymen — and showed, correctly, as I think, that politics and constitutions are a means, not an end, that the good and content and happiness of the people at large are the supreme end and law and reason of all governments; that the constitution of Guernsey was, therefore and evidently, perfect. Very likely he was right; and therefore I shall not take my holiday in Guernsey. I do not hold with violent changes, as I have said.

ROAST GOOSE WITH A DISSERTATION ON APPLE SAUCE AND SAGE AND ONIONS

THE WAR, I believe, is over. At all events, I will assume this to be the case, in order that I may speak of Michaelmas goose, and confess that, in common with most Englishmen, I have certain Teutonic tastes. In 1918, it was dangerous to admit a liking for Bach or Beethoven; now, I think, things are a little calmer, and I may venture to say that I like apple sauce with roast goose. As a matter of fact, I do not think that the goose, a very favourite dish in Germany, is served with apple sauce in that country; but the combination is purely Teutonic. In France, where dwells the True Church of cookery, they would shudder at the notion; ust as they shudder at lamb and mint sauce and red-currant jelly with saddle of mutton and jugged hare. I know that these things are wrong; but I like them all the same; and they are all German in feeling. In Germany, as I have read, they serve raspberry jam with roast veal, and English travellers have been known to denounce the absurdity of the combination, not seeing that it is on all fours with their own saddle of mutton and currant jelly. I say again that these things are wickedness, but I like them very well, and all peoples who have any Teutonic blood in them love such mixtures. There is the ‘Mostarda Soffrafina’ of northern Italy; it is fruit — small pears, if I remember — pickled in a hot sweet sauce. This they eat in Lombardy with their boiled beef; and from this circumstance, if all the history books in the world had perished, we might infer that the Lombards were of Teutonic stock. So, I say, I am for apple sauce with the Michaelmas goose; and, let it be added, for the stuffing of sage and onions, which, so far as I know, is a purely English and a most happy thought. Here, again, we must differ from our masters in cookery, the French. Walking once in Touraine with a French friend, I saw a bush of sage growing by the roadside. I told the Frenchman the use to which it was put in England, in relation to the goose, the duck, and the pig. He nibbled a leaf, and then looked at me with a glance which I had met before in French company.

I had met it once from M. le Curé, on his learning from me that in England we pronounce ‘Credo in unum Deum,’ ‘Creedo in yunum Deeum,’ instead of ‘Craydo in oonoom Dayoom.’ I met it again from a small farmer. We were talking in his vineyard, and as it happened, a great elderbush, laden with purple berries, grew at the corner of it. ‘In England,’ said I, ‘we make those berries there into wine.’ He glanced at me, and underlined his glance by spitting on the ground. And all three Frenchmen intimated by this glance that they had always heard that the English were fools, and that now they were sure of it. Well, true friends can still be friends, in spite of differences; even if those differences are as vital and deep-reaching as the question raised by apple sauce and sage and onions with roast goose. And, since we are on the matter of stuffing, let us consider the traditional thyme and parsley stuffing which we in England dedicate to the fowl, the turkey, and to roast veal. We eat it because we like it, but science has discovered within the last few years that ‘thymol’ is a substance of high value. It is a powerful disinfectant, it is of great service to the digestive process, it is the very thing to give to the mucous membrane; and so we have been scientific without knowing it in eating thyme with our fowl. And so, no doubt, science will presently discover that Salvine — which is the name that science will give to sage — is just as good for us as thymol. And this opens a question which has always struck me as of curious interest; the question of traditional wisdom in meat, drink, and medicine. Long ago, before chemistry in the modern sense can be said to have existed, old women used to treat goitre by rubbing a certain seaweed on the affected part. The treatment was successful; and a few hundred years afterwards science found that this seaweed contained iodine, which is just the thing for goitre. So with quinine. How did the savages of South America find out that the bark of one tree out of the thousands in their forests was good for malaria? They did so; just as our forefathers combined malt and hops into that admirable beverage, beer, without understanding in the least that they were concocting a perfectly balanced drink, which united the most valuable nutritive and tonic constituents.

It is the process by which these results were arrived at that puzzles me. Take the quinine, for example. There is, I imagine, a vast choice of trees and of plants in a South American forest. Are we to imagine the Indian of past ages threading his way through this waste of wood, tasting bits of trees, one after another, till he found the cinchona and found that it eased his pains? And our old Englishwomen, with their seaweed for goitre: how on earth did they come to think of it? And the leaf that makes tea, and the berry that gives us coffee, and the plant that affords cocoa — the only end of which is chocolate — I how are we to account for the discovery of their virtues? For with these, it is to be noted, the I process is a complicated one. Not much satisfaction, one imagines, could be obtained by chewing the green leaves of the tea shrub; nor would the grinding of raw coffee berries between the teeth be of great service to body or mind. It must have been sheer intuition which told some wise man of thousands of years ago that the leaves of the tea plant must be dried, and that then boiling water must be poured upon them, and that the resultant liquor was good to drink. And so with tobacco; how did the poor Indian know that this was stuff to be smoked in a pipe? For all we can see, the Indians of Hindustan might well have smoked their tea leaves, and the Indians of America poured boiling water on their tobacco leaves. I remember, indeed, that Amundsen, the Arctic explorer, told me how he and his companions found that the tobacco had been forgotten at one of their ‘dumps’; so they smoked tea in its place; but he did not speak well of the experiment. And I doubt whether tobacco tea would please a delicate palate. One must conceive primitive man, then, as engaged in endless dietetic and medicinal experiments; one must conceive him also as frequently feeling very unwell indeed; one must conceive him as occasionally dead. The man who wondered whether deadly nightshade would cure toothache, and made the experiment, fell a victim to the spirit of inquiry. And so, perhaps, there were anxious faces round the board when the first goose stuffed with sage and onions was eaten. It was a bold idea, all might be well; and, on the other hand, all might be very far from well.

All was well; and now, as I say, it only remains for science to prove that Salvine is the one preparation necessary to the happy digestion of the Michaelmas Goose.

WHERE ARE THE FOGS OF YESTERYEARS?

THIS IS A degenerate age. All our comforts have either gone or are fast going. I have said so again and again. Nobody heeds me, or if I am heeded I am told to think of the telephone, the aeroplane, and tubular boilers. But what idle trifling is this? Whoever heard of a jolly party drinking punch as they sat about the sparkling, dancing telephone? Is there any true history of a party, weather-bound in an aeroplane, getting down at a cloud-tavern and telling stories to each other till they had compiled a Household Words or All the Tear Round Christmas Number, only leaving the introduction, or framework, to be written by Mr. Dickens? Has a tubular boiler ever aided in the production of what John Browdie called something 'warm and varry coomfortable' to be taken after supper? Of course not; so what is the use of urging these idle conventions against my contention of the age's degeneracy?

All our comforts, I say, are passing from us. For here am I, writing in September and looking forward to October. Once on a time there would have been something to look forward to. For, with decent luck, and allowing for the eccentricities of our climate, the Londoner of twenty-five years ago had every reason to expect in October that rare treat, the first fog of the season. I must allow that the October fog was rarely, if ever, a perfect specimen of its kind. It was tender, it was, if you like, immature. It had not the richness of the right November growth. I do not think that I have ever heard of a man going past his own doorstep in a fog of October. The Great Fog Legend of the omnibus which somehow wandered into Clare Market — where is that market now? — was seen to vanish under an archway and was never seen more, belongs to November and Lord Mayor's Day. I admit, then, readily, that the amateur of fogs did not expect the great growths in October; but still there was a peculiar relish in the misty gifts of the month. A little thin, perhaps, in substance, a little lacking in the true sulphurous bouquet of later fogs; comparable, if you will, to the earliest duckling, to the August pear, but still, how relishable in their young and tender bloom! Wise men have held that a green goose eaten at Petertide has a delicacy of flavour that is wanting to the fatted bird of Michaelmas; and so there was a fleeting, sylph-like charm about the firstling fogs of October. The night before, perhaps, it had been warm and stuffy, and you began by casting off the second blanket on your bed. But somewhere in the small, mysterious hours, a chill came into the air and you half awoke, shivering slightly, and drew that rejected blanket back into its place and nestled gratefully under its genial warmth, and so fell asleep again and into happy dreams. And when the morning summons came, the light filtered dim and uncertain through the window, and, looking out, you saw not a street, but a white and fleecy cloud, through which rose the fantastic pinnacles of a fairy castle — otherwise, the chimney-pots of the houses over the way. And the noises of awakening London and the rattle of the rousing streets were hushed and muffled, as the whorls and eddies and wreaths of mist floated past your window. It had frozen in the night; and there was the exquisite result, the first fog of the year. And note the subtle relishes and aromas of this delicacy of the season. It was delightful in itself; for what can there be more delightful or of finer magic than an agency which turns Bloomsbury or Brixton into the appearance of a cloud and the architecture thereof into a thing of unearthly beauty? But beyond the actual enjoyment that your first fog afforded, how rare was it in its prophecy and promise of what was to come! You looked forward to the great fogs of November, December, January; to the masterpieces of foggery, when all London should pass into the mighty cloud, when noon should be as midnight, when the raw cold should pierce to the very bone, when an errand to the shop round the corner should be as desperate and doubtful as an errand to the Pole, almost an occasion for doorstep farewells; when huge blocks of ice should grind together in the invisible Thames, when the curtain of thick Egyptian darkness, if it were lifted for a moment, should show vast caverns and antres of tawny, fiery light, as it were the glow of a dying furnace. Such were the happy anticipations of that October morning of the past.

But, as I said once or twice before, our comforts and our simple pleasures are taken from us one by one. There are no real fogs in London now; the dimness of October gives no promise of November darkness. The last real fog was ‘presented’ on or about December 23, 1904. It was not a fog of the first class, for it was pure white and rigorists might maintain that it was merely a thick river mist. But the hansom cabmen were leading their horses, lamps went before the crawling omnibuses, and some guests, bidden to a wedding feast, went past one of the biggest London hotels without seeing it. Call it a mist if you will; but when shall we have such a mist again? And, just as I was going to write — for the third or fourth time — that life and London have few comforts left in them, it suddenly strikes me that there may be people who will declare that the London fogs of olden time were not comforts at all, but gross discomforts and miseries; that, in short, we are all the better and more comfortable without them. Well, I love a good paradox, but this is a little too much, even for me. The proposition that would deny the curious pleasures of a London fog is not a paradox; it is not even an oxymoron; it is a piece of rank absurdity. Surely this is obvious. I remember once talking to a great Arctic explorer. It was a day of piercing cold — what we in London call piercing cold — and there was a glorious and tremendous fire on the hearth. Before this fire the great man stood displayed, as I think the heralds say, in his enjoyment of the light, of the glow, of the crackling coals, and the genial heat. His face beamed like the blaze behind it, brightened like the light of the flames that danced on the dull walls. ‘You know,’ said he, ‘that nobody who has not been up to his waist in the freezing slush of the Arctic can enjoy a fire like this.’ Of course not; I saw his point at once. The argument surely needs not to be laboured; it is clear enough that the comforts of life cannot be enjoyed without the apposition of their contraries. You do not hear of the people of Aden or Bagdad or Bassorah — I prefer the old spelling — gathering about a glowing, roaring fire, drinking hot punch, and thanking Heaven for these delights. And since man is evidently meant to sit at flaming hearths and to drink hot punch, it is clear that if circumstances forbid his enjoyment of these pursuits he is so far a maimed and imperfect creature, deprived of the comforts in which he was intended to take his pleasure. Should we not then all become Arctic explorers?

That, no doubt, were the right and manly course; but there are difficulties in the way, and one can conceive objections being raised to the population of London spending the season round the North and South Poles. It would interfere with the films and with many social fixtures. In the old days there was a happy middle course. We had the fogs of which I have been speaking; with what a relish we drew back the curtains and saw the air grow dark without as the fire blazed bright within. The bitterer the chill of the air, the more grateful the warmth; the deeper the gloom without, the happier the hearts within. Decidedly, a London fog was one of the choicest of comforts.

But now, as Mr. Micawber said, when he was released from prison, everything is gone from us.

MARTINMAS

IN THE INFANCY of photography, the artist with the camera was accustomed to say to his patients: ‘Smile, please.’ In those days one had to assume rigidity for a considerable time before the releasing ‘Thank you’ was uttered; and so it was no wonder that these frozen and prolonged smiles came out in a somewhat ghastly manner, and render many an old family album a terror and a wonder to this day. But this is beside the point. I merely recall the photographer of 1869-70, because I am reversing his favourite injunction. I do not say ‘Smile, please.’ I say: ‘Be so kind as to look grave.’ For we are to have a little theology.

It comes about like this. Somebody — I forget his name and the name of his book — has just written an amusing work about the eminent men of our age. He ‘takes them off,’ I gather, with a pretty wit, and dealing with Mr. G. K. Chesterton, gives a pleasant version of the Chestertonian doctrine; that no one without a bottle of Bass in each hand can enter the Kingdom of Heaven. And the curious thing is that he is evidently under the impression that he has uttered an extravagant paroody of G. K. C., that he has reduced his position to an absurdity. Well, I cannot answer for Mr. Chesterton, but if I were he, I should accept the intended sarcasm as an admirable statement of my case; condensed, no doubt, and familiar, in its illustration, but all the better for that. Of course a man cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven without a bottle of Bass in each hand. Advanced theologians, Modernists, Universalists and all that lot may hold that one bottle in one hand may just scrape a man past the gates, but I have never had much sympathy with what is called Liberal theology. But, surely, the supposed absurd and damaging overstatement is merely the most obvious and the soundest common sense. For, sinking the technical expression of the doctrine — I am afraid pure theology is apt now and then to degenerate into asperity, and I must not get cross in these calm pages — what reason is there to suppose that a good man is one who is devoid of a palate and devoid of a stomach; devoid, in fact, of senses of any kind? It having pleased Heaven to give its creatures these faculties of sense, why should we think that Heaven will be highly gratified by our behaving as if we had no such faculties? A man who blandly but firmly declined to admit that the sun was bright or the sky was blue, on the ground \ that good men never saw anything, would run the risk of being certified. Why whould a man, who pretends that he can't taste anything be \ thought to be a being of a superior caste? For, be it noted, I am not pressing the pro-alcohol side of the argument. 'Bass,' as I take it, means something good to drink, without reference to the fact that if you drink too much of that agreeable beverage you may be led to commit indiscretions. For the moment, I am willing to substitute for 'a bottle of Bass in each hand,' 'an exquisitely made cup of chocolate in each hand,' and that beverage reminds me of the story told by the great French gourmet, Brillat Savarin. That most sensible man, reviewing the Revolution from his special point of view, deplored the ruin that it brought to the monasteries and the convents. These, he said, speaking from experience, were the great schools of the last refinements in cookery, and he quotes the dictum of an Abbess of his acquaintance on this very subject of chocolate. 'If you would have chocolate in perfection, my dear sir,' said the religious lady, 'if you would taste its most exquisite aromas, you must make it overnight and warm it up again the next morning; and I am sure that the good God, in whom reside all perfections, will not grudge us this little refinement.' The Abbess was in the right of it. It is, of course, true that a really good man does not suffer his liking for a bottle of Bass or a cup of chocolate to make him neglect his mother, starve his wife, or send his children to the workhouse. If a good man has to choose between making the chocolate overnight and suffering the wife of his bosom to experience the pangs of want, he will, almost always, say: 'By all means make it in the morning; I can bear it.' But this is true of all delights of the senses; a really nice man will not suffer his family to come to grief in order that he may indulge his propensity for looking at sunsets.

I said that we would waive the more or less alcoholic side of the question as involved in the symbol, 'Bass,' selected by Mr. Chesterton's critic. I said so because I think that good drink merely represents the first line of the cause which the bad people are attacking. It is my opinion that these bad people are only in the first stage or movement of a much more general attack. Tobacco will be the next line, the next engagement will centre round the meditative pipe, the gay cigarette, the magnificent Corona. Already that battle is preparing in America; soon, in powerful circles, a pipe will be inconsistent with piety. Nor will matters stop there. The Vegetarians have long been aware that what is the matter with the world is Meat. They have their feelings, like the anti-Burgundy and anti-Bass people and the anti-Tobacco people. They are quite convinced, with Mr. Bumble in Oliver Twist, that Meat is the root of all evil.

These persons then, sharing the opinion and the intelligence of Mr. Bumble, will engage on an anti-meat campaign. If they win, they will divide into two parties. One set will allow us to cook our vegetables; the other side will insist that if you are to boil your green peas, you may as well dine off rumpsteak at once. And, of course, sham science will come to their aid. There are plenty of doctors already who are quite prepared to demonstrate by unanswerable arguments that if you cook anything you destroy all its value. Before long there will be letters in The Times over signatures furnished with the most appalling array of degrees and qualifications showing that the way out of all our difficulties is to put out the kitchen fire. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that the campaign will stop here, with our palates and stomachs and general comfort and well-being. All the arts will next be the object of attack; tobacco, beer, beef and boiled beans having fallen, painting, sculpture, music, literature will be suspected, examined, denounced, prohibited. This is no fantasy; for this has happened before. It happened in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and is generally known as Puritanism. The movement was then allied with certain theological views. It began by smashing and destroying all the beautiful things that were then to be found in churches. It blotted out of the world a mass of beauty in a manner which is really awful to contemplate. Macaulay, not by any means the acutest of critics in a general way, got to the heart of the matter in his account of the Puritan objection to bear-baiting. They disliked bear-baiting, he said, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. So with their objection to sports and games of all sorts. They began by saying — and, no doubt, believing — that games were wicked when played on Sunday. They ended by banning games and sports of all kinds on any day. They shut up the theatres: they gave pleasure, and the Puritan hates pleasure because it is a good thing.

Now at the end of this grave sermon, I will give my text, reserving it, contrary to the usual practice of sound divines, to the last. This is the month of November, and on the eleventh of November is the feast of St. Martin, that good soldier-saint who gave half his cloak to the shivering beggar. And in the old days they used to say:

On the feast of Martinmas
Cups of ale shall freely pass.

They knew in those days that the saint and his charity and good ale were all good together, each in its several degree. They knew that all three were ‘congruous.’ They knew that a man cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven unless he carries a bottle of Bass in each hand.

Footnote

I was a true prophet. The above was written in 1921. Now, in 1923,1 have just been reading the report of a lecture by Dr. Leonard Williams, a well-known Harley Street specialist. Dr. Williams declares that the kitchen range is the worst enemy of man, and that we ought to live on raw roots and things, and very little of them. Compare with this the system of another distinguished specialist, Mr. Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall, Yorkshire. ‘When a boy gets weak and ill and don’t relish his meals we give him a change of diet — turn him out for an hour or so every day into a neighbour’s turnip-field, or sometimes, if it’s a delicate case, a turnip-field and a piece of carrots alternately.’

CHRISTMAS MUMMING

I HAVE OFTEN been tempted to put a certain question to the Vicar: to any vicar. Does he in his heart think that anything has much changed in the last four or five thousand years — that is in the known course of history? Are we any better; are we any worse? On the whole, if the said vicar had a parish in Babylon, would the general conduct of his parishioners have been much different from that of his parishioners in his parish in Marylebone? Or supposing him to be a country vicar; wouldn't he be glad on the whole if his young people were as decent in their ways as Daphnis and Chloe?

It is a large question, and I have had grave doubts on the matter; but, lately looking up this business of Christmas, I am inclined to think that we really have got on a little. But, first, it is necessary to go into the origin of Christmas. The old story was that it was a peculiarly northern festival; that all its mirth and jollity and ringing carols and sumptuous meats and drinks had no reference to any Christian joy. All our Christmas mirth, these wise men told us, we had inherited from our Scandinavian ancestors, who had noted that the tide of winter began to turn for the better somewhere about our Christmastide. The shortest day was past, the hours of light steadily began to lengthen, the spring was already prophesied. And so the Northern people literally made a song and dance about it; they made merry because the worst of the winter was over, and better things were coming. It is all very ingenious; but I think I see flaws. Did these people who rejoiced at Christmas tear their hair on Midsummer Day because the longest day was over and winter would soon be upon them? I have never heard that they did anything of the kind. And, again, it may be objected that the worst of the winter is, demonstrably, not over at Christmas. In nine cases out of ten the worst is to come. They must have been simple souls, indeed, those Scandinavians, if they rejoiced for winter past in December; with the terrors of January, February, and, often, of March to come. As a matter of fact, of course, they made merry as we make merry at this season, so far as our mirth is seasonal at all, precisely for the opposite reason. 'It is very cold, indeed: the snow is falling fast, the wind comes piercing from the North, all appearances of summer are long over: and the best of it is, there is greater cold to come.' That is the real sentiment of the season, and De Quincey; expresses it admirably. Thus he writes, indicating the season and the circumstances of felicity:

'Let it, however, not be spring, nor summer, nor autumn — but winter in his sternest shape. This is a most important point in the science of happiness. And I am surprised to see people overlook it, and think it matter of congratulation that winter is going, or if coming, is not likely to be a severe one…. Indeed, so much of an epicure am I in this matter, that I cannot relish a winter night fully if it be much past St. Thomas's day, and have degenerated into disgusting tendencies to vernal appearances; no, it must be divided by a thick wall of dark nights from all return of light and sunshine.'

And that, no doubt, is the truth of the matter, expressed as only that wonderful, profound and eloquent De Quincey could express it. But there is another point to be noted: they kept up Christmas tremendously in pagan Rome, though they did not call it by that name. Now, winter has no frightful terrors in Italy, and yet, it is odd enough, the Christmas of Rome fell, within a day or two, just at our Christmastide. They called it the Saturnalia. The Classical Dictionary tells me that it was a feast of immemorial antiquity, founded to commemorate the golden, happy age of Saturn. 'All animosity ceased, schools were shut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot and debauchery.' The last phrase is a little severe, but I think we may take it as meaning that the ancient Romans had a thoroughly good time at this season of the year. All social inequalities were annulled while the feast lasted; and as in old Virginia, in the slavery days, the black people claimed the right of taking the inside places in the coaches at Christmas while their masters rode outside, so in Rome, the slave told his master what he thought of him. 'Come,' says Horace to his man, 'use your December liberty, say what you like.' The man used it, freely enough; he told his master what he thought of him; that nobody would have been unhappier than he if he had suddenly found himself in the good old times that he was always praising, and so forth. Davus, in fact, told his master home truths, and it is in this point that, I claim, we have advanced over ancient morals. For, be it observed, we use our December liberty in quite another sense. Christmastide is exactly the season when we keep what are called home truths in the background. We hold back all the nasty things that are at the tip of our tongues, we begin to find that there is a good deal to be said for ‘that scoundrel Brown,’ we discover that M’Caw’s cold and studied insolence is ‘only manner,’ and that Mulligan’s noisy and tiresome vulgarity is pure heartiness and high spirits. We find out, in short, that we are all jolly good fellows. Even a man who considers himself deeply injured thinks it all over at Christmas, and sees that there is something to be said on the other side. And thus we transcend and surpass the pagan conception of Christmas — or Saturnalian — jollity. The Romans told each other ‘home truths’; we tell each other the truth. For, of course, we are, all of us, jolly good fellows. Consider, if we speak of literature; what is the truth about it? Surely, that is to be sought in Shakespeare, and Keats, not in the commercial drama of the West End, nor in the feeble imbecilities of the minor poets. If we are to speak of painting, we mean Turner, we neglect the existence of German oleographs and all the multitude of pink sentimentalities in pigment. Architecture means Westminster Abbey, not a tin meeting house. It is the good things and the splendid things and the perfect things that come to the account; not the failures or make-believes. So, with ourselves and the rest of us: at Christmas we see humanity as it ought to be: genial, full of charity, brimming over with mirth and good will. We are mummers, if you please; we dress up, if you like: but we know that these gay, cheerful and resplendent vestments are the clothes that we should always wear, if things were right, if ‘the letters of the Name were made known.’ It is true that one cannot go by the Underground into the City in parti-coloured jester’s robes, or in the silver armour of St. George: but so much the worse for the Underground and the City.

At Queen’s College, Oxford, they bring in the Boar’s Head with surpliced songmen and choristers and a noble old carol at Christmas. Everybody knows in his heart that this is the way in which we should always dine, if the world were properly managed. In the rush of business, it would be slightly inconvenient if the chops and steaks and cuts from the joint were brought in by chanting waiters: still, the old Oxford Christmas custom shows how the thing should be done.

The boar’s head in hand bear I
Bedecked with bays and rosemary.
And I pray you, my masters, be merry
Qui estis in convivio

Caput apri defero
Reddens laudes Domino.

A TALK FOR TWELFTH NIGHT

WE HAVE BEEN talking a lot of one Will Shakespeare lately. Miss Clemence Dane wrote not long ago a play about him. Mr. Arthur Whitby, one of the actors in it, an old Bensonian of ripe and large experience, and as well-graced a player as any we have in these days, told me that never had he been called upon to deliver such beautiful lines upon the stage — save when he had to speak the verse written by Shakespeare himself. And all kinds of fine things have been spoken of the piece, and yet it did not run — principally, I think, because the critics took it into their heads on the first night that Shakespeare was represented as Marlowe's murderer. Now, I never saw 'Will Shakespeare,' so I must say nothing of its presentation, or of the stage management which allowed this tavern scuffle between the two dramatists to be dubious and obscure: but I am a little entertained at the — implied — horror in the criticisms. Supposing Miss Clemence Dane had really made Shakespeare get into a rage with his rival, Marlowe, and draw that little dagger which hung by every man's side in those days and stab Marlowe to the heart: what about it? Should we have any reason to be shocked or surprised or alarmed or disgusted if such had been the fact, not merely in the twentieth-century play, but in sixteenth-century real life? Didn't Ben Jonson kill his man? Does anybody suppose that Shakespeare, the social being of his age, was any better than Ben Jonson, any better than the average Elizabethan playwright? Really it is time that we cleared our minds of this cant about Shakespeare; it is worse than the Scottish cant about Burns, a noble poet and a capital fellow in many ways, but — in actual life — not always in the Cotter's Saturday Night frame of mind.

Now, be patient. Examine yourself, and, speaking by custom of confession, avow that you hold Shakespeare to have been all good and all knowing and all wise; the genius being taken for granted. In spite of Ben Jonson's fervent but most truthful eulogy you insist that he had all the science of the age at his command. It has been quite in vain that the good Ben insisted that Will's education was a mere smattering— 'small Latin and less Greek' — you will have it that the creator of Falstaff must have been to some Dotheboys Hall of the period, where he was ‘instructed in all languages living and dead, mathematics, orthography, geometry, the use of the globes, algebra, singlestick (if required), writing, arithmetic, fortification, and every other branch of classical literature.’ Now, this was not the case. I have just been turning up his January play, ‘Twelfth Night.’ I look over the cast. The scene is laid in Illyria, which is now Jugo-Slovakia. Most of the names are Italian, which passes very well: but what about ‘Sir Toby Belch, uncle to Olivia,’ and his friend, ‘Sir Andrew Aguecheek’? Are Belch and Aguecheek names often found on the Illyrian seaboard? Most certainly not in the year 1600; possibly now, if the Gloucestershire Belches and the Westmorland Aguecheeks have small fixed incomes and are able to take advantage of the extremely favourable rate of exchange in Jugo-Slovakia. This is a small instance. But it does illustrate, and prove, the position that the true Shakespeare was not the creature of the intellectual and moral tea-party that we imagine. He laughs at all the schoolmasters. I dare say he knew that people on the Illyrian seaboard had, as a rule, Italian sounding names. What did he care? When he wanted broad comic effects from his characters he gave them gross and ridiculous English names — because he knew that these names would incline the pit to mirth. The ‘high brow,’ the ‘intellectual,’ the ‘intelligentsia’ would rather perish than use such a device: but Shakespeare — or ‘Shagsper,’ if you like — was not of that world. I have often thought that one of the finest pieces of Shakespearean criticism that I have ever heard came from my old friend, Jerome K. Jerome. I was talking to him about the libraries, especially the German libraries, that had been written on Shakespearean psychology.

‘Shakespeare,’ said Jerome, ‘was not like that. When he had got all those people dead in the last scene in “Hamlet,” he struck a flourish with his pen, and said to himself: “There! that ought to bring ’em in!” ‘

And there no doubt you have a great deal of the root of the matter. Shakespeare was not, consciously, a moralist, a philosopher, a thinker. He was a Warwickshire lad, with a small scholastic grounding and a universal curiosity, who came up to town and, somehow, fell into the theatre business first as actor, then as playhouse author, then as speculator — he was a member of the little syndicate that took up the land in Southwark on which the Globe was built. In addition, he happened to be a man of the supremest genius. But the chief passion of his life was Stratford-on-Avon. He never forgot it. Amid all the wild whirl of that London life — and it was a wild whirl then, a foaming torrent of such passions, political, sensual, emotional, intellectual, that our poor attempts at being alive in London now are pretty much as the green stuff on a duck-pond is to Niagara — he thought of the friendly fires and the good taverns and the solid, stolid, worthy people and the beloved fields. ‘Romeo and Juliet,’ ‘Hamlet,’ ‘Othello,’ — so many steps nearer to the haven where he would be, to the true, secure life that he loved. We think our London a tremendous centre of excitement; we, who are impressed when somebody takes hold of a revue which is a failure and turns it into a revue which is a success! Rubbish! William Shakespeare lived in a London which was impressed when it saw live men disembowelled at Tyburn, and heads of traitor nobles spiked on London Bridge. He lived in a red-hot world; a world of terrific beauty, horror, cruelty, disgust, revelry; our tea-party people and commentating Dons do not begin to have the elementary data — as they would say — for the understanding of Shakespeare. I do not believe that many of them have read Ben Jonson’s description of a voyage down Fleet Ditch; they had better not; it would make them unwell. But it is, no doubt, this imbecile notion of what Shakespeare ought to have been — a Don who condescended to write plays — that has led to the more imbecile notion that he could not have been the son of a Stratford shopkeeper who prospered none too well, and did not keep the roadway in front of his shop any too clean. To the horrible people who are best distinguished as Dons, whose idea of heaven is an everlasting examination, it is repulsive that this young wastrel, with a possible Grammar School smattering, should have written the finest things in the world. ‘The Warwickshire yokel,’ says one of them, in high contempt. Clearly impossible that such a person should have written plays which we annotate with innumerable ‘cf.’s’ and infinitely tiresome and irrelevant information, plays which we conduct examinations on, concerning which we write infinite dissertations. This author could have been no Stratford vagabond, no miserable player; he must have been one of us. And so has arisen the most marvellous folly of the world; the Baconian hypothesis. Grave men, being first assured that shabby, ‘Bohemian’ fellows do not write immortalities, have committed themselves to all the wonderful lunacies of the bi-literal cypher, have gone a little farther, and have at last found that Bacon wrote, not only all Shakespeare, but all the literature of the age, not only English, but foreign, including Montaigne’s Essays, and Cervantes’

Don Quixote. The last book which I read on the subject showed that Don Quixote should be read ‘d’un qui s’ôte’ — concerning one who hides himself — Bacon, of course. Indeed, the writer proved that the alleged author, Cervantes, had an illegitimate child and was very poor.

Which is evidence, of course, that he could not write masterpieces. The masterpieces notoriously are all written by moral men with large banking accounts.

May this January, this Twelfth Night, bring us better sense, as we sit about our sea-coal fire.

SOME FEBRUARY STARS

THE OTHER DAY a sad case came before the courts; one of those cases in which 'the home' has been broken up owing to differences, disagreements, subjects of variance and quarrel. Such affairs are not uncommon, though they are not quite so common as the members of the Society for the Instant Abolition of the Family pretend; but in the case of which I am speaking there were highly uncommon elements. Husband and wife had parted, not on account of the fabled lodger, or for any such simple cause. It was astrology that had driven them apart; it was astrology that sent the wife to dwell in the workhouse. I think that it was the lady who began it. I believe that she and her mother had dealt deeply in the Twelve Houses of the Heavens, in Rising Signs, in Lords of the Ascendant, in Trine and Sextile. At any rate, during the war, a communication came from astrological or other occult regions to the effect that the wife would be killed by an explosion. The husband, who had evidently become a fervent believer, met this threat with a scheme of his own. He caused his wife to sleep in the kitchen, and, as it were, bid the stars come on. Here, you may say, is one of the oddest instances of the mad irrationalities which infest the human mind. The husband believed in the stars and their doom, and he thought that this august fate, written in the heavens, this sentence issuing, we will suppose, from Mars ill-aspected with the Sun, could be turned aside and annulled — by a thin basement ceiling! Absurd enough, certainly; and yet no more absurd than the conduct of the father and mother of Œdipus in the Greek play. They were informed by the oracle that the child born to them would murder his father and marry his mother; and so — believing in the Oracle with all their hearts — they exposed the infant on a desolate mountain. It didn't do; you could not get round Greek Oracles that way, though you may play fast and loose with English horoscopes.

But to return to our modern family. The evidence as reported seems to become vague; all that was clear was that husband and wife, through roaming too freely in the starry plains, drifted apart on the earthly ones; and so the process of the courts drops a dull curtain on a curious scene. But the interest of all this to me was the survival of the belief in astrology; in that system which declares, sometimes in extreme terms, sometimes in moderate phrases, that human life is ruled by the planets; that things in Park Lane and Peckham, Brixton and Belgravia, Aldgate and Mayfair, all depend upon the march of Sun and Moon, Mars, Mercury, Venus, and the rest of them. It is an astounding theory. Here, we will say, is a little boy with a racking cough and an anxious mother bending over him; Saturn is 'afflicting the Native.' At the same time, Smith takes to his breast Beauty and Half-a-Million; Mercury and the Moon have fulfilled their promise to him. And Uranus, aided by Mercury, now in a very different humour, shuts up the small grocer's shop in Norwood and sends the grocer — poor man — off to the Bankruptcy Court.

There, in the rough, is the system. The broad lines of your life are all settled at the moment of your birth; success or failure, happiness or misery, riches or poverty, early death or length of days; all these are patent to the astrologer's eye. Give him but the moment of birth; his predictions will extend to the day of death. And the odd thing is: that while the astrologer's art has been known to the world certainly six thousand years, probably for a much longer time — they had horoscopes and bearer-cheques and bills-of-sale, all in bricks, in Babylon — yet mankind has never yet been able to make up its mind definitely whether there is anything in it, or whether it is all stuff and nonsense.

Not really to make up its mind. Certainly, the eighteenth century pooh-poohed the whole business, just as it pooh-poohed Alchemy. But that was more an impatient gesture than a reasoned conviction. The eighteenth century pooh-poohed Gothic Architecture in a similar manner. Gothic has long come to its own again; and they tell me that there are great commercial possibilities before Alchemy — or 'Synthetic Gold' — in Germany. At any rate, the principle of alchemy, the artificial transmutation of metals, has long been recognized by modern science. And, then, coming to my own experience: I once knew an astrologer. He predicted nothing so far as I was concerned. But one day, in the midst of casual conversation, he remarked, quietly enough:

'You have received two interesting letters in the course of the week, since I last saw you. One dealt with the discomforts of theatrical travelling. The other was about a particular article in the Classical Dictionary. And last Sunday you were talking to some people about the fooleries of your occult friends.’

There it was. It was all true. How did he do it? I don’t know. He said it was astrological A B C. It struck me that a very rough-and-ready test might be to my hand in the February Calendar, in the list of the great born during that month. For, if the general principles of astrology were true, it would probably follow that each month would have its own type. There would be the Februarian man, the Martian man, the Augustan man, and so forth. I did not, somehow, expect to find much confirmation in the February Calendar. But I found it.

The three most eminent names of those born in February are Charles Dickens, Henry Irving, and Ellen Terry. The most distinguished actor and actress of the last age; and the great Dickens, whose passion for the stage was almost a disease! I am sure that it was only the immense common sense of Dickens, the servant of his genius — as it often is — that prevented him from joining Crummles early in life. And he was an enthusiastic amateur all his days; his theatrical exploits make but tiresome reading. But there you are: it really looks as if the February aspects of the heavens inclined strongly to the theatre. Yet, for my part, I do not believe a word of it. Astrology cannot be true: for, if it were true, life would be impossible. Human nature, as we know it, would perish away and blacken as a piece of tissue paper in a candle flame. We could not live, if we knew what our life was to be. We could form no plans if their futility were plain from the start. And how about racing? I know racing men pretend that they deal in ‘certs,’ even in ‘dead certs.’ I have listened to them conferring together and proving beyond a shadow of doubt that the arrival of Bolter at the winning-post in advance of all others is as sure a thing as the arrival of the sun over the horizon in the morning. Well, the race is run and Bolter is nowhere in particular; but in a week’s time the same group will be talking in the same terms of Wolter or Polter or Nolter. They only deal in ‘certs.’

But, of course, in their hearts they must be quite well aware that their ‘certs’ are really ‘uncerts.’ If it were otherwise betting would be dead in a day. You can’t wager your money on the number of days in the week or the number of weeks in the year or on the multiplication table. There must be some sort of a chance, or there can be no bet. But if astrology were true, it would be A B C, I suppose, for the skilled astrologer to forecast every race by the immutable laws of the heavens. Whereupon, the Turf and all that it implies would instantly cease to exist. And I submit that, as Britons, we know that this would be absurd.

Therefore, Astrology is all stuff and nonsense!

MARCH AND A MORAL

I WAS GOING to write some fierce and eloquent things about March weather: about the days that grow longer and yet drearier, about the leaden heavens, the villainous wind from the north-east which comes from far, unhappy Siberian plains and searches to the very marrow of the bones, and about the March dust which swirls about the pavements, afflicting the eyes, choking mouth and nostrils. Our light-hearted ancestors used to say that a peck of this March dust was worth a king's ransom; but they lived on the land and measured life, largely, by the land. They knew nothing of what that dust can do in Piccadilly and the Strand. In fine, I was going to be savage with March and with Charles Kingsley, who was perverse enough to write a poem in praise of that horrible northeast wind, which sent him at last to his grave. And then, calling up memories of bygone March weather, I changed my mind. The sort of article which I had in mind would look silly, read in a deck-chair placed securely in garden shade, while the young people played lawn tennis in the full blaze and glow of the sun, and mopped their brows, calling for more ice in the cup. Yet that might well happen. Exactly forty years ago, I remember that there was just such weather in March; almost a week of it. A cloudless blue sky morning after morning, a delicious warmth in the sunlight, and that brilliance in the air which we do not often seem London — or in England either for the matter of that — that brilliance which reminds me always of Touraine and Provence, in which everything seen is clearly and sharply defined, in which every object seems to sparkle, as if it were not only in the light but was itself a form of light: all these signs were to be seen in those days of March, 1882. All the shops put out their awnings, people sauntered happily in this happy summer air, and lawn tennis — a youngish game then — flourished in that wonderful March weather. We all took the snowstorm which ended the spell as an outrage.

So again in '93, the year of the King's marriage — there were real music-halls in London in those days, and Charles Godfrey was singing two songs, 'After the Ball' and a loyal chant about 'Georgy-Porgy, Duke of Yorky' — in the year 1893 summer began in March and continued without a break till autumn. Then, again, only two years ago March in London was like July in Penzance; warm, still air and a constant dropping of fine warm rain; the sort of weather which gardeners like for budding-roses and taking cuttings. My pear tree — the pear tree — was a white cloud of shining glory that year on St. Patrick's Day; and my fern — the fern — had sent up its young growth with the fronds curved like a bishop's crozier five or six inches above ground. So, on the whole, it is best to leave March well alone; to say nothing about that vile north-easter, those bitter and grievous skies, the abominable scourge of the blinding, stinging dust. March may be anything or everything: it is only constant in its inconstancy — like the remaining eleven months of our blessed English year.

And hence the interest which we take in our weather. Foolish and proud people often reproach us with talking overmuch about the weather. 'A fine day, isn't it, for March?' 'Gorgeous June weather!' 'A very seasonable Christmas': these remarks, and many others like them, are supposed to indicate the depths of banality and stupidity on the part of the speakers. 'They can talk about nothing except the weather,' say the proud and foolish ones. These would like us to talk about Mrs. Humphry Ward, The Story of an African Farm, Nietzsche, Bergson, Psycho-Analysis, Relativity. They do not realize that it is they themselves who are the frivolous chatterers, occupied with the passing, the transient, the radically unimportant. What price — if I may be familiar for a moment — Robert Elsmere to-day? How many people in a hundred can tell me what happened at that African Farm? And as to the élan vital, now? And where do you think Psycho-Analysis will be in 1932? With crinolines and gigot sleeves — and Robert Elsmere. But we shall still be talking about the weather. And rightly: for our English weather is a matter of perennial interest. This, be it noted, is by no means the case with all weather. Don't tell a Southern Spaniard in August what a sunny day it is; he would invoke his saints against you. It is unwise to greet an Anglo-Indian on the plains at breakfast with, 'Another splendid day!' for if you do his liver will burn with angry bile, as Horace says of another matter, and he will hate you. I do not know what an Eskimo would say if you remarked to him: 'Snowy, isn't it?' in December. But he would not be interested. Note the distinction. In the Arctic region and on the Indian plain, weather talk is banal, empty and ridiculous. Here the sun never fails to blaze and scorch, there the snow surely falls. There is nothing to be said. To comment on the weather in such lands is as if one remarked: 'The sun rose this morning,' or 'The angles at the base of an isosceles triangle are equal.' But in England the case is altogether different. The Englishman may justly note that it is a fine day for March and that it is gorgeous June weather and so forth — just because there is no possibility of his encountering the answer: 'Of course it is.' It is never, of course. It froze in the southern counties in August a year and a half ago; and I must confess that the blaze of sunlight and the figures of the thermometer last October frightened me. There was something almost Apocalyptic about such weather. I remember especially noting the incongruity between the position of the sun in the sky with its heat and brilliance. Morning and evening it was low in the heavens, for such is the place of the sun in October; and yet its heat was vehement and its light blazed in the eyes as if we had been in the high dog-days. And on the other hand, there is the old tale of the Derby, run, not in a snowstorm, but — as I am assured — between two flurries of snow. Hence the perpetual interest of the English weather. It abounds in differences, in the unexpected; and it is only such things which are truly interesting, significant and beautiful. All the relish of life, or almost all of it, is to be sought in the element of surprise.

And this, let it be observed, is one of the few universal axioms that apply to everything; to nature, to man, to art. Let us consider, for example, the case of Jones, of London Wall and Surbiton, and the case of the starry heavens. Take Jones. We avoid him when we can. We let him choose his own carriage in the 9.30; and then get into another. The reason is that Jones never fails to say the expected thing. His conversation can be foretold with a degree of accuracy that the Meteorological Department of the Air Service has never attained in dealing with the weather. You always know exactly what he will say on any possible subject. A good man is Jones in every relation of life, and his pink peonies are the pride of Surbiton, Hampton, Molesey and the Dittons; but avoid him, since he lacks the element of surprise; in Bacon's words, there is no 'strangeness in the proportion' of Jones. He lacks that quality which the man who didn't write Shakespeare's works saw was essential to true beauty — or, we may add, to true significance and interest. And then, with this rule and measure of things still in our hands, let us contemplate the midnight sky of a clear, frosty night. An awful spectacle indeed, as Carlyle is supposed to have observed; but a spectacle awful in its wonder and its beauty — in its infinite diversity of form. Consider how the heavens would appear if the stars had been arranged in a definite and formal pattern of geometrical design, with everything matching and corresponding. That would be an awful spectacle in another sense; a spectacle as awful as a model prison or the corridors of a modern hotel. We could not have borne to look upon it. Indeed, there are modern streets that we can hardly bear to look upon, long, straight streets that go off from main roads in the far east of London, almost vanishing in perspective. They are terrible, these streets, because they consist of one house repeated, as it seems, to infinity. From end to end there is no variety, no element of surprise, in these dreary ways; hence, if we can, we avoid them as we avoid Jones of London Wall and Surbiton.

Hence, on the other hand, the charm and delight of things made by hand as contrasted with things made mechanically. Mark the difference between a bit of ironwork that has been hammered out by a craftsman, and another bit of ironwork that has been cast from the same design. In the latter case, absolute uniformity of execution, twirl and twist and curve corresponding with twirl and twist and curve to the tenth of an inch. In the former, infinite difference, endless though slight variety; no two twirls or twists exactly or absolutely alike. And you will find, if you care to examine the matter closely, that an oak tree is constructed on the same principle as the craftsman’s ironwork. No two leaves on that tree are exactly alike, though there is a close general resemblance between all the leaves on the broad tree. And here I am reminded that with all the goodwill in the world, one must not write about our English weather and omit to have a dig at it. So, be it observed, the difference between the leaves on the oak tree and the curly-wurlies on the iron gates are slight differences. The pattern in the ironwork ‘matches,’ though not absolutely; the leaves of the oak are very like one another, though not the same. I should not like to see fronds of a tree-fern sprouting from the boughs of our stout native oak.

So — it may be hinted — our English climate sometimes overdoes its passion for the unexpected. Eighty-four in the shade in October, five degrees of frost in August; a little violent, a thought Futurist?

ST. GEORGE AND THE DRAGON

ON THE TWENTY-THIRD of this month of April, we keep the feast-day of our Patron Saint — St. George for Merry England. Some of us are inclined to grumble about St. George. In the most respectable Church quarters the opinion has been expressed that it is a pity that the Patron of England is at the best misty, and at the worst mythological. Putting on one side Gibbon's slander, that the St. George of fact was a profiteering if not a swindling contractor to the Roman army — and really there seems every reason to suppose that this was only Gibbon's mischief — nothing remains about St. George but the Dragon. And when it comes to dragons, you know — to put the matter in the manner of Mr. George Sampson — really, you know, upon your life you mustn't. Dragons won't do. And you take away the dragon-killing, really there is nothing left. The compilers of the Roman Breviary did not live in what is called a critical age. They were certainly not men to scan the acts and legends of the saints with a glance of sour incredulity and suspicion; but they can make nothing, or next to nothing, of St. George. The Collect speaks of him as a Martyr without any specific detail, the verses and responses are from the 'Common of Martyrs' — such as are used for all martyrs. There is no legend; no hint that there was a dragon in the case.

Well, that being so, the Roman Breviary evidently knowing nothing whatever about St. George, we may conclude that there is nothing to be known. Our Patron Saint is a shadowy figure. And yet he is vitally interesting — to me at all events. For though the martyr of the third century did not kill any dragons, somebody did kill dragons at that vaguer date known as once upon a time. We know nothing about St. George; but the popular tradition that he was a dragon-killer proves that a very long time ago there were dragons and that there were men who encountered them and killed them. For tradition is always true. It rather understates than exaggerates. In this specific case, for example; go to your cabinet of rarities and curiosities, press the hidden pin, cause the secret drawers in which the rarest things lie to fly open; and take out a golden sovereign. Look at the figure of the dragon which the Saint is riding down and destroying. A horrid-looking brute, certainly; but a pet lamb, a positive kitten compared with the dragon as it really was. As it really was? Certainly; only the scientific people call dragons pterodactyls. As Kingsley observes, very pleasantly, in The Water Babies, the learned men had been scoffing at the mere notion of dragons for long years. Then they found their bones, and instead of owning up like decent fellows, and acknowledging that the simple old tale was a true tale, that there really had been dragons on the earth, they made up a Greek word and spoke of pterodactyls, or 'winged fingers' — a stupid term and not nearly so expressive as dragons. And, what is more, we know exactly what these terrific beasts — fifty feet long or more — looked like; not by the learned reconstructions of their frames, but in a much more vivid way. There remains to this day an exact model, on a huge scale, of the dragon of the slime. Not as he appeared in the soaring of his awful flight, beating the air with his 'winged fingers,' but as he lay torpid, reposing on the earth. This model is to be seen in Wales. The Peninsula of Gower, Glamorgan, runs out into the Bristol Channel. I have often looked at it, across the water, from the south Pembrokeshire coast. Carrying the eye from the horrid factory chimneys of Llanelly and Burry Port, you see an undulating range of hills running out south by west. The skyline of these hills swells upwards into a kind of gentle hump at about the middle of the range, and then curving down, ends in an insignificant point, low on the water. A singular shape this point; to the eye it seems curiously flattened: and its name is The Worm's Head. It is not a bit like the head of the worm that the gardener slices with his spade; but 'worm' was old English for dragon; and these swelling hills, ending in a small promontory, must form an exact picture of the horrible pterodactyl, half reptile, half bird, huge in body, ridiculous in head, as it lay at length on the ground. Here, in hill and rock, you have a picture — it is rather an awful thought — of the image in the mind and eye of a prehistoric ancestor who may have lived 400,000 years ago. He had looked into the place of dragons, and had noted the likeness of the monsters to that line of hills running out into the sea; and, somehow, his thought has come down through the tremendous ages; even to our day.

Tradition is always in the right, And, still occupying ourselves with the St. George legend, another proof can be gathered of the accuracy of the age-long memory of man. There is a picture of St. George and the Dragon, I think by a master of the Venetian school, in which the monster has quite a different aspect from the ‘worm’ or pterodactyl which gave its name to the Worm’s Head. In this picture, the dragon is a horrible bloated beast with a swollen, misshapen body. The painter could never have had a model; but he painted an excellent likeness of an iguanodon, another of those huge monsters that roamed the earth before the earth had boiled and flooded and dried and frozen into the shape that it now bears. Somehow, it seems clear, the word was passed on from age to age across all the gulfs and chasms of time. Where the seas are now, then was dry land; vast Atlantis, the island continent, had not sunken under the waves; there were terrors on the earth indeed — but not the terror of the Channel Passage, since men walked dryfoot from the points known to us as Dover and Calais. The earth heaved, as I say, and boiled; islands rose out of the sea, ships now sail over primæval mountain tops; Europe became a sheet of ice; yet the word was passed on, so that the Pembroke countryman and the Venetian painter knew what dragons were like; both the long breed and the thick breed.

By the way, I wonder whether the members of the Prehistoric Ladies’ Toy Dragon Club got on well together? But the consideration of this deep and obscure problem must be postponed for the present.

The memory of man, then, is boundless, reaching back to inconceivable antiquity. It is no marvel, therefore, if it has retained events and circumstances of historic and measurable times. A thousand years, two thousand years are trifling periods indeed when we compare them with the huge, unimaginable chaos of time; still, I remember being amazed when an Oxfordshire farm labourer, who had never been to school and could neither read nor write, said casually to me:

‘Ay, Chalgrove Field, that’s where they killed Muster Hampden. They do say it was down in oats at the time.’

Down in oats at the time! I could almost hear the brushing and rushing of the Cavaliers’ chargers, as they trampled down that field of oats in their hot onset.

‘And then,’ old Harmon went on, ‘Squire Scoop down at Wormsley there; he got hanged when it was all over.’

The name was not quite accurate. He was speaking of the Roundhead Colonel, Adrian Scrope, who was one of the few persons excepted by the merciful Charles II from the Act of Indemnity. To the old countryman it was all actual, gossip of the neighbouring countryside. To be sure, it was only two hundred and fifty years or so since it happened.

And then, I remember reading — I think in The Guardian — an interesting article on Tewkesbury and its Minster. The writer described a visit he had paid to the place thirty years before. He was shown over the church by a verger who ran over the associations of the place, after the manner of most vergers. But presently the visitor became aware that the old fellow was talking quite differently from most vergers. He was speaking of the battle of Tewkesbury; and he talked as if he had been there! He told of little things which do not get into the history books, he described the upper room in a house in the town where certain princes were murdered, and he ended up with a ghastly description of how the dead were brought from the battlefield and brought into the church, 'till the bodies reached up to the top of those pillars.' It was the vivid picture of an onlooker. The visitor made his inquiries, and found that the old man came of a family who had supplied sacristans, clerks, vergers to Tewkesbury Minster from the fifteenth century onward. The verger was telling the tale that his father had told him. And there are odd stories from Scotland and Ireland. In Scotland the simple country people had a silly tale of a knight all in silver armour who was buried under a certain mound on a hillside. Everybody laughed; till some one passing by the mound — eighty or perhaps a hundred years ago — noticed that the ground had been recently disturbed. The antiquaries took the matter in hand. But they were too late. A wisely credulous villager had been before them. Only the knight's bones and one or two laminæ of the wonderful silver armour remained. It was all true; the armour was Danish, dating back to the year 900 or so; the Hamlet period. The tradition had lasted among the unlearned for nine hundred years. And in Ireland the tale was of a fairy rath or castle; a rounded hill from which, said the peasants, flames could be seen issuing of nights. Again tradition was right; flames could have been seen issuing at night from the top of that queer hill; could have been seen, that is, if you happened to have been strolling that way somewhere about a.d 850. Investigation showed that this place had been a retreat of the aboriginal inhabitants of Ireland, the dark 'little people,' and had been sacked by Danes sometime in the ninth century. And as to the flames; the flue to carry off the smoke from the fairy fire was duly discovered.

It is wonderful, all this; but it is all over. I doubt whether old Harmon's children know anything about the culture of Chalgrove Field where Hampden fell; they went to school, the place where ignorance of everything that matters is so carefully imparted. And so with the story of Tewkesbury; the writer of the article visited the place a second time and found a strange verger. This man had never seen the stricken field of Tewkesbury, or the blood running in the upper room, or the dead men piled capital-high in the church. He told the story as it was printed in the Guide. The old folk-memory is dead; we have killed it with our silly schools and our rubbishy books.

THE POOR VICTORIANS

WE ALL KNOW what the poor Victorians were like. We have heard all about them over and over again. To begin with, they were prim. They were proper. They always went to bed early. Their only form of revelry consisted in tea-parties. The laws of their lives were dictated to them by maiden ladies and the vicar's wife. When the maiden ladies and the vicar's wife said that so-and-so was 'not quite nice,' or 'not at all the kind of thing that we expect to meet with in Dulchester,' there was an end of it, whatever 'it' was. Profligacy — displayed, let us say, by smoking a cigar in the High Street — was reproved, and genius, if it had said anything contrary to the maiden standard of Dulchester, thenceforth held its peace. So much for life; as for the arts in the Victorian era; they could not properly be said to exist. Here, too, the ladies of Dulchester were all mighty. Nobody spoke out; nobody dared to be 'daring.' No picture was painted that went beyond the vision of the Young Person. No poem that the Curate might possibly dislike was ever written. If you were at heart a gay dog you must keep your gaiety dark; else the County would reject you. If you were a moral sort of fellow and had an inclination to rebuke vice, you had to hold your tongue equally; since vice and immorality and all that sort of thing were not so much as to be mentioned. You were not to know that such things existed; since the existence of such things was not recognized at Miss Pinkerton's Academy for Young Ladies, and what those young ladies did not know, nobody was supposed to know. As to love; the word was, beware! Above all there must be no faintest hint of the vital things, of any sort of realities. You might be weakly sentimental, but you must never be fervid. You must not have 'ideas.' You must never stray for one moment from the pink-and-white drawing-room carpet. The convention was laid strictly down for you and no Victorian ever thought of departing from it. And then, all questions of morality and passion apart, the Victorian author was strictly required to keep his pages free of everything 'disagreeable' or 'unpleasant.' After all, the great rule applied here as everywhere else; he was not to write anything that he would hesitate to utter in the Vicarage drawing-room full of maiden ladies and curates and Young Persons. One did not in this sacred place talk about disagreeable things; equally one must not write about them. And so on, and so on; the general conclusion being that the Victorians couldn't write, couldn't paint, couldn't think, and couldn't properly be said to be alive at all. They lived and moved in a world of prim, feeble, old-maidish, curatical, school-girlish pretences, their chief object being to avoid telling or hearing the truth about any subject whatever.

There you are, with your accepted and recognized picture of the Victorian Age. And is it not enough to make one despair of all history? If this nonsense can be written and believed of a period close to our own of a time which many of us remember perfectly well, of an age which has left a great body of documents behind it; if this mendacious rubbish, I say, can pass current as fact; what is the good of trying to find out what life was like in the seventeenth century, or in the seventh century? If the near is so hopelessly misrepresented, how will it fare with the remote? For, to come to the documents; this is the manner in which one of the mild Victorian poets wrote of the passion of love.

O Love, Love, Love! O withering might!
O sun that from thy noonday height
Shudderest when I strain my sight,
Throbbing thro' all thy heat and light.
Lo, falling from my constant mind,
Lo, parch'd and wither'd, deaf and blind,
I whirl like leaves in roaring wind.
Last night, when some one spoke his name,
From my swift blood that went and came
A thousand little shafts of flame
Were shiver'd in my narrow frame.
O Love, O fire! once he drew
With one long kiss my whole soul thro'
My lips, as sunlight drinketh dew.

Thus wrote Victorian Tennyson. It does not remind me of Miss Pinkerton's Academy or the Vicarage drawing-room.

A little solemn, do you think? Well, let us try

Lazy, laughing, languid Jenny
Fond of a kiss and fond of a guinea.
… Poor shameful Jenny, full of grace
Thus with your head upon my knee:
Whose person or whose purse may be
The lodestar of your reverie?

Pretty well, in the way of frankness, it seems to me. The lines are the work of an eminent mid-Victorian, Dante Gabriel Rossetti. And anybody who is not satisfied may be referred to the first series of Poems and Ballads by another eminent mid-Victorian, Algernon Charles Swinburne. And then, as to that other well-known Victorian rule, that you must never mention anything that is not quite nice: listen to this. A well-known character in a novel of this prim age was sent to request the loan of a knife and fork.

‘Captain Hopkins lent me the knife and fork, with his compliments to Mr. Micawber. There was a very dirty lady in his little room, and two wan girls, his daughters, with shock heads of hair. I thought it was better to borrow Captain Hopkins’ knife and fork, than Captain Hopkins’ comb.’

That is not nice, but it was written by Charles Dickens. And do you know the same author’s description of the birth of Little Dorrit? The midwife is speaking.

‘The flies trouble you, don’t they, my dear?’ said Mrs. Bangham. ‘But p’raps they’ll take your mind off it, and do you good. What between the buryin’ ground, the grocers, the wagon-stables, and the paunch trade, the Marshalsea flies gets very large. P’raps they’re sent as a consolation, if we only know’d it. How are you now, my dear? No better? No, my dear, it ain’t to be expected; you’ll be worse before you’re better, and you know it, don’t you? Yes.’

Really, you know, this account of a confinement in a gaol, with all its nauseous circumstances, is by no means prim, curatical, or old-maidish. It does not at all fit in with the picture of the pink-and-white drawing-room in which the souls and bodies of the Victorians are supposed, in popular belief, to have dwelt.

And the Victorians all went to bed early after a cup of weak tea? Did they! I have just turned up a mid-Victorian magazine, The Welcome Guest, published in 1858. I open it at a picture: ‘Midnight: Supper Rooms in the Haymarket.’ It illustrates George Augustus Sala’s ‘Twice Round the Clock,’ and the text tells how the playgoers pour out of the theatres and pour into the Haymarket to eat expensive French dishes, to drink Clos Vougeot, Lafitte and ‘Chambertin with yellow seal’; to eat chops, steaks, kidneys, sausages or Welsh rabbit ‘washed down by the homely British brown stout, and followed, perchance, by the soothing cigar and the jorum of hot anything and water’; but above all to eat oysters. Why, in our mad daring days the mere cigar purchased at midnight is a criminal offence; and as to Burgundy, stout and ‘something hot,’ all that is a Star Chamber matter.

And be it remembered, these Haymarket supper-rooms were the early places for people who wanted to get home in good time. For the real amateurs of supper there was Evans’, and one o’clock was the time to go to Evans’, if you would sup like a man. You took a few oysters at the Haymarket, but that as a mere whet to the appetite. Great people have always had strong stomachs, says Sala — in italics — and forthwith he tells us how men supped in the mid-Victorian age; he described the mountains of kidneys, chops, sausages, the pints of stout, the creaming Scotch ale, the mighty measures of punch and grog; and all this beginning at one o’clock in the morning.

So it was in prim 1858; and we, we mad Georgian revellers, we may not buy so much as a cigarette after eight o’clock at night.

The truth is, of course, that the Victorian age, more especially the early and mid-Victorian ages, were times of jollity, and times of liberty, both in life and in letters. Those people who took a dozen oysters in the Haymarket at midnight and strolled off to Covent Garden to eat great suppers at Evans’ would not have believed that their grandsons would submit to be smacked and sent to bed early like naughty children. And as in life, so in letters. What the mid-Victorians wrote, whether it were well or ill, was written with a relish. We have lost all that. For Evans’ and his ‘jolly suppers, his brown stout and his hot grog to follow’ at one, two, three in the morning; what have we? The subterranean night-club, mean, debauched, futile, bloodless, the places where adulterated whisky is called ‘ginger ale,’ and drunk in coffee cups with an air of tremendous devilry, where the guests are spectres of the gutter, dissolute reptiles destitute utterly of all mirth, all gaiety and all jollity, where silly flappers get their ‘snow,’ and set the first scene of their squalid little tragedies. Jolly? Why, a mortuary is a gay scene by comparison.

And so with art and letters. Cubism, Vorticism, Post-Impressionism; verse that doesn’t scan and doesn’t rhyme; novels that make one think of a stupid post-mortem or a dull dissection; this is what we have in place of Tennyson, Swinburne, Rossetti, Dickens, Thackeray, the Pre-Raphaelites, and the great illustrators of the despised age, the wood-engravers whose work has become to us miraculous.

Those poor Victorians!

STUFF — AND SCIENCE

THE TWO MOST extravagant and improbable books in the world are Euclid and the Arabian Nights; but of the two by far the more improbable and extravagant is Euclid. Nay, it is flattery to say that Euclid is improbable; it is impossible.

For, consider; it is highly improbable, no doubt, that by rubbing a lamp you can summon a spirit, or jinn, who will build you a palace of incredible splendour in a night. This is most unlikely, I confess, but I cannot say that it is impossible, simply because neither I nor any one else can pretend to know all the laws of the universe. We are entitled to say that we have never come across the lamp, the genie or the palace; and that we have no intention of believing in the story till it be supported by strong evidence. We can say that, but we are really not entitled to say any more. We mustn’t even say ‘nonsense!’ or ‘rubbish!’ that is if we are cautious people. For — how long ago is it; twenty years, thirty years? — the state of a gentleman’s mind was once in some doubt. His relations were afraid that he was going mad, so they took out what Mr. Sampson Brass called a pretty little commission de lunatico. And a mental expert who gave evidence said that in his opinion Mr. X was mad, as mad as a hatter. The doctor had had a cosy little chat with Mr. X, and that gentleman had declared his belief in the possibility of dirigible flight. That was quite enough for the doctor. I don’t know whether the poor man was shut up. Possibly he is alive and in a madhouse to this day. He must find it highly amusing to watch the airplanes and airships soaring high above the asylum walls. Then the X-rays. I remember telling a friend about them in the ‘nineties; how some queer light had been found which would pierce through the solid walls of flesh and show, as in a photograph, every bone in your body. My friend laughed. He said that he did not believe everything that he saw in the papers. And then, you know, ‘wireless’: what would people have said to that? And wireless telephony: before long, they tell me, words uttered in London will be plainly audible in New York. Think of it, the human voice heard clearly across the Atlantic Ocean, as clearly and as easily as if the two speakers were talking to one another across the duck-pond in the farm-yard. It was utterly impossible according to all our notions and all our experience; but it has happened or soon will happen. So it doesn’t do to say that the highly improbable thing is therefore the impossible thing; Aladdin’s Lamp and the Genie and the Palace may yet come into experience.

Yet, as I say, I am willing to allow that the story of Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp is, on the face of it, highly extravagant and improbable. But Euclid cannot be let down so easily as that. I remember little of that author, I am glad to say, but I shall never forget the astounding statements with which he opens his work. A point, he begins, with the calmness of the finished and shameless liar, has neither parts nor magnitude, but only position. A line, he goes on, is length without breadth. And a plane surface, so he declares, has length and breadth but no thickness. On such foundations does Euclid raise his system of Geometry. Let us consider a little. Euclid is not a theologian. He is not a metaphysician. He is not a spiritualist. He is not dealing with the world of mind, soul or spirit. He is occupied with the visible world that we know, the world of time, space, solidity and matter. And he declares that in this material world there is something existing called a point which has no size at all and no parts: a material thing without materiality. So with his line; it has length without breadth. Who has seen such a thing? Who can imagine the possibility of such a thing? And who can conceive a surface without depth? Aladdin is improbable; but Euclid is, in the strictest sense of the word, impossible. His definitions are contradictions. A man once asked me if I couldn’t think of the Euclidean surface as I thought of the surface of a perfectly still pool of water. Certainly I can; but I cannot think of water without depth; and that is the surface which Euclid propounds for our acceptance.

So, you see, geometry, a branch of pure mathematics, the most abstract of the sciences, the science which is supposed to convey necessary truth, which no discoveries can affect, which no experience can render invalid; this branch of science turns out to be founded on a series of absurdities and contradictions in terms. And arithmetic, again, another branch of pure mathematics; lucky is it for our poor little boys and girls as they get through the multiplication table, and advance by painful degrees to vulgar fractions; lucky is it for them that they do not dream of the nightmare country into which these studies inevitably lead. The Snark was a Boojum! There are worse Boojums than the Snark, as witness that notorious affair of the contest between Achilles and the Tortoise. It is well known that Achilles was the swiftest of all men; the champion sprinter, in fact. It is equally well known that the tortoise is one of the slowest of animals. So, oddly enough, their Managements met and arranged that the two should race each other. Naturally, it was a case for handicapping, and to make things simple it was agreed that Achilles ran a hundred times as quickly as the Tortoise, and therefore that Achilles must be scratch, and the animal have a hundred yards' start. Very good. The race takes place. The swift-footed hero flies like light over the hundred yards which separate him from the Tortoise. But in that little space of time the Tortoise, a hundred times slower, has run a yard, and is still ahead. Achilles passes that yard, but the Tortoise has raced a hundredth of a yard and is still ahead. Then the thousandth part of a yard separates them; but the Tortoise by that much is still ahead — and will be ahead throughout all ages, if there be any truth in the science of arithmetic and in its doctrine of fractions. Solvitur ambulando: a practical experiment solves that puzzle, a philosopher said long ago; but as De Quincey notes, he was a foolish fellow, since the essence of the puzzle lies in the opposition between the known facts of the case and the teaching of science. We know that Achilles would pass the Tortoise in a flash; science tells us that the man must lag behind the reptile for ever.

Now then; to come to the practical application of all this. We have seen that science, in its most abstract mood; in those branches of it which are supposed to deal with necessary and unchanging truth, is founded on rank and preposterous absurdities. With its lines that are all length and no breadth, with its fraction dogmas that lead to the ridiculous; it is clearly nonsense. Very good; then do not let the doctor interfere with your dinner.

For, note the difference between pure science and applied science. A line is always a line in all climates and all ages. Supposing there is such a thing at all, it is the same in Paris as in London, in Pekin as in Cape Town. If two and two make four, they have always made four, and make four as much for Smith as for Robinson. But with applied science the case is very different. Here you enter into a region of infinite doubts, difficulties, differences; differences of body, differences of mind, differences of climate, differences of custom, differences of disposition, differences of inheritance. To put it in a nutshell; I would as soon go to an astrologer as to a doctor, if I wanted an answer to the question: 'Is beef bad for me?' It is monstrous indeed that science, shown to be mad in the abstract, should presume to dictate to us in the concrete. Yet it does. Look at the solemn diets that are prescribed. I have known people who live — or think they live, for they are not alive — on nuts, carrots, bread and dates; with a little cheese as a perilous and doubtful indulgence, and with a glass of milk, if they are resolved to be dogs and devils. This diet, which is supposed to be a cure for rheumatism, forbids all wine, beer, spirits, all coffee, chocolate, cocoa, tea, all peas and beans, all meat, fish and eggs. If you wish to tread the narrow way you drink no milk and eat no cheese. I do not know whether it cures rheumatism, I do not know whether a wise man would not prefer to be rheumatic. But the worst of it is that the people who live in this ridiculous way, who follow the Vague Treatment, as it is called, affect airs of superiority. They look down on the people who eat chops and steaks and thank God for them. They watch each other. One of them records how, at afternoon tea, she occasionally takes half a cup to save trouble; and she complains mildly that through the Vague sect the rumour wildly runs: 'Oh, Mrs. Blank has given up The Diet; she drinks tea!' Then, there is the Bague diet. In this you eat no meat, of course not; but, furthermore, you must not have anything cooked. You may have peas and beans, but they must be raw; you revel on carrots and turnips, as they come from the field, save that they are finely shredded. Cooking, it appears, blasts the vitamines, it destroys the invaluable potassium salts; cooking is the cause of most of the deadly and awful diseases that waste the world. Can there be any more putrid silliness than this? Here is modern science advising us to go back to the wretched apish savages who were our remote ancestors, who grubbed for roots and climbed for nuts and devoured raw worms because they had not found out the secret of fire. Even supposing these pompous imbeciles are right — there is not the slightest reason to believe that they are right — is it not better to live like a man for fifty years on beefsteaks and vol-au-vents than to mop and mow for a hundred years like a monkey on chopped carrots? And then there is the milder but still abhorrent folly of the physician, the 'well-known physician' of the newspaper interview, who tells people that they eat far too much; the sort of man who advises, in print, a small portion of porridge for breakfast, a tomato and a bit of cheese for lunch, and half a sole and one slice of mutton for dinner. This fellow is everywhere; and I need scarcely say that he regards all the alcohols as deadly poison. He represents the almost universal concession to cant. Politicians, who love nothing better than a sound bottle of champagne opened at two o'clock in the morning, tell us that the State will rush down to ruin if we drink a glass of beer after ten p.m. So doctors, who can relish good meat and good drink with any man, tell the world through the newspaper that it ought to live in a manner that would make a riot in a monastery.

But the reductio ad absurdum — I remember that much Euclid — is quite delightful. For the last sixty or seventy years, this great bully, science, a sort of Gradgrind and Bounderby rolled into one, has been bragging and blustering and pretending to know everything and telling its grandmother how to suck eggs, and coming the most tremendous howlers on every possible subject. It has announced with a grin that would make an Earlswood idiot envious that it has been into the dissecting-room and hasn't found the soul there. It tried a little Scripture History and announced, with a decision that the most dogmatic popes have been unable to command, that there are grave flaws in the story of Abraham, because writing is mentioned, and writing was unknown in the period at which Abraham is supposed to have lived. And this magnificent proclamation was made about a fortnight before certain inscribed tablets were found at Tel-el-Amarna; the characters having been formed 2,000 years at least before Abraham was born. Then a little profane history, for a change. You know about Homer and the Siege of Troy. Science laughed. There never was any Homer, there wasn't any Troy, there wasn't any Siege. The whole tale was a sun-myth. It was an account, in allegorical language, of the course of the sun over the heavens, from its rising to its setting. Then came Schliemann. He found Troy standing, what remained of it, in the place in which Homer said it stood. And, moreover, he found that it had been sacked, and that it had been burned, as Homer said it had been burnt. So sun-myths and sun-heroes went out of fashion, and in their place we have culture-gods and culture-heroes and culture-myths, and science is as happy as ever and as pleased as Punch, because it is quite sure that the Holy Grail was a saucepan used for cooking spring cabbage — as sure on this point as it was on the other point; that Achilles was the sun.

Very well, I have no objection. Fools must be fed with folly, and it seems the province of science to give fools their meat in due season. But I say to science: hands off my bill-of-fare! Conclude, if you like, that monkeys and anthropoid apes were the only people who knew how to order dinner. Discover, if you will, that the jackass is the supreme authority on diet, and that there is nothing like thistles. But let science keep its conclusions and discoveries to itself. I am going to have my dinner at the Café Royal.

ON HOLIDAYS

IT MAY SOUND unpatriotic, even now, almost four years since the ending of the war, but I cannot help it: there is a certain German with whom I am in the most cordial sympathy. I am sure that he and I would have got on very well indeed, on one point at all events.

He is not an actual German. He lives in a book, The Caravaners, by the Countess Russell, the author of Elizabeth and her German Garden. And I do not deny that there was a great deal to be said against the Baron von Ottringel, of Storchwerder in Prussia. He was a bore of the deadliest kind. He was a snob of the purest water. His selfishness stuck out of him in lumps. He was, as one of the characters in the book declares, 'a very grievous bounder.' He was utterly deficient in all the decent amenities of life. He was a mean cad. But I like him all the same. For he would not pretend that caravaning was a pleasant holiday. It fell out like this. Some of the Baron's friends near Storchwerder had English connections, and were making up a caravaning party for the summer holidays. They told the Baron how cheap a plan it was: how a caravan could be hired for fourteen pounds a month, how there would be no hotel bills to pay, no waiters to tip, no railway tickets to be taken. The Baron was a saving man; he was tempted; he became a caravaner. And he disliked it thoroughly. He didn't like helping to get doubtful dinners which took so long to prepare that they had to be eaten by lantern light 'in a gusty place, vainly endeavouring to hold our wraps about us, our feet in wet grass and our heads in a stormy darkness. The fitful flicker of the lanterns played over rapidly cooling eggs…. This was not a holiday; this was privation combined with exposure.' And then the poor man had to help to wash up in a rainstorm; and he didn't like that either.

And in spite of the many differences that have separated England and Prussia, I cordially shake hands with the Baron von Ottringel. It is not in the least amusing to anybody but a fool to eat a bad dinner on wet grass in the dark and then to undertake a job for which you have had no training in circumstances of the extremest discomfort. For there is a right way and a wrong way of doing the most trifling tasks, and the right way has to be learned. Even in washing up there are mysteries, as any man can find out for himself if he care to enter his own well-found back-kitchen, with a special washing-up geyser to help him; let him try the experiment on a blasted heath in the dark, with water half warmed over doubtful oil lamps and the heavens emptying themselves upon his head. The Baron was perfectly right; all this is beastly discomfort, and to pretend that it is a pleasant holiday is merely one of the many forms of cant. Of course the only way to enjoy caravaning would be to do in the caravan as the real caravaners do; that is to make oneself into a gipsy. The gipsies, no doubt, get on well enough; they lay no elaborate tables; they have their own modes of cooking suited to the life and the circumstances; they have no passion for spotless plates or for polished knives and forks. They know nothing of the many refinements, delicacies, niceties that have been invented, wisely or unwisely, by people who have had the habit of living in houses for hundreds — or thousands — of years. It is like enough that Mr. Petulengro would be as unhappy at a London hotel as was the Baron von Ottringel in the caravan. But Mr. Petulengro is too sensible a Romany to try to live like a gipsy in a London hotel; he would not attempt to bake a hedgehog in a clay oven on his bedroom floor. It is only the foolish gentile who is capable of playing the impossible part of drawing-room gipsy. Again and again the Baron was right — on the matter of caravaning, at all events.

Yet, though the practice is absurd, the theory is sound. For I suppose that the root of this uncomfortable caravaning business is the desire to take a holiday that shall be as great a change as possible; and this, no doubt, is the real end and benefit of holiday-making. It is not chiefly change of air that we want; change of everything else is much more important. From the mere physical point of view, the London air is good enough for anybody; and our great city, monstrous as it is with its infinite wilderness of houses, is one of the healthiest places in England. It is not our air that we require to change as the summer draws on, but the whole habit of mind and body, of the mind rather than of the body. And, no doubt, a farmer living somewhere Careg y Wastad (Rock of the Wilderness) way, near St. David’s (which is sixteen miles from a railway), should take his holiday at Charing Cross. An analysis of the air blowing over Careg y Wastad from the Atlantic Ocean might show it to be purer than the air of the Strand; but the change would set up Mr.

Caradoc Owen Morgan, of Llangadwaladyr Fach, for the rest of the year. And here we have the justification of the practice of ‘going abroad’ for a holiday. We are often told that it is a pity to go to France before we have exhausted the many and exquisite beauties of our own country; that we should explore our own mountains and lakes and moors before we roam in Touraine and Gascony and Provence. And, indeed, it is quite true that there are beauties and delights enough in England, Scotland and Wales to last and outlast the holidays of most lives; and yet there is a great deal to be said for the Continental holiday. Things may not be better nor more beautiful across the Channel; but they are so utterly different. The whole aspect is changed; even a tree on a French hilltop is a different object from a tree on an English hilltop. In our driest, hottest weather the world is presented to our eyes through faint veiling mists; in France the outlines of visible things are shown clearly in an air which is so luminous that the objects seen appear to be illuminated. And then there are the differences of architecture, the strange shock of finding that even small children seem able to speak French quite fluently, the sound of a strange tongue all the while in our ears, the novel aspect of the cafes with the people on the terrasse drinking their beer and their coffee in the open air, the queerness of a lunch that has garlic sausage, omelette fines herbes and pieds de porcs grillés in it instead of roast mutton, mashed, and Cheddar; all these things and many more combine to make a French holiday a very admirable holiday. You have been for a while in another world, you are immensely refreshed and delighted — unless you are like the gentleman I once saw at the Hotel de France at Bordeaux. It was the hour of déjeuner, and all the company were beginning the hors d’œuvres save this true Briton. He was pouring out tea from a Britannia-metal teapot, and ham and eggs were on the plate before him. But I believe this sturdy fellow to have been at Bordeaux on business, not pleasure; anyhow, his was not the way to enjoy the chief benefits of a holiday; change and new experiences. And that brings me to the puzzle of the average Londoner’s holiday. I have just been saying that when Mr. Caradoc Owen Morgan, of Llangadwaladyr Fach, Careg y Wastad, Pembroke, feels that he wants a holiday his best course is to spend a week or two in the heart of London; and clearly the reverse treatment should apply to the City man who is feeling ‘fed up’ with the City. But somehow it doesn’t. He ought to take his holiday at Careg y Wastad; but in fact he very rarely does anything of the kind. He seeks no solitudes, no wild places. He goes to Penzance, Brighton, Eastbourne, Folkestone, Margate, Southend, Cromer, according to his pocket or his tastes, almost always to some place where he will be in the company of crowds of people, where the life of London will be reproduced as nearly as possible, with fresh sea air thrown in.

This is queer; but so it is; and I am afraid the explanation is that the true Londoner hates the true country. It says nothing to him; he is bored by it, he is more than bored by it. I believe that he is frightened of it; that a deep, dark lane at night is almost as terrible to him as is the dark passage to the little child at bedtime. It is a repetition of history. They were just like that in the Augustan age of Rome. The authorities were alarmed. They couldn't prevent the country people from flocking into the great city, and once there, they never went back to the fields. Horace and Virgil, at the high desire of the Emperor, wrote beautiful poems about the delights of farming, and the joys of a country life in summer and winter, of piling the logs on the flame when the snow lay deep on Soracte, of the cool shade by the well of Bandusia in the heats of summer, of the good old days when the Romans loved the land. They wrote these delightful things, but I don't think that they troubled the country much themselves, or Virgil would never have told farmers that the way to get a swarm of bees was to kill a calf and bury it, and Horace would not read so absolutely as a finished man about town. And the country people still swarmed up to the city; and stayed there. So with our Londoners; they agree profoundly with that great Londoner who said a long time ago that he who is tired of London is tired of Life. Perhaps, indeed, like the children, we feel that we are all in the dark and love to keep together and make a noise to raise our spirits; and will not, even for a month or a bare fortnight, leave the cheer of the friendly lamps and the noisy, crowded streets.

SIX DOZEN OF PORT

MANY GOOD PEOPLE must have been sadly shocked to read of a certain recent bequest which has been recorded in the papers. The testator, a wealthy solicitor, directed his executors to buy six dozen of the best vintage port for the benefit of ‘his good friend and partner,’ Mr. Blank, in the hope that in drinking it Mr. Blank would be reminded of the cordial relations that had existed between them for many years.

I can imagine, as I say, that horror of varying degrees of intensity will be aroused by these dispositions. There are all the people who hate life, who have many names and styles and titles. They call themselves intellectuals, or, sometimes, the intelligentsia; I suppose because they have no intelligent understanding or perception of anything whatever. When you talk to them about literature they will be cross with you if you suggest that the thing exists or has ever existed outside Russia — always excepting, of course, one or two honoured and ‘conscientious’ English names. If you talk to them about education, they will laugh anything except physical science out of court, reserving always psycho-analysis, which turns the whole world of waking and dreaming into a peculiarly putrid and silly form of nightmare nastiness. But the real mark of this sect is their hatred of life. That is a large order, you will say. So it is. But a lady of my acquaintance put the matter very clearly once before one of the most distinguished members of the sect, a gentleman who never touches good meat or good drink and thinks the habit of smoking a disgusting vice. The lady had been listening to the Intellectual for some time, and then she turned and said: ‘I tell you what, George, what would do you good would be to be brought to bed with twins; then you might know something about life!’ The lady was proceeding per impossible, of course; but I think one sees her point. The sect in question argues most acutely against this, and that, and the other, and argues so well that you are confounded by the strength of its position — till you perceive that what they object to is not this, or that, or the other, but life itself, and, indeed, life is full of objectionable incidents, but it is all the life we know anything about.

Need I say that to the intellectuals, this bequest of six dozen of the very best port will be highly offensive? They are not all teetotallers, perhaps, but they would be agreed to holding port to be at best a very trivial thing. I remember one of them being highly irritated by one of the most savoury volumes of modern times, Professor Saintsbury's Notes from a Cellar Book, to read which is almost — but not quite — as rare a treat as the drinking of the choice and curious delicacies in wine that it describes. 'A record of a state of things which has fortunately quite passed away'; in these words, or in words to that effect, did the Intellectual describe the golden volume of one who is learned, it is true, in wine, but learned also in the literatures of the world, a true Professor of the humaner letters. These people, with certain exceptions, always speak with scorn of the Classics. If we get beaten in a foreign market, if the current goes wrong on 'the Met.,' if anything happens that ought not to happen, they say that it is because our educational system is all wrong, since we teach our boys Latin and Greek instead of physical science. Consequently, as despisers of what the Irish hedge schoolmaster called 'the haythen mythology,' these people know nothing about the story of Dionysos, the Wine God; how he went all over the world, civilizing the nations by teaching them the culture of the vine, and they have not heard the moral fable of King Pentheus, who resisted the civilizing mission of Dionysos, tried to keep the vine out of his kingdom, and, as a natural consequence, went mad and came to a dreadful end; being, in fact, torn to pieces. This sounds nonsense, doesn't it? But it has just been happening in our own day. Russia went dry — and then Russia went mad and Bolshevist; and even our advanced 'thinkers' are coming to the conclusion that Bolshevism is a very dreadful end indeed. Russia has been torn to pieces. As for the United States of America, a distinguished American statesman has declared recently that the increase of crime in the States since the coming of Prohibition has been terrific and terrifying.

And, by the way, I have been reading lately about two recent enactments of the Legislature of the Sovereign Commonwealths of Kentucky and Georgia. Kentucky has declared that Evolution is contrary to the laws of the State: Georgia enacts that the man who goes out fishing without his wife's leave is a felon, and that the punishment of his crime shall be a sentence of five years' penal servitude. As I was saying, Pentheus was very odd in his manner towards the end.

But, as I say, the Intellectual is by no means always a teetotaller. His position is rather that meat and drink are matters of no importance, that they are unworthy the consideration of a sage, and that a man who thinks much of his dinner and his glass of vintage port is an inferior person who thinks of meat and drink because he has no mind to think of anything higher. That is why the intelligentsia dislike Dickens, who loves nothing better than to describe a feast and the joys of good eating and good drinking. 'This is an inferior mind,' they say. 'If you would see true greatness read Luntic Kolnyatsch in the original Gibrisch' — with Mr. Max Beerbohm's leave. 'He specializes in skin-disease, vermin and suicide; subjects fit for the genius of the modern world.' All I can say is that it strikes me as a very strange frame of mind. You have something like it in the seventeenth-century Puritans, who hated a great number of noble and beautiful and goodly things; you have, perhaps, the original of it all in the fifth-century Manichees, who founded their faith on a logical basis, at all events. They were persuaded that the world with all that therein is was made by the devil, and therefore that everything in the world was very evil. A really thoroughgoing Manichee could not break a crust of bread without uttering a long apology for doing so, which was his grace before meat. This was all very well and consistent; but the intelligentsia have no very fervid belief in the devil; so why do they either hate, or, at least, despise old vintage port and, in general, all the good things of life? Remember the Kreutzer Sonata, by Tolstoi, the ancestor of the whole family of Kolnyatsch. Here you have a book which strikes not at this detail or that; not at the bottle of old port, or the good cigar, or the roast partridge, but at the very source of all life. It is thoroughgoing, certainly, for if the Kreutzer Sonata doctrine were carried out we should be delivered from all our troubles, since there would soon be none of us left. Tolstoi held, as it seems, that no children should be born into the world; presumably, therefore, he held that existence in itself is an evil, thus approximating to the doctrine of Buddhism. Well, Buddhism is of India, and Manes, the founder of the Manichees, was a Persian: the East has always been inclined to teetotalism; that is to the denial of the joy of life.

You will remember, of course, that highly popular best seller Rasselas, by the late Samuel Johnson, LL.D. Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, is speaking:

'By what means,' said the Prince, 'are the Europeans thus powerful; or why, since they can so easily visit Asia and Africa for trade and conquest, cannot the Asiaticks and Africans invade their coasts, plant colonies in their ports, and give laws to their natural princes? The same wind that carries them back would bring us thither.’

The puzzle is addressed to the sage, Imlac, the prince’s philosophic counsellor. Imlac, with some circumlocution, gives it up, and Johnson himself, commenting on the passage many years after, did the same. He said that he could see no real explanation of the remarkable facts.

The explanation is, of course, easy enough. The East, as I said, has always been inclined to teetotalism, with all that is implied in that term.

Let us be warned in time. Woe to us if we take to despising good drink while the myriads of millions of China take to strong ale and vintage port. Our day will be done. ‘Mene, Mene’ will be written on the wall. Let us rather honour the memory and imitate the example of the good man of Gray’s Inn, who left six dozen bottles of the finest port to his old friend. I am sure that he was a good man. If a man talks to me of the sacred cause of Humanity, I lock up my few silver spoons. If he speaks of Liberty I know that he has a Bill in his pocket by which it will be made penal to be out of bed after ten p.m. But he who speaks well of port is, as the Greeks said of their best men, beautiful and good.

THE CUSTOM OF THE MANOR

THEY HAVE BEEN abolishing things again. Lord Birkenhead’s Law of Property Bill — now, I suppose, an Act — puts an end, as ‘A Barrister’ in the newspaper informs me, to the whole of the Feudal System. A great link has been broken, a link that joined us, in a way, with the men of 1066, with all the life of our forefathers from that far-off time to yesterday.

Well, I think it is a pity. I believe that I am not known generally as a politician. My views as to the lodger franchise, the borough as distinct from the county franchise, the several Reform Bills from the ‘thirties of the last century onward that were always going to make us happy, as to Redistribution on a logical basis, as to many other things of the same sort, are generally understood to be vague. They are. Extremes meet — few people understand the depths of wisdom contained in apparently obvious proverbs — and Trotsky and Lenin and I have an equal contempt for votes and all that appertains to votes. I am thoroughly with the Parson. My suffragette friend was telling him that ‘the Vote’ was the breath of life to her, that it would make everything that was wrong right. ‘The Vote,’ it seemed, was a sort of Tree of Life, the leaves of which were appointed for the healing of the nations. The Parson listened kindly; and made a liberal offer.

‘Well,’ said he, ‘I’ve got three votes, and you’re welcome to the lot for half-a-crown.’

Those are my sentiments. I have no interest in votes or in the people who deal in them. But once upon a time I was an ardent politician. The great victory of Gladstone in 1880 warmed my heart. I was an earnest young Liberal. I remember reading in the Daily News a short leading article on the Unreformed Corporations. These, it appeared, were certain small bodies ruling small towns up and down England, which had somehow slipped through the sweeping nets of the ‘thirties, and now those also were to go. Lord Rosebery, another earnest young Liberal of somewhat greater eminence than myself, had taken the Bill through the Lords and one more relic of the bad old times was over. I was profoundly glad to hear it. And I must make a parenthesis. Why on earth should I be glad? To put the question quite distinctly: What the devil did it matter to me whether corporations were reformed or unreformed? ‘Keep your breath to cool your ain parritch,’ Lord Lauderdale might well have said to me: ‘Ye’ll find it het eneuch.’ It is indeed a mystery that I should have concerned myself with such stuff. But I have been investigating these matters somewhat keenly of late, and have come to certain conclusions. More than a year ago I wrote on the mystery of young Blueface, who rows himself into incipient heart-disease at Henley, and later in life finds his chief joy in spread-eagling himself on the face of dreadful Alpine heights, at the imminent risk of his life. I have found out why he does these things. The truth is that the actualities of life are so repulsive that we have been forced to invent all sorts of ways of escaping from them. The Blueface way is one way; the playing of a dozen games of chess all at once blindfolded, is another way; drinking methylated, spirit is yet another way; and I suppose politics is another of these grim sports. If you feel a genial glow at the thought that the Unreformed Corporations are no more; then you are less likely to worry over the fact that you have not had any dinner to-day, and are likely to have a smaller dinner to-morrow.

Well, I glowed as I read this blessed news in the London street. But, a year or two later, being in my own country down in the West, I read in the local paper that the last Portreeve of Usk, accompanied by his two Bailiffs, had unveiled a window in the parish church, commemorating the ending of this old song. That Unreformed Corporations Act had got to work; and something that had endured for a thousand years or more was ended. I knew then, suddenly, that I was no longer an earnest young Liberal. I knew that I hated the notion of destroying old things, just because they were old; and that, I believe, is not a Liberal frame of mind. But to abolish the Portreeve of Usk! Why, the Chief Magistrate of the City of London was the Portreeve of London before Mayors, much less Lord Mayors, were born or thought of. And I don’t believe that Usk is any the happier for having a Local Government Board instead of a Portreeve and two Bailiffs.

Let it be understood clearly; I am by no means in favour of retaining horrible abuses, just because they are old. If the Portreeve of Usk had been enabled, by a Charter of King John, to burn alive in Porthycarne Street any persons to whose opinions he objected, I should be all in favour of a Limiting Clause: earnest Young Liberals, Unbending Young Conservatives, and a few other people being alone excepted from its benefits. But I think it is a pity to smash links just for the sake of smashing them. Thus with the measure of that ardent and devoted Tory, Lord Birkenhead. It abolishes the heriot; the fine of the 'best beast' levied by the lord of the manor on the successor of a dead copyholder. I confess that if I were the new copyholder I should dislike having to give up my five-hundred guinea hunter to the lord as the fee of succession. But why abolish the ancient goodly custom of the heriot? There is no difficulty. The term 'the best beast' should be retained, with an explanatory clause declaring that the said beast shall not exceed in value a groat, or at the most vj pence. Now, according to the Laws of Howel Dda, and allowing for the exchange, this beast should be a kitten before it has caught its first mouse; and I would insist on the kitten. I would put the copyholder who refused his heriot of a kitten in the stocks for five minutes, and if I knew the correct mediæval English for a custom which is, doubtless, ancient, I should stipulate that this false varlet should stand drinks all round to the Court Baron of the Manor.

And then, again; this wretched enactment sweeps away 'Borough English,' the custom which in certain manors ordains that, not the eldest, but the youngest son is heir. Now, this is fairly tearing things up by the roots. Here is a custom which, I suspect, goes far beyond Norman, far beyond Saxon, far beyond that far, far time when the Celts invaded this island and found a little, dark people dwelling here, a people that lived in caves and in houses, hollowed out in the heart of domed hills. These small people, aborigines so far as we know, are considered on a plausible theory to have furnished the source of all the stories about the Little People — the wise name for the fairies. No doubt the custom of Borough English — under a name and in a tongue which would sound unearthly to modern Europe, save perhaps to Basques and Laps — was the custom of the dark little people of the hills; and so it is, naturally enough, that in the fairy tales the hero is often the youngest son. Has Lord Birkenhead ever heard of Hop-o'-my-Thumb? In framing his measure did he consider the leading case of Beauty and the Beast, which shows that the principle of Borough English applied even to female descent? It would seem not. And yet, how simple it would have been to retain this relic of pre-history, without annoying anybody. Suppose the case of John Smith, copyholder of Mudford, being and situate in the Manor of Muckindyke-le-Marsh. John Smith is making his will; he likes his son Perivale and wishes to cut off his youngest, Mulciber, with a shilling. Very good; let him do so. Mudford goes to Perivale, and Mulciber gets nothing — save the right to entitle himself for the rest of his days 'Heir of Mudford,' after the Scottish precedents of 'Master of Dun-blather' and 'Younger of Haddaneuk.' And thus the ancient custom of Borough English would be preserved.

And gavelkind goes too. Gavelkind provided that the estate should be shared out equally between all the surviving sons of the copyholder. This custom, I think, is not of the vast antiquity of Borough English; still it is old and bore witness to the highly interesting fact that in early times the share-and-share-alike principle had its strong supporters, anticipating the modern French laws of inheritance by many hundreds of years. Why abolish it, when it would have been easy to get round it? Why not have arranged that the estate of Blenkinsop should be devised entirely according to the copyholder's fancy, but that all sons should be known as Commoners of Blenkinsop, with the right of digging up one cabbage in the kitchen garden once a year at midnight on the Eve of the Derby?

Why didn't the Lord Chancellor arrange for the digging up of that cabbage? Instead of which he goes about rooting up the past.

THE VICE OF COLLECTING

THIS YEAR I spent my holiday with a party of collectors, as, in point of fact, I always do spend it. They are not people of mature years, their ages ranging from five to fifteen. They do not collect First Folios or Conrads or Masefields or incunabula — a pleasing word, which means in English very early printed books. They collect shells. Every day, this dozen of children, members of four or five families, comes down to the beach as if for enjoyment. They might bathe in the genial sea, well warmed by the Gulf Stream. They might play games on the mile-long stretch of firm sand. They might get up parties of hide-and-seek among the grassy dunes, up hills and down dales purple with wild thyme, golden with Ladies' Slipper, starred with burnet-roses. The older ones might play golf on the natural links, a wonderful sporting course as I am assured. They might even follow my example and do nothing at all, the best of all sports. Instead of which, they collect shells. As each party arrives, it scatters abroad. Some make for Giltar Head, some for Tenby town, some for the rocks, some for the smooth verge of the sea. In a few minutes the happy party has dissolved itself into melancholy individuals, who walk very slowly to and fro, their bodies bent double, their eyes glued to the sand. Land and sea and sky, craggy rocks and the golden sweep of the bay are all lost for them, blotted out; they see nothing but shells. They gather these shells every day for three weeks. When the night falls they sort them out. Finally, they mount them on sheets of cardboard. And then, the day before the end of the holidays — they throw them away. I believe that the landladies' garden paths consist of the accumulated collections of the last ten years. But commoner sorts gathered with less pains would make as good paths or better. You want about a bushel of pectens to make a foot of good, dry path.

I write, it will be observed, with some degree of venom. But I have always been the enemy of collectors or collections, whether on the large scale or on the small. I love the shell on the seashore, glittering from the water, gleaming and pearly in the sun. That very shell, dry and desiccated, gummed on to a cardboard square, seems to me dull, insignificant, uninteresting. And so with the hedgerows, with the deep, shaded banks where flowers of all kinds flourish and grow luxuriant and great and green, with the eyebright and the pink centaury and the enchanting Ladies' Tresses — an exquisite little orchid — on the dunes; with the singular growth of the water plants at the edge of the great marsh; with that patch of luminous blue at the edge of the deep wood where you would say that summer sky had fallen, if you did not know that the forget-me-not blossomed there every year; with the blue rounds of the chicory, the strangely mingled colours of the viper's bugloss, the dwale or deadly nightshade growing sinister, in stony places; with all these beauties and wonders I am enchanted, and on them in their natural places I cannot gaze long enough. But pick them, dry them, press them to death, bury their poor dead bodies in a folio book and call your crime a Hortus Siccus: then for me all the enchantment is over. These dismal things are not flowers, but the corpses of flowers. You may take your Hortus Siccus, your 'Dry Garden,' to the rubbish heap, for all I care. I don't like corpses. And so with other collections. Years ago a very young man was trying to impart to me the art of sucking eggs with a perseverance and an energy worthy of a better cause. He 'put me through it' smartly, he poured his precious balms of art, literature, culture on my head, he rebuked me in his righteous indignation. Well do I remember his stinging tones as he said to me one day: 'You talk sometimes as if you cared for beautiful things, and yet you never go near the South Kensington Museum!' I hung my head and had not a word to say. The fact was that I had paid a visit to the South Kensington Museum in the year 1880; and this visit had lasted me till 1910. I changed the subject hastily; and soon after my young friend gave me up as a hopeless case. I spent a few more happy years in keeping away from South Kensington Museum; and then one fine day I had to make a second visit, whether I would or no. I shall never forget the horror of that afternoon. Here was another 'Dry Garden'; a collection of beautiful things of all sorts torn from their natural places, their natural purposes, their natural and fit surroundings. The rare and costly plate that should have shone on the cupboard of some high lord was in a case, the chasuble that should have been on a priest's back was in a case, the Persian carpet that should have been on the floor was in a case. In short, everything was out of its place and in a case — except one object, the most melancholy ruin of all. This was, in itself, an exquisite piece of work. It had been an outer winding stairway. It was of carved oak, unpainted and untreated in any way. It was a beautiful piece of fifteenth-century workmanship, and it had been torn from its place, which was, I think, an old house in Rouen. Once, no doubt, these richly balustraded stairs had led up to a doorway as rich, to a goodly house of equal craft and beauty; now they took you to a blank wall and to empty space in the room at South Kensington Museum. I had never thought that there could be such a thing as the corpse of a staircase; but there it was before me; a staircase torn up by the roots, rent from the soil whence it had sprung, deprived of all its fit meaning and significance; truly a ghastly and repulsive spectacle.

I shall be asked, of course, whether I hold that the Rouen staircase should not have been preserved. Certainly I hold that it should be preserved, and preserved in a Museum, for the instruction of technical students, architects, wood carvers, and all such persons. But the general public should not be admitted. It is highly necessary that human bodies should be dissected, that human skeletons should be preserved; for the instruction of students of medicine, surgery, anatomy. But the general sightseer is not admitted to the Dissecting Room or to the Museum of Anatomy. We do not make a general and public show of a charnel house. Then there is another and very virulent form of this crime of collecting; that is the collecting of books. Take a notorious instance; the First Folio of Shakespeare. What on earth does anybody want with a copy of the First Folio? It is a thoroughly ugly book, vilely printed from a very poor fount on indifferent paper. It is quite difficult to read the text, which is choked with printer’s errors. Its size makes it thoroughly unhandy. If you possess a copy you must keep it guarded like a royal treasure, for fear of expert thieves. You hardly dare to turn a page for fear of its ‘condition’ deteriorating. Practically you have to treat the thing as a magpie treats a bit of glass or a ring; that is, bury it; and which, I wonder, is the more sensible, the collector or the magpie? The only person to whom a first folio can do any real good is that happy man, the convinced and enthusiastic Baconian. For him the printer’s errors and blunders are a goldmine. Nothing like the First Folio for those who work the various cyphers. No limit to the gorgeous secrets that can be extracted by this method; the hidden history of the Court of Queen Elizabeth, the true parentage of Bacon, the fact that he wrote the whole literature of the age, English and foreign; that he left ground plans and elevations from which Sir Christopher Wren rebuilt St. Paul’s Cathedral, Hampton Court and the City churches a little later, that he designed the watermarks (containing great mysteries) for the paper-makers of his time, that he was the founder of the Society of the Rosy Cross, that he knew all about the Sons of the Widow; all these marvels and many more are to be discovered in the First Folio by the true Baconian. I wish there were enough First Folios to go round these enlightened men; I would shut them and their copies up together.

And then there are the collectors of modern books. They are almost as bad. The other day I was speaking of the habit to an author whose books are just beginning to be collected. ‘Of course,’ he said, ‘I’m glad in a way, because in the long run it means money for me. But what rot it all is! You know those little books of mine, Waite and Waite and Hedger and Mixer? Well, people are giving a couple of quid for first editions, when they can get infinitely better editions for a bob a time. What do they do it for?’ I could not put my author wise — to use an idiom to which he is addicted — and I don’t believe anybody can. Why don’t people leave the shells on the shore, the flowers in the hedgerows, and the first editions in the booksellers’ shops? It is all a mystery. But then life is full of mysteries and, after all, it is mystery which gives life its delight, its joy and its savour.

SPLENDOUR

I AM GOING to do a very naughty thing. It is dreadful to be bad, but sometimes it is a relief to the feelings. And it does a man good to be a regular devil now and then; always provided that he does not let it get into a hobby. But, I confess, the particular form of naughtiness which I am contemplating is very bad indeed. It is called in the nursery ‘answering back.’ Bed without any supper is the usual penalty for this offence; and sometimes mummy comes and cries over the cot afterwards, and won’t go away till there is a firm understanding that Johnnie is going to be a better boy for the future. And Johnnie, being sleepy, readily undertakes to be a saint for the rest of his days. Well, I hope I shall not catch it quite as badly as that — I rather like supper with something devilled in it — but I confess that I mean to break out. It is not merely answering back, but answering back a reviewer, and a reviewer is more important even than Nana. Still, who cares? I don’t believe that Don’t Care was eaten by lions. Here goes.

The facts, are these. Some few weeks ago I published a little book. It was about most sorts of things, and amongst these things it contained a comparison between the general aspect of London as I remember it more than forty years ago, and the London of to-day. There was a particular contrast drawn between the Row of the ‘eighties and early ‘nineties and the Row of to-day. It is like this:

‘Now the old equipages were undeniably the last word of smartness; in themselves they were enough to tell the stranger that he had come to the very centre of the earth, of its riches and its splendours. There were the high-bred, high-spirited, high-stepping horses, in the first place, groomed to the last extreme of shiny, satiny perfection, tossing their heads proudly and champing their bits and doing the most wonderful things with their legs.’

And so forth and so forth; with a very unflattering comparison between these splendid arrays and the modern style— ‘now there are some “Snorting Billies” that choke and snarl and splutter as they dodge furtively and meanly in and out of the Park like mechanical rabbits, bolting for their burrows.' And I dwelt more particularly on the splendid liveries that were still to be seen in those old days, disassociating myself from the people who despise a servant's job, and laugh at him for being gorgeously dressed. 'The man who found "Blazes" ridiculous,' I observe, 'would probably find the King in his Coronation robes equally ridiculous,' objecting not so much to splendour on a footman's back, but to splendour in itself.

Now, as to all this, Mr. Maurice Hewlett, in a very amiable review of the book in question, takes a strong exception. He agrees with me, he says, in thinking that the old turn-outs were splendid, and that the modern motor-car is not splendid. Where he differs from me is in being quite sure that all splendour is a bad thing.

'I fear,' says Mr. Hewlett, 'that I share what he calls "that vile Liberal objection" to splendour as splendour.' He does find the King in his Coronation robes ridiculous. 'We are all so ridiculous essentially that none of us can afford to dress up.' Now, is Mr. Hewlett right? Waiving for a moment the point about 'Blazes' and His Majesty's Coronation robes, and dressing-up in general: is splendour as splendour a bad thing? Is meanness, the opposite, I take it, of splendour, the one thing that we ought to cultivate? It may be so; but if it be so, we have a tough job before us. We shall have to remake the earth; and the expense will be enormous. For if we are to be honest, and I take it that all good Liberals are honest, we cannot deny that there are many splendours in the material universe. There are the stars at night, for instance, they are splendid; you may call them showy if you like; but still, there they are. There are a great many of them; and some of them are excessively bright. Occasionally, they fall; and we perceive that they are, in fact, great ugly lumps of a metallic nature which science can analyse, if I may say so, in a brace of shakes. Then, why do they shine and put ideas into the heads of poets— 'patens of bright gold' and that sort of thing — and lovers? We know that they are really ferrous compounds and not patens of bright gold. Then what do they mean by it? And what are we going to do about it? And how are we to deal with the notorious outrage of harvest moons? I saw one, last September, coming up through the mists of the sea, a red and smouldering fire, a splendour of the night, an adorable beauty. It is all very well to object to splendour as splendour. But will the harvest moon take any notice of our objections? I doubt it. I know it is disloyal; but I doubt it.

And then there is another case; a very bad one. Early this year I bought a bulb for three and six. It was rather an ugly, shapeless-looking thing; not nearly so symmetrical as an onion. I placed it in a wooden tub full of leaf mould, and watered it at intervals and gave it certain doses of superphosphate of lime from week to week. What was the result? Two slender green stems came up out of the leaf mould and grew taller and taller and at last produced little green buds. These swelled and grew great and at last opened. And now there is a great crown of splendour: flowers of creamy loveliness, striped with gold, starred with crimson, radiant with orange-coloured stamens, exhaling rich odours. Truly the Lilium Auratum is splendour and glorious splendour, arrayed more nobly than Solomon or any other king. It may be urged, of course, that this lily comes from Japan, an autocratically-governed country, and that, therefore, the Lilium Auratum knows no better; but I hardly think that this will do. Why, even in our own country, where every one who wants the vote can have it, forget-me-nots are still very blue, and, in spite of the abolition of Christmas by the sturdy Puritans, holly berries have remained of a bright shade of red. So I am rather in a difficulty. Like many of the people in Miss Wilkins' beautiful New England tales: 'I wanter know.' Nature, from the stars in the sky to the forget-me-nots on the ground, seems given to splendour. Why should we, who are, I suppose, a part of nature, stand out, as it were, and resolve to be as mean and ugly as we possibly can? Is this really Liberalism? I cannot think it. I hope, for the sake of Liberalism, that it isn't. For if it were, Liberalism would be like the law according to Mr. Bumble, 'a ass.' For, if Mr. Hewlett will think it over, he will see that he has committed himself to the 'Program' of abolishing all the arts. Turner is splendid, Bach is splendid; they must go. Mr. Hewlett, he says, objects to splendour as splendour. Then Lincoln Cathedral, Durham Cathedral, St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey; all these must come down, and be beaten into shapeless ruins and rubble. All beautiful furniture must be smashed, all curious pottery and porcelain of the ages must be broken to mend the roads; nothing splendid, nothing beautiful must be preserved. Mr. Hewlett objects to splendour as splendour.

And then, more particularly, as to men, as to human beings. 'We are all so ridiculous essentially that none of us can afford to dress up.' Is that so? If so, we are in a very bad way indeed. Are we really to insist that every woman shall go about in a long robe of cinder grey, or in dark green corduroy coat and breeches? Is lace to be a penal offence? Are pretty shoes to spell a month's hard? Are fanciful and charming hats to be a matter for the magistrate? Nay, is a man with a well-cut suit and tie and socks and hat to correspond to be liable to be frog-marched on sight to the nearest police station? But all this is 'dressing up.' Anything, as that wisest of men, Dr. Johnson said, beyond a bull's-hide suit, is dressing up. And what about changing from grey to oddly cut black after seven o'clock every evening: what is this but dressing up? Is Mr. Hewlett too ridiculous essentially to put on evening-dress when he goes out to dinner? And again; since we are all so essentially ridiculous, as he says, what can be more ridiculous than serving that meal of dinner on snowy white napery of choice and costly make, with the ritual of curiously cut glasses, of fine silver, of exquisite flowers, in a room richly furnished, adorned with admirable paintings? The ridiculous creature man is to shovel food into his ridiculous belly that he may prolong his ridiculous existence: cannot he do this without the ridiculous splendour of cut glass, fair linen, Queen Anne silver, costly flowers, while he wears in honour of the evening the sort of coat that his grandfather wore in the morning, and the kind of tie that clergymen wore fifty years ago?

The fact is, of course, that when Mr. Hewlett declares that he dislikes splendour as splendour he is really declaring his dislike of the universe in general and of human nature in particular. The world from the flowers to the stars is a splendid spectacle, and the love of splendour is deeply set in the heart of man. The wretchedest savage with a few poor pots and gourds for all his belongings will yet scratch or cut some kind of decorative pattern on them. Poor work, rude work enough, but it is the best that he can do; the only splendour that he is capable of fashioning. And let us remember this: that it is the love of splendour, the splendid robe, the splendid word, the splendid tune, the splendid picture, which constitutes the vital distinction between man and brute. Many beasts have reason, the faculty of using means for a certain end. But only man has Art, which is the love of splendour and the desire to create it.

HOW TO SPEND CHRISTMAS

IT SEEMS PARADOXICAL, but I am strongly inclined to think that the more comfortable we become, the less we know of comfort. As I may have remarked before in this work, there is no reason to suppose that the Anglo-Indians of the Plains really appreciate the glorious sunshine of the dry season. It would take a new-comer from the Hebrides to enjoy the golden blaze.

You will remember that I once saw a man enjoy a noble fire as it ought to be enjoyed. It was a bitter day of fog and frost in London, and the fire was indeed a gorgeous one, with radiant depths of glowing coal at the heart of it, and great boulders from which jets of burning gas came shooting with a hissing, rushing noise, and flames that roared up the chimney. The man laughed as he came into the room and saw this mighty blaze.

‘Ah!’ he said as he drew his chair up to the heat, ‘you don’t really appreciate a good fire till you’ve been where I’ve been.’

Then Amundsen began to talk to me about the Polar places where he had been, of the remorseless cold, of wading up to the waist through boundless plains of freezing slush. And he looked at the fire as though he loved it. Now, he was no doubt right in holding that if a man would really taste all the full savours of a blazing hearth, he must go to the North Pole; to the utter, bitter darkness of the world. But the recipe is a severe one, and the journey long, and one cannot afford to be all that time away from business. Still, in the old days, people contrived to relish their firesides without taking the extreme measure of Polar Exploration. There is an old coaching print of which I am very fond. It shows the coach overturned in a wild, snowy landscape. The passengers are picking their way heavily, clumsily through the drift, one going on before with a lantern. ‘What miserable discomfort!’ you will say. Not a bit of it. I know, and they know, that after half an hour or so of our English substitute for the North Pole, they will come to the noblest roadside inn. The glow of it will gush out into the wild night through red-curtained windows; as the door opens the genial heat will conquer in an instant all winter weather; and within, a fire that would melt the frozen Pole itself, and tempting armchairs, and firelight and candlelight flickering and glittering on right Spanish mahogany. The coach passengers will laugh just as Amundsen laughed as they come into the room, and the guard — the man with the lamp — will say: ‘Make yourselves comfortable, gentlemen; we shan’t be able to get on for another couple of hours, or maybe three,’ and there will most certainly be punch, and probably some jolly stories. My belief is that when the coach was announced, and the passengers were packed in the straw and muffled up to the eyes in their shawls, they all declared that they had seldom passed a pleasanter evening, and fell asleep for the rest of the journey five minutes afterwards.

In these days one cannot do that kind of thing. Suppose the express is hung up for a while in a snowdrift. The steam heat is on, certainly; but there is nothing jolly about steam heat. As to punch: it is past ten o’clock and punch after ten is felony. Besides, most of the passengers have been instructed by ‘A Physician’ in their morning paper that there is nothing more chilling in its effects on the human frame than hot spirits. So there you are. The coach incident was, undeniably, something of a lark. There is nothing of a lark in sitting still in an express for an hour or two, waiting for the snow ploughs. And putting these incidents of travel on one side, I believe we are losing our sense of the joy of a blazing fire. We are getting to be rationalists on this subject; and it is always a bad thing to be a rationalist on any subject. I remember one night in my own house some guests of mine began to fall out about the heat of the room. Some said it was too hot, others that it was not hot enough. Whereupon an American gentleman in company, raised in the tradition of central heating, said sourly:

‘What’s the good of talking about the temperature of this room? There are probably ten distinct temperatures in this room.’

Of course there were; and that’s just the fun of it. You can only relish the joy of warmth properly when cold is, as it were, at your elbow.

The central-heating and steam-pipe people argue, no doubt, that fires are merely means to give heat, and that since the modern systems distribute heat more evenly and more effectually, they are quite evidently superior to open fires. Now, this sounds reasonable; but as a matter of fact it is nonsense. Nay, but it is so. Offer a fin gourmet the rarest of Bordeaux, the noblest Burgundy that you like to imagine, in a teacup, and watch his face. And be quick about it; for he will certainly kill you, and the verdict will be 'Justifiable Homicide.' Rationally, the wine is as good in old Betty's teacup as in the thinnest and most curious glass: but — we know better. It isn't. Science would assure us that Château Un Tel or Clos Chose cannot possibly be affected in any way by being poured into porcelain or earthenware instead of glass; and as usual where science is concerned we are forced to answer: 'You are perfectly right: but you lie for all that.' How does this matter of the wine and the teacup — one could drink Château vintages out of a teapot, for the matter of that — relate to that other matter of pipe-heating versus a roaring fire? Why, each example illustrates the singular but undeniable principle that, even in matters of the senses, there is much more involved than the senses; rather, perhaps, more than the particular sense which is to be gratified. The old hearth, if one comes to think of it, is a species of sacrament, symbolizing a whole world of dear and friendly and sacred and happy things. That leaping flame on the wild winter's night is much more than a means of securing that the temperature of the room shall not fall below 60° Fahrenheit. They understood this so well in old Rome that there were gods of the hearth, the Lares and Penates, and it was in their honour that the flame on the hearth blazed and glowed. And we have something of that ancient feeling still with us; we talk of fighting for our hearths and homes. Has anybody ever talked of fighting for our cellular 'Thermidor' improved reverberating radiators? But the 'Thermidor,' no doubt, distributes heat in a much more even manner than any open fire of coal or logs. And yet again, it doesn't. If we were sheep and goats 'that nourish a blind life within the brain' and felt the cold, then the radiator would be our proper apparatus of heat; but being men, we require, odd as it may seem, to have our souls warmed as well as our bodies; and so we choose, if we are wise, the flame of the sacred hearth, and if we are lucky and have a good store of well-seasoned oak logs, it is of them that we build the fire, and add to our joys the exquisite aroma, the incense of burning wood.

And so, of course, with the parallel case of good wine and the way to drink it. We drink wine for its rare savours and for the genial warmth of body and mind that it produces. But we do not drink it as we drink quinine. I have never heard of a quinine or castor oil gourmet who insisted on quaffing these beverages from a particular kind of glass — I suppose it would be a graduated medicine glass with the beautiful figures for drachms and scruples duly inscribed on its surface. But wine, somehow, we desire to receive after a different fashion. It must be brought to us, either ancient in its encrusted bottle with the dust and cobwebs of its deep, dark cellar thick upon it, or else decanted, in a vessel of cut glass; and the actual glass from which we drink it must be as fine as may be, a pleasure to the eye, a pleasure to the lip on which it rests. Here, again, we are unscientific. The flavour of our Bordeaux or Burgundy or old Port would be just as good if the wine were brought to table in a beer-jug and poured out in a coarse mug with blue band and a brown, blobby tree for its decoration; and, once more, how blest are they who ne'er consent by the ill advice of science to walk! It is a very odd thing — the world is simply chock full of very odd things — but the effect of consenting to walk by the advice of science would be to reduce humanity pretty well to the rank of beasts and barbarians. A pig is not particular as to the design of its trough, and a savage who drinks doesn't care in the least about the shape of the bottle which contains the firewater. This, as I say, is really odd, considering that science is supposed to be the guiding star of the very latest civilization. Science is triumphantly new, modern, progressive; and yet, as we have seen, its practical tendency would appear to be reactionary — though, after all, pigs are very nice animals, and there is a good deal to be said for the Red Man. And thus we come back to the paradox with which we started: the more comfortable we become, the less we know of comfort. We follow scientific principles, close up the hearth and take to the radiator, the error being that man is considered simply as a physiological surface, capable of certain impressions of cold and heat. He is that, but he is quite a number of other things, which are often more important to the sum of his well-being. Why, I dare say that science would be inclined to agree with Mr. Uriah Heep. He, being in gaol, thought that it would be better for everybody if they could be 'took up and brought here.' And as far as I can make out from reading that infernal 'Physician' in the daily paper, those are exactly the conclusions of the latest science. We all eat too much. In gaol our bill-of-fare would be expressed in ounces, and not many of them. Some of us drink 'alcohol' — to think that there are scoundrels so shameless as to call a fine Corton 'alcohol'! In gaol there is no 'alcohol.' Some of us are given to inhaling the dubious or more than dubious alkaloids generally known as tobacco. In gaol no smoking is allowed. Outside, we are often lazy. Inside, scientific authority would see that each got the exact amount of work and exercise proper to his case and constitution. Outside, all sorts of temptations, every kind of vice; nothing of the kind in a prison cell. Outside, houses are often damp and in defective repair — I have had a loose slate on my roof for weeks — inside, everything of this kind is in perfect condition.

In short, we should all be much better off if we were to spend this Christmas in gaol. Clearly: on scientific principles. It is undeniable; and it is also, as usual with scientific principles, the Devil's own lie.

ADELPHI: FAREWELL!

‘HE AND I walked away together; we stopped a little while by the rails of the Adelphi, looking on the Thames, and I said to him with some emotion that I was now thinking of two friends we had lost, who had once lived in the buildings behind us, Beauclerk and Garrick. “Ay, sir (said he tenderly), and two such friends as cannot be supplied.”’

‘He and I were Johnson and Boswell. And yet I understand that they are going to pull down the Adelphi.

Nay, ‘he and I’ were just coming away from poor Davy’s house, Number 5, where his widow had entertained them elegantly. Mrs. Garrick had talked of her husband with complacency, and when she cast her eyes on his portrait, which hung over the chimney-piece, said that ‘death was now the most agreeable object to her.’

Now, this should be sufficient. The place where this amazing remark was uttered to a festive assembled party, presumably with the object of cheering everybody up, and promoting a flow of genial spirits, such a place as this should be a sacred relic, a house to be preserved for ever.

And yet they are going to pull down the Adelphi. Nay, more. After this gay beginning, there was a large company in the drawing-room. Hannah More and Sir Joshua and Dr. Burney were present at dinner; later came the Bishop of Killaloe — did he often visit his Cathedral Church? — Dr. Percy of the Reliques, and several others. Johnson, talking of ‘a very respectable authour’ — modern English, ‘a distinguished man of letters’ — told the company a curious circumstance of his life, which was that he had married a printer’s devil.

‘And,’ added the Doctor, ‘she did not disgrace him; the woman had a bottom of good sense.’ Now, the Doctor was here talking the English of his youth. If he had said this in 1730 nobody would have laughed. To this day we don’t see anything funny when we speak of a blind street or alley as a cul-de-sac\ I am sure no self-respecting French cook of a very few years ago would have seen the slightest impropriety in murmuring in the ears of Madame la Duchesse, as he presented his new-found and exquisite dish to Her Grace: ‘Les culs d’Artichauts à la Marjolaine.’ But times change and phrases, and when the great Doctor brought out this sentence at Mrs. Garrick’s reception, on Friday, April 20th, 1781: ‘most of us could not forbear tittering and laughing.’ So Boswell records, though, remembering the honour of the Church, he declares that the Bishop of Killaloe kept his face with perfect steadiness. And Hannah More, who might be considered the Church’s Maiden-Aunt-in-chief, slyly hid her face behind a lady’s back. This was a tremendous occasion. Johnson would not bear that a phrase of his, meant to be perfectly straightforward common-sense English, should be regarded as funny. And so he glared sternly round and said: ‘Where’s the merriment?’ And then he ‘looked aweful,’ and slowly pronounced: ‘I say the woman was fundamentally sensible.’ I think that it shows the power of this great man that the company, which had tittered, did not now howl with mirth. But they did not. They ‘sat composed as at a funeral.’

And all this in the Adelphi. And yet they are going to pull down the Adelphi.

And, coming to a later, though still a most noble age, and to imagination in place of fact, do you remember where it was that Mr. Wardle rubbed his hands and said:

‘Let us have some of your best wine to-day, waiter.’

And the waiter replied:

‘You shall have some of the very best, sir.’

Now, I declare that that wine, the very best wine of an old-fashioned London hotel in 1830, has afforded me more choice pleasures than any wine I have ever drunk in fact. I revel in it. I do not seek to know exactly what wine it was. But I have every confidence in it. ‘Some of the very best!’ It was more than wine; it was dreams and chimes and music. The oldest and the rarest of it had been binned very deep down in dark cellars near the flow of the river, almost from the time of the Brothers Adam. I incline to surmise, though I will not be obstinate, that the dessert wine was Malmsey Madeira, older perhaps than the place where it was drunk; a vintage, let us say, of 1740.

And this wine was administered at Osborne's Hotel in the Adelphi. Is this a place to pull down?

But I am afraid it will be pulled down, and that the game of our dear old London is definitely up. In the last twenty years the change has been great; in the next twenty years it will probably be much greater. The world changes and the Strand must change with it. I suppose so; but I am sorry. Of course it all began just a hundred years ago. Many people have been accustomed to regard our late King George IV as a typical Tory. Some people said he was a pig-headed despot. Leigh Hunt, a Radical, was sent to gaol for abusing him. But I am afraid he was not of the true Tory faith. In his youth, let it be remembered, he had associated with the Whigs — I fear that they left their mark on him. Anyhow, it was in his reign that they began to knock about the Strand; the West Strand, by Trafalgar Square. David Copperfield remembered the old West Strand.

'I remember two pudding-shops, between which I was divided, according to my finances. One was in a court close to St. Martin's Church — at the back of the church — which is now removed altogether. The pudding at that shop was made of currants, and was rather a special pudding, but was dear, twopennyworth not being larger than a pennyworth of more ordinary pudding. A good shop for the latter was in the Strand — somewhere in that part which has been rebuilt since. It was a stout, pale pudding, heavy and flabby, and with great flat raisins in it, stuck in whole at wide distances apart.'

And I remember that stout, pale pudding too. In my day, it was to be seen sweltering in pans in the window of a shop on the north side of the Strand, over against St. Mary's.

Thus David's recollections of his sparse meals. I do not suppose that he — or Dickens — was aware that the court which sold the superior pudding was a relic of a cookshop rookery of the early seventeenth century. The quarter was sometimes called Porridge Island, sometimes the Bermudas, sometimes the Caribbee Islands. In Ben Jonson's day the place was noted for 'bottle ale' and tobacco. In 1753 a periodical essayist mentions the 'fine gentleman whose dinner is served up under cover of a pewter plate, from the Cook's shop in Porridge Island.' Men had eaten and drunk roughly in this maze of courts and alleys for more than two hundred years; poor little David Copperfield comes last and gets his slice of pudding there; and then George IV sweeps it all away. I wish he hadn’t. Then there was peace for a long time. Now and then a fine old house was pulled down, and an ugly modern house took its place, but the aspect of things in the Strand and about it remained pretty much as they were in 1830. When I first saw the Strand in 1880 it was still intact, and so it remained till late in the ‘nineties. And then the crash came. Beautiful old Clement’s Inn was, I think, the first to fall.

‘I was once of Clement’s Inn,’ says Shallow, ‘where I think they will talk of mad Shallow yet.’

As you went up by the narrow way from the Strand, you passed the fine hall of the Society, built in 1715, and within there were green gardens and closes, and a delicious eighteenth-century house standing in the middle of a lawn; what a choice retreat in the very heart of London; peace and greenness within a minute of the roaring Strand! Down came St. Clement’s Inn; and up went the big red flats. Soon after came the great scheme. Holywell Street and Wych Street with their sixteenth-century gables were swept away; New Inn disappeared; queer mazes of mouldering streets about Clare Market banished for ever; the old Globe, the old Olympic became as Babylon, things fallen and abolished. Australia House, mighty business buildings, as magnificent as anything in Berlin, stand in their stead.

And now the Adelphi also is to become a memory!

THE ART OF UNBELIEF

I HAVE JUST been reading a very odd article in a Sunday paper. It is a series of extracts from a book called Lord Kitchener's Lives. It tells you exactly how it all happened. It was dictated by Lord Kitchener's ghost to an otherwise unknown person called 'Ala Mana.' The story begins with the great soldier's embarkation on the Hampshire. It relates the odd behaviour of a cabin-boy:

'I was attracted to a cabin-boy who darted out of a shadow, and as he did so, glanced at me sharply, an expression of peculiar guilt in his eyes.'

The tale goes on to describe the apparition of Lord Kitchener's mother and her warning; the alarm of the submarine; Lord Kitchener's exit from his cabin and return to it, when he finds that his papers have been disturbed; his hearing the click of the lock and finding that he is locked into the cabin; the shock of the fatal torpedo; and, when Lord Kitchener had pounded through the panels of the cabin door, the discovery of the cabin-boy, with a bullet in his brain and a revolver in his hand. Then comes death by drowning, the assumption of an 'astral body' and remarkable encounters in the world of spirits.

Now, let it be noted that the Sunday paper describes the work as 'mediumistic balderdash.' But it prints four columns of extracts. Why? This is a side issue of the main argument — we shall come to that before long — but the point is curious. The paper prints all these extracts because it realizes that there is a Kitchener Myth, and that many of its readers will be highly interested in anything which bears on it. Strange though it may seem, even in these later days when folk-lore and folk-songs are almost forgotten by the folk whose fathers made them; when the real folk memory is either gone or on the point of going; when all the old tales which were told of winter nights about the fire have become 'subjects' to be dissected and examined and theorized over by learned men; when students in far Western American Universities now gain degrees by writing learned theses on stories that once gladdened or terrified smock-frocked alehouse company by lonely English lanes; when the old myth-making faculty was, one would have said, a thing utterly ended; still, in these days the folk have made a myth about Kitchener. It was not so strange that the Ireland of a generation ago refused to believe that Parnell was dead. There were men in the Ireland of the ‘nineties of the last century — perhaps there are still — who were living in the world of a thousand years ago; and so the Men of the Hills, as Parnell himself called them, believed that the story of their leader’s death in a Brighton lodging-house was all a lie, a lie concocted by the Saxon and Tim Healy, most likely. Parnell was gone into some strange region to rest and be restored and healed of his grievous wounds — I don’t think the Men of the Hills had heard of Avalon, and probably they had the United States of America in their minds — but he would come again and rule once more, and as the old man in the Irish workhouse told Lady Gregory: ‘there would be no police at all, and every poet should have twenty pounds a year.’

I was saying that there are Irishmen to-day who are living in the world of a thousand years ago. I have just quoted an instance. The old man in the workhouse had no notion, I am sure, that he was repeating a Welsh prophecy of the twelfth century with slight variations of phrase. The Welsh writer was speaking of the golden age that was to be when Cadwaladyr Vendigeid should return: ‘then,’ he said, ‘Saxons shall be eradicated and Bards shall flourish.’

It was not wonderful then, that the men of Kerry and Connemara made a myth of the return of Parnell; and for all I know there may be old men and women of the hills who still look for it, in spite of Sinn Fein and the Free State. But we of England, we of London with our morning papers and our evening papers and our Sunday papers and our wireless and our broadcasting and all the rest of it — progress, I think, it is called — it is marvellous that we too still possess the old faculty. We must know in our hearts, you would think, that the Hampshire was blown out of the water and that Kitchener was drowned; but we will not have it so. I remember that in my very own house, one night about two years ago, I was saying innocently: ‘They tell me that there are really people who believe that Kitchener is still alive: is it possible that there are such people?’ Whereupon a young gentleman in company lifted up his hand and with an expression of fervid belief said boldly: ‘Here’s one of them.’ It struck me as wonderful; and all the more when I found that the Survival of Kitchener was only one article in a queer sort of Credo, as to the details of which I have become somewhat vague. I think that you were bound to believe that the failure — if it were a failure — of the British Fleet at Jutland was planned by the British Admiralty, and with that went a confession of the iniquity of 'Salome,' and faith in a mysterious volume, possessed by Germany, in which all our names were written. It was the oddest confusion of a creed that ever was, I verily believe. For a few days it turned the calmness and the decency of a British Court of Justice into a scandalous disorder and produced a most ridiculous verdict; and then all the nonsense was forgotten, or so I thought. But, evidently, it was not so. The popular Sunday paper still finds it profitable to quote stuff which it confesses to be 'balderdash,' because the said stuff is related to the Kitchener mythology. Note that mysterious cabin-boy, who behaves in the manner of what the stage calls the heavy man: he is in the famous vein of the myth-makers.

But this by the way. I read on; I read how after a severe struggle, after the ghost of Lord Kitchener had the mortification of seeing the fishes tear his dead body as it sank through the waves; I read how the ghost went up and was received by 'guides' who led it to its high appointed place. The ghost was immediately placed under a professor, who offers a choice of studies and the choicest company.

'He said: "My brother is here too. He was once a man of distinguished rank." He paused. "To-night we go to the banquet. Queen Mary of Scots, King Edward the Seventh and Queen Victoria will be present, also several other notables of the physical world. They are all doing their work here."

'I asked: "What are Queen Mary and Queen Victoria doing?"

'He smiled. "Queen Mary is teaching young souls who are very tender and very spiritual. Each one has a message." He paused. "Queen Victoria is doing some literary, medical, and also scientific work. She is a brilliant student. She will teach the higher souls in a class in medical science. Also, through her interest in the earth, she will be the means of inspiring many great souls there."

'We had by this time come to a very tall building. As we entered, the professor said, "We will go up now in the lightning elevator,"' There is plenty more of the like sort: Queen Elizabeth, Tolstoi, Louis XVI are all encountered. But my point is this: by what faculty are we enabled to declare the whole farrago to be, as the paper rightly names it, balderdash; rubbish of the most hideous kind? For — let us be quite clear as to this point — we know nothing whatever as to the ghostly world. There may be people who think that they are quite certain that there is no such world, who think they are quite certain that when a man dies physically he dies utterly and for ever. I say 'people who think that they are certain' as to this and that advisedly; because it is certain that they are not certain: they know nothing whatever about it, and no human being can know anything about it. But, excluding these folks, and taking the rest of us, who are willing to admit that the human personality may persist after death in some manner which we cannot distinctly conceive, how, I ask, are we enabled to say decisively and finally that all this stuff that I have quoted about Kitchener and Queen Victoria and her literary and scientific studies and the rest of it is a lie?

For, as I say, we know nothing about the other world. For all we know it may be a world of balderdash; or, to go deeper still, this account of the studies and occupations of Queen Victoria and Mary Queen of Scots may not be balderdash at all. Let us remember: Dr. Johnson, a very great man and a very acute man, was quite sure that Milton's 'Lycidas' was balderdash or something perilously near it. And Voltaire, a very great man and a very acute man, of quite a different sort from Dr. Johnson, would have put Dante into a lunatic asylum. Now, of course, we are quite sure that both these great men were monstrously wrong: but how about the verdict of two hundred years hence? Then there was poor John Keats and his little book of verses, published about a hundred years ago. The reviewers in Blackwood's Magazine and the Quarterly Review, men of literary education and of accredited taste in literature, were quite certain that Keats' verse was balderdash. 'Go back to your gallipots, Master John': that, I think, was the polite advice of the Blackwood's authority. Yet, we have since come to the conclusion that Master John wrote some of the most exquisite poetry that has ever been written in English; I think we may be bold enough to say in any earthly tongue. So, dare we be confident as to what constitutes balderdash? Perhaps Queen Victoria is really making progress in her literary, scientific and medical studies. Of course it may be said that the whole tale is very unlikely. It is. But such unlikely things do happen sometimes. Suppose a prophet coming to those obscure solicitor people, the Buonapartes of Corsica, and telling them what the young Napoleon was to do in history. They would have said that the prophet’s story was a very unlikely one. And if you had told Robespierre, as he was resigning his judicial post, because it was against his conscience to sentence a criminal to death; if you had told him of the seas of innocent blood he was to spill; how indignant that mild young legal gentleman with his mild young verses would have been! And on the face of it, is there anything much more unlikely than the transmutation of a bloated caterpillar into the airy, exquisite butterfly?

Well, then, perhaps Mary Queen of Scots did exclaim to Lord Kitchener as in the printed story:

‘Oh, you should see King Edward’s work! He paints marvellously. Queen Victoria helps him in his training, and she is very clever in painting the eyes.’

And yet, we, we — I will put it brutally — who have any sense in our heads, know that all this and all other tales like to it are a farrago of ghastly imbecility, lying, fraud, delusion; these elements being mixed in varying proportions in various cases. We are perfectly certain that this is so: that nobody told the ghost of Kitchener that the ghost of King Edward VII is being helped to put in the eyes by the ghost of Queen Victoria. We are sure of all this: but how? Frankly, I do not know. Logically, as I think I have shown, we have no right to come to any conclusions whatever on the matter; we know nothing at all about it or of the final constitution of the universe.

Yet, we are sure, and when we cease to be sure, why, Heaven help us! And let it be remembered that there is this corollary: if we are justified in disbelieving certain tales, though we have no logical grounds for our disbelief, so also we are justified in believing certain other tales, though we have no logical grounds for our belief.

NOTE

ALL THESE ESSAYS and chronicles, with the exception of the last, ‘The Art of Unbelief,’ appeared in The Lyons Mail. The first article, ‘Dog and Duck,’ has been revised and considerably enlarged since its original appearance in print.

‘The Art of Unbelief was returned to me by the Editor of The Lyons Mail, with a few trenchant criticisms:

‘I cannot deal with the enclosed … I am afraid my readers would not understand it … a mass of dissertation, some of which I would not ask our linotype operators to translate.’

Such are the amenities of that highway which Sir Philip Gibbs has so delightfully called ‘The Street of Adventure.’

There are adventures and adventures, and some adventures are … muddy.

THE END

Dreads and Drolls

This non-fiction work is a series of true stories, many of which deal with the supernatural, the fantastic and the sensational. It was first published in 1926. As Machen explains in his introductory note, he has exercised his literary imagination and adopted a poetic license in order to render these ‘bare facts’ interesting and romantic for the reader. Consequently, this collection is as readable and intriguing (and, at times, as unsettling) as Machen’s avowedly fictional tales.

The stories take the form of ‘studies’ of particular events, persons and places, each of which may be categorised as a ‘dread’ or a ‘droll’ according to its capacity to evoke either terror or amusement.

Note

ALL THESE "DREADS" and "Drolls" appeared in "The Graphic". They were gathered from all sorts of sources. Most of them are strictly veridical, but it may be confessed that here and there imagination plays a small part.

My favourite in the collection is, decidedly, the story of Grimaldi the Clown and his long-lost brother. It is an enigma of a tale. On the one hand, there is nothing improbable in the bare plot. Many lads, I have no doubt, went to sea in the adventurous times of the Napoleonic Wars, and were unheard of by their families for long years, often enough they were never heard of again. They were killed in one fight or another, they perished in African swamps, they became Archimandrites in Russia, or confidential advisers to the Dey of Algiers or to Prester John. And again there is nothing improbable in the adventurer's return with a heavy bag of gold, nothing improbable in the final disappearance of a young man who flourishes this bag of gold in the purlieus of Drury Lane as the chimes are ringing midnight.

That is the bare plot of the tale, and as I say, it is all probable enough; and yet I defy anybody to read Grimaldi's story without lifting an incredulous eyebrow. And I have come to the conclusion that this impression is due to Grimaldi's unconscious art, I have no doubt that the Clown spoke the truth; but he had within him that love of mystery and wonder which (as I have said till people are sick of hearing me say it) is the sure foundation, the only foundation of Art. Again and again in his odd book this note of mysteriousness occurs. Take, for example, the incident, of the man with the silver staff. Grimaldi always declared that he never knew who this personage was. He didn't want to know. If he had made enquiries, I suppose he would have found that the mysterious stranger was Chief Bow Street Runner, or, as we should say, something big at Scotland Yard. And so, I daresay that the affair of Mr. Mackintosh and his twelve friends — a tale absolutely Arabian, as Grimaldi tells it — would have seemed tiresome enough to a man without his admirable capacity for mystery and capacity of creating it.

And thus in the business of the long-lost brother. It all happened, and there is nothing very remarkable in it — save for the wonderful though unconscious art which has made a plain tale of plain facts read like a subtle study in mysterious suggestion, a ghost story of the rarest kind.

This is a great gift: to be able so to tell the bare truth that it seems a magnificent lie. To many of us, it is rather given to invent elaborate fictions which are plainer (and duller) than the plainest facts.

The Man With The Silver Staff

JOE GRIMALDI, THE famous clown, whose life was edited by Dickens, had many strange adventures, and among them is the affair of the Man with the Silver Staff. This happened in the year 1798. Grimaldi had become engaged to his manager's daughter, and had settled in Penton Street, off Pentonville. He was employed at famous Sadler's Wells Theatre, and he was accustomed to pass from his house to the theatre by going across some pleasant pastures called Sadler's Wells Fields. These fields have long been covered by squares, the names of which are unfamiliar to most Londoners: Claremont, Myddleton, Lloyd, and Wilmington; and I will only say that he who is desirous of experiencing the sense of penetrating into outland and unknown territory cannot do better than explore this region, before the leases fall in and the great red flats go up.

One day, then, Grimaldi, on his peaceful way to rehearsal at the Wells, found the Fields occupied by a mob of about a thousand people, all of them scoundrels, engaged in a popular sport of the day. They were hunting an overdriven ox, and they were so densely packed and so extremely ruffianly that Grimaldi wondered whether he would not do better to turn back and go round by the Angel, Islington. Whereupon a young gentleman, looking at him attentively, came up to him and said.

"Is not your name Grimaldi, sir?"

"Yes, sir, it is," replied Grimaldi. "Pray may I enquire why you ask the question?"

"Because," answered the stranger, pointing to a man who stood among a little group of people hard by, "because I just now heard that gentleman mention it to a companion."

Grimaldi looked round, saw "the gentleman," and was not at all flattered to hear that he was being noted by him. The gentleman was "Old Lucas", a "desperate villain" — we should say, an infernal scoundrel — and Parish Constable of Clerkenwell. The fact is Mr. Lucas was in the habit of taking advantage of his official position. He made a practice of accusing innocent people of this, that, or the other crime, of perjuring himself freely and of engaging other perjurers in the necessary quantities, and of pocketing certain small sums due to him on the conviction of the supposed guilty person. And so Grimaldi was not pleased to hear that Lucas had mentioned him, and still less pleased when he heard what came next. He asked the polite young gentleman if he were quite sure that Old Lucas had mentioned his name.

“Quite certain,” was the reply. “I can’t have made any mistake upon the subject, because he wrote it down in his book.”

“Wrote it down in his book?” exclaimed Grimaldi.

“Yes, he did, indeed,” replied the other, “and more than that, I heard him say to another man beside him that ‘he could lay hold of you whenever he wanted you.’”

Grimaldi was not at all pleased to hear this. However, he took the long way round to the Wells, avoiding the mad ox, and bad Lucas, and the worse mob, and forgot all about the matter in the business of rehearsal. In the evening, however, he recollected it and told the tale to his friends in the green-room, soon before the curtain went up. And Dubois, the comedian, and another actor named Davis, and Richer, the renowned rope-dancer, all roared with laughter, after the good custom of green-rooms everywhere. Dubois remarked that Old Lucas would stick at nothing, not even at Joe’s life, to gain a few pounds, perhaps even a few shillings. Then they speculated as to whether the charge would be murder or only forgery, though, as one remarked, that made little difference, since it was a hanging matter either way. And poor Joe tried to laugh, too, but did not feel really happy; and then a theatre messenger came in and said that Mr. Grimaldi was wanted directly at the stage-door.

“Who wants me?” enquired Grimaldi, turning rather pale.

“Old Lucas,” answered the messenger, with something between a smile and a gasp. Whereupon the green-room howled with laughter, the messenger joining in, till Mr. Dubois perceived that Grimaldi looked very unhappy indeed. Whereupon Mr. Dubois and the others said — again according to players’ custom everywhere and always — that having had their laugh they would back up their friend to the uttermost of their power. The whole party trooped out to the stage-door and defied Lucas, who told Grimaldi that he must come with him directly to the police office in Hatton Garden; the actors asked for the constable's warrant, told him, one rather gathers, to go to hell, mentioning as, an alternative, a ducking in the adjacent waters of the New River. A joyous mob gathered at the sound of strife, and began to shout execrations against Lucas, who confessed at last that he had no warrant; "because people generally knows that I'm in authority, and thinks that sufficient." Whereupon the happy mob shouted again, derisively, and perhaps with a little threatening note, too. So Mr. Lucas said that if Mr. Grimaldi would promise to come to the police office in Hatton Garden the next morning, that would do; and Mr. Lucas turned to go on his way. But the news became general that the villain of a constable was trying to arrest the great Grimaldi, the favourite of all London, and in a moment the whole quarter rang with whoops and yells. Here was better sport than ox-hunting. Mr. Lucas ran for his life with a volley of rotten apples, mud, and so forth following after him — and the curtain went up at Sadler's Wells Theatre.

The next morning Grimaldi, accompanied by the famous rope-dancer and the two comedians, attended before Mr. Blamire, the magistrate of Hatton Garden. Old Lucas forthwith charged Grimaldi with hunting, and inciting and inducing other persons to hunt an overdriven ox in the fields of Pentonville, to the irritation of the ox and the hazard and danger of his Majesty's subjects. In confirmation of this, Lucas summoned a few friends, who confirmed him in every particular. On the other hand, Grimaldi told the truth, and called the young gentleman who had first given him warning of the threatening attitude of Lucas. The magistrate said, finally, that he was quite sure that Grimaldi's story was the true story and that Lucas and his friends were liars; still he was bound to act upon the deposition of the constable and his witnesses, and so he fined Grimaldi five shillings. As for Lucas, Mr. Blamire told him to be careful. In great delight the actors bowed to the magistrate, paid the five shillings fine, with a mysterious extra shilling "for the discharge," and, oddly enough, it was proposed and unanimously agreed that the party should adjourn to the King of Prussia (afterwards the Clown), a tavern opposite the Wells. Here they had a little lunch and made merry over the small profits accruing to Lucas on a five shilling fine. And in the middle of their mirth a man ran into the room and cried: "Joe! Joe! here's Old Lucas again." More roars of laughter. Grimaldi and his friends thought this was a capital joke — when in walked Old Lucas. He was, really, a surprising fellow, this Constable of Clerkenwell. He declared that Grimaldi had not paid the five shillings or the aforementioned one shilling, and that he must either pay or "come along."

"Not paid?" said the unfortunate clown. "Why, I paid the six shillings before I left the office."

Old Lucas only grinned, and said: "Pay the money, or come on with me."

Grimaldi swore he would not pay another farthing. The constable advanced to seize him and tore his shirt and waistcoat to ribbons. Whereupon, the mild Grimaldi was roused to anger and knocked Lucas down, causing the "porochial" nose to bleed grievously. But he got up again and produced his staff, and the fight was just going to begin again when a Mysterious Stranger rose from his place in the tavern room. He rose and drew from his pocket a Silver Staff, which he shook at Lucas; and, at the sight of that Staff, Lucas withered and collapsed. At the command of him of the Staff, the whole party returned to the police office, where Mr. Blamire remarked with amazement the change that had taken place in the shape of the constable's nose. And Mr. Blamire seemed to know the Mysterious Stranger very well indeed, and greeted him cordially. The matter was heard, the Silver Staff corroborated Grimaldi's story, and Old Lucas was fined five pounds, the money to go to the poor of the parish. Whereupon Old Lucas foamed at the mouth, like the hunted ox, and swore with frightful oaths and "great expressions of disrespect" that he would pay nothing. Then the worthy magistrate ordered Old Lucas to the cells, where he remained for five or six hours, devoting the whole time to howlings and imprecations, and at last paid up and wrote a penitent letter to Grimaldi.

And the Man with the Silver Staff? "Who," said Grimaldi, with profound respect and an air of great mystery: "Who this gentleman was, I never could ascertain; but that he was a person possessing a somewhat high degree of authority was evident to me from the great respect paid to him at the police office."

And here is another queer business in which Grimaldi was engaged, a few years later. He had a professional friend named Bologna, and Bologna knew a wealthy country gentleman, a Mr. Mackintosh, who lived down in Kent. Now Mr. Mackintosh had often pressed Bologna to come down to his place for the shooting and bring a friend; and so one October Grimaldi and Bologna hired a gig (the date is 1804) and drove in the direction of Bromley. Here they met a man in a fustian jacket, driving a lame horse in a taxed cart; and greatly to Grimaldi's amazement, this was Mr. Mackintosh the wealthy. And the magnificent house was a small roadside tavern, kept by Mr. Mackintosh's mother; and Bologna was mortified, and Grimaldi was inclined to laugh. However, the two actors had a good plain dinner, and in a day or two were taken out for the shooting.

"Now's your time," said Mackintosh, pointing to a field where a great number of pigeons were feeding.

The actors were cross. They said they had come to shoot birds. Mr. Mackintosh said that pigeons were birds, and the two comedians fired in a rage and slew twenty-five of them.

"And now," said Mackintosh, "if you will take my advice, you will cut away at once."

They were the squire's pigeons. Grimaldi and Bologna were chased to the Lane by the squire's gamekeeper, on Mr. Mackintosh's information, but that difficulty was surmounted by a moderate payment on account of the pigeons, a rumpsteak dinner and a bottle of wine.

And so, you will say, the end of Mr. Mackintosh and his odd sense of humour. Not at all. In three years' time a much smartened, spruced-up Mackintosh calls on Grimaldi, hopes his little joke has been forgiven, and trusts that Grimaldi and his wife will accept the hospitality offered by some friends in Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square. Grimaldi drives round one night after the play, finds a splendid mansion, splendidly furnished, a blaze of light, luxurious furniture, and noble meats and nobler wines for supper. There were just twelve people present besides Mackintosh and Grimaldi: Mr. and Mrs. Farmer, host and hostess, and five other married couples, all exquisitely dressed. The jewellery of the ladies was superb, the liveries of the servants were gorgeous. Again and again the Grimaldis partook of this Arabian hospitality; and always the party was the same; the six ladies, the six gentlemen, and Mr. Mackintosh. Mr. Grimaldi was a little perplexed; he thought that there was something peculiar about the manners of these people, but he could not quite say what it was. He puzzled his head, he felt that the Charlotte Street ways were different from the ways of the noblemen and gentlemen he met in the green-rooms of the Lane and the Wells; but he could not make out what the difference was.

And now for the solution of the puzzle. Alas! Mr. Mackintosh and his friends were all “desperate characters.” Mr. Farmer had been reprieved while he stood on the drop under the gallows; they were a pack of burglars, forgers, passers of forged notes. And what did they want with Mr. Grimaldi? Simply to be amused; that was all.

The Adventure Of The Long–Lost Brother

IN THE SECOND week of November, 1803, a play called “A Bold Stroke for a Wife” was running at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane. Miss Mellor was playing Anne; Bannister, Highwell; Atkin was Simon Pure; and Grimaldi, Aminadab. One night the prompter, otherwise the assistant stage manager, had put his head in at the green-room door and had summoned Mr. Grimaldi, and as the actor was going on the stage a messenger told him that two gentlemen were waiting to see him at the stage door. The stage must never wait, so Grimaldi sent a message to the gentlemen, to the effect that he would come down to them as soon as the business of the scene was over. Accordingly, he went to the stage door and found there two gentlemanly young men.

“Here’s Mr. Grimaldi — who wants him?” said the actor, and one of the young men turned swiftly about and accosted Grimaldi in a very cordial manner. Grimaldi looked at him. He was about, his own age and had the appearance of a man who had lived in some tropical climate. He wore the fashionable evening dress of 1803: a blue coat with gilt buttons, white waistcoat, and tight pantaloons, and a gold-headed dress cane was in his hand.

“Joe, my lad!” exclaimed this person, holding out his hand, with something of emotion in his manner, “how goes it with you now, old fellow?”

Grimaldi was confused. To the best of his belief he had never seen the young man before and, hesitating, he replied that he really had not the pleasure of his acquaintance. “Not the pleasure of my acquaintance!” repeated the stranger, with a loud laugh. “Well, Joe, that seems funny, anyhow!” He appealed to his companion, who agreed, and they both laughed heartily. Grimaldi grew perturbed and uneasy; he suspected that the two men were rather laughing at him than with him, and he was turning away offended, when the first young man said, in a tremulous voice:

“Joe, don’t you know me now?”

Grimaldi looked at him again. The man had opened his shirt, and was pointing to a scar upon his breast. By this scar Grimaldi recognised the young man as his only brother, John, who had gone to sea, had not been heard of for many years, and was supposed to be dead. Grimaldi was very much moved. The two embraced again and again, and gave vent to their feelings in tears. Men embraced each other in Dickens' earlier books. It is odd; but in the days of the Napoleonic War, when John Bull is supposed to have been most John Bullish, he had ways which we should call "Continental."

"Come upstairs," said Grimaldi. "Mr. Wroughton is there — Mr. Wroughton, who was the means of your going to sea — he'll be delighted to see you." The two were hurrying off, when the other young man, who had been quite forgotten, said:

"Well, John, then I'll wish you good-night."

"Good-night, good-night," said John Grimaldi, shaking his friend's hand. "I shall see you in the morning."

"Yes," replied the other, "at ten, mind!"

"At ten precisely; I shall not forget," answered John.

So the friend went away, unintroduced and unknown, so far as the actor was concerned. The brothers went first on the stage and then to the green-room; and the tale was told of this wonderful return, and the sailor was introduced to the actors. Still, the business of the stage continued, and the actor-brother had to leave the sailor-brother, gathering bits of his story between exits and entrances. The sailor said he had made a very successful trip.

"At this moment," he boasted, slapping his pocket, "I have six hundred pounds here."

"Why, John," said his brother, "it's very dangerous to carry so much money about with you."

"Dangerous!" replied John, "we sailors know nothing about danger. But, my lad, even if all this were gone, I should not be penniless."

Grimaldi was convinced by this and the knowing glance that the sailor gave him that he was, in fact, a wealthy man. But before he could get more exact information the prompter's voice was heard again, and the actor had to hurry away. In the meantime Mr. Wroughton talked to John, making kind enquiries as to his doings and his success. John replied as he had replied to his brother, and brought out a coarse canvas bag, stuffed full of coins. The comedy was over at last, and Grimaldi asked his brother how long he had been in town. He replied only two or three hours; that he had had his dinner and come on at once to the theatre. What did he intend to do? He had not considered the matter; his only object had been to see his brother and mother once more. The two had a long talk. Joe told his brother that he, his wife, and his mother all lived together. But there was plenty of room in the house; why should not the sailor come and live with them, and so they would all be happy together. John was delighted with the notion. But he said that he knew he would not be able to sleep unless he saw his mother that very night; what was her address? The address was given, but the actor suggested that they had better walk home together. He had finished for the night, and would be ready as soon as he had changed his dress. The sailor assented, and Joe went off to his dressing-room.

And then the strangeness of it all came with a sudden onset on Grimaldi. "The agitation of his feelings, the suddenness of his brother's return, the good fortune which had attended him in his absence, the gentility of his appearance, and his possession of so much money; all together confused him so that he could scarcely use his hands." He seems to have fallen into the state which the Scots call a "dwam," a manner of waking vision, in which actualities are taken for dreams and the man wonders when he will awake and recognise that he has been amongst the shadows of the night. "He stood still every now and then, quite lost in wonder, and then suddenly recollecting that his brother was waiting, looked over the room again and again for articles of dress that were lying before him." In consequence, he took much more time than usual in getting off his make-up and changing his dress; but at last he was ready and ran down to the stage. On his way he met Powell, one of the Company. Powell congratulated him on his brother's return, and Grimaldi "asked him more from nervousness than for information if he had seen him lately."

I think the phrase is curious. It must be remembered that Grimaldi wrote his own Memoirs — they were severely sub-edited, it is true — and, likely enough, the phrase in question is the old actor's own. Taking into account the odd things that came upon him in the dressing-room, I am inclined to think that he had begun to suspect that his brother had never returned, had never been introduced to the actors, had never spoken of his wealth; that the whole thing was an illusion, a phantasm of his mind. That, I believe, was what he meant by “nervousness”; he wished to be reassured by Powell, to be told that there was an actual brother waiting for him below, and that he would see him in a moment. But the events that were to come give this part of the story a very strange interest.

But Powell was reassuring enough.

“I saw him,” he replied, “but a moment ago; he is waiting for you on the stage. I won’t detain you, for he complains that you have been longer away now than you said you would be.”

Grimaldi hurried down to the spot where he had left his brother — it must have been the green-room, surely, not the stage, since there was an after-piece to follow “A Bold Stroke for a Wife” — but he was not there.

“Who are you looking for, Joe?” inquired Bannister, as he saw him looking eagerly about.

“Well, and I saw and spoke to him not a minute ago,” said Bannister. “When he left me, he went in that direction (pointing towards the passage that led towards the stage-door). I should think he had left the theatre.”

Grimaldi rushed to the stage-door, and asked the door-keeper whether his brother had gone out. The man said he had gone out not a minute before, he had not had time to get out of the street. Grimaldi ran out, and ran up and down the street; not a sign of his brother. He wondered what had happened. Then it struck him that John might have gone to look up some old friend or neighbour — the Grimaldis had been brought up close to the Lane. There was Mr. Bowley; he and John had been bosom friends when they were boys together. Forthwith Joe knocked at Mr. Bowley’s door.

Mr. Bowley himself opened the door, and was evidently greatly surprised.

“I have, indeed, seen your brother,” said he. “Good God! I was never so amazed in all my life.”

“Is he here now?” was the anxious inquiry.

“No; but he has not been gone a minute; he cannot have gone many yards.”

“Which way?”

“That way — towards Duke Street.”

Grimaldi thought on this that his brother must have gone to call on Mr. Bailey, the Grimaldis’ landlord, when they lived in Great Wild Street. Away to Mr. Bailey’s house in that street; again he knocked at the door. No-one answered; he knocked and rang again With increased fury, and at length a girl put her head out of an upper window, and said in a voice both sulky and sleepy:

“I tell you again, he is not at home.”

“What are you talking about? Who is not at home?”

“Why, Mr. Bailey. I told you so before. What do you keep on knocking for at this time of night?”

In great bewilderment, Grimaldi begged the girl to come downstairs, as he wanted to speak to her, telling her his name. She came down after a short interval.

“I’m sure I beg your pardon, sir,” said the maid. “But there was a gentleman here knocking and ringing very violently not a minute before you came. I told him Mr. Bailey was not at home; and when I heard you at the door I thought It was him, and that he would not go away.”

Then Grimaldi asked the girl if she had seen the gentleman’s face. She had not; she had looked out of the upper-window, and all that she noticed was that the gentleman had a white waistcoat, whence she inferred that he might have come to take her master out to a party.

Back went the amazed and frightened actor to the theatre. There nothing had been seen of the lost brother; and then Grimaldi began a sort of mad midnight tour of the houses of old friends round the Lane, knocking and ringing people out of their beds and enquiring after his brother. Some of the people thought Grimaldi was mad; and said so. His manner was wild, and nobody had heard of John Grimaldi for fourteen years. They had long given him up as dead.

One more call at the theatre; nothing had been seen of the missing man. Perhaps, Grimaldi thought, his brother had gone to the house in Pentonville. He had seemed so anxious to see his mother that very night; and between the calls of the prompter the two had been making plans of happiness of a family reunited after the passing of many years. But there was no brother at the house; but his mother sat in the supper-room, looking much paler than usual, so that Grimaldi thought she must have seen him.

“Well, mother,” he said, “has anything strange occurred here tonight?”

“No; nothing that I have heard of.”

“What! no stranger arrived! no long-lost relative recovered!” exclaimed Grimaldi.

“What do you mean?”

“Mean! Why, that John is come home safe and well, and with money enough to make all our fortunes.”

The mother screamed and fainted. John Grimaldi was never seen again, never heard of. A great noble, a frequenter of Drury Lane, used his influence at the Admiralty; some people thought that John had been pressed for the Navy. He was known to have gone under another name, and when no news came, it was suggested that he might well have fallen in one of the great sea fights of those great wars; it was two years before Trafalgar. Then a police officer, who had made enquiries in the neighbourhood of the Lane, had his theory of the boastful sailor with his bag of gold being decoyed into some black den, there to be robbed and murdered. And Grimaldi himself was inclined to suspect his brother’s companion, the smart young man in the white waistcoat, who made the appointment with his brother for ten o’clock the next morning. Why had this man not come round to the theatre, to make enquiries after his vanished friend? But John Grimaldi was seen no more.

It is an extraordinary tale. It may be true in every particular. But there are strange circumstances in the history. For example: why should John knock up his old friend, Mr. Bowley, only to dart away from his door in a minute’s time? Note that minute in advance all through the chase. It persisted up to Mr. Bailey’s house. The servant-girl there said, “there was a gentleman here knocking and ringing very violently not a minute before you came.” I do not quite know why; but this fixed period of a minute inspires me with distrust.

But if the story be an invention, I am sure it was not Joe Grimaldi’s. The famous clown was a worthy, stolid, solid man outside of his clowning. The lie, if it be a lie, must be the work of Mr. Thomas Egerton Wilks, Grimaldi’s friend during his life, editor of his Memoirs after the great clown’s death.

But many of the actors at the theatre had seen John Grimaldi and talked to him on the night of his return? Possibly; but that was in 1808. Bannister died, I think, in the ‘twenties; was anyone of the company alive when the Memoirs were published in 1838?

And yet, in spite of all, I incline to believe in the truth of the tale.

7B Coney Court

A GOOD MANY years ago the late Stephen Phillips, the poet and dramatist, got himself into a very queer piece of trouble. He had just left his house somewhere on the south coast, I think at Littlehampton or near it, and rumours had got abroad that he had done so because the place was haunted. The rumours penetrated to Fleet Street, and some paper sent down a reporter to interview the poet. Stephen Phillips told the newspaper man his experiences in his late residence, and they were, indeed, most remarkable. I have forgotten the detail, and cannot recall the manner of the noises or voices or apparitions that had vexed the late tenant; but there was no doubt that the house was haunted, and haunted very badly. A sensational “story” appeared in the paper and then the landlord of the house sued everybody concerned for heavy damages. It had not occurred to Phillips or the newspaper that you could libel a house; but the owner of it pointed out that to call a house haunted made it unlettable, and that in consequence of the statements in the interview the place once occupied by the poet had been empty on his hands for the last eighteen months. How the matter ended has escaped my memory, but I believe somebody, the poet or the paper, had to pay, and I should think it was the paper. However, I am taking the affair as a warning, and so I declare that all names and places in the following history are fictitious. There is no such Inn of Court or Chancery as Curzon’s Inn; there is no such square as Coney Court, though South Square, Gray’s Inn, once bore that name. And therefore: no action will lie.

But assuming for the moment that names and places are as true as the tale, it may be said that Curzon’s Inn lies somewhere between Fleet Street and Holborn. It is approached by a maze of crooked courts and paved alleys, guarded by iron posts, and it consists of a small hall — note the very odd and elaborate “sham Gothic” work about the principal doorway, date 1755 — a huge and ancient and flourishing mulberry tree in a railed enclosure, a quadrangle called Assay Square, and another which is Coney Court. In Coney Court there are nine entrances in the buildings, which were rebuilt in 1670. All is of a dim red of ancient brickwork; the entrances are enriched with Corinthian pilasters, in the manner of the older doorways in King's Bench Walk in the Temple; and the carved wooden penthouses over these doorways have been attributed to Grinling Gibbons; somewhat doubtfully, as I am told, and on a misreading of an allusion in a contemporary diary. But, at all events, there are nine doors in Coney Court, and no more than nine, and hence the perplexity of Mr. Hemmings, the Steward, when he received a cheque for £20, with a note to this effect:

Dear Sir —

Please receive the enclosed cheque for Twenty Pounds (£20 0 0), being the quarter's rent due to you for my chambers at 7B Coney Court, Curzon's Inn.

I remain, Yours faithfully,

Michael Carver.

That was all. There was no address. There was no date. The postmark bore the letter N. The letter was delivered by the first post of November 11, 1913, and by immemorial custom, of unknown origin, rents in Curzon's Inn are payable not on the English, but on the Scottish Quarter days. Now, November 11 is Martinmas, and so far everything was in order, But there is no such entrance in Coney Court as 7B, and there was no such name as Michael Carver on the books of the Inn. Mr. Hemmings was bothered, and nobody seemed to have heard of Mr. Carver. The porter, who had been employed at the Inn for upwards of forty years, was quite positive that no such name had been on the doorposts during the time of his service. Of course, the Steward made all possible enquiries. He went round to the various tenants at 6, 7, and 8, but could get no information whatever. As is usual in the old Inns, the tenants were miscellaneous. The main substratum — also as usual — was legal. There was a publisher in a very small and young way of business, who thought that poetry could be made to pay. There were the offices of a few shy and queer companies and syndicates, with names such as "Trexel Development Company, Ltd.," "J.H.V.N. Syndicate," "Sargasso Salvage: G. Nash, Secretary," and so forth, and so forth. Then the private residents; some of these were initials on the doorposts, "A.D.S.", "F.X.S.", one "Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Sheldon", and names that were little more than names to the inhabitants of the Inn, since the owners of them were never seen during the day, but crept out at night, after the gates were shut, and prowled from Assay Square to Coney Court and back again, stealthily, silently, not looking at one another, never speaking a word. Among all these folk the Steward made his quest, but not one of them had heard of such a person as Michael Carver, and one or two had occupied their chambers for thirty years. The next day, “St. Martin’s Morrow,” being the day appointed for the quarterly meeting of the Society, the “Pension”. as they called it, the puzzled Hemmings laid the matter before the President and the Ancients, with the result that they decided that there was nothing to be done. And from that date onward, quarter after quarter came the cheque for twenty pounds, with the formal note accompanying it. No date, no address, and the postmark still bearing the N. of the northern district, The matter was regularly laid before the Society: the Society as regularly decided that there was nothing to be done.

This went on till the Martinmas of November, 1918. The usual cheque was received; but the formal letter varied. It ran thus:

Dear Sir —

Please receive the enclosed cheque for Twenty Pounds (£20 0 0), being the quarter’s rent due to you for my Chambers at 7B Coney Court, Curzon’s Inn.

There is a bad patch of damp on the ceiling of my sitting room; arising, I should think, from a defective tile.

I shall be obliged if you will have this seen to at once.

I remain, Yours faithfully,

Michael Carver.

The Steward was stupefied. There was no such number in Coney Court, or the Inn, as 7B; how, then, could there be a leak in the roof! How could the Society see to a roof which did not exist? Next day, Mr. Hemmings laid the letter before the Pension in silence: there was nothing to say. The President read it attentively; the ten Ancients read it attentively. Then one of them, who happened to be a solicitor, suggested that enquiries should be made at Mr. Carver’s bank. “Sometimes you can bluff a bank,” he said hopefully. But Mr. Carver banked at Tellson’s, and the ancient should have known better. Hemmings received the curtest of letters from the House, informing him that Messrs. Tellson were not in the habit of discussing their client’s affairs with outsiders; and so, for the time being, the matter dropped. Next quarter day the usual Carver cheque was received, and with it an extremely stiff letter, pointing out that no notice had been taken of the writer's request, and that, in consequence the damp had spread all over the ceiling, and threatened to drip on the carpet. "I shall be obliged if you will remedy the defect immediately," the letter ended. The President and the Ancients again considered the matter. One suggested that the whole thing was the work of a practical joker, and another uttered the word "Mad," but these explanations were considered unsatisfactory, and the society, in the circumstances, resolved that there was nothing to be done.

The next quarter day brought no cheque. There was a letter, declaring that the tenant's furniture was covered with mould, and that in wet weather he was obliged to put a bowl on the floor to catch the water. Mr. Carver said finally that he had determined to cease all payment of rent until the necessary repairs were seen to. And then something still queerer happened, and this is the point at which the history would have become libellous if there were such a place as Curzon's Inn, or if there were such a court as Coney Court. The third pair chambers (right) of No. 7, Coney Court, had just been vacated by the tenants, solicitors or agents, and a widow lady and her daughter had moved in— "dingy, but so quiet", as the lady told her friends. And now she found her chambers very far from quiet. Night after night, at twelve, one, two, or three o'clock, she and her daughter were awoke by thunderous piano music, always the same music, which rendered sleep out of the question. The widow complained to the Steward, and he came round, with the Inn carpenter, and said he couldn't understand it at all.

"We never had any complaints from Jackson and Dowling," he declared, and the lady pointed out that Jackson and Dowling left the Inn every night at six.

The Steward went over the set carefully. He noticed a sort of crazy flight of steps, leading out of one of the rooms.

"What's that?" he asked the carpenter, and the man said it was a sort of lumber place, used by tenants for odds and ends.

They went up, and found themselves in a garret, lighted by one pane of glass in the roof. Here was a broken-down old piano with hardly a dozen notes sounding, a mouldy gladstone bag, two odd men's socks, a pair of trousers, and some ragged copies of Bach’s Fugues, in paper wrappers. There was a leak in the roof, and all reeked with damp.

The rubbish was removed, the place was turned out and whitewashed. There were no more disturbances. But a year later, the widow lady, being at a concert with a friend, suddenly gasped and choked, and whispered to the friend:

“That is the awful music I told you about.”

The distinguished pianist had just sounded the opening notes of John Sebastian Bach’s Fugue in C Major.

Neither the Principal, the Ancients, nor the Steward heard any more of the tenant of 7B Coney Court.

The Strange Case Of Emily Weston

THERE ARE CERTAIN resemblances between the affair of Grimaldi's brother and the disappearance and reappearance of Emily Weston at Stafford in the years 1849–50. Emily Weston was the only child of Samuel Weston, a shopkeeper and dealer in that pleasant town, which differs so happily from those other Staffordshire towns which make up the Potteries. Weston's shop was somewhere in that back quarter of Stafford which is near the eighteenth century theatre; a very modest looking place, as I recollect seeing it about twenty-five years ago, with a bulging window divided into small squares of glass. Within the stock was various: sides of bacon, large cheeses, mops and brooms, clusters of tallow candles hanging from a beam in the ceiling, rat-traps, tea in canisters, and some sacks of flour; in fact, as the old man who was my informant described it, the characteristic general shop of small country places, where, oddly enough, very solid sums of money were once made. Here, then, behind the little dark shop in the narrow street, lived Weston, his daughter Emily, and an old servant, who had been in the family for forty years. In 1849, Emily was twenty-three years old, and was considered to be, not exactly handsome, but decidedly attractive. She bore the best of characters, sang in the choir of the parish church, and was supposed to look favourably on the addresses of the son of the principal chemist of the town, named Elgie. One night in December, 1849, she told her father that she was going to a choir practice that was to be held in the church at nine o'clock. There was to be a new anthem for Christmas Day, "Unto us a Child," and the organist was rather anxious as to the solos. So the supper — bread, cheese, butter, and an openwork raspberry tart — was served at 8.30 instead of 9, the usual hour; and at five minutes to 9 Emily started for the church, which is about five minutes' walk from Weston's shop. Mary Williams, the old servant, was to call for her at 10 o'clock. But Mary was delayed by some household business at the last moment, and it was eight or ten minutes past ten when she got to the church. The windows were all dark, and the rector was locking the door. The servant said she supposed Miss Emily had gone home by the other way.

“Indeed,” said the rector, “she has not been at practice to-night. We feared she was ill. Do you say that she started from her home to come to practice?”. . . .

Emily Weston did not come home that night. No trace of her was to be found. A woman said she thought that a person who passed her close to the church soon after nine was Emily; but the lighting of Stafford in those days was far from brilliant, and the veil that was then generally worn made identification difficult, if not impossible. Week after week went by; still no Emily. Her father offered a reward of £100 to anyone who would find the girl, living or dead: there was no result. The police seemed helpless in the matter.

It was almost a year — a year within three days, I believe — before Emily Weston returned, as her father always declared. It was late at night — for that household — actually about half-past ten, when old Weston, who had been sitting up over some accounts, heard a gentle tapping at the door. Mary Williams, the servant, had been in bed for half an hour or more, and Weston went to the shop door and slowly unbolted, unchained, and unlocked it. While he did so he had put down the candle on the counter. By the dim light he could see a woman standing on the doorstep. He took the candle and held it up, peering at the figure before him. He saw that the woman was richly dressed in silk and furs; but he did not recognise her.

“Who are you?” said the old man, “And what can I have the pleasure of doing for you? It’s rather late at night.”

The woman raised her veil.

“Father,” she exclaimed, “don’t you know me? It’s Emily.”

“Even then,” the old man said afterwards, “I didn’t recognise her for a moment. Everything she wore was so splendid, and pearls and diamonds and all, that I could scarcely believe it was my Emily. But then when she smiled at me, I knew her to be sure, and brought her in, and lit the other candle in the parlour, and began to ask her all the questions I could think of. And all she would say was: ‘Wait a bit, father, wait a bit. I’ll tell you all about it; but I’ve come a very long way, and I feel tired.’” Samuel Weston was overwhelmed with joy at his daughter's return. He was so excited, as he said, that he did not know what to do with himself. He could "scarce believe his eyes," and insisted on knocking up Mr. and Mrs. Dales, neighbours and old friends, who lived two doors off. According to his account, when he at last brought Mr. Dales to his bedroom window, he called out that he and his wife must dress and come down at once, as Emily had come back. The two friends came down at length, heavy with sleep, and "mazed" as they said; and Mr. Weston opened a bottle of some very old sherry that he kept for great festivals, and the party sat together far into the night. At last the visitors went back to their beds, and Mr. Weston kissed his daughter good night at her bedroom door. She told him that he should hear everything in the morning.

Now it seems odd that Weston, who knocked up the Dales, should not have roused the old servant. So it was, however; and the next morning when the old man came down to breakfast, he found the table laid for one, as usual.

"What are you about, Mary?" he said. "Don't you know that Emily has come back? Lay her place, and tell her that breakfast is ready."

Old Mary Williams shrieked and fainted. Mr. Weston rushed upstairs, and knocked at; his daughter's door. There was no answer, and when he went into the room it was empty. The bed had not been slept in. And Emily Weston was never seen again. And here is an odd circumstance. The Dales, the people who were roused from sleep by Weston, declared that to the best of their recollection, the old man did not mention his daughter. They thought he said, "I have got somebody you would like to see," but were not sure. They remembered going round and seeing a beautiful lady, beautifully dressed, who was very pleasant and talked about a wonderful country a long way off where she had been; but they didn't think it was Emily Weston, though as Mrs. Dales said, "There was a look of her."

That is all. There is an explanation, but I leave that to the ingenuity of the reader.

The Highbury Mystery

WHEN THOMAS PINCH and his sister Ruth, having accomplished their unpleasant discussion with the brass-and-copper founder of Camberwell, went into the wild of London to look for lodgings, Tom suggested Islington as a promising quarter for their search. It is needless to say that Tom knew nothing whatever about Islington — or any other part of London. But an old phrase was in his mind, and it tempted him.

“It used to be called Merry Islington, once upon a time,” said Tom. “Perhaps it’s merry now; if so, it’s all the better. Eh?”

“If it’s not too dear,” said Tom’s sister.

“Of course, if it’s not too dear,” assented Tom. “Well, where is Islington? We can’t do better than go there, I should think. Let’s go.”

So far as I remember they did not find much mirth in Islington, though they did find two bedrooms and a triangular parlour which suited them very well. But the fact is that Tom Pinch went to Islington a little too late; just as I went to the old Fleet Street tavern in 1881, hoping to meet there the Principal Wits of the Town: a little too late. Islington was once a noted place for its houses of entertainment, for its bottled ale and skittles, its cakes, custard, stewed prunes, and so forth; and thus merry to seventeenth and eighteenth-century London. And in an Islington tavern just 160 years ago there was a meeting not devoid of mirth, or at least of cheerfulness, which yet linked itself on to a mysterious and terrible crime; the murder of Thomas Jenkyns, retired merchant, of Enfield Wash. The body of this Thomas Jenkyns was found on the night of September 23, 1765. It was lying in a pool of blood in a field near Highbury. The poor man’s throat had been cut from ear to ear, as the two men who found the corpse declared. And as for these two men, Thomas Brown and Richard Staple, inhabitants of some festering maze of alleys between Holborn and Clerkenwell, I am afraid they did not bear the best of characters. Bow Street knew them and they were known also at the taproom of the Bell, where they met friends of the same way of thinking as themselves. There had been a little highway robbery and a little burglary in their stories, and they had just missed the gallows more than once. So it may be as well not to consider too curiously what the two were doing in Highbury Fields ten o'clock of this dark September night. Thomas Brown told of the horror of his friend and himself when they stumbled on the murdered man.

"We were hard put to it to know what to do," he declared. "It seemed as if the poor man's head was almost cut away from his body, and I said to my friend, Richard Staple, who was with me, 'Why, Dick,' said I, 'this is a villainous to-do. For if we shift to raise the body, 'tis a great chance that the man's head will fall apart, and I cannot abide the thought of it.' 'Why, Tom,' said he, 'I am much of your mind in the business. What if we leave ill work as it lies, and go home peaceably by another way.' But I would not have that neither, lest, as I said, we should both be nabbed for the fact and come to Tyburn at last. And so we made shift to raise the dead man tenderly, I holding his head to his shoulders and trembling a great deal, and in this way bore him as far as Islington, without any misadventure, it being late of a dark night, with a cold wind rising, and very black clouds, and scarce anyone abroad."

This is, certainly, not a very merry opening, and, indeed, mirth is only a brief interlude in the tale. The cheerful relief is afforded by the evidence of Simon Murchison, who kept a snuff-shop in Norton Folgate, of William Frost, a brass-founder, of Clerkenwell, and of Abraham Lewis, clock maker, of Devizes. It was largely on their evidence that Anthony Mullins, citizen and haberdasher, was arrested and charged with the murder, a week after the discovery of the crime by the dubious Brown and Staple. The three elderly tradesmen had met by chance — they had not known each other before — at the Bowl and Sword tavern at Islington on the afternoon of September 23, and had got into conversation, all agreeing that things were not as they were in the reign of King George II.

"We all grew to be pretty dismal over the bad times," said Abraham Lewis, "till at last I said, 'Why, this will never end it or mend it. Come! let us go and bump it at Dog and Duck, and I will be surety for the first bowl of punch, the lowest notch of the three to be debtor for the second.'"

The three went out into the alley behind the tavern, and it is interesting to note that Mr. Murchison ordered pipes and a plate of tobacco, and that Mr. Frost paid for a bottle of brandy “to hearten the bowl,” and so they went to their match, which Mr. Frost won.

“And while we were in the garden-house at the side of the alley, drinking our punch, and smoking tobacco, and talking of the game, two men came out from the tavern and sat on a bench by the wall, speaking together very seriously, but not as we could hear what they said. They called for liquor and drank two glasses apiece and went out, and we saw no more of them.” The three identified the murderer and the murdered.

“I know him,” said Lewis, pointing to Mullins, “by his great beaked nose, and the dead man I could swear to any day, for as he lifted his glass I saw that his little finger was crooked back as if it had been broken, and I saw the body, and the little finger was crooked as I saw it on the live man.” Then Frost had seen the prisoner read a paper which Jenkyns had given to him, and Mullins had drawn out a tortoiseshell and gold spectacle-case of curious workmanship, and just such a spectacle-case was found on Mullins when he was taken. There were other witnesses who had seen Mullins and Jenkyns walking on the way to Highbury Fields a little later in the afternoon: there seemed no doubt as to the verdict which the jury would bring in.

Then came the surprise of the case. The prisoner’s two clerks, Mr. Osborne and Mr. Nichols, swore that their master had not stirred out of his counting-house from dinner time till eight o’clock in the evening. Osborne sat at a high desk facing Mr. Mullins’s private counting-house, which was separated from the rest of the room by a glass partition. Nichols’s stool was under a window and commanded a view of the door.

“I was busy with a great account,” said Osborne, “but ever and again I looked up from my book, and there sat my master, as he was always accustomed, but very still.”

Counsel: “Was he not used, then, to sit still in his counting-house?”

Osborne: “Why, not so. He would rise now and again commonly, and walk a little to and fro, and so sit down again. And twice or thrice in an hour he would come out and speak with us about the occasions of the day.”

Counsel: “And did he not stir at all on this afternoon?”

Osborne: “He sat still at his desk and never moved till it was past eight in the evening.”

And then a very curious point arose. Nichols, the other clerk, had been strangely overcome towards the end of the afternoon. He had come up to Osborne, looking very ill and pale, as Osborne said, and complaining that his heart was heavy, and that “he was sadly oppressed.” Osborne, belonging to a pre-scientific age, advised his fellow-clerk to go to the Mitre and drink a little ale, and Nichols did so, “looking tearfully to the place where Mr Mullins sat, with no candle by him.” A moment later, Mr. Mullins rose and came down to the general counting-house and asked Osborne where his fellow was. On hearing of his occupation, Mullins said, “Ah, poor child! He might do worse than drink a cup of ale.” Then Nichols returned, and soon after the two clerks went on their way, one to his lodgings by Pedlar’s Acre, the other to see the fireworks, at Marylebone Gardens. But when counsel for the Crown cross-examined Nichols as to the nature and cause of his seizure, the witness said:

“There came a great trembling upon me, and a dread on my heart and a sickness in my stomach… and I feared very much. And so I looked round on my stool to see if my fellow Osborne was in his place, and looking down on the floor of the counting-house I could have sworn that there was a great pool of blood there, with bubbles of blood in it, and I had almost swooned away.”

Naturally, Mullins was acquitted on the evidence of his two clerks. But what is the solution of the puzzle? When I treated this curious case some time ago, I mentioned the theory that has been advanced by some occultists of our day. These persons hold that while the natural body of Anthony Mullins was committing murder at Highbury, his “astral” body appeared all the while in the counting-house in the City. I was unable to accept this tempting solution, and declared my opinion that the two clerks perjured themselves to save their master from the gallows. But there is this difficulty: Why should the clerk Nichols have invented the outrageous tale of the visionary pool of blood?

The Little People

I HAVE BEEN looking into a very odd book, and I am going to tell the story of the Asiki, or Little Beings, first observing that the singular is Isiki. Well, it is said that the Asiki were once ordinary, human children, but were caught, when young and defenceless, by wizards or witches, and were dragged into the black depths of the forest, where there was no help for them, where no one could hear their cries. The wizards cut off their tongues as a first measure; and so they never speak again, and cannot inform against the magicians. They are then carried away, and hidden in a secret place, where they are subjected to magical processes which change their whole nature, so that they are no longer mortal. They forget their homes, their fathers and mothers and all their kinsfolk. Even the hair of their heads changes. Instead of being crisp wool, it becomes long and straight and hangs down their backs. At the back of their heads they wear a curious comb-shaped ornament, made of some twisted fibre. This they value almost as part of their life, just as in another quarter of the world there are people who drive motorcars and cherish little images and idols and grotesque figures, which are believed to constitute a most powerful protection. These Asiki will sometimes be seen walking on dark nights, and are occasionally met on their walks. It is believed that if a person is either naturally fearless, or made fearless by charms and spells, and dares to seize an Isiki and snatch away the comb, the possession of this mascot will bring him great wealth. But he will not be allowed to remain in peaceful possession of it. The Isiki, in a state of misery and desolation, will be seen wandering about the place where the magic comb was taken from it, endeavouring to get it back. And as late as the year 1901 strange things were told of these Little People in Libreville, French Congo. A certain Frenchman, known to be a Freemason, returning from his restaurant dinner to his house one evening noticed a small figure keeping pace with him on the other side of the road. He called out, “Who are you?” There was no reply; the figure kept on walking, advancing and retreating before him.

A few nights later, a negro clerk in some trading house met the Isiki near the place where the Frenchman had encountered it. And the Little Being began to chase the negro. He ran for his life, and told his master, the trader, what had happened. He got laughed at for his pains, and the next night the trader told the tale to a select company of white men and black women, the Freemason being present. And he said, "Your clerk did not lie; he told the truth. I have myself met that Little Being, but I did not try to catch it." Then the black women spoke of the odd comb-ornament, and of how the Asiki treasured it, and of the good fortune it would bring to anybody who could capture it. Whereupon the Frenchman — otherwise the Freemason — said, "As the Little Being is so small, the very next time I see it I will try to catch it and bring it here, so that you can see it and know that this story is actually true."

Soon after, the Frenchman and the trader went out at night and tried to find the Isiki. No Little Being was to be found, but a few nights later the Frenchman met it near the place where it had been seen before. He ran forward and tried to catch it, but the Isiki eluded him. However, he succeeded in snatching the comb, and ran with it towards his house. The Little Being was displeased and ran after him to recover the charm. Having no tongue, it could not speak, but holding out one hand pleadingly and with the other motioning to the back of its head, it made pathetic sounds in its throat, thus pleading that its treasure should be given back to it. It followed the Frenchman till the lights of his house began to shine, and then it disappeared. The Frenchman showed the comb to his friends, both black and white, and all agreed that they had never seen anything like it before. From that night the Isiki was often seen by negroes, who were afraid to pass that way in the dark. It followed the Frenchman persistently, pleading with its hands in dumb show, and making a grunting noise in its throat. The Frenchman got tired of all this, and made up his mind that he would give the comb back. And so next night he took it with him; and also a pair of scissors. The Little Being appeared and followed him. He held out his hand, with the comb in it. The Isiki leapt forward and snatched at the talisman and secured it, and the Frenchman tried to catch the Isiki. The Little Being was too agile, however, and escaped; but the Frenchman snipped off a lock of the long straight hair with his scissors, and brought it home and showed it to his friends.

Such is the story told by Dr. Robert H. Nassau, an American missionary, who had worked for forty years in Africa. He seems to fear that his tale will be regarded as incredible. It seems to me, on the contrary, highly, probable. Naturally, one dismisses that part of it which relates to the process by which these Little Beings are made, and that part of it which ascribes to them immortality. The Little People were not made out of little woolly piccaninnies by the magic arts of the wizards; and probably, if one could be caught and examined, it would be found that it had a tongue in its mouth, like any other human being. The fact is that here, in all likelihood, we have a pretty exact parallel to the Little People of our own folk-lore: the Daione Sidhe of Ireland, the Tylwyth Teg of Wales. The substratum in both cases is the same: an aboriginal people of small stature overcome and sent into the dark by invaders. In Britain and Ireland the dark meant subterranean dwellings made under the hills in the wildest and most remote parts of the country; they will point you out the place of these dwellings in Antrim to this day, and tell you that they are Fairy Raths. And in nine cases out of ten you may accept the statement with entire confidence; so long as you define “fairies” or “the People” as small, dark aborigines who hid from the invading Celt somewhere about 1500–1000 B.C. And in Africa the dark meant the blackness of the forest; places hidden in the thickest tangle of trees and undergrowth, protected, perhaps, from all outsiders, black or white, by a maze of narrow paths winding in and out of a foul swamp. And as to the legend of the torn-out tongues, of the guttural noises made by the Asiki; is it not the case that the Little People of the genuine Celtic tradition are also silent? I will not be sure; but I incline to think that this is so. They beckon, they gesticulate, they are seen by Irish countrymen playing at hurly: but they say nothing — the reason being that they do not speak the language of their conquerors. I have seen a monoglot Englishman in Touraine behaving much as the Isiki behaved to the Frenchman at Libreville, even to the making of unearthly sounds and the indulging in antic gestures. But he only wanted milk with his tea. And there is this further parallel between the Little Beings of Africa and the Little People of Ireland. Both are on a curious borderland between the natural and the supernatural. Both are able to “propagate procerity” — I use an elegant phrase of Dr. Johnson’s. This is formally asserted of the Asiki; and in Celtdom we have the legends of the changeling, the little, dark creature found in the cradle of the big, red-haired Celtic baby. And both are material and capable of dealing with material things and of making use of them. Miss Somerville has strange tales of them which are of our own day. Miss Somerville herself had seen the shoe that was found on the lonely hill. It was of the size that a child of about a year old might use, but it was heavily made, in the fashion of a workman's brogue, and had seen hard wear. And, again, she tells the story of two servants sent on a sudden errand at night. They were driving a car, and at the entrance of a certain town, the harness broke. And there they found a little saddler's shop, open in the dead of night, and two little men within — described with a shudder as "quare" — to whom the servants told their trouble. They were terrified almost out of their senses; they would not stay in the shop: but the work was done, and done well.

We have here a state of mind which is very hard to understand. What can an Immortal want with a workman's leather shoe? And how should Beings of another order from that of man, Beings to be beheld with awe and dread of the spirit, undertake saddlery repairs on demand? One would say that the belief that such things are so is impossible; but yet it exists in Ireland, probably to this day; and it is much like the negro belief as to the Asiki.

It is interesting to note, by the way, that Fairyland in Ireland seems strongly associated with leather. There is the matter of the fairy brogue, there is the adventure of the fairy saddlers; and then there is the Leprechaun, who is a fairy cobbler. He is, clearly, a distant cousin of the Asiki. And if, in spite of all his efforts to distract you, you continue to regard him with a fixed gaze, your reward will be a crock of gold.

Madame Rachel

THE OTHER DAY, reading the paper, I came upon a half-column that interested me. It was headed: “Slimness–While-You–Wait,” and a sub-heading ran: “The ‘Boiled Cyclist’ Treatment.” Who could resist such invitations as these! Not I.

I found that the article concerned a new “Beauty Parlour” in the Bond Street quarter. And how pleasant it is, by the way, to note the manner in which America is restoring to us the good old English word, “parlour,” which we had lost awhile. Well, in this Beauty Parlour, the lady who would achieve perfection of form must undergo many severe trials; and, indeed, this is the way of perfection of every kind, and there is no escape from it. And the trials of Bond Street are hard to bear; they almost recall the terrors which, in popular tradition, are supposed to await him who would pass through the Third Degree of a venerable secret order. Thus I read:

“First she (the person to be initiated in these mysteries) has to strip herself of her clothing and sit for twenty minutes in the ‘reducycle bath.’ The bath is surrounded by canvas which is fastened round her neck. In its interior a bicycle is fitted, and the client sits on the bicycle saddle and works the pedals as though she were actually riding quickly along a road.”

Then follows the Shower. To it succeeds the Roller, painted a pale mauve, “with kinks in it.” Then the Candidate is vested in a bathing costume, and there ensues the Ceremony of the Exercises on Coloured Mats to the music of the gramophone. Altogether, it strikes me as a strange but gorgeous rite; and I trust and believe that She renews her youth, in the fashion of that other She of Sir Rider Haggard’s invention.

In the bad old days, there were beauty parlours in Bond Street, though they did not call them then by that name. But there was no science then; only a great deal of wickedness. Listen, therefore, to the story of Sarah Rachel Leverson, called Madame Rachel, who lived at the corner of New Bond Street and Maddox Street, and said that she could make ladies beautiful for ever. Madame Rachel drove, on the face of it, much the same trade as that plied by Dickens's famous Miss Mowcher. She sold all sorts of cosmetics, enamels, paints, powders, rouges, unguents. She constantly proclaimed that she could make women beautiful for ever, and she came at last to Marlborough Street police station and to the Court of the Recorder of London, in the year 1868. The complainant was a Mrs. Borradaile, widow of a Colonel, who said that Madame Rachel had swindled her, one way and another, of £3000.

"On my first visit" — testifies Mrs. Borradaile— "I spent £10, and in the course of two or three days I had invested £170 with her. I paid her various sums of money for cosmetics, and so forth, during the latter part of 1864 and the commencement of 1865. Before purchasing these articles I asked her to do something for my skin, and she promised that if I would follow out her course of treatment in every particular she would succeed in making me beautiful for ever."

Poor Mrs. Borradaile! Serjeant Ballantine was retained for the prosecution — with him Mr. Straight and Mr. Montague Williams — and the last testifies that Mrs. Borradaile was "a sparse, thin, scraggy-looking woman, wholly devoid of figure; her hair was dyed a bright yellow; her face was raddled with paint." The matter went far beyond selling creams and powders, and Arabian herbs and nonsense of every sort in boxes and bottles and baths.

"On one occasion," said the witness, "I called on Madame Rachel, who told me that she had had an interview with the gentleman who had fallen in love with me. On asking his name, I was informed that it was Lord Ranelagh. I asked when he had met me, and the reply was, both before and after my marriage… Madame Rachel said that she would introduce me to him the next day… I called at Maddox Street, where the prisoner lived. Madame Rachel opened the door and said, 'I will now introduce you to the man who loves you.' She then introduced me to a man whom I believed, and still believe to be Lord Ranelagh. I said to him, 'Are you Lord Ranelagh?' and he answered, 'Yes; here is my card.' He then handed me a card, which I returned to him. The gentleman who gave me the card is the gentleman I now see in Court." This gentleman in Court, thus identified, was undoubtedly Lord Ranelagh. He gave evidence. He said he had often been in Madame Rachel's shop. He thought he had seen Mrs. Borradaile once at the shop, but he had no recollection of being introduced to her. He was asked, it would appear, what business he had in Madame Rachel's shop at all. He answered, "You don't suppose I went there to be enamelled."

Which reminds me of "Charley Pyegrave, the duke's son."

"He goes into a perfumer's shop, and wants to buy a bottle of the Madagascar Liquid."

"Charley does?" said Steerforth.

"Charley does. But they haven't got any of the Madagascar Liquid."

"What is it? Something to drink?" asked Steerforth.

"To drink?" returned Miss Mowcher, stopping to slap his cheek. "To doctor his own mustachios with, you know."

Well, the elderly woman in the shop said to Charley:

"Begging pardon, sir, it's not-not-not ROUGE, is it?"

"Rouge," said Charley. "What the unmentionable to ears polite do you think I want with rouge?"

But what was Lord Ranelagh doing at Madame Rachel's? Well, the curious are advised to consult the rumours of the time.

Madame Rachel, then, quite persuaded Mrs. Borradaile that Lord Ranelagh was desirous of marrying her. And, at Lord Ranelagh's express desire, Mrs. Borradaile was to go through an extra process of being made beautiful for ever. The poor, silly woman accordingly sold out securities and paid Madame Rachel £800 on account of £1000 "for bath preparations, spices, powders, sponges, perfumes, and attendance, to be continued till I (Mrs. Borradaile) am finished by the process." And from this moment the story surpasses the very bounds of extravagance. Madame Rachel said she was going to marry this happy couple "by proxy," otherwise "by letter writings." There were plenty of letter-writings handed over by Madame Rachel to Mrs. Borradaile. Sometimes they were signed "William," sometimes "Edward," Lord Ranelagh's name being Thomas; but, as Madame sagely observed, this was a wise precaution since letters are apt to be left about. They were odd letters. They all dwelt on the importance of keeping "Granny" (Madame Rachel) in good temper. They warned "Darling love, Mary, my sweet one," not to hold any communication with her family or with Lewis and Lewis — suspicious and untrustful tribes, both of them. The letters were in different handwritings, but, as "Granny" explained, Lord Ranelagh had hurt his arm, and sometimes made his servant write for him. Affectionate letters these: "I shall be at your feet — those pretty feet that I love — and you may kick your ugly old donkey"; "I would rather be shot like a dog than leave England without you"; "I heard you were insulted by a cabman in Oxford Street, yesterday. I wish I had been there"; "Mary, my heart's love, is it your wish to drive me mad? Granny has my instructions. Do as she tells you… . What is the meaning of the delay, at the eleventh hour? Granny lent me the money. You shall pay her, my own sweet one. Get the lace to-day and fear nothing. It will be £35." Clothes and lace and jewellery were necessary for the wedding, said Granny, and Mrs. Borradaile bought them — and Granny took care of them. Presumably, suspicion began to rise in the foolish woman's heart; she said she could not get any of these articles back. "You must ask the man who loves you for them back," said Madame, and she brought her victim a lighted cigar, "saying that Lord Ranelagh's love for me was as warm as that." That must have reassured Mrs. Borradaile, since soon after she executed a bond for £1600. This was for Lord Ranelagh, but Granny took care of it, and I suppose Granny also took care of a carriage which Mrs. Borradaile bought for her wedding.

And the end of the story? Five years' penal servitude for Granny.

Sir Benjamin The “Baron”

IT WAS WITH considerable delight that I read the other day an article “sticking up” very bravely for Harrison Ainsworth, and Dick Turpin, and the Ride to York, and the Tower of London, and all that world of brave things. I was pleased, because a man likes to have his opinions confirmed by high authority; and I have always had a very tender feeling for Harrison Ainsworth, recollecting how he made my ten-years’-old blood run cold by his description of the Subterranean Temple of the Demon in the “Lancashire Witches.” And it was of Harrison Ainsworth that I was chiefly thinking when I once observed that, though the Victorians did not always write well, they always wrote with a relish.

Things happened in those old Victorian story-books. There were lonely inns in which travellers were apt to be murdered. And these travellers were not always what they seemed. The names they gave were not always their own names. The apparent merchant sometimes turned out to be something very different. Sometimes they shuddered as they dismounted from their coaches. Sometimes they wrote vehemently as soon as they entered; sometimes they consigned papers to the fire and watched these papers burn to the last ember. Now and then the (apparently) faithful attendant of the Mysterious Stranger was not what he seemed. There were cases in which the traveller was seen one moment in the inn yard, and then had vanished in the twinkling of an eye, and had vanished for ever. Perhaps years afterwards a skeleton was discovered, buried deeply not far from the inn yard; and wife or sister, grown old and sick with vain waiting, came and gazed doubtfully with dim eyes upon the relics — and wondered.

There! Can you imagine what would happen if one submitted the above as an outline or sketch of a possible plot to our really modern writers, the veritable Georgians? I don’t think that they would be cross, or snap your head off, or wonder audibly what theatre put on transpontine melodrama in these days, or say it was interesting to find that Sue still found readers. There would be nothing violent of this kind; only the slight movement of a weary brow, before the conversation flowed back to its proper channel of “complexes” and skin-disease. Because you see, the Georgian novelist knows that the stuff of which we have been talking is not Life, has no relation to Life, and in a word, doesn’t happen. Exactly. And it all happened on the twenty-fifth of November, 1809, at Perleberg, a small Prussian town between Berlin and Hamburg. A coach and four drew up at the White Swan, and a tall, handsomely dressed man, wrapped up in a fur cloak lined with purple velvet, got down. He said he was in a hurry and wanted his lunch at once, and so, accompanied by his secretary and his servant, he entered the White Swan. It was noon when he arrived, and when he had finished his lunch he began to ask questions. Were there many soldiers stationed at Perleberg; who was in command? Captain Klitzing, of the Brandenburg Cuirassiers. Very good; where did he live? The stranger got the captain’s address, and ordered his horses to be put in at once. He did not seem to notice two Jew dealers who came into the inn as he was lunching. He went to Captain Klitzing’s house and found the captain with so bad a cold that he could hardly speak. The stranger said that he was Baron de Koch, that he was a merchant, and that he was now on a business journey to Hamburg. But, he added, trembling, he had seen something at the White Swan that frightened him, something that made him fear for his life; finally, that he would be grateful if Captain Klitzing would give him a guard during the few hours that he was at Perleberg. Captain Klitzing laughed at the request for a guard, whereon the stranger’s nerves got worse and worse. So the Captain said he should have two of his cuirassiers, and as the Baron trembled with cold — or terror — he was given a cup of hot tea, and he drank it gratefully, his hands shaking so that some of the tea was spilt. Then he put on the fur cloak with the velvet lining and went back to the White Swan. He ordered the horses to be taken out of the carriage, and sat down with a pile of papers about him, and began to write at top speed.

Seven o’clock in the evening. The Baron finished writing, burnt some documents, and once more ordered the horses to be put in. The soldiers were told that they could go, and as some of the witnesses declared, the Baron strolled into the inn kitchen and hung about there among the stablemen and postboys. It was said that some of these fellows must have seen him drawing out a full, fat purse and dangling a handsome watch in an absentminded sort of way. In the street a dim oil lamp hung up high in the air, and a stableman with a horn lantern was helping the postboy to harness the horses. The Baron stood there in the street, watching the horses being put in. On the steps of the inn, the Baron's secretary, having paid the bill, was talking to the landlord. Everything was ready. The postillion was standing with his hand on the saddle, waiting for the word to mount and away… when it suddenly became evident that the Baron had vanished.

And the mystery was never solved; it remains a mystery to this day. No time was lost on that dark and bitter night of November 25, 1809. The White Swan was searched, the posting-house was searched in vain; there was no trace of the traveller in the stables, in the outhouses, or in the street. The secretary sent a messenger to Captain Klitzing; no news of the Baron there, since his afternoon call. Then more ransacking of all the houses of the quarter, everybody joining in — except the two Jew tradesmen, who got into their carriage and resumed their journey. People remarked that they were the only persons present who took no interest in the quest for the lost Baron. Captain Klitzing remembered that his visitor appeared to be in mortal terror, to anticipate some dreadful fate. The Captain had laughed at the time; but now he began to wonder. He sent some of his men to seize the vanished stranger's travelling carriage; he gave orders that the Baron's secretary and his servant should be detained at an inn at the other end of the town; soldiers are posted at the White Swan; the civil magistracy is dragged out of bed to lend its aid, and the civil magistracy beats up Perleberg all through the night; and finds nothing. Meanwhile, the active Klitzing examines the Baron's secretary, and makes some strange discoveries. To begin with; the secretary confessed that though he had been known as Fisher, he was really Krouse. And as for the "Baron de Koch, merchant," he wasn't a baron, and he wasn't a merchant. He was Sir Benjamin Bathurst, late English Ambassador Extraordinary to Vienna. His mission to Vienna had failed, and he was making his way to England, via Hamburg. He had with him papers supposed to be of the highest importance. His false name, his lack of ambassadorial state were due to his desire to avoid the attentions of the French soldiers, who were then patrolling all Germany. Fisher, or Krouse, had been for some time a courier at the British Embassy at Vienna. The servant's name was Nicolaus Hilbert. Captain Klitzing left Perleberg, as he said, for a short journey of the utmost consequence. In reality, he consulted his military superior, who told him all about Sir Benjamin, the enormous importance of his mission, and the fury of Napoleon over the part which England had tried to play. But it was not known till later that before

Sir Benjamin Bathurst left Vienna the Prussian Government had warned him: to keep a sharp look-out on Krouse.

And after? Very little of consequence. The two Jew dealers were tracked to their abode. They were well-known people with the best of characters. The dubious Krouse and the servant pass out of the story. A week after the disappearance of Bathurst, his trousers were found in a thicket by two poor women gathering sticks. That thicket had been searched before without result. There were two bullet holes in one leg; but experts declared that the trousers had been held up, empty, to be fired at. In one pocket there was a letter, written, no doubt, at the White Swan. It was from Sir Benjamin to his wife. He told her of his fears. He was afraid, he said, that he would never see her or England any more. He added that if he were murdered it would be the doing of d'Entraigues, then the agent of Russia; a secret man, d'Entraigues, who had served all nations, and betrayed them all. And nothing more was ever known certainly. It was rumoured that Sir Benjamin was alive and a prisoner at Magdeburg, in French hands. Mrs. Bathurst — perhaps a wife, perhaps a widow — resolved to follow up this clue. Nothing came of her journey, save this: that she found that her intention of making it was known in Paris before it was suspected in London. She returned to London, and there the secret man, d'Entraigues, called on her. He said that her husband was dead, that the Governor of Magdeburg had been his gaoler till, on the order of Napoleon, the prisoner had been "put out of the Emperor's way." And d'Entraigues promised to tell Mrs. Bathurst the whole story. But soon afterwards he was assassinated by a dismissed servant, who immediately committed suicide. People said that at last the secret man had paid the penalty of knowing too much. Years later, in 1852, Mrs. Thistlethwayte, Sir Benjamin Bathurst's sister, was told that a skeleton had been found buried under a stable in Perleberg. The skull had been fractured by a blow of a hatchet; there were circumstances which linked the former owner of the house with Sir Benjamin's visit to Perleberg; this man, named Mertens, had been a servant at the White Swan. But Mrs. Thistlethwayte looked closely at the skull, and said that she was sure, from the shape, that it could not be her brother's.

But she may have been mistaken.

The Campden Wonder

MR. WILLIAM HARRISON was steward to the Viscountess Campden, of Campden, in Gloucestershire. One afternoon — to be precise, on the 16th of August, 1660 — he walked out from Campden to Charringworth, a place about two miles off, to receive some rent due to the Viscountess. He was late getting back, and between eight and nine in the evening his wife, feeling a little uneasy, sent the man, John Perry, to meet his master and bring him home. That night neither master nor man returned. Early the next morning Mr. Harrison's son, Edward, went towards Charringworth to enquire after his father. He met Perry coming from Charringworth, and was told by him that his father was not there. Then Edward Harrison and Perry went together to a village called Ebrington, between Charringworth and Campden, and at Ebrington a man named Daniel told them that Mr. Harrison had called on him on his way home from Charringworth the night before, but had not stayed. On this, the younger Harrison and the man turned back home, and on their way heard something of a hat, a band, and a comb found on the road between Ebrington and Campden by a poor woman, who was harvesting. They sought out the woman, they identified the hat, comb, and band as being the property of Mr. William Harrison. The hat and comb were hacked and cut, and the band — the broad round collar, ancestor of the legal bands of today, for which the bandbox was designed — bloody. Crowds came to look for the body of Mr. Harrison — his properties were found by a great brake of gorse — but no body was found. Mrs. Harrison was grievously alarmed. It struck her as highly suspicious that Perry, the manservant, had stayed out the whole night, instead of coming back, with news or without news. So Perry was haled before a justice of the peace, and told a very odd story. He said he set out for Charringworth, but soon met one William Reed, of Campden. It was getting dark, and Perry told Reed that he was afraid to go to Charringworth afoot, and so he would turn back and get his young master's horse, and ride to Charringworth. So Perry turned back, Reed being in his company, and came to the gate of the Harrison demesne. Reed went on his way, Perry stayed still by the gate. Then one Pierce came by, and Perry went with Pierce "a bow's shot into the fields," and again returned, Pierce being of his company; and so Pierce went on his way. And then Perry went and lay about an hour in the henroost, but could not sleep. Then the clock struck twelve and for the third time Perry sallied forth on his errand. But a great mist arose, and he lost his way, and lay the rest of the night under a hedge. At daybreak the next morning he at last ended his journey and came to Charringworth. Here he heard from William Plaisterer that Mr. Harrison had called the afternoon before and had received three-and-twenty pounds. And William Curtis had heard that Mr. Harrison had called at his house; but he was out and did not see him. And so Perry turned back and met young Edward Harrison, as we have heard already. Reed, Pierce, Plaisterer and Curtis were called and confirmed Perry's story so far as it concerned them.

The justice asked the man why he was afraid to go to Charringworth at nine, and not afraid at twelve. The answer was that it was dark at nine, but moonlight at twelve. Then he was asked why he did not inquire whether his master had come back after his first return and his second return. He said he saw light in his master's bedroom window, "which never used to be there so late when he was at home." It was considered wise to keep Perry in custody, and so he was held at Campden, sometimes in the prison, sometimes in an inn — a genial age — and there he told all sorts of stories. He told some people that Mr. Harrison had been murdered by a tinker, others that he had been robbed and murdered by a gentleman's servant, others that he had been killed and his body hidden in a bean-rick. The bean-rick was searched and nothing found. Finally, Perry confessed that William Harrison had been murdered by his mother and his brother. He declared that the two had "lain at him" — note the nearness of the seventeenth century idiom to our "had been at him" — ever since he entered the service of Mr. Harrison. They had pointed out how poor they were, and how simple it would be for John to tell them when Mr. Harrison was going to receive rents, so that they could waylay and rob him. These pleadings won at last upon John Perry's filial and fraternal heart, as he said, and on the Thursday morning — the day of Mr. Harrison's disappearance — he met his brother in the street of Campden and told him where his master was going in the afternoon, amiably remarking to brother Richard that if he cared to waylay Mr. Harrison he might have his money. That evening, Mrs. Harrison sent John Perry to meet his master, as we have heard, the time being about half-past eight. He met his brother Richard close at hand, and the two prowled about in the dusk of the evening till they came to some private grounds of Lady Campden's, called the Conygree. Certain persons were allowed to have a key which gave them passage through these grounds. Mr. Harrison, the agent, was, naturally, one of these persons, and he was accustomed to use the Conygree as a short cut to his house. Good son and brother John Perry saw a figure going into the Conygree, and told Richard Perry that this figure was probably his master, and that he could have his money. For his part, John observed, he would take a short walk in the fields. So John communes with nature, and then strolls into the Conygree. He finds his master on the ground, brother Richard upon him, and his mother standing by. William Harrison then cried out, "Ah, rogues, will you kill me?" John Perry, shocked, observed to Richard that he hoped he would not kill his master. Whereupon Richard, exclaiming briefly, "Peace, peace, you are a fool," strangled old Mr. Harrison — the agent was a man of seventy. The prudent Richard then took a bag of money out of Mr. Harrison's pocket and threw it into his mother's lap. The two Perrys carried the dead body into the garden adjoining the Conygree, and consulted what they should do with it. It was finally determined that it should be thrown into "the great sink by Wallington's mill, behind the garden." At this point John left the little family party, taking with him his master's hat, band, and comb, which he laid for the moment in the henroost. He then mooned about, in the manner described by him at his first examination, meeting Reed and Pierce. Finally, he took the hat, band, and comb, and after slashing them a little, laid them on the high-road, where the harvesting woman found them. And as to his master's body, said John, if it were not in the great sink, he did not know where it was.

The great sink was searched, the fishponds of Campden were searched, the ruins of Campden House, burnt in the Great Rebellion, were searched, but the body of William Harrison was not found. Nevertheless, Joan and Richard Perry, the mother and brother of John, were arrested; and the whole three charged with the murder of Mr. Harrison. Joan and Richard denied the fact with imprecations on themselves if they had any share in the deed alleged against them: John persisted in his accusations and declared he would maintain them to his death. All three prisoners were committed. On their way to prison, Richard, at the end of the procession, "pulling a clout out of his pocket, dropped a ball of inkle, which one of his guard taking up, he desired him to restore, saying it was only his wife's hair lace." But the guard showed it to John, who said sorrowfully that he knew it very well; his brother had strangled his master with it. Next day, being Sunday, the prisoners were taken to church. On their way, they passed Richard's house, and two of his children ran out to meet him. He took the smaller child on his arm, and led the other by the hand; whereupon both the children's noses began to bleed. This was thought to look badly for Richard.

There was another point. The year before Mr. Harrison's house had been broken into while he was at "lecture" — the Puritans were still in power in 1659 — and £140 had been taken. The justice of the peace, finding John in a confessing mood, asked him whether he knew about the robbery. Certainly, John knew. Richard had taken the money and hidden it in his garden. The garden was searched; nothing was found.

At the September assizes, the three were indicted for robbery and for robbery and murder. The Judge, Sir Christopher Turner, refused to try the latter charge, for the very good reason that no body had been found. On the charge of robbery — the robbery of 1659 —— they at first pleaded Not Guilty, but on advice altered the plea to Guilty, and enjoyed the benefit of the King's pardon and Act of Oblivion. Later, they denied any part in the robbery.

At the spring assizes of 1661, the three were tried again for murder, Sir Robert Hyde being the Judge. John's confession was put in evidence. Whereupon John said that he was mad when he uttered it, and knew not what he said. All three were found guilty of murdering William Harrison, condemned, and executed on Broadway Hill, in sight of Campden. Joan Perry, the mother, was hanged first. It was thought that she was a witch, and had cast a spell upon her sons, so that they could not confess while she lived. Richard then took his turn on the ladder, and died, protesting his innocence, and imploring his brother to tell all he knew about Mr. Harrison. John, the last to climb, wore "a dogged and surly carriage," and told the people he was not bound to confess to them. But at the last he said he knew nothing about his master's death; but, he added, they might, possibly, hear hereafter.

They did. In a little under two years Mr. Harrison came back to Campden.

He told the story of his adventures, in a letter addressed to Sir Thomas Overbury, Knight, of Bourton (near Campden), in Gloucestershire. He begins from the beginning.

“One Thursday in the afternoon, in the time of harvest, I went to Charringworth to demand rents, due to my lady Campden; at which time the tenants were bus in the fields, and late ere they came home, which occasioned my stay there till the close of the evening. I expected a considerable sum, but received only three-and-twenty pounds and no more. In my return home (in the narrow passage, amongst Ebrington Furzes), there met me one horseman, and said, ‘Art thou there?’ And I, fearing that he would have rid over me, struck his horse over the nose, whereupon he struck at me with his sword, several blows, and run it into my side; while I (with my little cane) made my defence as well as I could; at last another came behind me, run me into the thigh, laid hold on the collar of my doublet, and drew me to a hedge near to the place. Then came in another; they did not take my money, but mounted me behind one of them, drew my arms about his middle, and fastened my wrists together with something that had a spring lock to it as I conceived, by hearing it give a snap as they put it on; then they threw a great cloak over me, and carried me away. In the night they alighted at a hayrick which stood near unto a stone pit by a wall-side, where they took away my money, about two hours before day (as I heard one of them tell the other he thought it to be then). They tumbled me into the stone pit, they staid (as I thought) about an hour at the hayrick. When they took horse again, one of them bade me come out of the pit; I answered they had my money already, and asked what they would do with me; whereupon he struck me again, drew me out and put a great quantity of money to my pockets, and mounted me again after the same manner. And on the Friday night, about sun-setting, they brought me to a house… where they took me down almost dead, being sorely bruised with the carriage of the money. When the woman of the house saw I could neither stand nor speak, she asked them whether or no they had brought a dead man? They answered no, but a friend that was hurt, and they carrying him to a chirurgeon. She answered that if they did not make haste their friend would be dead before they could bring him to one. There they laid me on cushions, and suffered none to come into the room, but a little girl; there we stayed all night, they giving me some broth and strong waters. In the morning, very early, they mounted me as before, and on Saturday night they brought me to a place where were two or three houses, in one of which I lay all night on cushions, by their bedside. On Sunday morning they carried me from thence, and about three or four o'clock they brought me to a place by the seaside, called Deal, where they laid me down on the ground; and one of them staying by me, the other two walked a little off, to meet a man, with whom they talked; and in their discourse I heard them mention seven pounds, after which they went away together, and about half an hour after returned.

"The man (whose name, as I after heard, was Wrenshaw) said he feared I would die before he could get me on board; then presently they put me into a boat, and carried me on shipboard, where my wounds were dressed. I remained in the ship (as near as I could reckon) about six weeks, in which time I was indifferently recovered of my wounds and weakness. Then the master of the ship came and told me (and the rest who were in the same condition) that he discovered three Turkish ships; we all offered to fight in the defence of the ship and ourselves, but he commanded us to keep close, and said he could deal with them well enough. A little while after he called us up, and when we came on the deck we saw two Turkish ships close by us. Into one of them we were put, and placed in a dark hole, where how long we continued before we were landed, I know not. When we were landed they led us two days' journey, and put us into a great house or prison, where we remained four days and a half. And then came to us eight men to view us, who seemed to be officers; they called us and examined us of our trades and callings, which everyone answered; one said he was a chirurgeon, another that he was a broadcloth weaver, and I (after two or three demands) said I had some skill in physic. We three were set by and I was chosen by a grave physician of 87 years of age, who lived near to Smyrna, who had formerly been in England and knew Crowland, in Lincolnshire, which he preferred before all other places in England. He employed me to keep his still house, and gave me a silver bowl, double gilt, to drink in; my business was most in that place; but once he set me to gather cotton wool, which I not doing to his mind, he struck me down to the ground, and after drew his stiletto to stab me; but I, holding up my hands to him, he gave a stamp, and turned from me… . I was there about a year and three-quarters, and then my master fell sick on a Thursday, and sent for me, and calling me as he used by the name of Boll told me he should die, and bade me shift for myself. He died on Saturday following, and I presently hastened with my bowl to a port about a day's journey distant… . When I came thither, I addressed myself to two men who came out of a ship of Hamborough, which (as they said) was bound for Portugal within three or four days. I enquired of them for an English ship, they answered there was none. I entreated them to take me into their ship; they answered they durst not for fear of being discovered by the searchers."

To abbreviate Mr. Harrison a little: he at length prevailed on another man of the same ship to take him on board; the effective argument being a sight of the gilt bowl. He was placed below in the vessel "in a very uneasy place," and so well hidden that he escaped the Turkish searchers and was finally landed at Lisbon, free but moneyless. Here he fortunately fell in with an Englishman, a native of Wisbech, who paid for his passage to Dover, and so, with some pious and becoming expression of gratitude, Mr. William Harrison ends the story of his adventures, perils and deliverances.

Now, it may or may not have been noted, that I have told the whole story without comment or expression of opinion of any kind. And I have not commented, because I have no notion whether there is a single word of truth in the story. My authority is the State Trials, and one might think, on the face of it, that no more solid foundation of fact could be desired. But this is not so. The account in the State Trials is merely a reprint of a pamphlet issued in London in the year 1676:

"A True and Perfect Account of the Examination, Confession, Trial, Condemnation and Execution of Joan Perry, and her two sons, John and Richard Perry, for the Supposed Murder of William Harrison, Gent. London, printed for Rowland Reynolds, next Arundel Gate, over against St. Clement's Church in the Strand, 1676."

The pamphlet gives as its authority a letter sent by Sir T. O. (Thomas Overbury) to T. S. (T. Shirley), a London physician; but as both these gentlemen are far beyond all cross-examination, nothing is established thereby. Of course, the story reeks with improbabilities. At first sight, the most improbable circumstance of all is the conduct of John Perry in swearing away, not only the life of his mother and his brother, but his own life as well. But his conduct is not without precedent. To this day, people give themselves up for murders which they have not committed, and in John Perry's day women confessed freely to having shared in the monstrous horrors of the Witches' Sabbath. If the story be true, John Perry was a hysterical madman. And there is another point: the condemnation and execution of these people for murder, there being no corpus delicti — otherwise the body of the dead man or some identifiable part of it — producible; was such a thing possible? Unfortunately, it was. It was against all legal principle. The Civil Law forbade it. Lord Hale said: "I would never convict any person of murder or manslaughter unless the fact were proved to be done, or at least the body found dead." But, apparently, this was a matter left to the taste and fancy of the judge, for Lord Hale supports his principle by citing two cases in which men were hanged for the murder of persons who proved afterwards to be alive. So there is no improbability in this part of the story. As we have seen, the judge at the first assize, Sir Christopher Turner, held with Lord Hale and refused to try the Perrys, "because the body was not found." At the next assizes, the judge, Sir Robert Hyde, made no difficulties on the ground of the lacking body.

The big difficulty lies in Mr. Harrison's story. Why was he abducted, and who were his abductors? He speaks of other people on the ship as being in the same condition as himself. Was there a Little Syndicate which operated in old gentlemen, selling them to master mariners at seven pounds apiece? This seems unlikely. And could you transport this sort of goods from Campden, Gloucestershire, to Deal, Kent, without fear of interruption? I do not know; the tale must remain the Campden Wonder, so far as I am concerned.

The Man From Nowhere

IN THAT HIGHLY picturesque, but quite un-Dickensian book, “A Tale of Two Cities,” there is a curious chapter describing the reception at the house of Monseigneur — Monseigneur being a great nobleman, high in favour and power at Court. Dickens describes the company:

“Military officers destitute of military knowledge; naval officers with no idea of a ship; civil officers without a notion of affairs; brazen ecclesiastics of the worst world worldly, with sensual eyes, loose tongues, and looser lives; all totally unfit for their several callings, all lying horribly in pretending to belong to them, but all nearly or remotely of the order of Monseigneur, and therefore foisted on all public employments from which any living was to be got; these were to be told off by the score and the score.”

But there were still more remarkable people present at Monseigneur’s reception.

“In the outermost room were half a dozen exceptional people who had had, for a few years, some vague misgiving in them that things in general were going rather wrong. As a promising way of setting them right, half of the half dozen had become members of a fantastic sect of Convulsionists, and were even then considering within themselves whether they should foam, rage, roar, and turn cataleptic on the spot, thereby setting up a highly intelligible finger-post to the future, for Monseigneur’s guidance. Besides these Dervishes, were the other three who had rushed into another sect, which mended matters with a jargon about ‘the Centre of Truth,’ holding that man had got out of the Centre of Truth — which did not need much demonstration — but had not got out of the Circumference, and that he was to be kept from flying out of the Circumference, and was even to be shoved back into the Centre by fasting and seeing of spirits. Among these, accordingly, much discoursing with spirits went on, and it did a world of good which never became manifest.”

Dickens was thinking of a very curious sect, or occult fraternity, which existed in France in the later years of Louis XV. The founder of this fraternity or order (oddly enough, called "The Elect Cohens," Cohen being taken in its Hebrew significance of priest) was a mysterious person called Don Martines de Pasqually de la Tour, otherwise known as Martinez de Pasquales. Mr. A. E. Waite, from whose most curious and most interesting "Life of Louis Claude de St. Martin" I gather these particulars, says that Martinez was probably of Spanish origin; but that nothing is known of his early life or of the sources of the occult knowledge which he professed, truly or falsely, to hold in his keeping. He said that he was a transfigured disciple of Swedenborg, "and an initiate of the Rose Cross;" and one is tempted to infer from this latter claim that Martinez was either foolish or knavish, since all the story of the Rosicrucians is a dream about an order which never existed. However that may be, the evidence goes to show that Martinez, the Man from Nowhere, was in Paris in 1754, founding the Lodge — there was a Masonic connection — of the Elect Cohens. Later, the centre of the Elect Cohens was moved to Bordeaux, and here Martinez met Saint Martin, a young Tourainian of noble family, then a lieutenant in the regiment of Foix. Saint Martin became an enthusiastic admirer and disciple, and was initiated into the mysteries of the order. He was a valuable adherent; as a man of race he had access to the receptions of Monseigneur, and could propagate there the doctrines of his master. But the order of the Elect Cohens came to an abrupt end. It was understood by the faithful that Martinez had still certain secrets in reserve, that they had not yet attained to the highest grades of the order, when in 1772, the Grand Sovereign of the Elect Cohens was called by private affairs to the island of St. Domingo.

He never returned — in the body — dying there in 1774. And from that time Saint Martin gradually withdrew himself more and more from the world of occultism — which is a world where visible and sensible marvels happen or are supposed to happen — and attached himself to the teaching of Jacob Behmen, to the world of mysticism, where the signs and wonders are of the spirit, not of the body. Saint Martin ended as a Catholic Quaker, if one may use such a term. He accepted all the doctrines of the Church, and denied the efficacy of all its Sacraments.

But there was another disciple of Martinez de Pasquales, the Man from Nowhere, to whom very strange things happened. This was the Abbé

Fournié, who wrote a book called "Ce que nous avons été, ce que nous sommes, et ce que nous viendrons," published in London in 1801, and now very rare. Fournié states that at an early age he conceived "an intense desire for a demonstration of the reality of another life and the truth of the central doctrines of Christianity."

After eighteen months of profound agitation — I quote from Mr. Waite's life of Saint Martin — he met an unknown personage who promised a solution of his doubts, and pointing to the throng of a crowded thoroughfare observed: "They know not whither they are going, but thou shalt know."

This personage was Martinez. The Abbé speaks oddly of him. "He left the disciples often in suspense as to whether he himself were true or false, good or bad, angel of light or fiend. This uncertainty kindled so strongly within me, that night and day I cried out on God to help me, if He really existed. But the more I appealed the more I sank into the abyss, and my only interior answer was the desolating feeling — there is no God, there is no life to come, there is only death and nothingness." In spite of these desolations the Abbé continued in fervent prayer. He says that light came to him, but only in flashes, and now and then there were visions of things to come, which were afterwards fulfilled. In this manner he continued for five years "full of agitation and darkness, consumed by the desire of God and the contradiction of that desire. At length, on a certain day towards ten o'clock in the evening, I, being prostrated in my chamber, calling on God to assist me, heard suddenly the voice of M. de Pasqually, my director, who had died in the body more than two years previously. I heard him speaking distinctly outside my chamber, the door being closed and the windows in like manner, the shutters also being secured. I turned in the direction of the voice, being that of the long garden belonging to the house, and thereupon I beheld M. de Pasqually with my eyes, who began speaking, and with him: were my father and my mother, both also dead in the body. God knows the terrible night which I passed."

As Mr. Waite observes, it is clear that this proof of the life to come, so long and so fervently desired by the Abbé Fournié, almost frightened him to death. He describes an extraordinary sensation which accompanied the vision, "as of a hand passing through his body and smiting his soul, leaving an impression of pain which could not be described in words, and seemed to belong rather to eternity than time." The terror remained in the Abbé's soul as he wrote his story many years after the event; though he declares that he held with the figures of the vision an ordinary conversation, such as he might have held with the living. Then there was added to the ghostly assembly the appearance of his sister, who had been dead for twenty years, and, finally, there came “another being who was not of the nature of men.” The vision returned again and again and became persistent.

It is an extraordinary tale. As Mr. Waite notes, there can be no doubt of the Abbé’s sincerity or honesty. There is one mark which distinguishes these apparitions from the apparitions of our modern spiritualistic séance. That is the mark of awe and terror even to the point of agony; of a dread so great that it could be described as a Hand piercing body and spirit. So Job spoke of his vision:

“Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof.

“In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, “Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake,

“Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up.”

But, as I understand, the frequenters of the séance experience nothing of the dread of Job, nothing of the awful fear of the Abbé Fournié. They converse easily, familiarly, cosily with the spirits of the dead, and that Hand of Terror does not smite them.

And our conclusion? It is quite impossible to form any conclusion. Probably, I suppose, the long spiritual conflict through which the Abbé had passed had broken down the wall between perception and hallucination. There are all sorts of ways of breaking down this wall, one of them being brandy, the resulting visions being known as delirium tremens. Opium and haschisch also do the work in their manner; staring at a bright object such as a pool of ink or a crystal can induce visions in some subjects. And intense fatigue will now and then bring about like results. Amongst the nonsense and lies that gathered about the “Angels of Mons” legend, there were certain veridical stories, which no doubt gave a true account of the experiences of those concerned. Worn-out men on that terrible retreat of August, 1914, found their way barred by spectral chairs and burning candles that were not there. A distinguished officer wrote to me, telling me how he, several of his officers, and several of his men watched for twenty minutes a ghostly army.

“As we rode along I became conscious of the fact that, in the fields on both sides of the road along which we were marching, I could see a very large body of horsemen. These horsemen had the appearance of squadrons of cavalry, and they seemed to be riding across the fields and going in the same direction as we ourselves, and keeping level with us.” A party was sent out to investigate. They found nothing. “We were all dog tired and overtaxed,” said my correspondent; but he notes, very acutely, that all the observers saw the same appearance.

And so the Abbé Fournié may have hallucinated himself into that seeing of visions. Or perhaps not.

Morduck The Witch

THE BELIEF IN witchcraft died very hard. Indeed, it is not dead yet; but we call the thing and our belief in it by other names. It is not difficult, if you are so disposed, to consult both men and women who have a familiar spirit, in the year 1926.

Richard Hathaway was the defendant in an odd trial in this matter of witchcraft in the first year of Queen Anne. He said he had been bewitched by Sarah Morduck, and twenty years or so earlier, Sarah Morduck would, no doubt, have been hanged for the fact. But it was getting a little late, and so Richard was convicted of being a cheat and impostor, and pilloried in Southwark and Cornhill and at Temple Bar, and imprisoned for six months, and handsomely flogged — for being too late. Indeed Sarah Morduck had a narrow escape. Richard had vomited nails and pins, he could not speak nor open his eyes, great noises were heard in his house; all these troubles being due, as he said, to the spells of Sarah. Accordingly he went to the woman's house and scratched her savagely, and immediately experienced great relief. But there was a clever clergyman then at Southwark, where the persons of the story lived. It seemed that Hathaway, after the relief brought about by his scratchings, had relapsed, and Dr. Martin, rector of St. George's, calling on the man, found that he could neither speak nor see. So Dr. Martin told Hathaway that he had heard of his troubles, and had brought Sarah Morduck with him that she might be scratched again, and another cure effected. But in the background Dr. Martin had another woman, not visible to Hathaway, and when a hand was held out to be scratched, the Doctor had seen to it that it was the other woman's hand. Hathaway's eyes opened, and he began to talk, but, of course, the believers in witchcraft said that proved nothing. It has been laid down by high spiritualist authority that if a ghost is seized at a séance, and is found to be the medium swathed in white muslin, that proves nothing. Consequently, Sarah Morduck was haled from Southwark to the City, and set upon by the rabble, and scratched again in full court, but as luck and the turn of the tide of opinion would have it, acquitted in the end. Hathaway should have taken the hint. But he still persisted that he was bewitched, and now a spell had been laid upon him which prevented him from eating. He was consigned to the care and observation of a surgeon and in public kept up a tremendous fast. But crafty holes had been bored in the walls of his room, and through these holes he was observed to eat and drink most heartily. And so he was put upon his trial as a cheat and an impostor; whereupon the "prayers of the congregation" were asked for him in many churches, and good people collected money to support him in his trials. And poor Sarah, as counsel observed, was in grave danger of being torn in pieces by the mob. Dr. Martin, the Rector of Southwark, told the Court how he managed his ingenious device. There had been some difficulty, he said, in getting a woman who was willing to be scratched.

"I had before met with a poor woman, whom I ordered to follow me, who received alms of the parish, designing she should be the person the experiment should be tried on… . I told her I would give her a shilling if she would let this man scratch her. She flew off, and said she would not suffer it for all the world. At last somebody said, 'Here is a woman who will suffer herself to be scratched'; and this was one Johnson."

The Doctor goes on with his story; tells how his plain demonstration that Hathaway was a humbug, a cheat, and a liar did not demonstrate anything to the people who had made up their minds. Nay; the man himself had the impudence to speak to his parish priest in this style:

"Do you not believe," he said to Dr. Martin, "that I am bewitched?"

"No, I do not."

"Then," says he, "I may as well not believe what you say in the pulpit; I may say to you as our Saviour said to the Jews: 'Though you see miracles you will not believe.'"

The logic is almost modern.

The good Rector went down to Guildford Assizes, where Sarah Morduck was charged with the capital offence of witchcraft. He gave his evidence, and Sarah was acquitted. And the result to the Doctor?

"When I came to town, I was abused by many people, both openly and privately: 'You have the blood of that innocent man to be at your door; the woman had been hanged if you had not saved her; the judgments of God will fall on you.'"

And the general opinion was, added Dr. Martin, that he had been bribed, and the judge had been bribed, and the jury had been bribed, and that on the whole, mercy, and truth, and justice were fled out of the land since Sarah Morduck was not hanged, and oh! what must the feelings of poor Mr Hathaway be in this dreadful trial?

Mr. Bateman, of Pembrokeshire, gave an entertaining account of Hathaway's great performance of vomiting pins.

"I said to him, 'I hear you vomit pins!' 'Yes,' says he. Says I, 'Prithee let me see thee.' So he sat on a low seat, and they gave him something in a cup, and by drinking this I was to see him vomit pins; and he took some drink; but, as far as I could perceive, he did not swallow any. He pretended then to be in an agony and vomited several times, and there were pins on the ground. I had the room swept very clean, and gave him the same again. He vomited again, and there were abundance of pins on the ground again. I believe he vomited fourteen or fifteen times, and I believe there were some hundreds of pins on the ground; but I thought the pins were dropt from one or other; and I took up some of them, and they were dry."

Mr. Bateman searched Hathaway, and found pins by the parcel in his pockets. The man from Pembrokeshire concludes, sanely enough, that rascal Hathaway had some trick of dropping the pins on the ground, but he confesses that he could not catch him in the act, though he observed him keenly and closely. Then one Hearne, brother of the supposed witch, told how his sister was set upon and grievously used by the mob. Hearne applied for protection to Sir Thomas Lane, a magistrate, and that wise Solomon of a judge said there had been grievous provocation; and all the satisfaction Morduck and her brother received from the Court was that Sir Thomas ordered the witch to be scratched again. This done, Hathaway, supposed to be fasting under an evil spell, fell on some bread and cheese with enormous appetite, and "brustled about like a cock sparrow." Nobody could resist this, so poor Sarah Morduck was committed by Sir Thomas Lane to take her trial for witchcraft. Mr. Kensy, the surgeon to whose care Hathaway was entrusted, then told, with much liveliness, how he had laid traps for the impostor, how he had feigned a furious quarrel with his servant in Hathaway’s presence; and how this servant, instructed by him, arranged to bring the man food and drink in secret; and how the doctor viewed, through a secret hole in the wall, Mr. Hathaway consuming fish, oysters, strong beer and brandy with immense relish, with so much relish, indeed, that he became extremely unwell. The maid-servant who was in the plot gave an example of the abusive language used by her master in the course of the sham quarrel: he called her “presbyterian jade”; a phrase that shows that people had not yet forgotten Oliver’s days in the first year of the reign of Queen Anne. And the maid relates how she gave Hathaway a bottle of stout — I did not know that strong porter was called so as far back as this — and this drink was so stout that the cheat became very merry, and danced about, and took the tongs and played upon them. But after that he was mighty sick — details omitted. Strange noises were heard every night in the house where Hathaway slept. A psychical researcher, named Hunt, told how he had observed this side of the mystery. Hathaway was put to bed, “three little things in black bags” called “the charms” were sewed on his shirt, and Mr. Hunt presently observed the man moving his hands about. Hunt struck the fellow’s hands and told him to keep them still or put them out of the bed.

“Then I and the company sitting still about the bed, Welling (Hathaway’s master) said, ‘Hearken, you will not believe; hear what a noise there is; the like is heard here almost every night.’ Whereupon all were silent. At last I heard a small scratching or rubbing at the bed’s feet; and putting my head close to the bed’s feet, listening, I heard something shriek; and perceiving the bed-clothes stir, I took hold of the fellow’s foot, and said, ‘I have caught the witch that made the noise.’ I thought it had been mice at first, but seeing the clothes move, I catched his foot.”

And so on, and so on. The defence called their witnesses who were sure, or almost sure, that Hathaway was bewitched. One of these, Mrs. Willoughby, gives curious evidence.

L. C. J. “Do you think he was bewitched?”

Willoughby. “I believe he was, my lord.”

L. C. J. “I suppose you have some skill in witchcraft. Did you ever see anybody that was bewitched before?”

Willoughby. “My lord, I have been under the same circumstances myself, when I was a girl… I flew over them all… one held me by one arm, another by the other, and another behind, and I flew sheer over their heads.”

L. C. J. “Woman, can you produce any of these women that saw you fly?”

But they were dead. After the Lord Chief Justice had summed up, the jury found Hathaway guilty with all convenient speed, and he received the sentence that his crimes deserved.

And the odd thing is that when I began to unbury this old tale, I thought it might interest because it was so hopelessly obsolete. But it seems to me now that there are modern applications in it; enough and to spare.

“Characters”

I AM WONDERING as I look through my book of “Characters” whether the number of queer people in the world has actually diminished in the last hundred years, or whether they are simply neglected, suffered to go about dressing oddly, behaving oddly, talking oddly, and dying oddly, without the tribute of more than a brief paragraph in the newspapers. On the whole, I am inclined to think this latter the true explanation of the case. For, as I remember, I once tried to draw a pale outline of a truly remarkable character who lived in our day; say some fourteen or fifteen years ago. In those days I was connected with a daily paper, and in the routine of the office I was sent down one fine day to Reigate, to make enquiries about a certain Mr. Campo Tosto, who had lived near that town, and had left his wealth — wealth of a curious kind — in a somewhat curious manner. At Reigate, I found that Mr. Campo Tosto’s house was about four miles away, and that it was situated in a hamlet called Burnt Green. I began to be entertained. Decidedly, there was to be something odd about this tale. Here was the late Campo Tosto living at Burnt Green; which was to all intents and purposes a translation of his name into English. Very good; elated, I hired a trap at Reigate, and we drove on our way. I asked the driver if he knew anything about Campo Tosto, deceased. Not much; he was a queer old gentleman; he didn’t like people about his grounds, and sometimes he would shoot at trespassers.

“Shoot!” said I. “Shoot at them with a gun!”

“Yes, with a gun now and then; but mostly with a bow and arrows!”

Now there were two oddities mentioned in the paragraph on which my enquiries were based. The wealth of Campo Tosto consisted almost wholly in antiquities and objects of art. The late fifteenth century had been the queer old gentleman’s favourite period; and his collection contained all sorts of pieces of that age: pictures, chests, spike candlesticks, statues; valued, I believe, at two thousand pounds or thereabouts. And all this property he had left to a man who, with his wife, had looked after him for some time. This man had been a farm labourer, and his name was Turk; an odd sort of name for an English labourer. We drew near the residence of the late Campo Tosto; a house removed a little way from the road on a slight hillside; a place rather pretentious in a small way without being in the least interesting; about fifty or sixty years old, I suppose. And just then we ran into Mr. Turk, the happy heir of mediæval art. He seemed worried. Men with cameras and long sticks buzzed about him. They wanted him to be photographed in the interests of the public, but he denied them, and did so with considerable irritation. I jumped out of the trap, and put my business before him. He stood still for a moment; and that was enough. Four cameras clicked at once, as Mr. Turk firmly declined to have anything to do with me. Turk declared that he would tell me nothing, show me nothing. "This is the only thing I'll do for you," he said. "Give me that paper," I gave him my paper, open at the "leader page." He deliberately turned it upside down, and read out nine or ten lines of inverted type with the greatest ease, and with absolute correctness.

"You see," said Turk, cunningly, "I used to be a farm labourer, but of late I've had a lot to do with fuller's earth."

He was evidently convinced that he had furnished me with a complete and lucid explanation of his singular feat; a matter which is no feat at all to those engaged in the technical side of newspaper production, but not an accomplishment of the ordinary man.

I walked beside him on the path leading to his hall door. I was endeavouring to wheedle and persuade; without the faintest result. Now and again, he would stop to emphasise his denial with a blow of his fist on his open palm; and again the cameras went click, click. Finally, we got to the hall door, which was half glass. I had just caught a glimpse of a huddle of strange things within; Madonnas dim and rich, in curious frames of carven gold, great brass candlesticks that had stood before Flemish altars and had heard the holy mutter of the Mass, carved chests with linen-fold panels, saints in oak, grey with age — when Mrs. Turk appeared, terrible as an army with banners. Not even the men of the cameras could abide her onset. We all fled, as sheep before the wolf.

And then I went home and set down everything, just as it had happened. But it never got into print. People in authority at the newspaper office sidled into my room and looked at me quietly, keenly. They took counsel together over the matter. I think it was lucky that my engagements for the next few weeks were of an entirely ordinary kind, for if I had lit on anything remotely resembling the wonder world that had been disclosed to me at Burnt Green, I feel sure that I should have had an interview with a specialist; a specialist in the affairs of the mind.

The moral is obvious. We do not hear of “Characters” now, because men are not suffered to write about them. They have become incredible, owing, as I believe, to a certain grossness and thickening of the power of apprehension. I have known many characters myself: there was the case of the lady, a member of a wandering company of entertainers, whose sentimental and pathetic ballad usually touched all hearts at the seaside. One afternoon she perceived to her amazement and indignation that the ballad was not going at all well. She heard some gasps of horrified wonder, then chuckles, then open mirth. Furious, and rightly so, for she was a most delightful and accomplished singer, she turned to leave the stage, and, turning, she saw the cause of this altered reception. On the floor, against the backcloth depicting a happy valley, bowered in roses, there crawled on his stomach another member of the company. One eye was upturned, and it was bloodshot. Between his teeth he held a gigantic carving knife. Years afterwards, this same gentleman caused some little commotion in Holborn, between two and three in the morning. He was reposing on his back in a horse-trough, calling loudly for his solicitor, declining to move till his legal adviser should attend. And the resident in a southern suburb who demanded in a formal and serious letter that his next door neighbour should chain up the bees in his hive, “because your bee has stung my baby’s bottom” — he deserved fame, but the age denies it him.

It was otherwise of old. “Characters” were once a literary genre; and I have often wondered as to those who compiled these chronicles of odd and whimsical lives. There is a certain style which was evidently considered appropriate to the matter; for the manner of these biographies never varies. The stranger the tale, the more stolid, flat and insipid does the chronicler become. I feel sure that every word is true; no liar could write with such dulness. Take the case of Betty Bolaine, born at Canterbury, in the year 1723. She was of “a covetous turn.” She smiled on many suitors for the sake of the presents they gave her.

“At an assembly at Canterbury, when large hoop-petticoats were universally worn, the ladies, complaining of the inconvenience of the fashion, agreed to lay aside their hoops for awhile. Miss Bolaine objected to this proposal, fearing her saving contrivances would make her laughed at. However, her objections were overcome by her companions, and instead of a cane hoop she exhibited a straw one stitched with pack-thread and red tape and covered by an old dirty apron of her father’s.”

Miss Bolaine found a man after her own heart, a Mr. Box, with whom she set up house-keeping on the most economical principles.

“With this man she could eat a mouldy crust, with frowsy or stinking meat, sometimes picked up in the road, and cooked on cabbage stalks, burnt with turf, which was constantly stolen from the commons by night. These, with dried furze bushes, and dead stalks from their garden, constantly supplied fuel all the year round… . At this time, she was sometimes seen in a jacket crimped round her waist, and made of bed furniture, having monkeys, macaws and frogs depicted in needlework… . Her upper bonnet (for she wore two) consisted of thirty-six pieces of black stuff, curiously joined together; the under one was an old chip hat she once found on a dunghill in a garden, and which she was remembered to have worn nineteen years at least. Over this covering sometimes she would throw pieces of gauze, silk brocade, and tiffany, to make herself fine, as she thought… in this manner did she call every Sunday evening on the Dean of Canterbury, stumping through the hall and up the great staircase into the drawing-room.”

There is something stupendous about this bundle of unsavoury rags calling on the Dean of Canterbury; and Miss Bolaine’s will was also picturesque. A dozen or so of people had endured her and bribed her for long years; and she left the whole of her fortune of £20,000 to a Prebendary of Canterbury, whose acquaintance she had just made.

The miser was a great favourite with the depicter of “Characters,” as the friends of Mr. Boffin and of Silas Wegg will remember, but he had other strings to his bow. There was the Reverend George Harvest, “a lover of good eating almost to gluttony, extremely negligent in his dress, and a believer in ghosts, goblins, and fairies”: there was the great painter, George Morland, who went through the ways of Marylebone, carrying a pig which he matched against every dog he met; there was Thomas Topham who could roll up a large pewter dish with his fingers; the Cock Lane Ghost; and the Fasting Woman of Tutbury — for Mrs. Nickleby, it seems, was wrong in alluding to this Character as the Thirsty Woman.

“Doubles” In Crime

THERE ARE CASES, in life and at law, which must ever remain mysteries. We may be assured, as reasonable beings, that the verdict was truly given, that the truth of the matter was reached, and yet at the unreasonable back of our heads there will be that little jot of hesitation, that unjustifiable “and yet,” which refuses to be quashed or put out of court.

There is such a case as this in Montagu Williams’s wonderful volume of reminiscences. The affair happened somewhere in the mid-’eighties, and in its day was known as “The Brighton Bigamy.” One Miss Emma Dash met a gentleman on the Parade at Brighton, shortly before Eastertide. He introduced himself. He said he had met Miss Dash at a dance in London, and he was allowed to join the young lady, who was promenading with her mother. Captain McDonald — that was the name he gave — told the story of his heart. He was a sea captain, and four years before he had been engaged to a lady, who, her mother said, was over young to marry yet. So the Captain waited; but when he returned from his last voyage he found his sweetheart married to another. And he drew a moral: if he ever did get married, he avowed, he would take his wife aboard with him. Captain McDonald, it appeared, was every inch a sailor. One might almost venture to call him a Jack Tar. There were no cautious delays, no slow deliberations for him. He was full of the rush, the fine impulsiveness of the deep blue mariner — of fiction. That very afternoon, on permission given, he called on the young lady and her mother, and drove Miss Dash to Lewes. They dined at the White Hart and drove back to Brighton. At the station, the Captain took train to London, promising to send a wire to Miss Dash. The wire was duly received; it requested Miss Dash to meet the 12.34 train, and, if possible, secure the man who had driven them to Lewes. The two met, drove to Worthing, dined there, and returned to Brighton. The Captain saw Miss Dash home, and asked the mother for the daughter’s hand. Mrs. Dash said that really they had known him for a very short time; still, she gave her consent. Captain McDonald thereupon said that he would get the licence directly. In the course of conversation he happened to mention the name of his ship: it was the Kaikoura. Next day came the Captain with the licence, and the two went to a clergyman. The Captain, evidently unprejudiced by any ecclesiastical bias, said he would like to be married on Good Friday. But the clergyman declined, and it was arranged that the wedding should take place the day after, Easter Eve. They were duly married at St. James's Church, among those present being Mrs. Dash, a Miss Lewis, and a Mr. May. After the breakfast Captain and Mrs. McDonald went away to Chichester. They came back to Brighton on Easter Monday, and the Captain departed, to go to his ship, as he said, there to make arrangements for the due reception and entertainment of his bride. But he never came back.

Some months afterwards, a Mr. Osborne, who had been one of the wedding guests, was at a garden-party at Fulham, given by the Butchers' Company. There he saw a gentleman dressed as a Highlander, and he thought he recognised him as that missing Highlander, Captain McDonald. Osborne thereupon tapped his man on the shoulder, and accused him of being Miss Dash's recreant husband. The Highlander denied it, and said his name was Malcolm. He was detained, and poor Miss Dash — or Mrs. Captain McDonald — was brought up from Brighton, and promptly identified the man as her husband. Mr. Malcolm denied everything. He said he had never been to Brighton in his life, and that he was married to another lady. When it came to the trial, the bride, the priest, and all the wedding guests swore without hesitation that Malcolm and McDonald were the same. On the other hand, Montagu Williams, defending, called, as he says, a host of witnesses who swore, also without hesitation, that the prisoner was in London on the days when, according to the prosecution, he was courting Miss Dash and getting married at Brighton. Mr. Malcolm, who was a meat-salesman at Newgate Market, received a most excellent character; he was, they said, the strictest of teetotallers. And Mr. Williams, his counsel, was able to produce a better piece of evidence even than this. He called the manageress of the hotel at Brighton where Captain McDonald told Miss Dash that he was staying, just before the wedding. The manageress swore that on the night before Good Friday a Captain McDonald was undoubtedly staying at her hotel, and also that the prisoner was, most certainly, not the Captain McDonald whom she had entertained. But then, again, all the wedding guest witnesses recognised on Malcolm's face a scar which, they said, they had seen on the face of McDonald. The signature on the marriage register was produced, and the master-butcher, Malcolm's employer, admitted, against his will, that, in his opinion, the name McDonald was in the handwriting of his man, Malcolm. And then, a very odd circumstance: McDonald had told Miss Dash that his ship was called the Kaikoura. And this was the name of a ship which had brought over a consignment of meat from Australia to Malcolm's master — a short while before McDonald went courting at Brighton.

The general defence was that Malcolm must have a double, a man exactly like him, who could honestly be mistaken for him. And this strange thing happened, in fact, which happened in fancy in the "Tale of Two Cities."

"While I was addressing the jury," says Montagu Williams, "and dwelling upon the probability that there were two men concerned who closely resembled one another, an individual, either by accident or design, wandered into the Court and took up his place underneath the dock, when it was immediately perceived that he bore a striking resemblance to the prisoner. It was, of course, not for one moment suggested that he was the mysterious bridegroom."

The jury disagreed. The case was tried again in the following sessions, but by that time Montagu Williams was too ill to undertake the defence. "O Jaggerth, Jaggerth, Jaggerth! all otherth ith Cag–Maggerth, give me Jaggerth." Malcolm was defended by another counsel, found guilty, and sentenced to five years' penal servitude. And, apparently, the verdict was a just one, since Montagu Williams adds: "It subsequently transpired that Miss Dash was not the only woman with whom he had committed bigamy."

And yet, what about that "host of witnesses" (say half a dozen) who swore that Malcolm was in London, not at Brighton, on the critical dates? Professional perjurers, hired on the Jagger's system? Possibly. And the hotel manageress, with her evidence as to a Captain McDonald, who was not the prisoner, Malcolm, staying at her hotel? Here it would be interesting to consult the full report of the case. In the summary before me, it does not appear whether the manageress were asked if this guest of hers were like the prisoner, though she was sure he was, in fact, not the prisoner. There, evidently, is the real point. McDonald is not a very rare name. It might easily happen that a veritable McDonald and a man who had falsely taken the name might be in Brighton at the same time.

How Clubs Began

ONE OR TWO shop fronts of our old Regent Street still survive amongst the ruins and the new buildings which are more depressing than any ruins. But the goodly street is ended, and it seems fitting that Mr. Jaschke, the Barber of Kings, did not long survive the destruction of his famous shop.

There was a picture in his window that was one of the features of London, like the Filter in Fleet Street and — in the same thoroughfare — the Meerschaum Pipe, with the carving of the Battle of Leipsic on the bowl, priced at one hundred guineas. Mr. Jaschke's picture represented a personage in the costume of a hundred years ago. Long, dark locks flowed luxuriant and profuse over his shoulders, and the inscription was, "The Secret of Beau Brummel." It advertised some cunning preparation which would make baldness impossible; and it is gone, like many another London landmark. Too many, indeed, of these landmarks have departed from us, and the men who come back to us after their years of service in the Malay States and China and Persia will look round vainly, seeking for things that are to be seen no more. It was not so formerly. Twenty years ago a friend of mine who had been in China for some time came back and found London the same as ever. "Nothing has changed," he said. "The chickens are still feeding in the window of the incubator shop at the top of Regent Street." The chickens have long flown away.

But about Mr. Jaschke and his shop. We have all heard how King Edward pronounced him to be the perfect barber; the man who knew not only the art of beard-trimming in perfection, but also that more difficult art of hearing everything and saying nothing. Royalty was the province of Jaschke's razor and scissors; his back shop was called the House of Lords, so noble was the custom of the place. And, considering these things, the awful question has just struck me: what would have happened to me if I had strolled into Jaschke's and asked for a shave or a hair cut? This is a very deep and perplexing question, but the situation is not without precedent. Newman Noggs, it may be remembered, once escorted Miss Morleena Kenwigs to a highly genteel establishment in Soho, where they not only cut and curled ladies elegantly and children carefully, but shaved gentlemen easily. And while Morleena's pigtails were being attended to there presented himself for shaving a big, burly, good-humoured coal-heaver, with a pipe in his mouth, who, drawing his hand across his chin, requested to know when a shaver would be disengaged.

The journeyman, to whom this question was put, looked doubtfully at the young proprietor, and the young proprietor looked scornfully at the coal-heaver, observing at the same time:

"You won't get shaved here, my man."

"Why not?" said the coal-heaver.

"We don't shave gentlemen in your line," remarked the young proprietor.

"Why, I see you a-shaving of a baker, when I was a-looking through the winder, last week," said the coal-heaver.

"It's necessary to draw the line somewheres, my fine fellow," replied the principal. "We draw the line there. We can't go beyond bakers. If we was to get any lower than bakers, our customers would desert us, and we might shut up shop." The situations seem to me fairly analogous. But what would I have said, if I had ventured into the "House of Lords" at Jaschke's, asked for a shave, and been told that Jaschke didn't shave gentlemen in my line? Should I have observed, "I see you a-shaving of a temporary major," and would Jaschke have replied that he drew the line at temporary majors? It is a curious and a doubtful point.

And that consideration led me to another curious point, how, formerly at all events, things that were nominally public were, in fact, private. In the mythical days before the War you might find yourself in an old-fashioned country town and wander into the bar-parlour of an old-fashioned inn. There would be half a dozen comfortable-looking men, substantial farmers and tradesmen, talking together over their reasonable potations, and by the fire an inviting and an empty chair. In it you would sit down, and as you did so a round man would beg your pardon "but that's Mr. Apple's chair." "He's sat in that chair every night for thirty years, has Mr Apple," another round man would say to his neighbour, and there would be nothing for it but to get up as quickly as possible and leave Mr. Apple his place by the hearth. And in some such fashion, I suppose, certain of the old coffee-houses and chocolate-houses were converted from a public to a private use, sometimes by way of business, sometimes by way of pleasure.

Lloyd's was once Lloyd's Coffee House, and White's was White's Chocolate House in the year 1700, and for some time after. Indeed, as late as 1733, the proprietor, Mr. Arthur, "having had the misfortune to be burnt out of White's Chocolate House, is removed to Gaunt's Coffee House, next the St. James's Coffee House in St. James's Street, where he humbly begs they"— "all noblemen and gentlemen"— "will favour him with their company as usual." Evidently, it was still an open house, in name at all events; and it would probably be a difficult matter to trace the successive steps by which White's became a club in the modern sense, open to its members, but strictly private as far as all others were concerned. Possibly a room was at first appropriated to the use of a few constant and privileged customers, who constituted the club and eventually took possession of all the rooms in the Chocolate House. There was, no doubt, a transitional period, as Davies, writing of Colley Cibber, remarks:

"But Colley, we are told, had the honour to be a member of the great club at White's and so, I suppose, might any man who wore good clothes and paid his money when he lost it."

Indeed, it is certain that Colley Cibber was a member, since a book of rules and list of members dated 1736 contains his name, with those of the Duke of Devonshire, the Earls of Cholmondeley, Chesterfield and Rockingham, Sir John Cope, and Major–General Churchill. It seems likely, then, that Davies — he was the Tom Davies who kept the bookseller's shop in Russell Street, Covent Garden, where Boswell first met Johnson — was wrong in thinking that any well-dressed man who paid his gaming debts could be a member of "the great club at White's." There might have been a public room into which the well-dressed man might stroll; but I do not think he would stay very long in the room occupied by the Duke and the Earls.

The first traces of a club subscription are to be found in the 1736 rules. It is directed that "every member is to pay one guinea a year towards having a good Cook," and it was not till 1775 that this guinea became ten and of general application. A few years later an order was made that dinner should be served daily while Parliament was sitting, the reckoning to be twelve shillings a head: in our money, at least two guineas, and probably more. The old Chocolate House, as it existed in the days of the Tatler and Spectator had been distinguished for "gallantry and intrigue, pleasure and entertainment," the later club had become the headquarters of high play. Walpole writes in 1750:

"They have put in the papers a good story made on White's. A man dropped down dead at the door was carried in; the club immediately made bets whether he was dead or not, and when they were going to bleed him the wagerers for his death interposed, and said it would affect the fairness of the bet."

And so Lord Lyttleton says that he trembles to think that "the rattling of a dice-box at White's may one day or other (if my son should be a member of that noble academy) shake down all our fine oaks."

Indeed, the rules deal more and more with the apparatus of gambling. A rule of 1736 directs that "every member who is in the room after 7 o'clock and plays is to pay Half a Crown." Note, by the way, that the phrase "in the room" goes to confirm my conjecture that the original club occupied one room in the Chocolate House; there being other rooms open to Davies' man in good clothes, who was not a member. Then, the "Picket Cards" are to be charged to the Dinner or Supper Bill, and the Quinze players are to pay for their own cards, the Dice used at Hazard are to be paid for by Boxes, and it is ordained that each member who plays at Chess, Draughts, or Backgammon "do pay One Shilling each time of playing by daylight and half a crown Each by candlelight." But White's, like the barber in "Nicholas Nickleby," did draw the line somewhere. There was a Rule that "No Member of the Club shall hold a Faro Bank."

Polite Correspondance

THEY TALK MUCH of Dr. Johnson’s Letter to Lord Chesterfield. Certainly, it is an amazing, a triumphant epistle. It is, perhaps, the palmary example of how agony long endured, shame, misery and humiliation can at last turn to flame and a sword, and rend and devour and hew asunder the wretched tormentor who is found at last to be but a Wig and buckram and a grin and a black heart. Listen to the phrases. They are well known, and yet I think that they cannot be too well known.

“When upon some slight encouragement I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address; and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre — that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found myself so little encouraged that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in publick, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could, and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

“Seven years, my Lord, have now passed since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a Patron before… the notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known and do not want it.”

“Till I am solitary and cannot impart it.” Johnson’s wife had died in the interval between the beginning and the end of the Dictionary. An absurd woman, they say, many years older than Johnson, given to “cordials” somewhat too freely, given also to the extravagant use of paint as applied to the face; but yet the Doctor loved her dearly. It would have been an exquisite joy to tell his “Tetty” how the great Lord Chesterfield was the fervent friend of the poor, ragged, starving scholar, the approver of his work and his helper in it. But Tetty was dead, and it had never been possible to utter that comfortable word; and so, I say, agony turns to flaming fire, to this great letter of denunciation.

There is no letter that I know of worthy of being compared with it. But Johnson’s letter is tragedy; the spectacle of a soul on fire, while yet the tears rain down from the man’s eyes. There is no spectacle, I think, that can be paralleled with this. But if I were compiling an anthology of letters, I believe that I could find something on the comic side, worthy at least of being in the same volume.

A little way off the white limestone road that winds by the river from Newport to Caerleon-on-Usk, in Monmouthshire, there is, or was, an ancient dwelling called St. Julians. In this place lived, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, a certain Sir William Herbert, third son of the first Earl of Pembroke. This gentleman was once annoyed by a Mr. Morgan, who is only known as the object of Sir William’s fury. And thus we begin:

“Sir — Peruse this letter in God’s name. Be not disquieted. I reverence your hoary hair. Although in your son I find too much folly and lewdness, yet in you I expect gravity and wisdom. It hath pleased your son, late of Bristol, to deliver a challenge to a man of mine, on the behalf of a gentleman (as he said) ‘as good as myself’ who he was, he named not, neither do I know; but if he be as good as myself, it must be either for virtue, for birth, for ability, or for calling and dignity: for virtue, I think he meant not, for it is a thing which exceeds his judgment; if for birth, he must be the heir male of an Earl, the heir in blood of ten Earls, for in testimony thereof I bear their several coats. Besides, he must be of the blood royal, for by my grandmother Devereux, I am lineally and legitimately descended out of the body of Edward IV. If for ability, he must have a thousand pounds a year in possession, a thousand pounds more in expectation, and must have some thousands in substance besides. If for calling and dignity, he must be knight, or lord of several seignories, in several kingdoms; a lieutenant of his county; and a counsellor of a province.

“Now, to lay all circmnstances aside, be it known to your son, or to any man else, that if there be anyone who beareth the name of gentleman, and whose words are of reputation in his county, that doth say, or dare say, that I have done unjustly, spoken an untruth, stained my credit and reputation in this matter, or in any matter else, wherein your son is exasperated, I say he lieth in his throat, and my sword shall maintain my word upon him, in any place or province, wheresoever he dare, and where I stand not sworn to observe the peace. But if they be such as are within my governance, and over whom I have authority, I will, for their reformation, chastise them with justice, and for their malapert misdemeanour bind them to their good behaviour. Of this sort I account your son, and his like; against whom I will shortly issue my warrant, if this my warning doth not reform them. And so I thought fit to advertise you hereof, and leave you to God."

How magnificent is "my grandmother Devereux!" The race of such grandmothers is, I am sure, extinct. No man can write such a letter now. No man dares in these days to think so nobly of himself and his ancestors. Sir Leicester Dedlock, even, would not have addressed Mr. Lawrence Boythorn in this superb and exalted manner. He would have instructed Mr. Tulkinghorn to take some kind of proceedings, and though Mr. Tulkinghorn was a great man in his way, after all he was but an attorney. And recourse to an attorney is but a shabby substitute for the resounding boasts and the terrific threats of "old Sir William Herbert of St. Gillyans," as his age called him.

And now for an example of a very different school of letter-writing. We are to fall a little in the world. Our polite correspondent is neither a Georgian saint and sage, nor a high Elizabethan gentleman. He is Mr. Percy Mapleton, generally known as Lefroy, who is in Maidstone Gaol, awaiting his trial for the murder of Frederick Isaac Gold upon the 27th of June, 1881. He is addressing a lady who, I believe, was a relation of his:

"My Darling Annie,

"I am getting this posted secretly by a true and kind friend, and I trust you implicitly to do as I ask you. Dearest, should God permit a verdict of 'Guilty' to be returned, you know what my fate must be unless you prevent it, which you can do by assisting me in this way. Send me (concealed in a common meat pie, made in an oblong tin cheap dish), a saw file, six inches or so long, without a handle; place this at bottom of pie, embedded in under crust and gravy. And now, dearest, for the greater favour of the two. Send me, in centre of a small cake, like your half-crown one, a tiny bottle of prussic acid, the smaller the better; this last you could, I believe, obtain from either Drs. Green or Cressy for destroying a favourite cat. My darling, believe me when I say, as I hope for salvation, that this last should only be used the last night allowed me by the law to live, if it comes to that last extremity. Never while a chance of life remained would I use it, but only as a last resource… . By packing these, as I say, carefully, sending with them a tin of milk, etc no risk will be incurred as my things are, comparatively speaking, never examined. Get them yourself soon, and direct them in a feigned hand, without any accompanying note. If you receive this safely, and will aid me, by return send a postcard, saying; 'Dear P., Captain Lefroy has returned.'"

It has been remarked, I believe, that the profuse use of the italic character is often a sign of a weak and confused mind. It is certainly evidence of such a state in this extraordinary letter of Lefroy's. It will be noted that he italicises phrases which need no italics. "As I hope for salvation," is quite clear in Roman type; "a chance of life," "a favourite cat" are phrases which involve no obscurity. There are, indeed, phrases which the commentator might write in italics or mark with bracketed notes of exclamation, and chief of these is Lefroy's remark that his things were, "comparatively speaking, never examined." How do you "comparatively speaking," never examine anything? Clearly, the man's mind was a heap of foolishness and confusion; he doesn't even understand how a meat pie is made, as appears by his idle talk about "under crust." He has been reading silly fictions about prisoners escaping by means of hidden files, the kind of fiction with which Tom Sawyer embittered the life of the unfortunate Jim, who "mashed his teeth" by biting on a brass candlestick concealed by Tom in the negro's prison fare. And the "feigned hand" of Lefroy is much on the level of the "nonnamous letters" which Tom insisted on writing to Jim's gaolers. And it must be said that the poor woman to whom this extraordinary letter was addressed seems to have belonged to the crazy world which Lefroy himself inhabited. She replied. She did not say, as kindly as might be, "don't talk nonsense." She did not perceive that the file business was sheer idiocy, but:

"First I must tell you that the delay about what you mentioned has happened through our being told that only two shops in London make them, but trust before you have this it will have arrived safely; if so, say in your next: ‘The little basket with butter, etc., came safely.’”

And her letter, too, is full of italics, and many phrases are in “small caps.” Lefroy, clearly, was a man of confusion, and lived in a world of confusion. If he had avoided italics, he might have avoided Maidstone Gaol, the hangman and the rope.

Casanova In London

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY, that extraordinary, admirable, and detestable age, gave us all manner of wonderful things and men, but was, above all, rich in adventurers, in the species which was rightly named chevaliers d'industrie. Rightly, because there was always something of polish, of singularity, of distinction about the eighteenth century rogue. The species, I think, is extinct.

We have swindlers now in plenty, confidence men in abundance. There were some highly ingenious artists in knavery engaged in the case of "Mr. A." And we have occultists, and occult cranks, and founders of new religions, and initiators in secret rites, enough and more than enough. And again, we have dons, learned men, in profusion. But the type that combined all these types in one has ceased to exist. There is no modern translation of Casanova; swindler, cardsharper, occult quack, profligate, dealer in all the mysteries, man of the world — and LL.D. of the University of Padua at the age of fifteen. There were, as I say, some very clever people who interested themselves in the unfortunate Indian Rajah's banking account; but not one of them, I feel sure, could have written as a degree thesis: Utrum judaei possint construere novam synagogas: "Should the Jews be allowed to build new synagogues?" Then, on the other hand: Madame Blavatsky told some amazing tales about Mahatmas, and deceived many persons in high official places. But I never understood that she made much money by it, "it" being taken to mean Theosophy, the "ancient wisdom religion." Casanova, on the other hand, was accused by the nephew of Madame la Duchesse d'Urfê of having swindled his aunt of a million francs, forty thousand pounds or more. The nephew may have exaggerated, for he was in a rage. But it is certain that Venetian Casanova did very handsomely out of Madame d'Urfê's Rosicrucian delusions.

This ingenious gentleman, Giovanni Giacomo Casanova, visited our shores in the early 'sixties of the eighteenth century, soon after the accession of King George III. He had hired a packet at Calais, and was delighted to accommodate the Duke of Bedford on board. The passage took two and a half hours, and at Dover "the custom-house officials made a minute, offensive, and even an impertinent perquisition." Still:

"England is different in every respect from the rest of Europe; even the country has a different aspect, and the water of the Thames has a taste peculiar to itself. Everything has its own characteristics, and the fish, cattle, horses, men and women are of a type not found in any other land. Their manner of living is totally different from that of other countries, especially their cookery. The most striking feature in their character is their national pride; they exalt themselves above all other nations."

Casanova had business in London. He had to call on the famous Madame Comely, Cornelis, or Comelys. This lady, an old Venetian friend of our adventurer, had used in her time many names, but had finally and for English use coined a new one out of the name of a Dutch lover, Cornelius Rigerboos. She had settled down in Carlisle House, Soho Square — afterwards in the occupation of Crosse and Blackwell — just opposite to the Venetian Embassy, and here she gave balls, concerts and masquerades to the nobility and gentry on the most splendid scale. But, somehow, she displeased the Grand Jury of the County of Middlesex, who presented her as a public nuisance. Madame was ruined. She became a vendor of asses' milk at Knightsbridge, and died at last in 1797, a prisoner in the Fleet.

But when Casanova called on her in the early sixties, she was in all the splendour of success. In her own words:

"I give twelve balls and twelve suppers to the nobility, and the same number to the middle-classes in the year. I have often as many as six hundred guests at two guineas a head."

She had two secretaries, over thirty servants, and her gross receipts were £24,000 per annum. And she felt able to be insolent to her old friend Casanova, who resented her behaviour, and took a furnished house in Pall Mall, china, linen and plate included, for twenty guineas a week. He was in disgrace with his own government, since he had broken prison in a spectacular and amazing manner, and so he was presented at Court by the French ambassador, the Comte de Guerchi. King George III spoke in a low voice, but his Queen seems to have been lively. She spoke of the Venetian Ambassador Extraordinary:

“M. Querini amused me extremely, he called me a little devil.”

“He meant to say,” replied Casanova, “that your highness is as witty as an angel.”

And one seems to hear the voice of a later member of the Royal house remarking severely:

“We are not amused.”

Casanova had managed to get introductions to fine company in England. He called on Lady Harrington and played whist for small stakes, losing fifteen guineas. He was given a lesson in English manners.

“You paid in gold,” said Lady Harrington. “I suppose you had no bank-notes about you?”

“Yes, my lady, I have notes for fifty and a hundred pounds.”

“Then you must change one of them or wait till another time to pay, for, in England, to pay in gold is a solecism only pardonable in a stranger. Perhaps you noticed that the lady smiled.”

Many things struck Casanova as strange. He was invited by a younger son of the Duke of Bedford to oysters and champagne at a tavern. They drank two bottles of champagne, and the Duke’s son made Casanova pay half the cost of the second bottle. And the tavern cooking: they laughed at Casanova when he said that he did not care to dine at taverns, because he could not get soup.

“Are you ill?” said the Englishmen. “Soup is only fit for invalids.”

The English of the day, says Casanova, were wholly carnivorous; they ate neither soup nor dessert: “which circumstance made me remark that an English dinner is like eternity; it has no beginning and no end. Soup is considered very extravagant, as the very servants refuse to eat the meat from which it has been made. They say it is only fit to give to dogs. The salt beef which they use is certainly excellent. I cannot say the same for their beer, which was so bitter that I could not drink it.”

Casanova went to Drury Lane. By some accident the company could not give the piece that had been announced. The house was in an uproar. “Garrick, the celebrated actor, came forward and tried in vain to restore order. He was obliged to retire behind the curtain. Then the King, the Queen, and all the fashionables left the theatre, and in less than an hour the house was gutted, till nothing but the bare walls were left. After this destruction, which went on without any authority interposing, the mad populace rushed to the taverns to consume gin and beer… . Such are the English and above all the Londoners. They hoot the King and the royal family when they appear in public, and the consequence is that they are never seen, save on great occasions, when order is kept by hundreds of constables." Casanova went everywhere; he was to be seen alike in high company and in low. He went to Ranelagh and to Vauxhall, preferring the latter. He strolled into coffee-houses, and now and then caught odd scraps of conversation — when the language used was French or Italian. Thus:

"Tommy has committed suicide, and he was right, for he was in such a state that he could only expect unhappiness for the rest of his life."

"You are quite mistaken," said the other, with the greatest composure. "I was one of his creditors myself, and on making an inventory of his effects I feel satisfied that he has done a very foolish and a very childish thing; he might have lived on comfortably, and not killed himself for fully six months."

And, then, Casanova met Miss Charpillon, of Denmark Street, Soho, and this turned out to be the most unfortunate meeting of his life. Miss Charpillon robbed, swindled, humbugged the experienced old profligate to her heart's content. She drove him to the point of suicide. She belonged to a Swiss family of hereditary bad character, and a few years later she triumphed almost as completely over another wily old practitioner of bad morals, the famous Jack Wilkes. Jack recovered; but Casanova was never quite the triumphant rascal again. One of the consequences of his entanglement with the terrible Charpillon was an appearance before Sir John Fielding at Bow Street. The woman had sworn an information against him. He was arrested and taken before the magistrate, whom he confused with the illustrious novelist, dead in Lisbon many years before.

"At the end of the room I saw a gentleman sitting in an armchair, and concluded him to be my judge. I was right, and the judge was blind. He wore a broad band round his head, passing over his eyes. A man beside me, guessing I was a foreigner, said in French:

“‘Be of good courage, Mr. Fielding is a just and equitable magistrate.’

“I thanked the kindly unknown, and was delighted to see before me this famous and estimable writer, whose works are an honour to the English nation… .

“‘Signor Casanova,’ said he in excellent Italian, ‘be kind enough to step forward. I wish to speak to you.’

“I was delighted to hear the accents of my native tongue, and making my way through the press, I came up to the bar of the court, and said:

“‘Eccomi, Signore.’

“He continued to speak Italian, and said:

“‘Signor de Casanova, citizen of Venice, you are condemned to perpetual confinement in the prisons of his Majesty the King of Great Britain.’”

This was Sir John’s little joke. He explained to Casanova that an information, supported by witnesses, charged him with “intending to do grievous bodily harm to the person of a pretty girl,” and that, in consequence, he must be kept in prison for the rest of his days. Casanova declared that he had no intention of doing harm to the pretty girl, who was, of course, Miss Charpillon of Denmark Street. Then two householders were summoned, and Casanova was bailed out, after a brief visit to Newgate, which struck him as “a hell such as Dante might have conceived.”

He left London and England in a hurry. There was a forged bill of exchange and a talk of hanging, and Casanova wisely posted away with all speed on the Dover Road.

Mr. Lutterloh

ON A FAMOUS evening Mr. Boffin called on his literary man in ordinary, Mr. Silas Wegg. He was in a cab, blocked up with books, and he called excitedly:

"Here! lend a hand, Wegg, I can't get out till the way is cleared for me. This is the Annual Register, Wegg, in a cabful of wollumes. Do you know him?"

"Know the Animal Register, sir," said the Impostor, who had caught the name imperfectly. "For a trifling wager, I think I could find any Animal in him, blindfold, Mr. Boffin."

I shall never pretend to the minute knowledge affected by Mr. Wegg; but I have been glancing through an odd volume of the Register, and have certainly come across some very queer animals.

And the first of them is a literal animal, the swallow. The account quoted in the Register is from Barrington's Miscellanies. It seems that during the winter the swallow hides itself under water. This is a well-known fact, and Linnæus is quoted in support of it, with many other witnesses. For example, Mr. Stephens, A.S.S. — there seems to me something ominous about these letters — used to pick up bunches of swallows or martins from a pond at Shrivenham, where his father was vicar. "The birds were carried into the kitchen, on which they soon afterwards flew about the room, in the presence of his father, mother, and others, particularly the Rev. Dr. Pye."

I find it very hard to resist the Rev. Dr. Pye. There is something orthodox, comfortable and full-bodied in his style. I wish I could have seen him as he walked abroad, in wig, cassock, gown and bands, round of speech, I am sure.

But, indeed, a host of witnesses to the submersive habit of the swallow are cited, including a Brentford man and Sigismond, King of Poland. The Brentford man said he had caught specimens in the eyt opposite the town, and the King affirmed on his oath to Cardinal Commendon that he had frequently seen swallows which were found at the bottom of lakes.

And before we laugh, let us remember how many of us saw Russians, thousands of them, in England, in the year 1914. The Annual Register from which I am quoting is dated 1781.

And then there are the other Animals, the featherless bipeds. There is a full account of the trial of Lord George Gordon for High Treason on February 5, 1781, with a very vivid description of the scene at the doors of the House of Commons (see "Barnaby Rudge," Chapter XLIX). And here I came across a very odd animal. There is a well-known passage in Boswell's "Johnson" in which Johnson and Boswell decide that Fleet Street (or the town) is better than Greenwich Park (that is, the country). Boswell fortifies himself in this opinion "by the authority of a very fashionable baronet in the brilliant world, who, on his attention being called to the fragrance of a May evening in the country, observed, 'This may be very well; but for my part, I prefer the smell of a flambeau at the playhouse.'" A footnote informs us that Mr. Boswell's smart friend was Sir Michael Le Fleming. I have never heard more of him, and never expected to hear more of him. A learned Boswellian surmises that, on the evidence given, Sir Michael was probably an unprofitable friend for Boswell, and so the matter ended, as I thought. And here, to my amazement, the fashionable, brilliant and — may one surmise? — somewhat sophisticated baronet, makes his appearance in the Gordon trial. The Rev. Thomas Bowen was officiating as Chaplain to the House of Commons on June 2, 1780. Giving evidence, he says that, prayers ended, he sat under the gallery, near the door. In and out of the House comes Lord George, telling his supporters in the lobby what was going on within. This intelligence comes in gusts to the Chaplain, thus:

Lord George: "Mr. Burke, member for Bristol (the Burke) has said — — " and then the door was shut, and no more was heard.

Again: "Lord North calls you a mob": "Mr. Rous has just moved that the civil power be sent for, but don't you mind; keep yourselves cool; be steady — — " and so on, and so on. And then the Chaplain saw a gentleman go up to Lord George and speak to him, and as soon as Lord George saw who it was, he called to the people, "This is Sir Michael le Fleming; he has just been speaking for you." He seemed to be remarkably pleased with Sir Michael, the witness testified: "patted or stroaked, his shoulder, and exhibited a kind of joy, which the witness knew not how to describe."

Dear me! Who would have thought that Boswell’s brilliant, fashionable, playhouse-flambeau loving baronet was a stout Protestant after all?

But the most awe-inspiring of all the Animals in this Register of 1781 is a certain Mr. Lutterloh. He and his strange name and his strange career are to be found in the account of the arrest, trial, conviction and condemnation of Henry Francis de la Motte for treasonable practices. De la Motte was a French nobleman, with the queer title of Baron Deckham. He had been colonel of the regiment of Soubise in the last war, and had shown gallantry. He had lived beyond his income, and taken refuge in England, and had then, so said the prosecution, engaged in the treasonable practice of furnishing the French Government with information as to his Majesty King George’s forces and plans. He had resided in Bond Street, at a Mr. Otley’s, a woollen-draper, for some time. The story begins with Mr. De la Motte visiting the Secretary of State — of his free will or in response to a hint does not appear. On his way upstairs he dropped several papers full of guilty matters, which were picked up by the messengers and carried with him to the Secretary, Lord Hillsborough. Thereupon, De la Motte was immediately committed a close prisoner to the Tower on the charge of high treason. And here is the first shock: Would a man guilty of such practices fortify himself for a visit to the Secretary of State by stuffing his pockets with treasonable documents, and then carelessly strew the Secretary’s stairs with them, as if they were roses? But I lack space in which to tell the whole story of poor De la Motte — the evident source and prototype of Darnay in “The Tale of Two Cities.” I do not know whether he were guilty; but the case against him has an ill look — for the Government and its agents. The dignity and nobility of his demeanour during the trial were remarked by all, and after the dreadful sentence had been passed, Mr. Akerman, the gaoler, said that he never in his life saw a man in De la Motte’s position with more becoming firmness and fortitude. But the mysterious Mr. Lutterloh? After the examination of the papers which Mr. De la Motte had so thoughtfully dropped on the Secretary’s stairs, orders were issued for the apprehension of Henry Lutterloh, Esq., of Wickham, near Portsmouth. The messengers found Mr. Lutterloh ready booted to go a-hunting, but when he was told of the messengers’ business “he did not discover the least embarrassment.” His keys, his papers were all at their service. He was a German, who had lately taken a house near Portsmouth. He kept a pack of hounds, and was very popular with the neighbouring gentry.

And yet, as it turned out at the trial, Mr. Lutterloh had been a servant (discharged on suspicion of thieving), a chandler in Great Wild Street, Drury Lane, a bankrupt and a fugitive, and a book-keeper at the George Inn, Portsmouth. He confessed in the witness-box that the prisoner, De la Motte, had raised him from beggary to comfort by his generosity. But a powerful feeling came upon Mr. Lutterloh, urging him to make some restitution to the country he had injured. Also, he said, he felt a desire to enrich himself. And so he swore the generous French gentleman's life away.

I am sure that Mr. Dunning and Mr. Peckham did their best for the defence. But I wish the prisoner's solicitor could have briefed Mr. Stryver and Mr. Sydney Carton.

Before Wembley

IT IS TO be gathered from all sorts of sources that the great Exhibition at Wembley did not go so prosperously as might be desired. I wonder why. I believe the reasons are composite. In the first place, I suspect that the Exhibition was much too big; the Great Exhibition of 1851 went into the Crystal Palace. Then it was too technical. I think I have heard that six acres — the area of Trafalgar Square — were devoted to engineering exhibits. Perfectly enchanting — to engineers. But how I should loathe seeing six acres of wheels going round. And, lastly, there is the matter of "closing hours." It is said that the first remark of the late Lord Tennyson on entering the Exhibition of 1851 was "Can one get a decent bottle of Bass here?" It is deplorable, no doubt; but to the average male mind Exhibitions and the modern closing hours are incompatible.

It seems to me that we should begin by separating things which don't go together in the least. Let the Engineers hold their exhibition at Olympia, or at the Agricultural Hall, Islington; let the Builders follow them; let the Dominion Products have their due turn. But what London wants of a summer night is a place of moderate size where, amidst agreeable surroundings, it can sit and eat and drink and smoke in the open-air, and listen to a band or two and dance a dance or two, and perhaps see a revue or two, with a few variety turns now and then, and a cabaret performance and an occasional concert. Fireworks, of course; and I think a Grand Guignol theatre, with the audience in the open air on fine nights. I doubt whether there would be room for an Amusement Park. The fact is, I am for a return to Vauxhall, and all that sort of thing, with all the improvements that modern ingenuity can suggest. Here is a note of a pleasant evening spent at Vauxhall, just 175 years ago.

"I had a card," writes Horace Walpole, "from Lady Caroline Petersham, to go with her to Vauxhall. I went accordingly to her house, and found her and the little Ashe, or the Pollard Ashe as they called her; they had just finished their last layer of red, and looked as handsome as crimson could make them… . We marched to our barge, with a boat of French horns attending and little Ashe singing. We paraded some time up the river, and at last debarked at Vauxhall… . Here we picked up Lord Granby, arrived very drunk from Jenny Whims (a Chelsea tavern). At last we assembled in our booth, Lady Caroline in the front with the vizor of her hat erect, and looking gloriously jolly and handsome. She had fetched my brother Orford from the next box, where he was enjoying himself with his petite partie, to help us to mince chickens. We minced seven chickens into a China dish, which Lady Caroline stewed over a lamp with three pats of butter and a flagon of water, stirring and rattling and laughing, and we every minute expecting the dish to fly about our ears. She had brought Betty, the fruit-girl, with hampers of strawberries and cherries from Roger's, and made her wait upon us, and then made her sup by us at a little table… . In short, the whole air of our party was sufficient, as you will easily imagine, to take up the whole attention of the Gardens; so much so, that from 11 o'clock till half an hour after one we had the whole concourse round our booth; at last they came into the little gardens of each booth on the sides of ours, till Harry Vane took up a bumper and drank their healths, and was proceeding to treat them with still greater freedoms. It was three o'clock before we got home."

The company, as you perceive, was high, though distinctly jolly. Indeed, a contemporary writer describing Spring Gardens, as the place was then called, declares that they were laid out "in so grand a taste that they are frequented in the three summer months by most of the nobility and gentry then in and near London; and are often honoured with some of the Royal Family, who are here entertained with the sweet song of numbers of nightingales, in concert with the best band of musick in England. Here are fine pavilions, shady groves, and most delightful walks, illuminated by above a thousand lamps, so disposed that they all take fire together, almost as quick as lightning, and with such a sudden blaze as is perfectly surprising." In the generation before this Sir Roger de Coverley visited Vauxhaul "exquisitely pleasant in summer," as his friend, the Spectator, declares. "When," he says, "I considered the fragrancy of the walks and bowers, with the choirs of birds that sang upon the trees, and the loose tribe of people that walked under their shades, I could not but look on the place as a kind of Mahometan Paradise. Sir Roger told me it put him in mind of a little coppice by his house in the country, which his chaplain used to call an Aviary of Nightingales. He here fetched a deep sigh, and was falling into a fit of musing when a Mask, who came behind him, gave him a gentle tap on the shoulder and asked him if he would drink a bottle of Mead with her? But the Knight being startled at so unexpected a familiarity and displeased to be interrupted in his thoughts of the widow, told her she was a wanton baggage, and bid her go about her business. We concluded our walk with a glass of Burton ale and a slice of hung beef."

The gardens lingered on, I believe, into the fifties of the last century, but the shady groves had got too shady to be agreeable. The Mask or Baggage still frequented the walks, but the nightingales had flown away, and with them Lady Caroline Petersham, the little Ashe, Horace Walpole, Lord Orford, the Marquis of Granby, Harry Vane, Sir Roger and the Spectator. The last real party who went to Vauxhall were Amelia Sedley, Jos. Sedley, George Osborne, Dobbin, and Becky Sharp; when Jos. drank too much rack punch and called Becky his diddle-diddle-darling.

Vauxhall had many competitors, on the large scale and the small. In 1740, Ranelagh was begun on a site near Chelsea Hospital. "Vauxhall under cover" it was called: there was a Rotunda with balconies full of little alehouses. Of course, Horace Walpole went to Ranelagh.

"Two nights ago Ranelagh Gardens were opened at Chelsea; the prince, princess, duke, much nobility, and much mob besides were there. There is a vast amphitheatre, finely gilt, painted, and illuminated, into which everybody that loves eating, drinking, staring, or crowding is admitted for twelve pence. The building and disposition of the gardens cost sixteen thousand pounds. Twice a week there are to be ridottos at guinea tickets, for which you are to have a supper and music."

Horace was inclined to sniff in a languid manner when Ranelagh was opened. Vauxhall, he thought, was "a little better." But in two years the fashionable success of Ranelagh was assured, and the languid sniff has changed into a shrill squeak. "Every night constantly I go to Ranelagh, which has totally beat Vauxhall. Nobody goes anywhere else — everybody goes there. My Lord Chesterfield is so fond of it that he says he has ordered all his letters to be directed thither." One of the first of the entertainment gardens of London was old Spring Gardens, close to Charing Cross, and it is strange to think that this place, with its grave, late memories of the serious and salutary labours of the London County Council, owed its name to a piece of simple jocularity. There was a jet, or spring, of water there, and a German, travelling in England in Queen Elizabeth's days, writes:

"In a garden joining to this Palace (Whitehall) there is a jet d'eau, with a sundial, at which, while strangers are looking, a quantity of water forced by a wheel, which the gardener turns at a distance through a number of little pipes, plentifully sprinkles those that are standing around."

The joke was improved later. A trap was contrived on the ground, and whoever trod on this trap was immediately deluged. There were other amusements, a bathing pond, a pheasant yard, and a bowling green. In the time of King Charles I:

"There was kept in it an ordinary of six shillings a meal (when the King's proclamation allows but two shillings elsewhere), continual bibbing and drinking wine all day under the trees; two or three quarrels every week." There was also "a certain cabaret, in the middle of this paradise, where the forbidden fruits are certain trifling tarts, neats' tongues, salacious meats, and bad Rhenish."

Then there were Cuper's Gardens just opposite Somerset House, which became Cupid's Gardens in the famous old song, and Marylebone Gardens, and Bagnigge Wells, and Sadler's Wells, all popular in their day.

I believe I saw the last of the tribe one day in Camden Town. In a dreary street there was a drearier public house, with the dreariest little triangle of a garden beside it. Two dusty trees, six dusty bushes, four metal tables, and twice as many chairs, a small pipe from which a small jet of water might sometimes issue, traces of fairy lamps… . Such was the last echo of gorgeous, gay Vauxhall.

The Ingenious Mr. Blee

“STEPHEN M’DANIEL, JOHN Berry, James Egan (otherwise Gahagan) and James Salmon were indicted, for that, at the gaol delivery for our sovereign lord the King at the county gaol at Maidstone for the county of Kent, on Tuesday, the 13th of August, in the twenty-eighth year of our said sovereign lord the King, Peter Kelly and John Ellis were, in due form of law, indicted for a robbery on the King’s highway on James Salmon, by putting him in corporal fear and danger of his life, in the parish of St. Paul, Deptford, in the county of Kent, and taking from him one linen handkerchief, value 4d., two pair of leather breeches, one clasp knife, one iron tobacco box, one silver pocket-piece, one guinea, and one half-crown; and that the said Peter Kelly and John Ellis were tried and convicted for that robbery; and that the said M’Daniel, Berry, Egan, and Salmon, on the 23rd of July, 1754, in the City of London, were accessories before this felony was committed; and feloniously and maliciously did aid, abet, assist, counsel, hire and command the said Ellis and Kelly to commit this robbery, against the peace his crown and dignity.”

Thus in and these words were the Right Honourable Theodore Janssen, Esq., Lord Mayor of the City of London, and his Majesty’s Justices of Oyer and Terminer introduced to what Mr. Sampson Brass would have called a pretty little conspiracy. And the person who unveiled it all, for good reasons, no doubt, pertaining to his comfort and peace of mind and of body was a Mr. Thomas Blee, who lodged at John Berry’s house and did odd jobs, very odd jobs indeed, for him. It seemed that there was what we should call a Little Syndicate, consisting of Berry and his fellows at the bar of the Old Bailey. They all lived round and about Hatton Garden and the backways of Holborn, and they had quiet little drinks together over business in the taproom of the Bell and in other vanished taverns. The syndicate was in low water in July, 1754, and Berry sent his man Blee — how did Stevenson miss so wonderful a name while he was thinking of his pirates and villains at large? — to M’Daniel, and a sort of unofficial committee meeting was held. At the end of it they both said to Blee: “Tom, money grows scarce, you must give a sharp look out for a couple to go upon the scamp now, and if you cannot get two, you must get one." The "scamp," Thomas Blee explained, meant the highway. But Thomas was troubled with scruples. He told Berry and M'Daniel, as he swore, that Kidden's was so bad an affair that he did not choose to be concerned more. Kidden had been tried, condemned and executed a year before; and since secrecy is now valueless it may be mentioned that the business of Berry and his syndicate was to lure poor runagates into the commission of felony, to get them condemned and executed, and then to pocket the reward. It was Fagin, and perhaps rather worse than Fagin, long before Fagin's day; but it will be noted that Mr. Berry's beat was not very remote from that of Dickens's Jew.

Well, Thomas Blee, remembering poor Kidden's end, had scruples, but they were overcome. The next day Berry, M'Daniel and Blee went into Spa Fields — all grey squares and grey streets now between Sadler's Wells and Islington — and looked for idle fellows, at first without success. Then there was another and a fuller committee meeting at the sign of Sir John Oldcastle; in this Salmon, the breeches maker, was included. There was a good deal of discussion as to where the robbery should be committed, and it was pointed out that there were peculiar advantages attached to the road between New Cross turnpike and Deptford, since the inhabitants of East Greenwich offered a special reward of twenty pounds for the apprehension of highwaymen and footpads. And it was settled that Mr. Salmon should be the gentleman to be robbed, and that a Mr. Egan should act as "fence," to buy the stolen goods, and the happy party calculated that what with the official reward and the unofficial reward they would make twenty pounds apiece — about £100 of our money, I suppose. And a day or two later, the friends met together at the Bell, in Holborn, and made the most minute arrangements as to the various identifiable properties that Salmon was to carry; in order that he might be robbed of them. So everything was settled very comfortably, and it only remained to find a couple of young fellows to play the part of the thieves; and that was the business of good Thomas Blee. Accordingly, Mr. Blee went to work. He found two likely young fellows, known pickpockets, down in Fleet Market, Farringdon Street. These were Kelly and Ellis, and Blee told them, according to his instructions, that he knew where to get "a brave parcel of lullies" — otherwise, a parcel of linen. And then followed the most elaborate proceedings. Blee had to show his two prospective highwaymen to Berry and the other members of the syndicate that their skilled eyes might see whether the two young men were suitable for the purpose; and there were meetings at the Plumb Tree alehouse in Plumb Tree Court, Shoe Lane, and occasions when Blee stood by Ellis and Kelly in the Artillery Ground — where the White Regiment was marching. Everything was satisfactory.

"Mr. Berry," said Thomas Blee, "do you think they will do?" And Mr. Berry said, in his hearty way:

"Do! Damme, I have done less than they over, for March and Newman were less."

I am not quite clear as to the precise sense of this remark. It may mean that Mr. Berry was quite satisfied that Ellis and Kelly were not too young to be hanged. At any rate, he was pleased, since he gave Blee sixpence, double his usual gratuity. The affair seemed very promising, and the day for the robbery had been settled, when the plan was a little disarranged by some trouble in the Artillery Ground, where Kelly and Ellis usually "worked" — in the sense that the Artful Dodger and Charley Bates worked.

"About half-an-hour after that," says Thomas Blee, "there was hue-and-cry after a pickpocket. M'Daniel came to me, and said, 'The chief person is a-ducking in the Pyed–Horse Yard; follow him, and give him some gin, for they have almost killed him.'"

Blee found Ellis and gave him a penny or two and went back and reassured M'Daniel: "then he and I came out of the Artillery ground together; as we were coming out of the ground, we met one they call Plump (his name Brebrook) and another fellow they call Doctor, that was turnkey at Clerkenwell Bridewell. Plump, seeing M'Daniel and I together, said to me, 'You rascal, you deserve to be hanged for that affair of Ridden.'"

The day was finally settled. Berry gave Blee the extraordinary sum of five shillings "to flash to the boys," to dazzle them, that is, with the sight of so much money, for Blee usually gave them gin by ha'porths. So the party set out on the way to Deptford, calling by arrangement with the syndicate at certain taverns on the way. At one of these taverns there was almost a misadventure. Kelly caught a glimpse of Berry, lurking in obscurity, and on coming out observed with an oath to Blee: "There is that old thief-catching son of a bitch, your old master." But Blee soothed his fears, and a breast of lamb was bought in the Borough Market, and fried for dinner at the Black Spread Eagle in Kent Street. The three drank together, and slept in the fields, Salmon and Berry always, as it were, round the corner, slinking on the track of Blee and his victims, communicating with Blee under the very noses of Kelly and Ellis. Salmon came into a tavern where Blee and his young friends were sitting, and, taking a place near them, began to speak of walking to London. Then Berry passes the tavern window and beckons to Blee with an evil crook of his finger, and so Blee gets his last instructions, and the three steal out on the track of Salmon. Up to this time, be it remembered, the two dupes thought they were to steal "lullies," or linen. But the sight of Salmon walking before them on the dark, lonely road had the desired effect. Kelly observed: "There is that old blood of a bitch, the breeches-maker in Shoe Lane… let's scamp him." Accordingly, Salmon was set upon by all three and robbed according to plan. The next day, Egan, the receiver, or fence, of the comedy, was "discovered" in the Black Spread Eagle by Blee, and over a breakfast of lamb's liver and bacon, washed down by a pot of "twopenny" — the eighteenth century equivalent of the "four ale" of pre-War days — the stolen goods, all carefully marked for identification, were handed over to the fence. Kelly and Ellis were arrested, tried, and condemned to death in due course; and everything seemed to point to a large reward and a happy ending for everybody concerned — save Kelly and Ellis.

But something went wrong. The constables arrested not only Kelly and Ellis but also Thomas Blee. This may have been a blunder, a pure accident, or Kelly and Ellis may have given Blee away, or Mr. Berry may have considered in his wisdom that Blee's time was come, and that he was ripe for the journey in the Tyburn cart. But Thomas did exactly as might have been expected. He turned King's Evidence at the first possible moment; and the little syndicate found themselves in the dock at the Old Bailey pleading not guilty to the indictment quoted at the head of this article. They called divers friends to give evidence as to character, and the said friends declared in cheerful unison that Berry and the rest of them bore the worst characters possible. The verdict was Guilty, and sentence seven years' imprisonment, two turns in the pillory, and a fine of one mark each. The sting of the sentence was in the pillory. M'Daniel and Berry, pilloried near Hatton Garden, were with difficulty rescued by the sheriff from the fury of the mob. Then Egan and Salmon stood in the pillory at Smithfield. At the end of half an hour’s hail of oyster-shells and stones, Egan was struck dead, and Salmon dangerously wounded. In the end, Salmon and Berry died in Newgate, and M’Daniel “procured himself to be sent abroad for life to the Indies as a soldier.”

The Gay Victorians

THERE IS A certain fable with which we greatly comfort our hearts in these days. And this is the fable of the mild, the tame, the old-maiden-ladylike Victorians. We know in our inner hearts that we, the Georgians, are the most regulation-ridden people that ever were. If we want a box of chocolates or a packet of cigarettes after eight o'clock at night, we cannot get either without breaking the law. In most parts of London, the greatest city in the world, a glass of beer after ten becomes a penal offence. We have the liberty to go to bed quietly; that is about all. I suppose it is the secret knowledge of all this, the knowledge that we have become a flock of rather pitiful sheep, driven tamely off to our pens by the sheep dog of the law, that makes us puff out our chests and pity the poor, limited, propriety-ridden Victorians, and pretend that we are desperate dogs, indeed. If a man would keep any spirit at all, it is necessary that he should look down on someone; rightly or wrongly. But the mid-Victorian age was not really what we pretend to think it. It was, probably, one of the jolliest ages in our history; and all the better for this, that a great deal of the jollity was above-ground, harmless, hearty mirth. There was the other side, of course; there always is that, and now more than ever, since the coming of cocaine — the nasty, underground, poisonous gaiety that is not gaiety at all, but rather ghastliness. But on the whole, the mid-Victorian who was resolved to "keep it up" and "make a night of it" could make a most tremendous night of it and be rather the better than the worse the morning after. A headache? Possibly. But an occasional headache does not do anyone much harm.

I was talking the other day to a man whose business it is, speaking generally, to know everything. I will not define his occupation more precisely; but I happened to mention to him the "Welcome Guest" and Sala's "Twice Round the Clock." He had neither heard of the periodical nor the series of articles. And so, perhaps, I may safely quote this witness of the London world in the year 1858, when Queen Victoria had been reigning twenty-seven years. The period may fairly be called the mid-Victorian; and this was the fashion of it. The time is midnight; the people are coming out of the Haymarket Theatre, still laughing at the drolleries of the inimitable Mr. Buckstone and ——

“Supper is now the great cry, and the abundant eating and drinking resources of the Haymarket are forthwith called into requisition. By the ravenous hunger and thirst displayed by the late patrons of the theatre, you would imagine that they had gone without dinner for a week… Are you rich — there is Dubourg’s, the Hotel de Paris, and the upstairs department of the Café de l’Europe. There is no lack of cunning cooks there, I warrant, to send you up pheasants and partridges en papillote; filets with mushrooms or truffles, culinary gew-gaws that shall cost five shillings the dish. Yes, and cellarers shall not be wanting to convey to you the Roederer’s champagne, the fragrant Clos Vougeot, the refreshing Lafitte and the enlivening Chambertin with yellow seal… If your taste leads you still towards French cookery — though you wince somewhat at the idea of the claret, burgundy and champagne to follow — there exists a second-class French restaurant or two where excellent suppers may be obtained at moderate prices.” Sala follows on the descending scale: a porkpie and a glass of ale at a bar for a few pence: “trotters,” mysterious but succulent, for a penny; a potato from the can at the Coventry Street end of the Haymarket, with salt and pepper, for a halfpenny: and then reverts to oysters, as the refreshment most proper to the hour and the place.

“I will abide by the Haymarket oyster shop, rude, simple, primitive as it is, with its peaceful concourse of customers taking perpendicular refreshment at the counter, plying the unpretending pepper-castor and the vinegar cruet with the perforated cork, calling cheerfully for crusty bread and pats of butter; and tossing off foaming pints of brownest stout.” But a a few oysters and a little bread-and-butter and stout at midnight were only the beginning of a mid-Victorian’s night out. Refreshed, he strolled on to Evans’s in Covent Garden, where, as Mr. Sala assures him, Captain Costigan is no longer allowed to sing his dubious songs, to the shame of young Clive Newcome and to the rage and indignation of the immortal Colonel, his father.

“We have been to the play, we have consumed a few oysters in the Haymarket; but the principal effect of that refreshment seems to have been to make us ten times hungrier. The delicate bivalves of Colchester” — I am afraid that Sala was the first to call an oyster a “succulent bivalve”— “have failed in appeasing our bucolic stomachs. We require meat. Wherefore we walk till the piazza looms in sight. A low doorway, brilliantly lit with gas, greets our view. We descend a flight of stone steps, pass through a vestibule, and enter the 'Cave of Harmony.' The visitor finds himself in a vast music-hall of really noble proportions and decorated not only with admirable taste, but with something nearly akin to splendour. At the northern extremity of the hall is a spacious proscenium and stage, with the grand pianoforte de rigueur, the whole veiled by a curtain in the intervals of performance. As for the huge area stretching from the proscenium to a row of columns which separate it from the ante-chamber café, it is occupied by parallel lines of tables… . See the suppers set forth for the strong stomached supporters of Evans's. See the pyramids of dishes arrive; the steaming succession of red-hot chops, with their brown, frizzling caudal appendages seething hot tears of passionate fat. See the serene kidneys unsubdued, though grilled, smiling though cooked, weltering proudly in their noble gravy… . See the yellow lava of the Welsh rabbit stream over and engulf the timid toast. Sniff the fragrant vapour of the corpulent sausage. Mark how the russet leathern-coated baked potato at first defies the knife, then gracefully cedes, and through a lengthened gash yields its farinaceous effervescence to the influence of butter and catsup. The only refreshment present open to even a suspicion of effeminacy are the poached eggs, glistening like suns in a firmament of willow-pattern plate; and those, too, I am willing to believe, are only to be taken by country gentlemen hard-pressed by hunger, just to 'stay their stomachs,' while the more important chops and kidneys are being prepared… Pints of stout, if you please, no puny half-measures, pints of sparkling pale ale, or brownest Burton moisten these sturdy rations. And when the strong men have supped — or, rather, before they have supped, and while they have supped — and indeed generally during the evening, there bursts out a strong smell of something good to drink; and presently you perceive that the strong men have ordered potent libations of spirituous liquors, hot whiskey and water being the favourite one; and are hastily brewing mighty jorums of punch and grog which they undauntedly quaff."

There! What a jolly scene it is, and how entirely honest and free from blame. And while people are eating heartily and drinking heartily and smoking heartily, a choir of small boys sing eighteenth century glees to them; or perhaps it is a nigger minstrel, some far-off precursor of poor

Chirgwin; or it may be a comic singer who obliges. Perhaps, as I have hinted, there may be a headache to-morrow morning, perhaps a slight distaste for breakfast; but those stout fellows of the ‘fifties care little for such trifles. And all this jollity, all this brown stout and steaming punch at one o’clock in the morning! To us “daring” Georgians it seems well-nigh incredible.

There is one odd note in this tale of Sala’s. It is well-known that Thackeray was a constant visitor at Evans’s. Here is his portrait according to Sala.

“Thersites Theorbo (who is an assiduous frequenter of the Cave at hours when men of not so transcendent a genius are in bed), Thersites Theorbo, down yonder in the café ante-saloon, glowering over his grog, cannot forbear beating time and wagging his august head approvingly when he hears the little boys sing. May their pure harmony do the battered old cynic good!”

Now, I wonder. This was the very year of the famous Dickens–Thackeray-Yates quarrel. Thackeray had called Yates “Young Grub-street” in print; I wonder whether he had called Sala “Young Guttersnipe” in conversation. Sala was a Dickens man; and led-captains fought valiantly for their chiefs in those brave days.

Chivalry

WHEN I AM down in the country, I am sometimes taken to see castles, and I want to make a confession about them. I look about their walls, I mark portcullis and moat, newel stair and keep, I enter into the central court, a green space surrounded by walls half-whole, half-broken — and I cannot form the faintest conception of what these great places were like when they were inhabited; for, it must be remembered, what we see when we admire a ruined castle is a house without a roof, generally without floors or ceilings, always without woodwork of any kind or sort. Take the roof off Smith's villa at Surbiton. Burn every beam in the house, break in all the windows, make the kitchen and back garden a heap of confused stones overgrown with grass and weeds. Knock down every door and every party wall, blow up the stairs, smash the floors, make Smith's potting-shed and his fowl-house in the back garden into beautiful green mounds, turf-covered; and then bring along your post-historic New Zealander, and ask him to tell you what Laburnum Villa was like in the days of its pride, and what manner of life the Smiths led there. I don't believe the New Zealander would make much of the job; and so I make very little of the job when I pass into a twelfth century castle. I can see that those high outer walls, sloping outward to the ground ("battered") for greater strength, were meant to keep people out; I conjecture that those windows, a narrow slit outside, a broad splay within, were handy for shooting without much chance of being shot; I have been told that the keep, or central tower, with walls six, eight, ten feet thick, was the last refuge of the De Somethings when a breach had been made in the outer defence; and that is about all. "The great hall," says somebody, pointing to a large space, where an inner wall half-stands, half-falls. It may be so; but it may be the chapel, or the great kitchen; all is so broken, so uncertain. And then: "Secret passage, communicating with the Abbey, five miles away," and "The black dungeon under the keep, where the objects of feudal oppression pined away." It may be so, or it may be the mere apparatus of drainage.

And as to how the De Somethings lived, where they slept, at what time they had their meals, what they ate at their meals, how they spent their days when the foe were not battering at the outer bailey, I have hardly the faintest notion. I except a few items of the castle bill of fare: a great deal of salt cod, a great deal of salt beef, a great deal of salt herring, venison pies, roast game, peacock and swan occasionally, buttered eggs, richly spiced dishes from the east, dishes in which meat, raisins, and currants were mingled — the mince-pie is the only modern survivor of this school of cookery — pike and other fish from the castle pond; abundance of strong, thick ale — there were no clarifying hops then — and liberal Gascon wine; we may make out a fairly satisfactory bill for the table of our great lord. But that is about all, so far as I am concerned. Indeed, I once asked a man deeply learned in antiquity, a famous herald, to tell me what it was like, generally speaking, to pay a visit to a thirteenth century lord at his castle. “For example,” I said, “when a Barry of Manorbier went to stay for a few weeks with a Bohun of Caldicot, how did the castle party begin the day? Was the Barry called for breakfast?”

He considered the question, and finally declared that in his opinion there was no formal beginning of the day: “I believe they all woke up like animals, and shook themselves.” It may be: but I would rather incline to think that a bell at six o’clock in the morning roused everybody for Mass in the chapel, and that afterwards people strolled to the buttery-hatch and broke their fast, lunching-in the proper sense of the word “lunch” — on hunks of bread and chunks of salt beef or pasty, with quarts of ale for the simple and quarts of red wine for the gentle. And then to the stables, quite in the manner of a modern country house in the hunting shires, and a long discussion there as to the horses. And then, perhaps, a little tennis, the court being the castle court-yard with its lean-to wooden buildings (the penthouse of the game) the opening now called the grille — then the buttery-hatch aforesaid — and the odd projection of one wall which tennis players call the tambour. And so to a mighty dinner at ten, with a very honest appetite, and a strong thirst. Of course, knight errantry in the sense of the romances never existed; nothing at all like it ever existed. The romances of chivalry that is, do not picture the thirteenth century as Dickens, Thackeray, and Trollope between them very fairly pictured the earlier and middle nineteenth century. The romances are pure fantasies of the imagination: nothing more. I have just been reading a curious document which bears on this point. It is a contract, and is as formal and business-like a document as any contract between manager and actor, or between author and publisher. It was executed in the year 1297. It begins:

“An du rengne le Roy Edward fiz le Roy Hen’ vintenne et quint ssi accoumto p’entr Sire Johan Bluet Chevaler et Wylliame Martel.”

Or in English:

“In the year of the reign of King Edward, the son of King Henry, one score and five, it was thus agreed between Sir John Bluet, Knight, and William Martel.”

The fact was that the stout knight — to use the later Gothic manner — Sir John Bluet, wanted a courtly squire. William Martel applied for the engagement, and got it. A contract was then drawn up, and duly sealed: it was a contract valid during the life of William Martel, and it was binding on the heirs of Sir John Bluet. And the said Sir John was to pay William sixty pence of silver yearly; payments due at Hockday (Eastertide) and Michaelmas. Provision is made for default on the part of tenants who paid the rents from which William was to draw his salary: it is expressly stipulated that the squire or his solicitor may put an execution into the house of any such defaulting tenant. Besides the money payment, the chivalrous (though businesslike) squire was to have a robe at Christmas and another robe at Easter; the value of each to be ten pence. Furthermore, William was to be maintained as long as he lived in sufficient meat and drink as a gentleman ought to have— “E a sustenir le devauntdit Wyll’ taunt come il vivera en manger e en beovere avenauntement come a gental homme a peut.” And his two servants are also to have their board and lodging, and his two horses are to be found in hay and oats and shoes; the two horses to have between them 46 bushels of oats a year. And, on his side, the gentle William engaged himself well and faithfully to serve Sir John Bluet as an esquire ought to do “in the war now wageing between the King of England and the King of France; and also in England if war should break out there, which God forbid; and in Wales and all other lands on this side the sea, or beyond the sea wherever the said John may be (except the Holy Land), and in tournaments in time of peace with a great war horse — en tens de pees od en graunt chevall de armes — which the said John will find him and suitable armour without any default on his part.”

The gentle, the chivalrous William! He had evidently heard a thing or two about crusading; and I seem to hear a more modern voice speaking to much the same effect:

“No, dear old chap, I’m afraid we’ll have to cut that clause about the Eastern Tour. I don’t mind the Welsh smalls or the Scotch fitups, and I’m quite willing to go to South Africa or the States; but I’ve made up my mind I’ll never play juvenile leads in the East again. You see, old man, if you come to cues, there’s no bunce in it.”

Such was the actual Age of Chivalry. A little on the practical side, perhaps. Don Quixote would have been disgusted by the document which I have quoted; and, indeed, when Sancho Panza asked for a fixed salary — Teresa urging him — the Knight said there was no precedent in the books for such an arrangement. Not in Amadis of Gaul or in Tirante lo Blanch, perhaps, but we see how it was in actual life.

It is clear that Sancho knew more about Chivalry than his master.

How The Rich Live

THIS IS TO be a talk about some wealthy men that I have known and heard of. I was once a wealthy man myself; a friend of mine confessed to me quite lately that he had been a capitalist in his day; and then there is a great figure in musical history, known well enough for his work, but not generally recognised as being amongst the very rich. To begin with my friend. This is Mr. Lenville, the well-known actor. We were talking the other day as we often do talk about the old times of the stage, of which I know a very little, and he a great deal; the old times being understood to be somewhere between thirty and forty years ago. There is no doubt that they were bad old times. Now a bright young gentleman “walks on” for six months or so. He has little paragraphs in the papers about the amazingly brilliant way in which he walks on, and how interesting it is that he should walk on at all. Then he has a small part; and there are portraits and clever caricatures as well as paragraphs. Then he models in clay a little, and the public interest, as the paragraphists declare, is enormous, so that he gets quite a large part and delivers it so naturally that very few people beyond the front row of the stalls hear a word he says. The bright young man’s fortune is then made. Things were very different in the time of which Mr. Lenville was talking. In those days people had to learn how to act before they were heard of in the western theatres of London. They learned how to act by playing dozens, hundreds of parts in all sorts of obscure playhouses in the country and in the unknown suburbs. They laboured in stock companies in northern towns, at the Britannia, Hoxton; they went on tour in repertory. They were hungry for experience and for bread and cheese and beer. They tried the booths for a while, some of them, and learned what “nunty munjare” means, and how to put the “portable” together, take it to pieces, and get the snow off the roof; also to paint scenery and manufacture dress shirts and shoes and mediæval armour out of white paper, American cloth, and sheet tin, and, by the way, to learn the text of any part ever written in rather less than no time. I remember one of the old stock managers saying to me:

“So I made up my mind to put up ‘Venice Preserved,’ and gave the company three days for study. The Heavy Man said to me: ‘Look here, I can’t study the Cardinal in three days.’ I talked to him. ‘You play the Heavy Lead, don’t you?’ ‘Yes,’ he said, ‘but I can’t study 500 lengths in three days.’ ‘Well, the Cardinal is the heavy part, isn’t it?’ ‘I know.’ ‘Then,’ said I, ‘you’d better go’; and one of the Responsibles took it on, and was perfect on the night.”

Well, it was of such times as those that Mr. Lenville was telling me. He and his friend, Mr. Folair, were in a very bad way. There was nothing doing, and very little to eat. So the two of them walked up one fine morning to the Grand, Islington, where a stock company was running, in the hopes of getting an engagement. But there was no vacancy. They came out into the sunlight, with twopence between them, and walked over to the Angel, and, boldly entering the public bar, ordered a pint of four ale, which they drank slowly, in alternate sips, out of the pewter pot. And as they drank, they discussed the best way to walk home. This was an easy problem for Lenville, who lived in Marylebone, but a formidable business for Folair, an inhabitant of uttermost Hammersmith. And so Lenville gave his views on the subject of the shortest cut to Hammersmith, illustrating his remarks by drawing a kind of diagram, or map, with his stick on the sawdust of the floor.

“Here you see,” said Lenville, “you get up by Portobello Road,” and drew the stick firmly along in the direction of Notting Hill Gate. Something glittered in the disturbed sawdust. The two men hardly dared to believe in that which they saw. It was a half-sovereign — otherwise wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. “Do we hand it over to the barman?” whispered Folair. Lenville replied in words which signified that they emphatically didn’t, and as he spoke his pipe dropped from his hand on to the floor. He picked it up, and soon after the pair of players were having some more beer and sharing the change.

“And I never felt so well off before or since.” So Mr. Lenville ended his tale.

And I, too, I have known wealth in my day. I was living in Queer Street at the time, a quiet place enough to look at, but not really so quiet as it seemed, being close to a certain Grove, where there are streets even queerer.

Well, in those days, I went out regularly to get the supper beer. Not in the honest, manly way of the Briton, who carries the jug in his hand and boldly enters the jug and bottle department, rejoicing in the brown foam that crowns the vessel. This was too high for me; so I used to go to the saloon bar and buy a quart bottle of beer and smuggle it back in a bag or great coat pocket, the whole being done in a very careless, easy manner. But one night there was only fivepence-halfpenny in the house. It is true the bottle of beer cost only fourpence; but it was my custom every evening to have a small glass of something with bitters in it. This cost threepence; and I was ashamed to go to the public-house and omit this decorative part of the ceremony — and yet there was only fivepence-halfpenny in the house. And then, as I fumbled aimlessly, desperately, about in odd corners and disused places, there appeared and was manifested in a dusty drawer, a shabby little old purse, with a broken fastening. I opened the purse, and at the bottom of it was a sixpence and a shilling, both black from lying by. How rich, how glorious a superfluity! I tasted in their acutest savours the delights of wealth!

The last story of the wealthy was told of himself by the mighty John Sebastian Bach. When he was a lad — it was soon after his voice had broken — he had a great desire to hear an illustrious organist of Hamburg, one Reinken. Bach was very poor, and the long journey had to be done on foot, and coming back, he found himself a far way from his home, with hardly any money left in his pockets. He sat down on a bench outside an inn, very hungry, very weary. Suddenly, a window was opened, and two herring heads fell at Bach's feet. He picked them up; there might be a scrap or two of herring left that he might eat. And behold! he found on examination that in each head was a piece of gold. He never found out how it had happened, but, refreshed, he went back and heard the great Reinken once more, and was able to go on his way home at ease and rejoicing.

So much of wealthy men. I once knew a poor man. He was a country squire with an income of ten thousand a year, in the time when ten thousand bought twice as much as it will buy to-day. This squire wished very violently to set up a coach and four, and to possess a steam yacht; but found that he could hardly afford the upkeep of both. In the end, he fixed on the coach, and drove it about bravely enough and tried to smile. But he longed all the while, very bitterly and grievously, for the steam yacht.

I was sorry for him.

A Lament For London’s Lost Inns

AMONGST THE PLEASANT recollections of old, vanished London that I possess, none is more agreeable than my memories of the old inns. I do not mean the inns which would now be called hostels — in an attempt to be older than the old — that is, the various Inns of Chancery, though of these I could tell a long tale. I remember well the joy of turning aside from the gaiety of the Strand when the Strand was the cheerfullest, most delightful street in all London, and, as I believe, in the world, and going up a little quiet way and so into Clement’s Inn, with its fine Hall, its lawns, its peace and quiet, and its Garden House, a red brick, mid-Georgian house in the middle of a green garden. Once when I turned thus aside, the Garden House was empty, and I asked the rent. It was only £120 a year; but it was slightly beyond my means. And then there was New Inn, as peaceful as Clement’s, which it adjoined, but not so green. There were some sad, broken fragments of it surviving off Aldwych up to two or three years ago, but I am afraid these are now gone. The main entrance to New Inn was in Wych Street.

“The gentleman next in esteem and authority among us is another Bachelor who is a member of the Inner Temple. He is an excellent Critic and the time of the Play is his hour of business; exactly at five he passes through New Inn, crosses through Russell Court, and takes a turn at Will’s till the play begins.”

Thus the Spectator, and thus, I think, we see one of the sources of the younger Dickens. Lyons’ Inn, where the old Globe Theatre stood, was gone long before my day. Barnard’s, which Pip in “Great Expectations” disliked so thoroughly, has been converted into the Mercer’s School, its hall happily intact; Clifford’s (one of the choicest specimens of the Inns of Chancery) survives in a fragmentary state, but, I am afraid, will not last much longer. Thavie’s Inn, the residence of Mr. Jellaby, still exists by Holborn, but looks exactly like a street. I suppose it was rebuilt soon after the Society of Lincoln’s Inn sold it in 1771. It was named after John Thavie, an armourer, who lived in the reign of Edward III. Thus do old, old names, even the names of lesser men, cling to our London byways.

But it is not of the inns of this sort that I am thinking, but rather of those inns of common, not of legal, entertainment. It is odd to note that the word is fast becoming — if it has not become — obsolete, together with tavern; the reason being, as I suppose, that the things themselves are gone, or almost gone. We have hotels and we have “pubs”; scarcely inns or taverns. One of the noblest of the old inns that I remember was the Bell, in Holborn, to which the Amersham coach used to run up to in 1880, or thereabouts. Facing the street, it was seen to be a late seventeenth century building of dim and yet warm old brick, with a fine coat of arms in terra-cotta set into it. But within, under the archway, it was, in my recollection, almost a replica of the White Hart Yard, as shown in the “Pickwick” plate, depicting the first appearance of Mr. Samuel Weller. There were two tiers of galleries leading to the bedrooms, running round three sides of the court. In a word, you turned from Holborn into the seventeenth century, as, by the way, you may still turn if you will take the trouble to walk under Gray’s Inn archway through South Square into Gray’s Inn Square. Then, near at hand, was Ridley’s Family Hotel, with bow windows bulging over the Holborn pavement; a sound, comfortable, snug-looking place, where I can see archdeacons reading the Times after breakfast. Of the taverns of former years my chief recollections cluster round the Cock, standing where a branch of the Bank of England now stands, near the corner of Chancery Lane. I had several chops in that old coffee-room of the Cock, where Tennyson called for his pint of port, of which he wrote one of the finest things in the lighter vein that have been written in English or in any other language. Thus to the head-waiter:

Live long, ere from thy topmost head
The thick-set hazel dies;
Long, ere the hateful crow shall tread
The comers of thine eyes;
Live long, nor feel in head or chest
Our changeful equinoxes,
Till mellow Death, like some late guest,

Shall call thee from the boxes.

My occasional visits to the old vanished tavern were paid in its last days, in ‘82 or ‘83. I do not know what I could have been reading, what eighteenth century stuff was in my head — I was twenty at the time — but I had a vague idea that I should meet “the wits” at the Cock, otherwise, “the most respectable authors of the day.” I should think I was about a hundred years too late. I met no wits at the Cock, and I found that the coffee-room began to empty soon after nine, when, according to my out-dated fancies, it should have begun to be brilliant. But the odd thing is that once upon a time the sort of thing that I expected to happen did really happen.

“I was about seventeen when I first came up to town, an odd-looking boy, with short rough hair, and that sort of awkwardness which one always brings up at first out of the country. However, in spite of my bashfulness and appearance, I used now and then to thrust myself into Will’s to have the pleasure of seeing the most celebrated wits of that time, who then resorted thither. The second time that ever I was there, Mr. Dryden was speaking of his own things, as he frequently did, especially of such as had been lately published. ‘If anything of mine is good,’ said he, ’tis MacFlecknoe; and I value myself the more upon it, because it is the first piece of ridicule written in Heroics!’ On hearing this, I plucked up my spirit so far as to say, in a voice just loud enough to be heard, ‘that MacFlecknoe was a very fine poem, but that I had not imagined it to be the first that ever was writ that way.’ On this, Dryden turned short upon me, as surprised at my interposing; asked me how long I had been a dealer in poetry; and added, with a smile, ‘Pray, sir, what is it that you did imagine to have been writ so before?’ I named Boileau’s Lutrin, and Tassoni’s Secchia Rapita, which I had read, and knew Dryden had borrowed some strokes from each. ‘’Tis true,’ said Dryden, ‘I had forgot them.’ A little after Dryden went out, and in going spoke to me again, and desired me to come and see him next day. I was delighted with the invitation; went to see him accordingly and was well acquainted with him after, as long as he lived.”

Thus it was at Will’s, the Great Coffee House in Covent Garden, as Pepys called it. It was No.1, Bow Street, on the west side at the corner of Russell Street, and was perhaps the most illustrious of London taverns, from the Restoration to early Hanoverian days. It was here that “old Swinney” described Dryden as holding court. He told Dr. Johnson that “at Will’s Coffee House Dryden had a particular chair for himself, which was set by the fire in winter, and was then called his winter-chair; and that it was carried out for him to the balcony in summer, and was then called his summer-chair.”

Decidedly, I was a little late in searching for the wits at the Cock.

More Inns

THERE IS A certain "framework" to one of Dickens's Christmas Stories which, I suppose, is not as well known as many of his occasional works. It is called "Somebody's Luggage," and is, as a framework, tolerably artificial. The scheme of it is, that a certain unknown traveller comes to an old fashioned London Inn, situated (I gather) in Holborn or the Strand, writes a great deal in the coffee-room, sends the porter on errands to publishing quarters, stays a night, and vanishes the next evening, leaving all his luggage behind him. Christopher, the head waiter, a most delightful character, becomes curious about this abandoned luggage. He buys it from the proprietress for the amount of the unknown's bill, and discovers that the luggage is full of manuscripts.

"He had crumpled up this writing of his everywhere, in every part and parcel of his luggage. There was writing in his dressing-case, writing in his boots, writing among his shaving tackle, writing in his hat box, writing folded away down among the whalebones of his umbrella."

Christopher first of all disposes of the luggage to a dealer not far from St. Clement Danes in the Strand. "On my remarking that I should have thought these articles not quite in his line, he said; 'No more ith a manth grandmother, Mithter Chrithtoper; but if any man will bring hith grandmother here, and offer her at a fair trifle below what the'll feth with good luck when the'th thcoured and turned — I'll buy her.'"

And then Christopher disposes of the Writings to the Editor of the All the Year Round, otherwise Mr. Dickens, and the Christmas Number begins with the manuscript that was found in the traveller's boots — and I am afraid that it had been better to have left it in his boots.

But what concerns me for the moment with "Somebody's Luggage," is the Bill of the man who went away. It is entered under the heading: "Coffee Room, No.4 — the number of the box occupied by the traveller — Feb. 2nd, 1856." It contains some curious items.

The oddest item is the charge for breakfast. Nominally this was half-a-crown, but this sum covered, it is evident, merely the tea or coffee, the bread and toast and the butter. Everything else is an extra, and these bring the total up to seven-and-sixpence; the profits to the establishment amounting to about 1000 per cent. or more; since I do not believe that the water-cress cost more than a penny. The breakages were also charged excessively, but the bed is cheap at three shillings, and the dinner most reasonable — provided that the dishes were good of their kind. Unfortunately, it is impossible to compare Christophers' inn with any hotel of our day, since the old kind has ceased to exist, save, perhaps, in a few old hostelries, lingering in small out-of-the-way country towns.

I have stayed at all sorts of houses of entertainment in my day in all parts of this island. I have lodged at small country "pubs" and have been very comfortable; I have stayed at Palatial Hotels in big towns and have been hideously uncomfortable. I remember especially one of these latter. It had a Louis Quatorze, or Quinze, or Seize Tea room, furnished with the utmost luxury. There was marble everywhere, and hot air and cold air, and bathing arrangements that recalled the later Romans at their worst. And they kept me waiting twenty-five minutes for the bacon and eggs at breakfast; and when this rare and exotic dish did appear it was by no means excellent.

A great contrast to this was the Bell at Driffield, in that part of Yorkshire splendidly called the High Wolds. It is an extraordinary country; a great part of it ploughland when I visited it about eight years ago. The fields are huge; some of them, I believe, a hundred acres in extent. There are hardly any trees; they want to grow corn (they told me) not trees. The hedges are about three feet high by a foot broad, and if a hedge shows signs of becoming luxuriant, it is torn up. No weeds were suffered to grow in these hedgerows; not a flower appeared. But the lie of the land was the strangest thing about this strange region. It rose up before you with a great surge and swell; not precipitously, but gently and yet mightily, climbing up and up to the sky line; the white road rising perhaps for three or four miles, and in such a way that one felt that there must be a sudden and tremendous descent on the other side. Indeed I was strongly reminded of the Graveyard Scene in Sir John Martin Harvey's production of "Hamlet," the finest piece of scenic illusion that I have ever seen, where there was just such a gradual upward surge of the stage to the panorama cloth of the sky, with the like imperative suggestion that beyond the line of meeting, a thousand feet of sheer, precipitous cliff fell to the sea. But the Wolds were as deceptive as the theatre. The summit of the long wave gained, there was no violent, abrupt fall. The land went slowly down as it had slowly ascended; and then, far away, rose again into another climbing billow, marked by the white chalk road.

But the Bell at Driffield. It is a small, old coaching inn, and I did not suppose that its resources would be very varied. So when the landlord asked me on my first evening there what I would like for breakfast, I said, "Oh, bacon and eggs, I suppose." Instantly my host was roused. His manner became combative, his chin advanced with a sort of side-toss, peculiar to Yorkshire. And he said:

"Ah don't know about that. What about devilled kidneys?"

I assented gladly. Next morning, the devilled kidneys came and were admirable. Soon after they were served, the landlord came into the coffee-room. I expressed my high approval of the kidneys. He pointed to the sideboard, on which were a magnificent ham, just cut, and two plump fowls, golden brown from the roasting.

"Now mind you help yourself, Mr. Machen," said he, in an admonitory manner; implying that he would think very little of me if I did not help myself. "And if there's anything else you would fancy, I hope you'll mention it."

I left early the next day, and bid good-bye to this good host of the Bell. He relaxed a little.

"Coom again, Mr. Machen, coom again. Coom next time for your pleasure, not for your business. As far as I know, you can get oop when you like, and go to bed when you like, and do anything you like for that matter." And he wagged a genial finger at me, as if he would say that he had imparted the great secret of life. Driving to the station, I found myself thinking of Shenstone's lines. I quote from memory:

Whoe'er hath travelled life's dull round,

Whate'er his fortunes may have been,

Must sigh to think he still has found

His warmest welcome at an inn.

I have other good inns of pleasant and grateful memory. It is a great thing to stay at the Swan at Wells in summer weather; to look out across the street over the green turf of the close, to see the marvellous imagery of the west front of the cathedral against a sky of such a glowing and luminous blue as one only sees in the west. The inn at Dunster, too, the Luttrell Arms; that has a warm welcome and one of the loveliest prospects in England to commend it. And the Vine at Stafford has an old and flourishing vine making all its front green and living; and within there is the most delightful bar parlour, shaped like a boat. Here the boots brought a bag of list slippers at ten o’clock at night, and we all suited ourselves with slippers, as men who are too comfortable to stir in a hurry. We sat up talking to one another, and to the landlady and her daughter, who sat in the boat-shaped room with us in the old, friendly fashion. It was two o’clock in the morning before we stirred. The next morning, the landlady apologised for keeping me up so late. “But really,” she said smiling, “when one once embarks on these literary conversations, time seems to fly.” I agreed that literature was an absorbing subject; but what I remembered chiefly was some very old bottled ale which, to quote Mr. Bob Sawyer on the brandy at the Blue Lion, Muggleton, was too good to leave in a hurry.

How I wish somebody would open a Bell or a Swan, or a Luttrell Arms, or a Vine — in London!

Deadly Nevergreen

THERE IS A great talk of ghosts just now. They call them spirits, but ghosts is the good and ancient word of England. These ghosts come when the lights are out, and utter nothing or very little of consequence; and sometimes their remarks are “evidential” and sometimes they are not “evidential,” and on the whole nothing much happens. But how is it — if ghosts are, in fact, accustomed to revisit the lands beneath the moon — that anyone dares to pass the intersection of the Edgware Road with the Oxford Road after night has fallen? For it is stated that the ghosts of men who have died violently are given to revisit the scenes of their taking off. The murdered haunt the places of their dreadful endings; how is it, then, that the site of Tyburn Tree is not dense with the spirits of the great multitude of men and women who perished awfully there during the space of three hundred years or more? One would have said that the very ground would cry out with the agony of all these unhappy souls, that perished there by the old torturous method of execution: the cart driven on, the poor wretch left dangling in the air, to strangle by slow and excruciating degrees. But there are no reports of ghosts by the place of Deadly Nevergreen, Tyburn Tree.

One of the strangest of the ends made at Tyburn was that of Lord Ferrers, who was executed on May 5, 1760, for the murder of his steward, John Johnson. It is probable that Lord Ferrers was, in fact, a homicidal maniac, but, being tried by his peers, he was found guilty of murder and condemned to death, and accordingly was hanged with infinite pomp and ceremony. Every courtesy was shown this unhappy nobleman. He was allowed to drive from the Tower to Tyburn in his own landau, drawn by six horses, instead of in the mourning coach which had been provided by some friends. Mr. Sheriff Vaillant attended him, and observed “that it gave him the highest concern to wait upon him upon so melancholy an occasion, but that he would do everything in his power to render his situation as easy as possible.” Earl Ferrers replied politely, and, being dressed in light clothes, embroidered with silver, remarked that his dress might seem strange, but that he had a reason for wearing it. It is said that this gay and rich habit was his lordship's wedding suit, and that he remarked that the latter occasion was as good a one for wearing it as the former. And so the procession set forth: a large number of the constables of Middlesex, a party of horse-grenadiers, and a party of foot, Mr. Sheriff Errington's coach, the famous landau and six, Mr. Sheriff Vaillant's chariot, a mourning coach and six, and lastly a hearse and six. This horrid pageantry set out from the Tower soon after nine, but moved so slowly that Tyburn was not reached till a quarter to twelve. The condemned man behaved with the greatest calmness, hinted very politely to the chaplain that he was a Deist, censured the late Lord Bolingbroke for suffering his religious sentiments to be given to the world, and as to the late Mr. Johnson, whom he had shot dead, protested that he had not the slightest malice against him, but "he had met with so many crosses and vexations that he scarce knew what he did" — he had been a good deal worried, as we should put it.

At last the procession got as far as Drury Lane, and here Lord Ferrers said that he was thirsty and would like a glass of wine and water. But Mr. Sheriff Valliant pointed out that the dense crowd would become still denser if a halt were made, and that his lordship might be disturbed thereby, whereupon the Earl answered: "That's true, I say no more, let us by no means stop." They drew near to Tyburn, and Earl Ferrers said that there was a person waiting in a coach, for whom he had a very sincere regard, and of whom he would be glad to take leave before he died. Again the Sheriff was polite, but firm. He said that if his lordship insisted it should be so, "but that he wished his lordship, for his own sake, would decline it, lest the sight of a person, for whom he had such regard, should unman him, and disarm him of the fortitude he possessed." Again my lord gave way, and now the landau was over against the place of death.

And here it is to be noted that there were two instruments of execution at Tyburn. One was the permanent three-legged structure, the true Tyburn Tree which stood where the two roads meet. The other was a temporary scaffold sometimes erected in the Oxford road, by the park railings. It was on this scaffold that Lord Ferrers suffered. It was covered with black baize, and on two black cushions the condemned man and the chaplain knelt and, repeated the Lord's Prayer together. Lord Ferrers took leave of the chaplain and the two sheriffs with many polite expressions, desiring Mr. Sheriff Vaillant to be so good as to accept his watch. Then he called for the executioner, who desired his forgiveness, and his lordship, intending to give the man five guineas, gave it to the assistant hangman by mistake. Hence an "unseasonable dispute between these unthinking wretches." But Mr. Sheriff Vaillant instantly ended that. And then:

"His neckcloth being taken off, a white cap, which his lordship had brought in his pocket being put upon his head, his arms secured by a black sash from incommoding himself, and the cord put round his neck, he advanced by three steps upon an elevation in the middle of the scaffold, where part of the floor had been raised about eighteen inches higher than the rest, and standing under the cross-beam which went over it, covered with black baize, he asked the executioner, 'Am I right?' Then the cap was drawn over his face; and then, upon a signal given by the sheriff (for his lordship, upon being asked, declined to give one himself), that part upon which he stood instantly sunk down from beneath his feet, and left him entirely suspended; but not having sunk down so low as was designed, it was immediately pressed down, and levelled with the rest of the floor. For a few seconds his lordship made some struggles against the attacks of death, but was soon eased of all pain by the pressure of the executioner."

It was his lordship's misfortune that he made the experiment of the New Drop in a very early and ineffective stage of that invention.

It was one of the ugly features of the eighteenth century that it was by no means the rough mob of London that alone took pleasure in these hideous scenes. Boswell was an amateur of executions, and there were many elegant gentlemen who made a point of being present and write to each other, in unspeakably loathsome terms, on the matter. Thus Gilly Williams writes to George Selwyn:

"Harrington's porter was condemned yesterday. Cadogan and I have already bespoke places at the Brazier's. I presume we shall have your honour's company, if your stomach is not too squeamish for a single swing."

And so again, the Earl of Carlisle, another of Selwyn's correspondents, writes of Hackman, the murderer of Miss Reay:

"He was long at his prayers; and when he flung down his handkerchief for the signal for the cart to move on, Jack Ketch, instead of instantly whipping on the horse, jumped on the other side of him to snatch up the handkerchief, lest he should lose his rights. He then returned, to the head of the cart, and jehu'd him out of the world."

Dickens has been accused of grossly libelling the famous Lord Chesterfield by his character of Sir John Chester in "Barnaby Rudge." All good friends of Dr. Johnson will agree that it is impossible to speak too harshly of the detestable Chesterfield. But, that apart, it is doubtful whether a more odious type has ever existed than the bad Whig noble of the eighteenth century.

Ceremony On The Scaffold

ON THE TENTH of June, 1541, Sir Edmund Knevet was arraigned before the officers of the Green Cloth for striking one Master Cleer of Norfolk within the Tennis Court of the King's House. The sentence was that Sir Edmund Knevet must lose his right hand, and forfeit all his possessions.

Now supposing that the Board of Green Cloth existed still in all its vigour, with the old power of passing exemplary sentences, what would happen to plain Bill Smith of these days convicted of giving Tom Robinson one for himself within the verges of St. James's Park? I can imagine the scene very well. Bill would be taken from his cell at eight o'clock one morning. He would be led to a dingy and despairing metal shed in the prison-yard by a couple of warders. Here there would await him the Governor of the Prison, the Medical Officer, perhaps the Chaplain, a skilled surgeon, an anæsthetist, a nurse (very bright and cheerful, with red cheeks), and an operating table. On this table Bill would be politely requested to place himself. He would inhale the very latest formula, the Medical Officer keeping in careful touch with his pulse. The distinguished surgeon would then amputate Bill's right hand, the dressings would be applied with the greatest care, and in due course the prisoner would be escorted to the hospital. Here he would remain for the next three weeks, being nurtured on a light but nourishing diet. On his release from prison he would be fitted with an artificial hand, of the newest pattern. Such would be the course of justice in 1926, if it had continued to order right hands to be cut off.

They did not do things in that shabby, hole-in-the-corner way four hundred years ago. The ancient chronicle from which I quote continues the story thus:

"Whereupon there was called to do execution, first the Serjeant Surgeon, with his Instruments pertaining to his office, then, the Serjeant of the Wood Yard, with a mallet and a block to lay the hand upon, then the King's Master Cook with a knife to cut off the hand, then the Serjeant of the Larder to set the knife right on the joint, then the Serjeant Ferrier with searing irons to sear the veins, then the Serjeant of the Poultry with a Cock, which Cock should have his head smitten off upon the same block and with the same knife; then the Yeoman of the Chandry with Sear-cloaths, then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a pan of fire to heat the Irons, a chafer of water to cool the ends of the Irons, and two forms for all officers to set their stuff on, then the Serjeant of the Cellar with Wine, Ale and Beer; then the Serjeant of the Ewry with Bason, Ewre, and Towels."

There! It must be confessed that there was nothing mean about the court of Henry VIII. If it was only a matter of cutting off a gentleman's hand, the thing was done magnificently; with — I think we may say — a sense of style. In this particular affair of Sir Edmund Knevet I am afraid that some of the company were disappointed; for when it came to the point of execution Sir Edmund confessed everything and submitted himself in every respect, only begging that the King's Majesty would take the left hand instead of the right, since with that hand, he said, he might live to do the King some service. Whereupon somebody ran to tell the King, and the King immediately forgave Sir Edmund, and left him both his hands and restored to him all his forfeited lands and goods. I am afraid, I say, that, some of the company went away grumbling and asking (more or less) if they were going to have their money back; but I daresay there were others who were all for a happy ending. And I have no doubt that the seven Serjeants, the two Yeomen, and the King's Master Cook gave a good account of the Wine, Ale, and Beer.

Things did not always end so pleasantly. When Nigel (he of "The Fortunes") was in prison for drawing his sword on the villain, Dalgarno, in the precincts of the Court, Sir Mungo Malagrowther visited him, and, by way of consolation, gave a lively account of some proceedings under the Board of Green Cloth which he had once witnessed. The culprit, if I remember, bore the striking off of his hand bravely enough, but when it came to the application of those red-hot irons to the stump, he uttered an eldritch screech. The Palace Court, the body which once gave these savage sentences, lingered on far into the 'forties of the last century. Tip (otherwise Edward) Dorrit once occupied a stool in the office of an attorney "in a great National Palladium called the Palace Court," and indeed the Marshalsea, whence Tip came, was originally built as a prison for persons accused of offences committed within the verge of the Court. But I suppose that in its later years the tribunal bled its victims rather metaphorically than literally.

But as to the general question of the public ceremonial and elaborate execution of judgment upon criminals; how does it compare with our grim and secret way of carrying out the last doom of the law? So far as we are concerned, no doubt Charles Dickens, that determined and consistent denouncer of public executions, was perfectly right. Johnson was mistaken when he said that the pageant of Tyburn, with its long drive from Newgate, furnished an example to the populace. Dickens describes the execution of the Mannings and the demeanour of the crowd that waited all night to witness it; it is plain that the vilest degradation, not reformation, was the result of that hideous spectacle. But as for the criminal himself; there, perhaps, Johnson was right in thinking that he was fortified by the dismal pageantry, by the bell ringing at St. Sepulchre's, by the flowers presented by lady admirers, by the last drink at St. Giles's. Jonathan Wild is reported by Fielding to have picked the chaplain's pocket of a corkscrew going in the cart to Tyburn, and Sixteen Stringed Jack wore a bright pea-green coat as he went on his way to the Three Wooden Stilts. And, then, there was the admirable Colonel Turner, who was hanged in the seventeenth century for something like robbery with violence. He made what Leslie Stephen rightly called a superb dying speech. "He spoke under the gallows as if he were the good apprentice just arrived at the mayoralty… . " He was brought up in an honest family in the good old times, he said, and lamented the bad times that had since come in. So the Colonel ran on happily, speaking of his loyalty to the King, his firm piety, his detestation of profane swearing and drunkenness; in a word of his well-nigh saintly character. At last the hangman put the rope round his neck.

"Dost thou mean to choke me, fellow?" asked the Colonel. "What a simple fellow is this! How long have you been executioner that you know not how to put the knot?"

Then, as he was putting on the white cap, he saw a lady at a window. He kissed his hand to her, said, "Your servant, Mistress," and pulled down the cap, undaunted to the last, as an eye-witness of the scene reports.

It is clear that Colonel Turner would not have liked our modern ways of doing things.

Old Dr. Mounsey

SOMETIME IN THE summer of 1768, Dr. Samuel Johnson supped at the Crown and Anchor, in the Strand, with a little company that Mr. Boswell had collected to meet him. The company consisted of Dr. Percy, afterwards Bishop of Dromore (Percy’s “Reliques”), Dr. Douglas, Mr. Langton (“Lanky”), Dr. Robertson, the historian, Dr. Blair (Blair’s “Rhetoric”) and Mr. Thomas Davies, the bookseller of Russell Street, Covent Garden. The Scots were all prudent and silent, but Johnson was “in remarkable vigour of mind and eager to exert himself in conversation.” He did exert himself in conversation: to the following effect:

“He was vehement against old Dr. Mounsey, of Chelsea College, as ‘a fellow who swore and talked bawdy.’ ‘I have been often in his company (said Dr. Percy), and never heard him swear or talk bawdy.’ Mr. Davies, who sat next to Dr. Percy, having after this had some conversation ‘aside with him, made a discovery which, in his zeal to pay court to Dr. Johnson, he eagerly proclaimed aloud from the foot of the table: ‘O, Sir, I have found out a very good reason why Dr. Percy never heard Mounsey swear or talk bawdy; for he tells me he never saw him but at the Duke of Northumberland’s table!’, ‘And so, Sir (said Johnson loudly to Dr. Percy), you would shield this man from the charge of swearing and talking bawdy because he did not do so at the Duke of Northumberland’s table. Sir, you might as well tell us that you had seen him hold up his hand at the Old Bailey, and he neither swore nor talked bawdy; or that you had seen him in the cart at Tyburn, and he neither swore nor talked bawdy. And is it thus, Sir, that you presume to controvert what I have related?”, Whereupon Dr. Percy left the room in a huff, and next morning Dr. Johnson observed complacently that there had been “good talk.”

Of course, the passage had been long familiar to me, but not reading Boswell in the luxury of an annotated edition, I had always speculated vainly as to this “old Dr. Mounsey,” who appears on the great lantern show for a moment, sets Johnson and Percy by the ears, and then vanishes. It was only the other day that I found in an odd old book (published, strangely enough, at Louisville, Kentucky) the true history of Dr. Messenger Mounsey (or Monsey), Physician to Chelsea Hospital.

He was the son of a country parson, who refused in 1689 to take the oath of allegiance to the Usurpers, William and Mary. He was educated at Cambridge and settled down as a physician in Bury St. Edmunds, where he married a widow with a handsome jointure. He made an income of £300 a year, and grumbled because he had to work too hard for it. Fortunately for him, Lord Godolphin was seized with apoplexy on a journey to his country seat, and Bury was the nearest point where medical help was to be had. Dr. Mounsey was called in, Lord Godolphin got better, liked his physician's talk, and made Dr. Messenger for life. He had an apartment at Lord Godolphin's town house, was made Physician to Chelsea Hospital and saw all the best company of the age, from King George II downwards. For a a time he was a great friend of Garrick's; but Garrick had a sly tongue, and the Doctor had a rough tongue, and the friendship ended in offence and epigrams. Garrick used to make comic business out of Mounsey's oddities for the entertainment of his friends; Mounsey said that Garrick would never leave the stage "so long as he knows a guinea is cross on one side and pile on the other" — so long as guineas have heads and tails — and the two became sworn enemies. The fact is that Dr. Mounsey was an intensely rude old man, or, in the elegant phrase of my authority, "it became the fashion for the young, the delicate, and the gay to exclaim against him as an interrupter of established forms, and as a violator of those minute rules of good breeding — which, however trifling they may appear to the sage and the philosopher, contribute essentially to the ease and comfort of modern life." Yet the queer old man had, like the greater Doctor of his age, an interior benevolence. Once, going along Oxford Market, he observed a poor woman asking the price of a fine piece of beef.

"The brute answered the woman, 'One penny a pound,' thinking, no doubt, it was too good for her. 'Weigh that piece of beef,' said the Doctor.

"'Ten pounds and a half,' said Mr. Butcher.

"'Here, good woman,' cried the Doctor, 'hold up your apron and take that beef home to your family.'

"'God bless your honour!'

"'Go off, directly, home; no compliments! Here, Mr. Butcher,' continued the Doctor, 'give me change out of this shilling for that poor woman's beef.'

"'What do you mean, Sir?' replied the Butcher.

"'Mean, Sir! why to pay for the poor woman's beef, what you asked her; a penny a pound. Come, make haste and give me three halfpence; I am in a hurry.'

"'Why, Sir… ' said the Butcher.

"'No why sirs with me,' answered the Doctor, 'give me my change instantly, or I will break your head.' The Butcher again began to expostulate, and the Doctor struck him with all his force with his cane."

But the principal adventure of his life seems to have been the affair of the bank-notes. Dr. Mounsey, who was born in 1693, not long after the foundation of the Bank of England, had an old-fashioned distrust of "securities" of all sorts, and so, being bound on a summer holiday, he hid his notes and gold in his fire-place, putting them under the "cinders and shavings" of the laid fire. A month later Dr. Mounsey returned and found his house-keeper entertaining a few friends to tea in his sitting-room. The fire had just been lighted; the kettle was on the hob. "He ran across the room like a madman, swearing his housekeeper had ruined him for ever, and had burned all his bank-notes. First went the contents of the slop-basin, then the teapot, and then he rushed to the pump in the kitchen, and brought a pail of water, which he threw partly over the fire and partly over the company, who in the utmost consternation retreated as speedily as possible. His housekeeper cried out: 'For God's sake, Sir, forbear, you will spoil the steel stove and fire-irons.' 'Damn the stove, irons, you, your company, and all!' replied the Doctor, 'you have ruined and undone me for ever; you have burned my bank-notes.' 'Lord, Sir,' said the half-drowned woman, 'who'd think of putting bank-notes in a Bath stove, where the fire is ready laid?' 'Fire,' said he, 'who'd think of making a fire in summer-time, where there has not been one for months?'" The notes were recovered in a damaged and dubious condition. But Dr. Mounsey's patron, Lord Godolphin, said that he would go with him the next day to the Bank of England, and everything would be quite all right. But Godolphin had told the King, and the King said that he must hear Mounsey tell the tale of the burning notes and the drenched tea-party. And so, when the Doctor came, King George II was hidden in a cupboard, and was so much amused that he kicked the cupboard door open. “God!” said the Doctor in a rage, and then saw who had been listening, and with considerable tact ran on his sentence, “bless your majesty; this may be a joke with you and his lordship, but to me a loss of near £400.” But Lord Godolphin assured him that he should have his money, and made an appointment to meet him at the Bank a little later. Dr. Mounsey, in the interval, transacted some business at the Horse Guards, and took water at Whitehall for the Bank. In going down the river he felt that he must have a look at the bank-notes, to make quite sure that they were safe. So he pulled out his pocket-book; and a gust of wind blew the notes out of the book and into the river. “The Doctor, with a volley of oaths — the other Doctor was right on one point, at all events — desired the waterman to put back, for that his bank-notes were overboard. He was instantly obeyed; and when he reached them he took the hat from his head, and, dipping it in the river, took up his notes, together with half a hatful of water. With his hat, the notes, and the water under his arm he was landed at the famous stairs called the Three Cranes in the Vintry, and walked straight to the Bank.

“What have you under your arm?” asked Lord Godolphin. “The damned notes,” replied the Doctor, throwing the hat on the table with such violence that the water spurted into the faces of the City Kings who sat about the board. “There,” said the Doctor, “take the remains of your damned notes, for neither fire nor water will consume them.” He got his money in full, but he did not go away in peace. He had forgotten all about the watermen and the fare from Whitehall. They were waiting outside the Bank “howling for their money,” and swearing that the Doctor was a madman. When he came out, one of the watermen laid hold of him — and was instantly knocked down for his pains. However, a crown for the little mistake, with half a crown for the fare, adjusted this little difficulty, and Dr. Messenger Mounsey resolved to invest his money in the Funds for the future.

This remarkable character outlived Dr. Johnson by five years, dying in 1789, at the age of ninety-six. Naturally, he made an eccentric will. He left the bulk of his money to his daughter, tying it up by a complicated system of entail to her female descendants. He mentioned in his will a young lady on whose wit, taste and elegance be “lavished encomiums” — leaving her an old battered snuff-box, worth about sixpence. He mentioned also another young lady to whom he had intended to bequeath a legacy. But she turned out “a pert, conceited minx,” so she got nothing. Then came annuities to two clergymen, who had turned Unitarian.

And I am wondering whether Dr. Johnson knew all that there was to be known about Dr. Messenger Mounsey. He abominated foul and blasphemous language, no doubt; he would have detested a man who abused the Church of England and comforted heretics. But if he had known of the principal clause in old Dr. Mounsey’s will, by which large property was not only left to a woman but entailed in the female line, then he would have dismissed Dr. Mounsey as a wild and irresponsible madman, fit for Bedlam and nothing else.

The Euston Square Mystery

DECIDEDLY; THE MURDER of Matilda J. Hacker in Euston Square, in the year 1878, is one of those cases that are to be marked with an “and yet… . “ No doubt the verdict of the jury was the right verdict, according to the rules of the law; but… .

Miss Hacker, if she had lived in an earlier age, would undoubtedly have been one of those “Characters,” of whom we were talking. Like Miss Betty Bolaine, she lived at Canterbury; like Miss Bolaine she had an aversion from the spending of money. But, born in a later age, she did not appear in polite company as an animated and malodorous rag-bag, nor did she make her meals of rotten meat picked up in the gutter and roasted on a fire of cabbage stalks. We have long lost the courage of our opinions; and Miss Hacker expressed herself in a purely negative way — she would not pay her rates at Canterbury. She was a well-to-do old woman, but she did not like paying rates. Accordingly, she absconded. She took various names, and lived in various places, so as to avoid being traced and proceeded against by the Canterbury authorities. At length, she called herself Huish, and took lodgings at 4, Euston Square — the place changed its name in consequence — a house kept by a Mr. and Mrs. Bastindoff. Like many other “Characters” of the chronicles, she was accustomed to keep a good deal of money by her in a cash-box.

On the 10th of October, 1878, she wrote a business letter to her agent about some property, the reply to be addressed to “M. B., Post Office, Holborn.” On Sunday, October 14, Mr. and Mrs. Bastindoff were out for the day, and Miss Hacker was alone in the house with the servant, Hannah Dobbs. Next day, Mr. Bastindoff told the servant to go up to the old lady and get some rent due to him. Hannah, Mr. Bastindoff declared, ran upstairs with alacrity, saying, “I’ll go,” and came down again with a £5 note. The note was changed, the rent owing deducted, and the balance handed to Hannah Dobbs; it does not appear why. But one would think that the lodger would have received the balance. And now a very singular point. Mrs. Bastindoff said afterwards in the witness-box that on the morning of Sunday, October 14, Hannah had told her that she thought that Miss Huish (otherwise Hacker) was going to leave the lodgings that day; indeed, that she believed the old lady had already gone. This statement seems to have produced little effect on the Bastindoff family, since Mr. Bastindoff sent up his servant to collect money from his lodger on the Monday morning, and collected it. It is not recorded that he said: “So she hasn’t gone, after all,” or made any remark in particular. But after the successful embassy of the £5 note, it would appear that the lodger’s disappearance was gently allowed to steal on the family consciousness. Still, nobody troubled to go into the old lady’s rooms for a couple of days, and then only to get them ready for a new lodger. In these rooms, Mrs Bastindoff declared, she saw a stain on the carpet, and also clear evidence that someone had tried to wash the stain away. Still, Mrs. Bastindoff did not seem afraid with any amazement. A lodger had disappeared, probably on Sunday morning; had handed over five pounds on the Monday; her room, on the Wednesday, was found to be darkly stained; afterwards, analysis showed that this was, indeed, the stain of blood. But, so far as we can see, all these odd circumstances were accepted by the Bastindoffs as being completely in the natural order of things.

And there were other queer things, that appear to have aroused no particular comment at the time of their occurrence. Soon after October 15 Hannah Dobbs showed one of the Bastindoff children a Dream Book, which, she said, had belonged to Miss Hacker. She gave another child a funny toy, the lodger’s cash-box — with a broken lid. She also mounted a watch and chain which no one had ever seen about her before. But she explained that the watch and chain had been left her by an old uncle, lately dead at Bideford. She pawned them, later, under a false name, and it turned out at last that they were originally the property of Miss Hacker. It was found that there was no uncle at Bideford, and, naturally enough, therefore, that he hadn’t died. Soon after the disappearance of the old woman, Hannah Dobbs left the Bastindoff service, and went into lodgings. She could not pay her rent, so left her box as security. Eventually it was opened, and several articles in it were identified as having been the property of Miss Hacker.

So much for Miss Hacker’s disappearance; now for her reappearance. Seven months later, in May, 1879, the cellar at No.4, Euston Square, was cleared out, as one of the lodgers wanted to store coal there. Then Miss Hacker reappeared; very dead down in that cellar, with a rope about her neck. But the body was identified beyond doubt, and some pieces of jewellery found by the body were known to have been the property of the dead woman. A pretty strong case, as Montagu Williams observes, and yet Hannah Dobbs was acquitted. The judge was Mr. Justice Hawkins, who was not generally supposed to be unduly favourable to prisoners at the bar. But the point, it seems, was technical. Hannah Dobbs was, undoubtedly, in possession of various pieces of property that had belonged to Miss Hacker; but that was no proof that she had murdered Miss Hacker; it was not even proof that she knew that Miss Hacker had been murdered. I do not know whether it were proved that Hannah Dobbs must have seen the watch and chain (for example) in the dead woman's possession; even so, they might have been given to her by another person and that other person might have assured Hannah that they were a gift to him from Miss Hacker.

Then followed a very odd sequel. Hannah Dobbs became a popular heroine. The proprietor of the Police News took up her case, and issued a pamphlet, which pretended to tell Miss Dobbs' true story. Miss Dobbs declared that there had been certain relations between herself and Bastindoff, before she entered his service, and during her residence in his house. Then Mr. Bastindoff filed an affidavit, denying these allegations. And on that affidavit he was indicted for perjury. Again the Judge was Hawkins. Hannah Dobbs, who had been rather shabby at her own trial, turned up smartly dressed in the witness-box. She swore that the relations between herself and Bastindoff began in the autumn of 1877, when she was in service at 42, Torrington Square. Hannah and another girl were cleaning windows, and Mr. Severin Bastindoff spoke to them.

"In consequence of that conversation he and I went out together that night or a night or two afterwards, and from that time until I entered his service we frequently went out together. The relationship was kept up during the time I was an inmate of his house."

This story was corroborated by Hannah's fellow-servants. Two of them said that one night they were waiting for Bastindoff and that all three fell asleep before the kitchen fire, leaving the area door open. Two policemen noticed the open door, entered, woke the girls up, and partook of a little coffee with them. The girls identified the prisoner as the man they had seen, but explained that when they had met him below stairs his beard was differently cut. Mr. Justice Hawkins then directed that a witness, once a partner of Bastindoff's, should be recalled, and he gave a description of the prisoner's beard, old style, which confirmed the statement of the servant girls. A Mrs. Carpenter, keeper of an inn at Redhill, swore that in the year 1877 Dobbs and Bastindoff passed the night together at her hotel. It was observed that this Mrs. Carpenter was violently antagonistic to the accused man. Hannah Dobbs was cross-examined. It appeared that she had been convicted of theft, and her little life story led Mr. Justice Hawkins to declare her "a most infamous person." The defence was that on the day on which Bastindoff was said to have been at Redhill with infamous Hannah, he was really fishing in quite a different part of the country; and that the man who was with Hannah was really brother Peter Bastindoff, who was just like Severin. But, unfortunately, the people who swore that Severin was fishing, swore that Peter was fishing too, a statement making confusion very much worse confounded, but not helpful to the defence.

There is only one gleam of light in this strange, tragical, most horrible case: Severin Bastindoff's best witness was his mother-in-law. One would have thought that this affecting circumstance would have melted brassy bosoms and hearts of flint; but it was not so. In the result, Severin Bastindoff was found guilty of the crime of perjury, and sentenced to twelve months hard labour.

There is no happy ending to this queer story. Nobody was hanged, though it seems pretty clear that somebody, perhaps several somebodies, would have been "nane the waur for a hanging," as the humorous Scots justice observed on one occasion.

The Power Of Jargon

NOT SO MANY years ago, fifteen or sixteen, or seventeen, perhaps, we were all following the Druce Case with immense interest. Stated baldly, as I remember it, the general thesis was that a Mr. Druce, keeper of a big furniture shop in Baker Street, who in due season died, and was buried in Highgate Cemetery, was not Mr. Druce at all, but the Duke of Portland; the famous Duke who caused to be constructed the underground mansion at Welbeck, and was thought to be more than a little eccentric. Now, I have forgotten the detail, I regret to say, but if this Mr. Druce could be proved to have been, in fact, the Duke, then somebody would come in for a great deal of money. The original claimant went mad and died, and then another claimant appeared, and turned himself or herself into a company, and found some hundreds of people ready to subscribe quite large sums so that the legal proceedings should be taken and the recovered treasure distributed amongst them. This monstrous bubble of a story was finally burst by leave being given to open the Druce vault at Highgate; whereupon the body of poor Mr. Druce was disclosed and found to be undoubtedly the body of Mr. Druce, and not a lump of lead, as (I think) was alleged by the Claimant. But in the course of litigation one extraordinary witness was called in support of the Claimant's case. She was a very old lady, over eighty, to the best of my recollection, and she had been brought all the way from New Zealand to tell the most outrageous cock-and-bull story that was ever heard in an English law court. She knew all about the secret of the Duke of Portland, who had the odd humour, according to the fable, of pretending at intervals to be an upholsterer in Baker Street; she knew, because in her youth she had been "outside correspondent" to him, Charles Dickens, and Lord Lytton. She did not explain what an "outside correspondent" was; she placidly babbled her imbecilities in the witness-box, and was finally prosecuted for perjury, convicted and let off very lightly.

But it is her phrase that interests me. I am convinced that it was a great attraction to the people who were persuaded to back this crazy imposture, just because it was idiotic, which, after all, is not surprising, since the persons concerned who parted with their money in such a cause were undoubtedly idiots, and so it was, I think, with the amazing case of Benson and the Turf Frauds, an old tale of the ‘seventies.

Benson was a man of Jewish race. He was only twenty-six, but he had been in grave trouble before. He was perfectly well-mannered, well-educated, well-dressed, and had contrived, one gathers, by gig-keeping on a magnificent scale, to associate with the very best people in the Isle of Wight. He drove a splendidly equipped carriage and pair; therefore, he was a good man. He had collected about him a remarkable gang of assistants; and in the year 1876 Benson and his friends laid a remarkable trap, and baited it in the oddest manner. This bait was taken, and taken eagerly, by one Madame de Goncourt, a wealthy French widow. Benson, no doubt, had marked her down; it is the business of men who follow his difficult and dangerous craft to know everything — everything that may at all concern them. At all events, Madame de Goncourt received an odd number of an English paper called Sport. Of course, there was no such paper. But Madame. de Goncourt, reading this journal which had fallen on her from the clouds, learned from it that it was the property of an immensely wealthy Englishman, a Mr. Montgomery. This Mr. Montgomery had mysterious and masterly access to turf and stable secrets that had enabled him to win, not thousands, but millions of pounds on the race-course. Not unnaturally, the bookmakers were enraged at the disastrous science of Mr. Montgomery. They refused to take his bets. Sport was enraged. It pointed out a way. Though Mr. Montgomery could not make bets in his own name, he could pay a slight commission to foreign agents, who would back horses for him in their own names. All this impressed Madame de Goncourt immensely, and she was impressed still more by the receipt of a letter from the great Mr. Montgomery. This gentleman — alias Benson — wrote as follows:

“Your name has been favourably mentioned to me by the Franco–English Society of Publicity, and I consequently repose in you the most esteemed confidence. What I require of you is very simple indeed. I will send you for each race the amount which I desire to put on the horse which must, in my opinion, win. You will have to forward the money in your name, but on my account, to the bookmaker, and thus will be able to get the real odds, which, on account of my success and great knowledge, are denied me. The bookmaker will, on settling day, send you the amount, added to the stake originally forwarded to him. This you will please remit to me, and, on its receipt, I will forthwith forward to you a commission of five per cent."

Madame de Goncourt had more money than she knew what to do with; naturally, therefore, she wanted to make more. She became Mr. Montgomery's agent, and received cheques of "The Royal Bank of London, Charing Cross." There was no such bank, to be sure; but, then, there was no Franco–English Society of Publicity. Sham cheques came raining on Madame de Goncourt, and she forwarded them to various agents of Benson, who were supposed to be English bookmakers. Then Mr. Montgomery sent her a Bank of London cheque for £1000, which was to be put on a certain horse and sent to a bookmaker named Francis, who, said Mr. Montgomery, was a "sworn-bookmaker." And he advised the lady, very strongly, to invest a like sum on her own account. She did so, and in a few days she had sent £10,000 to various sworn-bookmakers.

Then, of course, the inevitable mistake. The gang did not know when to leave the board. They put it to Madame de Goncourt that a vast fortune was to be made if she could venture £30,000 with a sworn-bookmaker named Ellerton; and Mr. Montgomery said that if the lady could not command the whole sum he would gladly advance the difference himself. She was only too ready to find the whole sum required; but before this could be done she had to have a talk with her banker — and then all was spoilt. Madame de Goncour came over to England, and characteristically enough, applied to the Lord Mayor, telling him, no doubt, that she had suffered wrong. Her confidence in the French Legend of the Lord Mayor of London was justified; Benson and his rascals were caught, and the lady recovered almost the whole of her money. I do not think I am in the least glad to record this fact. On the whole, I think Benson and his pirates deserved the money quite as well as Madame de Goncourt, if not better. Poor men, men of large families and small means, may be readily excused if they are over-ready to accept idle tales of immense gains: but the rich should not be covetous. But this is not a moral tale. Its point lies in the highly successful use of absurd jargon, of the "outside correspondent" order. Mark the "Franco–English Society of Publicity," non-existent, of course but interesting as containing an early example of the ugly word, "publicity." Note "The Royal Bank of London"; note, above all, the "sworn-bookmaker," a great creation. There is no surer bait than pompous and unmeaning gibberish of this sort. You remember “The Anglo–Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Assurance Company.” In England we require the moral touch implied in “Disinterested.” Benson was baiting his hook for Continental victims, and so did not appeal to the ethical issue. It is well known that they are not really moral on the Continent. I shall call my swindle “The All–British Orphans’ Benevolent Protection and Reconstruction Company, Ltd.” Reconstruction is one of the most blessed of these blessed words; and what good man could resist the temptation of benevolently protecting and reconstructing an All–British Orphan — especially if he were promised interest on his money at the rate of twenty-five per cent?

GUINEVERE AND LANCELOT

UPON A MORNING in May a man kept his master’s sheep on the hills that are above the Forest of Dendreath, in the midst of the Isle of Britain. It was very early in the morning when the man came out of the shelter that he had made between two rocks, and the dew was thick upon the short grass, and at the sun rising all the land glittered as if it had been the Shining Isle beyond the waves of ocean, and an odour of sweetness rose up from the region of the leaves. Then the sun ascended in his splendour, and the mists in the forests vanished away, and the shepherd saw before him all the wonders of the Forest of Dendreath. In the west he beheld the Road of the Eagle that issues from the waste land of Cameliard; and suddenly he was amazed, for far away he saw a red flame and a white flame advancing side by side along the alley of the wood.

Now, these flames were indeed nothing but that famous knight of high worship, Sir Lancelot, the principal warrior of the Order of the Round Table, and beside him Guinevere, that was to be Arthur’s Queen. When the shepherd far on the wild hill had seen them they had but come forth from a shade of beechen leaves, and as they appeared suddenly in the open glade the sunbeams smote upon them, and so bright was Lancelot’s armour made that it was as if it spouted white fire, and Guinevere was as the burning of vehement flames. Upon her head she bore a cap of golden cloth, curiously adorned with jewels such as rubies and carbuncles and chrysoprases, and her cotehardie was of red samite. And about her she held a cloak of flame-coloured satin, and her belt was of gold and crystals. Golden was the glory of her hair. So they rode through the alleys of the forest in the sweetness of the May morning, amidst the glittering of many leaves stirred by the wind of heaven. And at their passing by all the choir of the birds of the wood exulted. Deep from the shade in the heart of the forest Eos the nightingale chanted the melody of lovers with unwearied antiphons; to him gladly replied the blackbird, a master of song; the blackcap was of their chorus; from the throats of smaller birds there rose a sweet sound like that of pipes of faerie. So journeyed Sir Lancelot and the lady by the ways of the happy forest, one glancing gently on the other as they rode at a merry pace.

Now, when Sir Lancelot brought Guinevere from her father's castle in Cameliard, they rode for a day and found no adventure. But as night fell, and the sun went down, and it grew dark, they heard a noise as of crackling flames, and the sky grew red; and they saw a high hill before them, and on the height of it a fair castle was built, with lofty walls and many springing towers and pinnacles. But a black smoke swelled up from it, and great flames encompassed it, and as they looked there was a roaring and a riving as of thunder; and then that fair and goodly place fell apart, and was dashed down into the dust, being consumed with fire. 'Alas, fair lord,' said Guinevere, 'what castle was this, and who was the lord of it? What evil chance hath so piteously destroyed it all?'

'Lady,' replied Sir Lancelot, 'that I may scarcely tell. Let be awhile, and it: may be that we shall fall in with some man who shall advise us.' And then they pressed a little forward, and Sir Lancelot found a poor man hidden amongst the thorns and bushes by the way, and he asked the man what enemy had come upon the castle, and for what cause it had thus been burned and ruined. 'Sir,' said the poor man, 'ye are to understand that this castle was the castle of Sir Sagramour of the Fair Mount, that was a knight of great worship, and a noble warrior, and the lord of all these lands. And it fell out by evil chance that he saw Eglaise, the daughter of King Ryon of the Rugged Island, as she went forth from her chamber to hear mass, and the hearts of these two became inflamed with love, and so they fled away together and dwelt happily at that castle for a year and a day. Then cometh King Ryon against Sir Sagramour and taketh his castle and burneth it as ye have seen, and Sir Sagramour is slain, and his wife with him, and no living man is left therein.' Then Sir Lancelot and Guinevere, the queen that was to be, marvelled, and went on their way; and said Guinevere: 'I see very well that this love is both piteous and cruel, since by it husband and wife are slain, and a fair hold has its portion with ashes and destruction.'

'Will ye say so, lady!' answered Lancelot. 'Consider well that by this name love is all the round earth ordered, with the shining of the stars at night, and with all the spheres of the heavens, and with the perpetual choirs of Paradise. And without this love ye are to understand right as the doctors teach us, that there were no brightness of the sun at all, nor any light of the moon, nor should there be any green thing upon the earth, nor any bird of the wood, nor beast of the rocks, nor fishes in ocean; nay, when love shall pass, then passeth man also. And ye shall not say that this knight and his sweetheart were unhappy nor of an ill end, for to our lord Love they did great worship and great honour, and were well rewarded of him, so that they dwelt for a year and a day in the estate of gladness, and now praise God in Paradise, in the bliss that is perdurable and everlasting.'

'Oh, knight,' said then Guinevere, 'I see well that ye are a great lover and a high master — yea, a very doctor of love; and well I wit that in the King's court at Camelot ye have the love of many ladies, and bear the palm of all amorous knights.'

'Lady, ye judge falsely, since never yet have I loved maid nor wife.'

'Is this as ye say, of very truth!'

'It is as I have said, lady, and ye must know that I am none of the knights of the bower, but of the stricken field, where I do battle for my lord, King Arthur, against his enemies, and against the foes of all the land.'

'Nevertheless, sir knight, of love ye speak very honestly and fairly, and ye hold love in great worship, as is plain to see, and so at last ye shall doubtless receive the high guerdon and reward of that lord Love whose lauds and offices ye so well recite.' And then that fair lady looked on Sir Lancelot with right good liking. And as they passed on their way they came to a lake, and all about it there were yew-trees set as a high hedge, and from the shadow of these trees they heard issuing a noise of lamentation. 'What is this?' said Guinevere. 'Let us delay and listen.' And there was a sound of a man who wept, and after his weeping they saw him take a lute, and he sang this melody:

I make an incantation against the brightness of the sky:
I make an incantation against the shining of the sun:
I make an incantation against the wind of heaven.

I utter a spell against the boughs of the oak,

Against the Aspen and the alder, the willow and the birch,
Against the budding of every tree that is in the wood.

I bind a charm against the rose that it blossom not:
May my magic bring darkness on the generation of the flowers:
May blackness consume the grass of the fields.

Let there be a mighty spell upon the melody of the birds, Let the green perpetual choir be silent, Let the song of fairyland be heard no more.

For in Gwenllian was the brightness of the sky, She was the splendour of the heavenly sun, She imparted sweetness to the breeze from on high.

In her were contained the delight of the woods, The sweetness of the rose, the pleasure of the flowers.
Her voice gave rapture to the song of the birds.
The joys of the world have departed with her to Paradise.

And Guinevere and Sir Lancelot went on their way, considering the sad estate of this desolate lover, and again the lady spoke and said: ‘What say ye, sir knight? Will ye still be so hardy as to praise this love that bringeth men into so piteous a case! Heard ye not how he spoke, saying that all joys had departed with the lady that death has taken from him?’

‘Lady,’ said he, ‘there shall come a day when ye shall understand well that, albeit lovers may die and perish, yet love remaineth ever immortal, since no pangs of death may ever assail him.’ And a second time Guinevere looked gently on Sir Lancelot, and in her heart she had him in right good liking.

After this fashion Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere passed through the regions of Britain, till they drew near to Camelot, where King Arthur held his court with his Knights of the Round Table. And as they paced through the Forest of Dendreath they could see through the boughs of the trees the open country shining before them, and Sir Lancelot said: ‘Lady, in a day’s journey we shall come to Camelot, and there shall we find King Arthur and all his Knights of the Round Table, and the ladies of his court, and the saint that shall make you King Arthur’s queen.’ And she knew not what she should have said to this, and her heart grew sad and then she bethought her of an old tale and matter of wizardry, or so men say. And she gazed at the trees of the wood, searching for a tree that she knew of; and as they came to the wood’s verge she saw her desire, and broke off a little bough from a wych-elm that grew by the way. Then she has broken this bough in twain, and one she has hidden about her, and the other she has given to the knight, saying: ‘I wit well that all of my lord’s knights are men of truth and gentle dealing, and I think that of them all ye be not the least.

Wherefore, whatsoever ye swear to me, sure am I that ye will perform your oath and keep it, and never gainsay it not so long as ye live.’

‘Ye say rightly, lady. What will ye that I swear to you?’

‘I will have you swear that evermore while ye be quick and in this life ye keep this bough that I give you, for to be a token of this wayfaring and of my wedding of my lord, King Arthur.’

‘So shall it be, very willingly,’ and Lancelot swore this by holy rood. Then at the end of their way they came to high Camelot, the golden and glorious city of King Arthur, and by the high saint were King Arthur and the Lady Guinevere made man and wife.

There was a day when Queen Guinevere, that now is married to King Arthur, sat with her ladies in her bower, and they were at sport, devising of certain flowers, that were their lovers, and of their divers properties. Said one damosel: ‘I know a rose-tree that rises not too tall, and it grows in a low garden, and four shining waters are about this garden, and five lions keep watch over this garden, and six thorns there be on this rose-tree, and one blossom only. Tell me where my rose is hidden.’ Then, by computing of numbers, the other ladies made out the name of a knight and spoke it, and they all laughed with glee; and so sped their sport very merrily. But all the while the Queen sat silent, and she looked out of the window of the high tower, and saw far away the green trees in the wood, and the road by which she had passed from Cameliard to Camelot. And whereas her ladies spoke of flowers and of the knights their lovers, so her thoughts fell on the bough of the wychelm which she had broken with Lancelot; and fervently did she desire the love of this knight in her heart. Then did she wholly burn, then did her heart become as a coal of fire, and forthwith she went apart and wrote a scroll, and sent the writing to one that dwelt in Camelot, being a man reputed a sorcerer and a great clerk in art magic. So it fell out that Guinevere stole away in the night-time, and came to a hidden place in a wood that was near to Camelot, and there the wizard had already his cauldron of sorcery and incantation. And he had made set about this cauldron a ring of fires, and a shining smoke went up from the vessel as it were quick glass, and within the ring you might see divers puppets and images in wax and in wood, shamefully devised and foully wrought, having on their foreheads and their breasts the signs and marks of the devils of hell and of the cursed gods and goddesses of heathen men, and with the wizard there was a lad that all the while made the fires to burn with spices and gums of Satan, and a black smoke rose up from these flames. Then came the Queen into the ring, and at the wizard’s bidding she doffed all her clothes and stood naked by the cauldron, and so she dipped the elm wand into the bubbling of the cauldron, right as the wizard commanded her. Forthwith ye might hear a noise and a rushing sound amongst the black branches and thickets of the wood, the great boughs of the trees tossed one on other, and said the wizard: ‘Now, madam, the Hosts of the Air draw near; now is at hand the Army of Tzabaoth.’ Then, in the shimmering and in the shining of the glassy smoke that rose from the cauldron there showed the shapes of the Mighty Ones, and to the Mightiest did Guinevere there make offering of herself; and, this done, ‘Now,’ said the wizard, ‘is the time come.’ Then drew forth Queen Guinevere the wych-bough from its place and again dipped it down three times into the cauldron of incantation and drew it forth, saying:

One was one in the wood,

On the tree of old enchantment; One was made twain in the wood,

A word of wisdom was uttered.
Now, one calleth to one,
One tree cannot be dissevered.
By the sign of union
Let the parted be joined together.

Then, with the great word of incantation, the lady made the sign, and forth came flying in the air Sir Lancelot, in his ghostly body. And from that night Sir Lancelot, that was the flower and crown of all King Arthur’s warriors, durst nor deny the Queen Guinevere in anything, but loved her from that time forth.

Now at that time it is to be understood that Camelot was the wonder and prize of all the cities in the Isle of Britain, nay, of the whole world. For, like that city of Syon, it was set on a high hill, and encompassed on every side by rich gardens and bowers of delight and orchards and pleasure places. And on high were the palaces of the warriors and the choirs and altars of the saints, and the most lordly palace of the Emperor Arthur, as it were a mountain on a mountain. And here were assembled all the rarities and precious things of the whole world, and all the instruments of wisdom, and all the books in which the secret things were written, which Merlin had gathered together from all the coasts of the world. In this city did Sir Lancelot and the Queen have their pleasure and delight and dalliance, and by art magic no eye could discern their pleasures, while they lived in wantonness. And ever Sir Lancelot, that was a loyal knight in his heart, must grieve and mourn for his piteous transgression against his lord, and ever must he weep and lament in his chamber for this mortal sin, and ever must he strive that it be put from him. Yet, by virtue of the spell and by the cauldron of incantation, he was without succour and relief, and what the Queen would that must he do. And it fell out that one night he strove against the word of incantation and magic, and it was as if his heart was bursten within him, and down fell he on the floor of his chamber, as though he were stark dead. Then came his squire, and to him it seemed that the spirit was departed from Sir Lancelot, and he made a lamentable crying, and still Sir Lancelot lay there like a dead man. And when the life returned to him he that was the mightiest of all King Arthur’s Knights of the Round Table was, as it were, a little child, and no strength nor virtue was there left in his body. And while he lay there, there came without his window one of Guinevere’s damsels, taught by the Queen, and thus she sang to him:

All through the nightertale I longed for thee, In loneliness, and harkened for the door To open, or a footstep on the floor.

O lief sweetheart, I pray thee pity me, I hunger for thy kisses evermore; All through the nightertale I longed for thee.

Delight is turned to woe, and misery Is my solace, certes, my heart is sore, Yet these poor lips a smile at morning bore, Though all the nightertale I longed for thee.

Wherefore henceforth Sir Lancelot strove no more, but lived deliciously in the golden meshes of the Queen’s desires. And so to them twain the fruits of the orchards of Camelot were as apples of Avalon and golden delights, and the gardens were as walks of Paradise, and the feasts in King Arthur’s hall were like the perpetual entertainment of the Blessed and Venerable Head of Bran Vendigeid, and the singing of the birds was as the song of the Three Fairy Birds of Rhiannon.

And one year King Arthur kept the feast of Pentecost at Camelot, as his custom was for the most part, and thirteen churches were set apart wherein King Arthur and his court heard mass. And afterwards, when they were in hall, suddenly there fell a silence, and each man looked on other and was afraid. Then there was a noise like thunder, and the roof was all afire; and then they heard in that place a melody as of the choirs of Paradise and the rejoicing of the angels, and ye would have said that there was an odour in that hall as of all the spicery of the world. And all the knights fell down on their knees together, and they saw as it were a hand pass from one end of the hall to the other and go forth; and the hand bore up the holy and blessed Vessel of the Sangraal, wrapt about in veils of red samite, and there was a shining of light that made the sun darkness; and to Sir Lancelot, because of his deadly sin, it was as if a sword had pierced his body, for his flesh began to tremble when he beheld the spiritual things. Yet he might not put his sin from him, but ever again returned to his dalliance with the Queen, for the spell that she had set upon him could not yet be broken.

Now, with the passing of the years, it happened that the bough of wych-elm that Queen Guinevere had severed in the wood withered and shrank, and, though the Queen and Sir Lancelot might keep each their portion never so well, the leaves that were on the boughs fell ff. And when a leaf fell off then it vanished away, and as it vanished there flew forth a great bird, black as a coal; and these birds perched on the trees of the wood, and cried out as men passed by, 'Guinevere is the leman of Sir Lancelot.' And so this sin could no longer be covered, and all the court of King Arthur had knowledge of these birds and of what their message was, and some believed it and some not, but all looked strangely on Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere. And it fell out at last that Guinevere took out her portion of the bough and set it before her, counting the leaves that remained; and suddenly she must go forth from her chamber to sit in hall; and by ill chance she had forgotten the bough, so that one of her damsels cometh in, and seeing it, casteth it into the fire. And in that moment was Sir Lancelot set free from the virtue of the enchantment and the wizardry that had been done upon him; and in that moment came the lad that had prepared the fires of the sorcery, and confessed all to the King, and the report of this was made known to all the city of Camelot. Then the anger of King Arthur was like to burning of fire, and he sent ten knights, that were the mightiest that he had, to waylay Sir Lancelot, that they might slay him forthwith and hew his body in pieces. So these knights went forth, and they came upon Sir Lancelot as he walked in his garden, and he had no arms, but only a short sword, upon him. Then they cried: 'Now shall ye surely die, thou foul and disloyal knight, for the deep dishonour that ye have done our lord the King,' and they ran at him to kill him But for their mail five of them did he leave for dead in that garden, since he was the most valorous and most mightiest of all knights that ever have been in this world; and so the five knights that were left in life fled away from before Sir Lancelot. Then would Sir Lancelot endeavour to bring forth the Queen harmless, but he might not, she was so closely kept; and so Sir Lancelot fled forth from Camelot, and gathered his kinsfolk about him, if haply he might deliver the Queen from prison. For Arthur swore that for wizardry and disloyalty she should be burnt. But afterward King Arthur repented of his oath, and Guinevere dwelt, as all men know, in an abbey of nuns at Amesbury, and in due time was Sir Lancelot hallowed Bishop of Canterbury. And so, having repented of their sins, they both departed from this life: on whose souls may God have pity.

SHAKESPEARE AND SHAKESPERE

I ONCE READ an amusing story about Charles Kingsley and Dean Stanley. Kingsley had a letter from Stanley, and was observed to be poring over it with twisted brows all through breakfast-time. At last, after half-an-hour's study, he turned and said: 'I am sure that his letter of Stanley's is full of the dearest things, but so far I can only read one word, and that looks like 'damn.'

'However, so far as I know, no critic has advanced the opinion that 'Stanley,' the illegible correspondent, must have been a different man from 'Stanley,' the cultured author. And yet Mr G. G. Greenwood, M.P., author of 'In re Shakespeare: Beeching v. Greenwood,' has said that 'It is hardy possible to conceive that the poems and plays were written in William Shakespere's illegible, illiterate scrawl.' This remark was in Mr Greenwood's Shakespeare Problem Re-stated. In this 'Rejoinder' to Canon Beeching he hardly sticks to his guns and hardly abandons them. And, personally, I cannot quite understand how a point which is demonstrably of no earthly importance should have been made at all. And I confess that I do not think that Mr Greenwood is much happier in his other arguments. Shakespeare or 'Shake-speare,' he says, is just the sort of name to serve as a pseudonym. Why? Are pseudonyms usually 'pictorial' names? Are authors with pictorial names — such as Ashmole and Bacon — to be suspected of imposture? Again, there is the question of 'dirty Stratford.' Mr Greenwood admits that the dirtiness signifies nothing. Why, then, did he mention it? Because it is 'one of the few known facts of Shakespere's life.' But it is not one of the significant facts of Shakspere's life. The 'reeking pile of filth' at the front door of the house in Henley Street is in no sense illative; it stands in no possible or thinkable relation to the 'Venus and Adonis 'or to the 'Sonnets.' And Shakespeare was 'a rustic.' Well, and Burns was a rustic, and Keats was a Cockney, and Hogg was a shepherd, and Boswell was a drunken and dissolute laird, and Tennyson did not take his degree, and Dickens lived in squalid purlieus and stuck labels on blacking-bottles, and Borrow was a vagabond, and Poe was a wastrel, and Zola was 'ploughed' for his Baccalauréat! And what then? Does Mr Greenwood think that the world’s masterpieces are necessarily written by University dons, people of fashion, and members of the Athenæum Club? Shakespeare was a call-boy, or a prompter, or a super, when he came up to London. Certainly; and Chaucer was in the Customs, and Lamb was a clerk, and Dickens — the blacking business over — was a newspaper reporter, and Coleridge enlisted in the Army. Ergo! Really; if it be necessary for Mr Greenwood’s thesis to beat up such ‘arguments’ as these, the case against the identity of the ‘rustic’ and play-actor with the playwright must be weak indeed.

A NEW YEAR MEDITATION

I WANT TO enter into competition with Mr Sherlock Holmes — or rather, perhaps, with M. Dupin, the great detective of Poe's imagination. We all know, of course, that if we placed before either of these personages a little tooth-powder, a bunch of violets, and the Hypnerotomachia Poliphili we should immediately arrive at the most astounding and unexpected results; and so I hope to deduce odd conclusions from three recent events, all chronicled in the daily paper. In the first place, Mr H. G. Wells has published his novel, The War in the Air, wherein we are instructed that the whole fabric of civilisation is destined to utter destruction and ruin. Secondly, the yearly address delivered at the meeting of the Egypt Exploration Fund showed that in prehistoric times the Egyptians kept pet dogs, whose bodies have been found braceleted about the legs with ivory, whose teeth show traces of overfeeding and systematic pampering. Thirdly, that records of the Birmingham Police Court have dealt quite lately with the adventures of five boys charged with breaking into a number of houses at Harborne. 'Their abode,' said the police, 'was a cave which they had constructed at Florida, a lonely district near Harborne Golf Links. Investigations showed the cave to be partly a natural declivity and partly an ingeniously constructed hut, formed of interlaced boughs. Grass and soil laid on the top formed a perfectly rainproof roof. This was supported by stout balks of timber. The walls and floor of the hut had been carefully lined with straw.'

Now, I submit that these three items of news, incongruous as they may seem, have, in spite of all appearances, a certain relation to one another. To take Mr Wells's book in the first place. I do not know, nor do I suppose that Mr Wells knows, the precise manner and fashion in which the present structure of things which we call Modern Civilisation will be reduced to dust and ashes, but we may be sure that somehow or other the fabric of our social order will sooner or later come thundering to the ground; commerce and manufactures, machines and great cities, economic systems, means of communication — all these things are destined to pass away as the old empires with their civilisation have passed away. The world will go into the melting-pot again, and the great breakup which followed the decline of the Roman Empire will be repeated in a very different form. But in a certain way the results will be similar. A highly artificial state of things will be succeeded by a barbarous and natural state of things. Perhaps a man who wants a knife will not be able to buy one in Oxford Street or in Bond Street, for the reason that both streets will be heaps of ruins overgrown by trees and flowers. The man in need of a knife will be obliged to make it himself as best he can; and it is likely enough that the man incapable of making knives (or spears or swords) will find himself hopelessly handicapped, and doomed to perish. In a word, the arts and crafts will be born again in a world where dilettantism has, perforce, ceased to exist — in a world of sincerities. There will be painting in this new world, as in the old; but nobody will be inspired to paint pictures of fox-terriers capering about a little girl and a Persian kitten. Poetry will be rude enough, but it will be the expression of sheer ecstasy, not to be repressed or controlled; people will dance, but they will not waltz; there will be strange songs, but no musical comedies.

It may be said that it is impossible to prophesy; but I think that this opinion is mistaken. I think that the instance of these prehistoric pets of prehistoric Egyptians — one instance of many possible instances — shows that humanity, in spite of surface changes for good or bad, is radically immutable. There is, I know, a sort of assumption, usually rather implied than expressed as a definite proposition, that modern man is really a different creature from medieval man or ancient man or prehistoric man; that a cabbage has somehow or other turned into a rose-tree — or, if you like, that a rose-tree has become a mangelwurzel. For the last hundred years or more one has encountered this ‘transformation-scene’ hypothesis or assumption; some people will date the beginning of the miracle from the fall of Constantinople, others from the Reformation, others from the French Revolution. And yet — to take the last date of transmutation — I have met peasants who don’t care twopence for M. le Curé, and spend considerable sums with ‘le grand divin’ when their cattle are out of sorts. And I suppose that ‘palmists’ and astrologers gain a very pretty living from the pockets of well-educated people in the London of today. Then there is another region: one has heard that the reign of brute force is over. But if that is the case it seems a pity to waste such a lot of money on ‘Dreadnoughts’ and ‘Invincibles’ and ‘Collingwoods.’ No, it seems to me that humanity is always humanity. It may be bound down by all kinds of conventions; it may be caged up by every sort of rule and regulation; but it remains unaltered, both for good and for evil. The lion of the Zoo is essentially the lion of the desert. This may be demonstrated by the simple and pleasing experiment of throwing open the gates of his cage.

Probably the boys who recently appeared before the Birmingham magistrates were the children of comparatively well-to-do parents; they were burglars and cave-dwellers not from necessity, but from choice. The boys ‘bolted’ to the best of their ability from civilisation; they made their own house instead of the houses that had been made for them; they won their own food by their own wit: they returned, in a word, as far as they were able, to the primitive state. A most interesting example. It shows that the secret has been kept; that in spite of the yearly, monthly, hourly work of the enormous machine that we call civilisation the human spirit yet remains, unchanged and unchangeable, ready, when the opportunity occurs, to wipe out all the lines that have been ruled for it, and to write again the ancient hieroglyphics in place of the modern commercial hand. No doubt those Birmingham boys will get into sad trouble, since so long as the present social structure endures our larders must be protected; and yet in their doings I find grounds for a great optimism. For the whole note of our modern civilisation is that everybody is engaged in ‘dry-nursing’ everybody else, and the dry-nursing is all done by machinery. Now, the fact is that man’s happiness really depends on the exercise of his creative faculties, of the power given him of making all sorts of things with his own brains and his own hands; and some have hoped and many have feared that those faculties were becoming more and more atrophied, so that in a hundred years or so nine-tenths of the human race would be unable to do anything beyond touching an electric button. And if this were really the truth, we can see that the inevitable collapse of modern civilisation would lead to the extinction of a hopeless and a helpless race.

The secret, as I say, has been well kept through centuries of mechanical oppression; in the heart of man there is still the desire of making, of inventing, of creating. At first in the new age the faculty will be utilitarian; the spear to kill the game and the pot to cook it in will be the things needful. But the spear will be a real spear made out of the man’s own head; it will not be a feeble, second-hand copy of some spear made three thousand years ago. And the maker of pots will have no South Kensington Museum to go to, so that he may imitate, very badly, pots that cooked Trojan dinners during the great siege. And from this compulsory sincerity and from the desire of the beautiful and the wonderful that is part of man's unalterable nature will rise the new art, the new literature, and the new music.

CASUISTRY

I HAVE ALWAYS sympathised with Count Smorltork. Mr Pickwick, it will be remembered, uttered the dictum, 'The word politics, sir, comprises in itself a difficult study of no inconsiderable magnitude.' And the Count, drawing out his tablets, began to write: 'Politics. The word poltic surprises by himself.' The Count had not, perhaps, quite penetrated to the root of the matter; but had Mr Pickwick? And have any of us achieved the feat in question? I, at all events, am ready to confess that I am in comparative, if not positive darkness; and my perplexity has been rather increased than diminished by reading a report of Professor Pollard's recent lecture on Politics and Character, delivered before the London Institution. Here, for instance, is a sentence from the report in question:

> He (Professor Pollard) had no hesitation in saying that it would be a man's duty to tell a lie if thereby he could save his country from a great disaster.

And in the margin of the paper a friend of mine has scribbled:

> The party politician easily defines 'a great disaster' as the defeat of his own candidate or fad at the polls.

Exactly; and so we seem to arrive at the proposition that any politician may tell any lie that will benefit his party.

Which is as much as to say that politicians are exempt from all the rules of morality. For if a lie is allowable, why not a theft? Suppose the existence of certain documents to be dangerous in the highest degree to the programme — nay, to the very existence of the Blues or the Reds. Now we have already granted the premiss that on the success of the Blues — or the Reds — depends the spiritual, moral, and material salvation of England; surely, therefore, it follows on Professor Pollard's showing that it is a duty to steal the documents in question, if it can be done without scandal. Again, let us put the case that the success of the Reds largely depends on the high moral reputation of X, the Red leader, with a numerous class of the community. Clearly, it is the duty of the Blues — to whom the success of the Reds is 'a great disaster' — to involve X in the most horrible scandal that can be arranged. Suppose X to be a fervent teetotaller, to depend largely on teetotal support. Then it is the business of the Blues, through some discreet and trusty agent, to contrive that X shall be seen dead drunk in Piccadilly at the height of the season. Or again, Y, the champion of the Blues, may have quite innocently involved himself in a chain of incidents which one little word can render utterly and conclusively damning to his reputation; it is, obviously, the Reds' duty to insert that fatal word, and so to deliver England from 'a great disaster.' And thus we may run pretty well through the range of the Ten Commandments and arrive at the conclusion that the politician is absolved from all obedience to the moral law. You may lie, you may steal, you may bear false witness; nay, you can commit murder. It was the Royalists of the seventeenth century, oddly enough, who quoted the assassination of Cæsar by Brutus as an example to be followed — Cromwell, of course, being Cæsar. And on the other hand, I am sure that many of us at the present day would be ready to maintain that the murders of Charles I and Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette were, to say the least, highly excusable. The Good of the People is the Supreme Law. Of course, and anyone not utterly brutish or utterly insane must be aware that it is only Our Party which works or can work for the Good of the People. Therefore, Our Party is at perfect liberty to commit what crimes it pleases, so long as these crimes seem likely to secure its ascendancy.

And, it may be asked, what does this lead to? The conclusion is obviously monstrous — no one believes that it would be right to dope Mr Balfour's tea or to knock Mr Lloyd George on the head, however grave one's conviction of the political mischievousness of the one or the other. What, then, is the truth of the matter? Let us take one point of view — that of absolute ethics; let us deny Professor Pollard's position right out without mincing matters, and say that it is in no circumstances whatever lawful to tell a lie or to commit any other direct sin for any good result whatever. This is a splendid position; we can all approve of it and a pretty pickle it would lead us into. Suppose you are on a lonely road at night, and a woman flies past you and turns to the right. Three minutes later comes a ruffian with a revolver, and asks with imprecations which way the woman went. Are you going to say, To the right, and take care of the quarry in the second field just by the stile'? surely not, unless you are a murderer. You may refuse to give any information whatever? Certainly, if you have the courage of martyrdom. It would be easy to construct dozens of such cases to show that again and again, not only in politics but in the whole course of life, men are confronted by such enigmas, are faced by the choice, not between guilt and innocence, but between a minor evil and a major evil. Put again a political case: Suppose yourself to be aware that your reader is an unscrupulous ruffian, who has committed actions which would lead to his instant expulsion from any decent pothouse where his offence was known. You are to expose him! Yes; and with his ruin, which would inevitably follow, would come the ruin of the whole series of good laws which you are convinced would make the desert of modern life blossom like the rose, which, let us say, would redeem many children from early death, and rescue many men and women from Life-long misery and degradation. No; the problem is indeed a difficult one. I am sure that there is no absolute solution. It is one of the privileges and the paradoxes which constitute the position of man that he can ask many questions to which there is no one clear and definite and absolute answer. We cannot understand Space and Time, and yet we cannot deny Space and Time. Either way we seem driven to absurdity.

I suppose that the only possible answer is to be found in accommodation, which is Latin for making the best of a bad business. Take this specific instance of Politics and Ethics. Personally, I am inclined to conclude that the vast mass of humbug, and 'inexactitude,' and exaggeration, and bearing of false witness, and downright malignant lying which seems inseparable from modern democratic politics, is, in fact, the reductio ad absurdum (or ad iniquitatem) of democracy: a practical demonstration that the theory of democracy, however charming and logical it may be as pure theory, is virtually and intrinsically false. A cynic once said that the main difference between the old regime and the new in France was this, that whereas of old corruption was the privilege of the few, now it had become the delight of the multitude. This is extreme, but it is not to be denied that while one factory chimney is ugly, a thousand such chimneys, smoking all together, shut out the sun and constitute a grievous pestilence. So, while it may be very bad for the individual courtier to tell lies to the individual despot, it may be much worse when the whole nation enters, as it were, the great market of lies — which is modern politics — and buys and sells falsehood wholesale.

Or, there is another solution; I do not know whether it will be found more tolerable. This is to be sought in the confession that very few actions can be pronounced wholly bad, apart from the circumstances of each individual case; that a lie may be a sacred duty, that the killing of a fellow-creature may be a sacred duty, that to bear false witness against one's neighbour may be a sacred duty, or — at the worst — a very venial sin. And this solution is the solution of casuistry — of making distinctions, of weighing circumstances — of readjusting one's ethical balance a dozen times a day. 'Oh, casuistry!' people say, with a vague yet intense shudder, as if every iniquity was comprehended in that word. But how about the soldier who levels his rifle against the enemy of his king and country in the day of battle? How about the man who smashes the skull of the ruffian who has attacked his wife or his child? It is written, plain enough, 'Thou shalt not kill,' and no less a man than Tolstoy holds to the letter of the law. Are we prepared to follow him — into a region of intolerable and indeed wicked absurdity?

SUPERSTITION — OR INSTINCT

WHAT IS SUPERSTITION? The word is in common use enough, but I suppose a good many of us would find ourselves in some difficulty if we were suddenly called upon for a precise definition. The old Latin dictionary explanation, ‘Excessive fear of the gods,’ is hardly satisfactory, since the superstitious are often profoundly irreligious; and I remember a character in a novel who hung on the words of the late Mr Bradlaugh, and shuddered at the thought of spilling the salt. As a matter of fact John o’ London and Thormanby have defined the word by example: a superstition is a conventional belief of which we can give no reasonable account. To this category we may refer the horror of salt-spilling and of walking under ladders, the trust in the caul, and the like; in none of these cases is there any obvious or ascertainable connection whatever between cause and effect.

There are many beliefs, which the strictly ‘scientific’ mind would call superstitious, which are not really superstitious at all. Only the other day an aunt of mine, in whose veracity I have the most profound confidence, told me the following story, which, I may add, rests on corroborative evidence: Some sixty years ago the aunt in question, having just come home for the holidays, was looking forward to a short visit to a friendly family. Two days before the visit she noticed that her mother looked disturbed in the morning; the day before the visit her mother announced that they were not going to the Garth. No reason was forthcoming, but on the very night of their proposed arrival there was a tropical thunderstorm, the wells in the hills burst and flooded over, the Garth was overwhelmed, and every soul in it perished. Then my grandmother explained that for two nights running she had woke up from sleep with the words Do not go to the Garth ringing in her ears.

In this case the event proved clearly enough that it would have been ‘superstitious’ — or foolish, at all events — to have disregarded the warning voice; and yet, in a somewhat similar instance, also authentic, the omen was obeyed and led its victims to destruction. A few years ago a husband and wife put off their holiday from the Tuesday to the Thursday. They were going to the Channel Islands, if I remember rightly, and on the Monday night: the wife dreamed that she saw the boat wrecked on the rocks. She told her friends, and she and her husband sailed on the Thursday. It was the Thursday boat that was wrecked, and they were amongst the lost. It would be very difficult, it seems to me, to form a plausible theory of this message that went so fatally astray, that was delivered to the destruction of the recipients. But I believe that research would show that many of these ‘warnings’ are purposeless, or accidental. The Cornish farmer’s dream, twice repeated, of the assassination of Mr Perceval did not save the statesman’s life. Perhaps it is sheer accident which allows us these momentary glimpses of that mysterious region in which there is neither past nor future — only an Everlasting Now.

But, to return to superstition properly so called, to beliefs and practices which seem wholly devoid of rational justification, which are not patient of any theory, however wild: are we to regard the superstitious man as a person who has retained certain fragments of a lost knowledge? A friend of mine holds this theory; he totally rejects the explanations of the Rationalists. He rejects the doctrine of the paint-pot on the ladder and the doctrine of the ancient scarcity of salt; he will have none of the notion that a first tenancy is unlucky, because a brand-new house is often damp. But he takes his stand on the ground that it is always safest to obey the rules of the superstitious game, because superstitions may eventually turn out to be true and well based, though at present we have not the remotest knowledge of their basis.

Many years ago, before the dawn of modern chemistry, old wives used to say that a certain kind of seaweed cured goitre. The faculty of medicine laughed; there was no possible reason why goitre should be cured by seaweed. I do not know how the doctors treated the malady; most likely they followed the famous advice given in Molière’s Interlude. But in process of time it was discovered that the seaweed of the old women was full of iodine, and iodine is undoubtedly good for goitre. But for how many centuries before iodine was thought of had the seaweed worked its ‘irrational’ cures?

Now it may be that there is a very strong analogy between this circumstance and many popular superstitions; there may be a real procession of cause and effect in the latter case as in the former. At present one cannot see the remotest connection between spilling sat and misfortune; still, it is possible that the connection exists, and that to one's descendants it may seem the merest commonplace of the most ordinary common sense. But personally I incline to the theory of a survival from the remotest dawn of human history — perhaps even from a period still more remote. Is it not possible that 'superstition' may be a corrupted and fragmentary survival of the 'instincts' of our half-human, half-bestial ancestor?

Of course, I abandon the attempt to work out the theory. I believe the best scientific authorities have frowned on the well-known doctrine as to certain dreams common to most of us — those dreams which end terribly enough with a fall from a fearful height. It has been surmised that this is an inherited recollection of a prehistoric fall from one bough to another; but this, it seems, is an explanation that we must not receive. But perhaps we may imagine a tradition, broken and inconsequent doubtless, passed on from those unimaginable beings who were our first fathers to 'articulate-speaking men,' as Homer calls them, and not void even in our time, but existent still, and yet powerful in a certain degree in these days of swarming suburbs and fields that bear streets, as if it were mushrooms, in a night.

Perhaps, then, in our very midst today, even in this generation that rides in motor cars and writes to the daily paper, beneath the common characters of common life there are discernible the shadowy marks of a most ancient language; so that the morning paper is itself a sort of palimpsest. Who knows what strong reasons there might not have been 'once upon a time' against entering a newly discovered cave? And was the ladder once a man-trap?

I remember a curious case of superstition that came under my own notice. An acquaintance of mine, a very well-known littérateur, was a devout believer in astrology, who lived, let us say, in Barnes, and was happy in that agreeable district. However, he experienced some sort of uneasiness, whether of body or spirit I know not, and promptly consulted his star-gazer-in-chief. He was advised that the south of London was highly dangerous to him, that the north-west district meant salvation, and forthwith the Wisdom of the Chaldees drove my acquaintance to some street near Maida Vale, a neighbourhood which he detested most profoundly!

It may be very absurd to believe that the advent of a black cat means good luck. Personally I have no doubt on this point, since by this very event I was translated from penury to (comparative) opulence at a certain Christmastide a few years ago. I had asked a friend to dinner on Christmas Day, and if I had been asked how I proposed to entertain him I expect I should have replied in the spirit of Marcel in the Scènes de la Vie de Bohème. The landlord of the unfurnished rooms saw that his new lodger had no furniture, and observed, naturally enough: ‘Au moins vous avez un lit? Sur quoi reposez-vous?’ The reply was: ‘Monsieur, je me repose sur la Providence!’ Anyhow, it looked like a banquet of bread and cheese; then came the black cat, and in his train abundance. I leave the curious reader to work out for himself any possible connection between black cats and the prehistoric equivalents of Burgundy and banking accounts.

IMAGINATION AND HEALTH

THE OTHER DAY I read some remarkable statistics. They were given by the President of the British Pharmaceutical Conference, and they relate to the wonderful increase in the consumption of Patent medicines. Here they are:

The amount expended in remedies of this description in the years mentioned was approximately as follows: 1860, £350,000; 1870, £580,000; 1880, £1,080,000; 1890, £1,740,000; 1900, £2,310,000; 1907, £2,620,000. Reckoning the population of the British Isles at about twenty-three millions in 1860, and thirty-nine millions in 1906, it followed that the amount spent in patent medicines per head is now five times as great as it was half a century ago.

Each of us, therefore, takes five bottles of medicine instead of the one bottle that contented our fathers and mothers; and let it be remembered that these doses leave out of account all medicine save the ‘proprietary’ sort. Besides the bottles and boxes that are bought at the chemist’s, we must take into account all the physicians’ prescriptions that are made up, all the drugs that the ‘surgeon and apothecary’ dispenses in the course of his practice, all the ‘tabloids’ and ‘tablets’ and ‘pilules’ of ascertained contents that so many of us prescribe for ourselves, and, in country places, the medicaments of the herbalist, and even the herbs which are still gathered and dried for healing purposes by labouring folk. One has no idea of the ‘dem’d total,’ but its size must be enormous; we are consuming whole oceans of liquid, whole mountains of solid medicine. And I believe that the public health is better than it was fifty years ago. What is the explanation? Are we stronger because we take so much medicine, or do we take so much medicine because, in spite of an improved bill of health, we are more frightened of disease, more anxious about the welfare of our bodies than of old?

Those who mingle their drugs with some tincture of psychology are aware that a ten-ounce bottle may sometimes contain strange ingredients — ingredients that would escape the most subtle analysis of the Pharmaceutical Society. I was once staying with a country doctor, and one morning, after opening his letters, my friend came out of the surgery with what I can only call a grin of embarrassment on his face. He explained that he had just heard from a patient to the effect that 'that new green medicine has done me a lot of good; it suits me ever so much better than that pink stuff. Please send me another bottle of the green.' The doctor then told me what had happened: in sending out his medicines he had mixed up his 'pink patient' and his 'green patient,' if one may call them so. One colour was, we will say, for indigestion, the other for catarrh. Still, the pink man undoubtedly felt better for his green dose. I never heard whether the individual with the bad cold derived great benefit from the indigestion mixture. But it is quite possible that he did.

And here is another case which also came within my own experience. Once upon a time there was a corn merchant who had a shop somewhere near Drury Lane. Outside the shop, in little bins or receptacles, samples of the various kinds of grain were exposed to view, and small boys who passed by were in many cases unable to resist the temptation of clutching handfuls of corn. The enraged proprietor would rush out with fury stamped on his countenance; the small boy would fly, shrieking insult and opprobrium. At last one of these imps was caught in the very act and circumstance of felonious grain-snatching; he was held tight by the collar while the man of the shop informed him that his doom would be swift and horrible. The corn-merchant led his prisoner forthwith to a neighbouring chemist's shop, and whispered something to the two assistants. These immediately busied themselves in horrid preparations, and presently the wretched boy was handed a goblet, on which fearsome and cabalistic characters were graven. It contained a clear, colourless liquid. 'Now, drink that, you young rascal,' said the dealer, 'and you'll find it a dose that you won't forget to the day of your death.' The liquid was swallowed, and the boy left the shop; he was already green, and his limbs tottered beneath him. And the next day that lad's mother came round in fury, bringing with her an inspector of police from the adjoining Bow Street. Her son, she said, had all but died in the night; a giant's dose had been administered to him in that shop, and she would have the law of the chemist. And the two apothe-

Imagination and Health caries explained that the grim goblet had held no other drug or gum or medicament than pure distilled water!

Now, the curious point is that both my friend the doctor and my friend the apothecary were in the strictest sense of the terms wizards and magicians. The doctor was a ‘white’ wizard, the chemist a wizard pure and simple. And what I want to know is whether the law of England allows the Lieges to be slain by black magic? The Act — or Acts — against witchcraft was repealed in the thirties of the eighteenth century — Dr Johnson was a young man of twenty-five or thereabouts — so I suppose that if the corn-stealing urchin had actually died no indictment would have lain against the chemist. The rationale of each case is one and the same; the imagination of the doctor’s patient was seized and possessed by the strange green colour of his new bottle of medicine; he was convinced that such queer-looking stuff must be a potent producer of health; he drank, and felt much better. In the other case the imagination was attacked more forcibly; the spell of the chemist’s shop, of the strange glass, of the threatening words, transmuted the pure water into something very like a poison, and the result was as we have seen. So it seems to me that the repeal of those Witchcraft Acts was an affair of questionable wisdom. And I think that we should not speak slightingly of a great and mysterious part of our nature. We are in the habit of saying, ‘Oh, that is all imagination,’ or, That was only imagination.’ But if this imagination can cure or kill, it must be a somewhat important thing after all.

But here there arises a very important question: What is the strength of this power of the imagination; is it possible to measure it? I suppose not; we can lay down no rules, for the reason that the imagination is a variable and varying quality. The lower degrees of the imagination are so evident in their effects; every doctor knows that a cheerful patient, a man who thinks that he is going to get well, has an infinitely better chance than a man who is frightened and despondent. Is it not, then, reasonable to suppose that a power which all of us, or nearly all of us, possess in a slight degree has been or may be raised to x — to an infinitely high degree? Many of us can write verse of a sort and a few of us can write Hamlet, the Divine Comedy, and Lycidas. With a pencil and a bit of paper a child of five can draw something which is recognisable as an attempt to portray the human figure, or a tree; at the other end of the scale are Velasquez and Turner. The physical scientist would say, I suppose, that no imaginative power on earth can help or hinder the operation of strychnine or carbolic acid taken into the system; and I wonder whether he is right, though I am quite sure that I should not like to confute him by the way of personal experiment. I believe, however, that Mr Andrew Lang is convinced that under certain conditions fire does not burn. And if that be so, I should be inclined to think that there may be conditions in which prussic acid does not kill.

ENGLAND AND REVOLUTION

WHEN ROBESPIERRE WAS a young man he was, I believe, an ecclesiastical judge — what is known in England as a bishop's 'official' — and in course of time a person guilty of some capital offence was brought before him for judgement. And, so great was the tenderness of the young lawyer's heart, that, rather than pronounce sentence of death, Robespierre resigned his office, became an idealist politician — and drowned Paris in the blood of his victims. And this story of Robespierre illustrates fairly enough one of the main theses of Mr W. Lawler Wilson's The Menace of Socialism. Mr Wilson has many alarming predictions to make — he tells us that all Socialistic systems, beginning with the reduction of the rich to poverty, must assuredly end in the reduction of the poor to beggary — but he insists, above all, on the fact that the benevolence and philanthropy of Socialist words are the infallible forerunners of ferocious and bloody Socialist deeds. You begin, he says, by professing an almost ecstatic enthusiasm for your brother man's welfare, and you end by plunging a pike into your brother man's breast.

It would be impossible competently to review The Menace of Socialism in the course of a brief article. The subject is too vast, and the author's treatment of his matter is complex. But I will try to indicate in a few words the whole scheme of Mr Wilson's book, and to notice some special points which have struck me. Mr Wilson begins, then, by giving various definitions of Socialism, Communism, Collectivism, and Anarchism. He traces the rise of each and all of these forms of political thought to the French Revolution of 1789, which, according to his thesis, he describes as essentially economic in its final ends; he shows the revolutionary, or Socialist, spirit asleep during the Napoleonic period, and again roused at the Revolution of 1830. This rising, he declares, was essentially 'red' in its origin, but it was skilfully diverted into other channels by the cautious bourgeoisie. Then he takes us to the period of the unrest of 1848, which broke out in different forms all over Europe, but in each case, according to the author, with a Socialist end in view. Next, we have the period of the International, of Marx, and of Lassalle; and Mr Wilson's Lassalle is by no means the sympathetic figure that some of us know in Meredith's Tragic Comedians. The French Commune marks the end of this period. From France we pass to Berlin and Bebel's work in the Reichstag and in the constituencies; and the Russian Revolution of 1905-6 closes this general survey. The next section of the book deals with the 'English Movement,' its origins, its leaders, and its organisation or organisations; then come Mr Wilson's 'Anti-Socialist Economics,' and, to end all, his 'Alternative Policy.' And unless this policy, or some equivalent policy, is put into speedy and energetic action, the author is of opinion that all Europe — England not excepted — is in danger of a terrible and destructive revolutionary rising, which will spare neither life nor purse nor land. No doubt, he says in effect, many of the Socialist leaders are amiable enthusiasts who sincerely desire the good of their fellow-men, and would not dream of attaining their ends by any but lawful and pacific means. But the French Revolution was the work of amiable enthusiasts, and ended in the bloody orgies of the guillotine. And, besides, in revolution it is the mob which leads, and even the most furious section of the mob. The leaders are, in reality, at the mercy of their followers, and must go forward or be trampled to death. When Robespierre sent the Hebertists — the Extreme Left — to the scaffold and proclaimed the existence of the Supreme Being, his doom was sealed. Such, I think, in fair summary, are the content and the doctrine of The Menace of Socialism.

Well, I have said that I cannot pretend to review the whole book or the whole question; but there are one or two matters that may be discussed by the way. The author says that all wealth is the reward of intelligence, or in his own phrase, 'Intelligence is the determining factor in all values.' I disagree with him entirely. Some wealth is the reward of intelligence, and some wealth is the reward of public or private baseness, of downright swindling, of poisoning the poor with adulterated and noxious provisions, of a crafty and detestable capacity for taking advantage of other men's weaknesses and kindnesses, of the worst possible painting, of the worst possible writing, of the worst possible music, and, finally, of sheer luck. Two men are working in the gold-fields: the claim of the one may yield ten thousand pounds, the claim of the other nothing — or a broken neck. I do not know that certain English gentlemen of the sixteenth century were gifted with any especial degree of intelligence; presumably their chief grace was the art of rendering themselves agreeable to Henry VIII. Hence they were endowed with the loot of the monasteries.

Then there is a phrase about ‘backward and undeveloped peoples’ as contrasted, presumably, with industrial and commercial peoples, and I cannot at all agree with the implied judgement. I remember a little valley in the West of England, which I have not seen for many years. When I visited this place twenty years ago it held, I suppose, some four or five homesteads: two farms, let us say, and three cottages. One of these farms was a freehold, the other was rented from a considerate landlord, and each of the cottagers had a bit of land of his own. These people all worked hard but worked healthily; they lived plainly, but they lived wholesomely, and I do not think that a little discreet poaching in the shining brook was very severely visited. Their houses, farms, and cottages were sturdy buildings of the sixteenth century, pleasant to look at and pleasant to live in: in a word, the valley was not Avalon, but it was a worthy human place enough. And now, if I revisited that valley, I might very likely find the clear brook transmuted into a black scum-sewer, great chimneys vomiting poisonous smoke into the air, the goodly old houses and their orchards and gardens replaced by rows of mean, jerry-built houses, by emporiums of margarine, and vile cagmag, and bad drink, and every kind of abomination. If any trees should be left, they would be black to the touch; and under these inhuman conditions perhaps five thousand people would exist instead of the twenty-five or thirty who lived there decently and pleasantly twenty years ago. No doubt the colliery-owner or the mill-owner who has effected this transmutation is extremely comfortable on the profits, but his case would not make me call the former state of things ‘backward and undeveloped.’ True, the valley may now support five thousand people instead of only twenty-five, but what about the old Latin tag which speaks of ‘losing all that makes life worth living — for the sake of keeping alive’? There is one thing which I am glad to note in Mr Wilson’s book: his mind is quite free from optimistic delusions; he is not writing under the impression that there is nothing the matter with England. On the contrary, he sees plainly that Socialism is the symptom of a deep-rooted disease, that the state of England today is not far from desperate. He is probably right in thinking that there is just this choice — remedy or revolution.

CELTIC MAGIC

IN CONSEQUENCE OF that, the men of the Island of the Mighty obtained such success as they had; but they were not victorious, for only seven men of them all escaped, and Bendigeid Vran himself was wounded in the foot with a poisoned dart… And Bendigeid Vran commanded them that they should cut off his head. 'And take you my head,' said he, 'and bear it even unto the White Mount in London, and bury it there with the face towards France. And a long time will you be upon the road. In Harlech you will be feasting seven years, the birds of Rhiannon singing unto you the while. And all that time the head will be to you as pleasant company as it ever was when on my body. And at Gwales in Penvro you will be fourscore years, and you may remain there, and the head with you, uncorrupted, until you open the door that looks towards Aber Henvelen, and towards Cornwall.'

This is from the tale of 'Branwen, the daughter of Llyr,' in the Mabinogion; and even readers who are not folklorists will guess how the story ends. The heroes who guarded the head of Bran the Blessed feasted in Harlech, and three birds came and sang to them such a song as they had never heard before, birds whose notes were clear and distinct, yet sounding as if they came over the waves of ocean. Then the heroes went to Gwales, to the palace of delights; there they lost all the burden of heavy years, and all sorrows passed from them, and all the time was as one moment of joy, till 'Heilyn, the son of Gwynn,' opened the forbidden door and looked towards Cornwall and Aber Henvelen, and then their rapture was ended, all their bitter memories returned, and they were cast out of Paradise. Now, so far as I know, the true significance of this most ancient and primitive legend has hitherto escaped notice. Mr Alfred Nutt has pointed out, with his customary acumen, that this Bran, whom no house could contain, is clearly a pre-Christian god or demi-god, and that the tales which made: him the first of the saints and evangelists of Britain are late inventions and confusions. Mr

Nutt is no doubt absolutely right in his contention; but it seems to me that the vital interest of this story is to be sought in the fact that it is a legend of Loss, a Legend of the Fall of Man. Sir Oliver Lodge, I believe, will not hear of such a thing as the Fall of Man; he sees nothing in history but the gradual and triumphant Rise of Man; and it is here that Sir Oliver Lodge differs from the early Celts. No doubt there is a good deal to be said for Sir Oliver's theory; it is certain, for instance, that travelling is much more comfortable than it was a hundred years ago, and sanitation is almost a science of yesterday. Bur I am with the Celts.

For it seems to me that it is the sense of a great loss which lies at the root of all the Celtic magic, the Celtic mysticism, the Celtic wonder. The story that I have quoted does not stand alone; the same message is delivered in many and various symbols. Parallel, to a certain extent, with the Head of Bran is the great mystery of the Sangraal, the holy thing that healed all hurts and doles, that filled those who were privileged to gaze on it with celestial joys, and was in itself a portion of heaven, a gift from Paradise. Corbenic, the castle or church of the Graal, was scarcely on earth; the way to it was charted only on the maps of the spirit. And the whole legend of the Graal is a tale of a great and woeful loss. The companions of Bran were like Adam and Eve; they fell through disobedience to a direct command; and the Holy Vessel was withdrawn from Britain by reason of the wickedness of the Britons. In the Norman-French legends with which we are more or less familiar, the Graal is withdrawn finally; the Celts, I think, had a vague hope that it would return in the great day of Redemption, when 'Saxons shall be rooted out of the land, and bards shall flourish therein.' Still the sense of loss lay deep in the Celtic heart; lost were the magic rarities of the Isle of Britain, for Merlin bore them with him into the House of Glass, where he himself lies lost to the whole world. And King Arthur 'changed his life,' and passed into the enchanted region of Avalon, where he awaits the signal that he is to return and to restore all things. And it is the sense of this loss that lies at the heart of Wordsworth's wonderful Ode; we dwell very far inland, but we have memories of the great deep, the pelagus vastissimum Dei, from which we have come.

This, then, is the 'Celtic magic.' If we are honest we must confess that, in a sense, the Celts have been ineffective; in Celtdom there is no Homer, nor Dante, nor Shakespeare, nor Milton. There is, instead, the story of the venerable head of Bran the Blessed, and there were doubtless legends, as bare and unadorned as this, from which the Anglo-Normans and the Germans constructed the Quest of the Sangraal, the Parsifal, the whole Arthurian Mythos. Indeed, there is only one line in Welsh literature which foreshadows the Arthur that we know: it occurs in the poem called 'The Graves.' The burial-places of the heroes are enumerated and described; they lie in the mountain, in the valley, by the ninth wave on the sea-shore, but 'not wise is it to seek the grave of Arthur.' There is this one line to hint that Arthur was a mystery as well as a warrior; and this line, no doubt, refers to a legend that has been lost — or, rather, survives glorified in the Norman romances. But the Celts, as I say, did not make a great world literature; they set a little leaven in the somewhat solid, somewhat mundane Anglo-Norman lump, and the whole became leavened. The late seventeenth, or early eighteenth century cast out this leaven for a time; and so, with all our admiration for Mr Pope's wonderful talents, we do not quite esteem him a poet.

Here, then, is the paradox, which is also a truth — that those who write best of the song of the nightingale do so inasmuch as they have heard the song of the Fairy Birds of Rhiannon; that the actual and tangible earth and sea are best described by men who have visions and memories of domed hills in fairyland, who have accompanied in dreams St Brendan and his fellows sailing in a magic boat across the enchanted deep in search of the holy and heavenly island of the West, which is Avalon, and Atlantis, and also Paradise. Logically, no doubt, the best describer of the primrose and of the flower on the wall should be the man who thinks of the primrose as complete and perfect in itself, as a natural object of purely natural beauty. But actually, in hard fact, the best descriptions of flowers are not to be sought in florists' catalogues, but in the pages written by dreamers, who see in earthly blossoms the relics of a lost kingdom, the half-comprehended hieroglyphics of a most ancient speech. To the Celt, and to those who have the Celtic spirit, the whole material universe appears as a vast symbol; and art is a great incantation which can restore, to a certain extent, the paradise that has been lost. You could not have comforted the heroes who had enjoyed the entertainment of the Venerable Head with a Lord Mayor's banquet; they would still have sighed for the magic feast that they had lost and for the song of the fairy birds; and this sorrow of theirs, this longing of theirs which we still suffer, is the true 'divine discontent.' And perhaps in the first ages of man art was indeed an incantation in the literal sense of the word; it was an effort to bring back that which had been lost, to renew the delights which no material pleasures can give.

And, as I say, we still suffer this regret and this longing of the Celtic heroes; for man in his essence is changeless, immutable. All we, Like Pryderi, Manawyddan, Taliesin, and the rest of them, have heard, secretly, ‘a certain song,’ and all the songs that earthly voices sing to us are ‘unpleasant compared thereto.’ And the only refuge for us is in incantation, in high magic; happy are they that find the secret of this concealed mystery.

THE HOLY GRAAL

IF ONE MENTIONS the term 'Holy Graal' in average — not expert — company, I suppose that the majority is reminded of Tennyson's idyll, while a large and respectable minority is aware that Tennyson drew his matter from Malory's Morte d'Arthur. Some of those present will have read the latter book, and a few will know that Malory was a fifteenth-century editor of older legends. Now these are the rude elements of knowledge of a great and difficult and most complicated literary question; and to those who desire to go further I earnestly recommend The Hidden Church of the Holy Graal: Its Legends and Symbolism, by A.E.Waite.

I do not think that I exaggerate when I say that the study of the Graal is as perplexed as the study of Liturgies, and the first thing that will astonish Mr Waite's readers will be the number of the sources. These sources, in prose and verse, were written in Old French, Dutch, and German, and were composed, roughly speaking, between the years 1170 and 1230. If was the period during which the Order of the Knights of the Temple was at its highest power, during which the dogma of Transubstantiation was formulated. And between these years the massive pillars and round arches of Norman architecture had, somehow or other, become transmuted into the wonderful and unique magic of the Early English or 'First Pointed' style: Durham, as it were, had become Salisbury. A principal part of Mr Waite's task — admirably carried out — has been to give a long and elaborate analysis of all these romances. By consequence, every reader of the book has before him the materials for framing a judgement on this fascinating question; he will note the points on which the various romances agree, the numerous points on which they differ; he will be able to form his own conclusions, or perhaps to agree with the conclusion propounded by the author, or again to decide that the problem is an insoluble one, in spite of the wealth of evidence. In any case, The Hidden Church of the Holy Graal will be indispensable to all students of the greatest romance-cycle in the world.

It would be impossible in the space at my disposal to tell the story of the Graal as it may be collected from the Norman-French Romances — firstly, because of its complexity; secondly, because every statement would have to be qualified by a reference to a varying account in Romance A or B or C. But the general outlines of the legend are very briefly and baldly as follows: St Joseph of Arimathæa collected in a vessel the Precious Blood which dropped from the wounds of our Lord. In this vessel Christ had 'made His Sacrament.' The Jews, hearing how Joseph had cared for the Lord's Body, threw him into prison, where he remained for many years. But Christ, bearing the Precious vessel (or Graal), appeared to Joseph and comforted him, telling him that the Eucharist should never be offered without memorial being made of what he had done, and imparting to him certain 'secret words' which would give to the faithful hearer power over men and favour with God. As a specimen of the language in which these romances are written, here are some of the words which Christ is supposed to have spoken to Joseph: 'Et veisseaux ou l'en sacrifiera et sanctifiera, sénéfiera la pierre en quoi tu meis mon cors' — the vessel in which the Eucharist shall be sacrificed and consecrated shall symbolise the stone in which you laid My body. To be brief, Joseph is released at last from prison, and finds his way, with certain of the faithful, after strange adventures, to Britain. Here he founds Christianity; his son (or nephew) succeeds him in the custody of the Holy Relic, and in the super-apostolic priesthood bestowed by Christ Himself. But in the very beginning of the story we have the sense of sin and doom; the Graal is approached by an unlicensed or unworthy person, who is immediately subjected to strange judgements and enchantments; the House of Faith is, apparently, half-ruined before it is built; and a cloud descends upon the sanctuary and upon the whole of Britain. But there is a promise that a knight of the lineage of Joseph shall in due season heal the wounded keeper and put an end to the 'adventurous' (i e evil) days. This knight was Galahad (or Percival). And yet, though the dreary enchantments are removed from Britain, the Graal is at last either lifted up to heaven or taken into still closer hiding, and the predestined knight either renders up his soul to God in Sarras, the 'spiritual place,' or else vanishes, like King Arthur, into some dim Avalon.

Now, this is the baldest and most insufficient of statements of the root-matter of the legend, and I trust that Mr Waite, and all other 'questers,' will accept the excuse of limited space. But now we are confronted by the great problems: What is the date of the invention of this story? From what materials was it drawn? Is it a Celtic legend amplified and glorified, or is it a French romance into which a few Celtic names have been dropped for ornament? Well, so far as I understand the entrancing but very subtle theory that Mr Waite propounds, the Celtic elements are mere accidents. A pagan legend survived into the twelfth century, and was then informed with a new design. According to Mr Waite, the design which thus gave life to the inert body of folklore was to express the most profound secrets of Christian mysticism; or, using the author's own phraseology, the minstrels and the monks had heard faint and distant rumour proceeding from the 'Secret School' which had always been latent in the Christian Church, and, without understanding very well the real intent of the message, they constructed this marvellous story of a chalice holier than the chalice of the mass, of a Communion more intimate than that of any earthly altar, of a mass with words more mighty in their operations than the Words of Institution, of a priesthood and episcopate which held their Orders directly from God. It must be added that the author of The Hidden Church is careful to point out that he does not use the word 'school' in any concrete or corporate sense; he rather implies by it the existence in certain exalted souls of a consciousness of an invisible sanctuary within the visible.

Of course, there have been many other theories. Dr Sebastian Evans advances the impossible view that the whole legend is a politico-ecclesiastical allegory of the events of 1200-1208; Professor Rhys of Oxford, has invited us to look upon Merlin and Galahad as 'sun-heroes.' Personally, I am of opinion that the story is of Celtic origin, and that the Knights of the Graal are Welsh saints in armour. A relic of peculiar sanctity — a portable altar, perhaps — used by St David, and famed for its miraculous properties, became confused at a very early period with the Magic Cauldron of pagan tradition; the ruin of the Celtic Church and Celtic State found its symbolism in the desolate 'enchantment' of Britain; the loss or concealment of the relic became the vanishing of the Graal; the flight and death of Cadwaladr the Blessed are translated into the Passing of Galahad. Such, in rough outline, was the legend as it existed amongst the Celts, c. A.D. 1100. Then came the devotion of the Precious Blood, the rumour that St Joseph was buried in Glastonbury, having with him in the grave two phials of the Blood of Christ; and at this moment, I conjecture, the Welsh story passed into the hands of the Norman poets and romancers, who added many things from many sources, who added, above all, the high imagination of sanctity and that marvellous power which, as I have noted, was able to transmute the heavy Norman style into the miracle of the pointed arch. This theory, like all others, is full of difficulties, but I think that one of the strongest points in its favour may be found in the Parsifal, which, apparently, derives from an early and uncorrupted form of the legend; for, in the Parsifal, the Graal is neither a cup nor a bowl — it is a stone. And there is no mention of the Precious Blood.

JUSTICE, LIBERTY — AND FALLACY

SOME MONTHS AGO Mr Wells’s remarkable book, New Worlds for Old, came into my hands. It was an eloquent appeal for the reconstruction of society on Socialistic lines, and I felt inclined to say to the author, ‘Almost thou persuadest me.’ But the whole argument was based on the one premiss — that human nature has improved, is improving, and will improve ad infinitum. This, I say, was the base of Mr Wells’s pyramid; without it, he acknowledged, the case for Socialism must collapse, and a Socialistic change would only mean a change for the worse. Mr Wells thought this premiss proven; he alleged certain instances of amelioration, declaring, truly enough, that an advertisement in a field, though ugly, was not so ugly as a hanged man on a gibbet. I ventured to question his thesis of a continuous and real and interior improvement in human nature, and I am glad to call as a witness Mr G. Lowes Dickinson.

This is what ‘Martin,’ representing, I presume, the author, has to say on the question:

> Some of [the great financiers], it would almost seem, are creditable modern representatives of Periander, or of Front-de-Bceuf, or of Caesar Borgia. For it is Power, not wealth or comfort, at which they aim; and in pursuit of that aim they trample under foot all law and all morality. As the ancient tyrant or the medieval baron robbed, so do they; only where he stole lands, and castles, and material goods, they steal the symbols of those things, securities and cash. As the tyrant and the baron tortured and murdered, so do they; only where he with his own hands used the rack and the knife, saw the blood flow, and heard the victim scream, they perhaps never see or learn the consequences of their operations, except when they read in the papers, or hear in conversation as they return from church, that this man is in the Bankruptcy Court, that in the lunatic asylum, while another has committed suicide, leaving his wife and children destitute.

And in this passage, it seems to me, the whole argument of a steady progression to higher things is confuted. We like beef as well as our ancestors did; the difference between them and us is merely this — that we should not like to slaughter an ox with our own hands. Gravy in the dish pleases us very well, but we are careful to forget the fact that the tasty sirloin implies the bloody horrors of the slaughter-house. I am very fond of lobster mayonnaise, but I should not care to he involved personally in the beginnings of that delicacy. The lobster is said to scream during the process of boiling alive.

And yet, though Mr Dickinson recognises the immutability of human nature, as the instance that I have given demonstrates — though he agrees that under present conditions Socialism would be a curse rather than a blessing — yet he is a Socialist. He confesses that the financier is but a torturing, robbing, medieval baron in modern disguise, and he thinks that all this can be changed. He does not affirm, with Mr Wells, that we are steadily becoming better by natural process, but he is sure that we can be made better by artificial process — that is, by breeding:

> With the development of knowledge we may expect that there will come a development in the institution of marriage on the lines of prohibiting, whether by law or opinion or both, unions which it is known will result in bad offspring, and encouraging those which will result in good… Only in quite recent years have a few bold men, like Francis Calton, ventured to assert the importance of breeding for a good stock, and initiated the inquiries that may lead to knowledge on the subject.

And I cannot help speculating as to the possible benefit to humanity that would have ensured if some such entries as these were to be seen in old records: ‘Considering that one Shakespeare of this town hath been shown to be very slothful in business, and to be but of an unthrifty and ill-chanced wit in his buyings and sellings: resolved that he be declared incapable of Holy Matrimony.’ Or, again: ‘Mr Dickens applied for a Matrimonial Licence. Evidence of gross business incapacity and consequent poverty having been given: Licence refused.’ For I am sure that the elder Shakespeares and the elder Dickenses appeared to their contemporaries as most unsatisfactory and futile persons, and there must have been a phthisical tendency in the Keats family.

I do not think that I am doing the author an injustice by these imaginary instances. He names some of the just impediments, as he deems them, to marriage, and they are all of the material kind; and later in his book the sentence occurs: ‘No one who believes, as both Hanington and I do, in a society which is based upon material wellbeing will deny the importance of maintaining production.’ And it seems to me that, while Mr Dickinson recognises to the fullest extent the horrible injustices and meannesses and iniquities of the present social order (or disorder), he has failed to detect the cause of all these evils. And I believe that the cause is to be stated in his own words: our society is all wrong because it is ‘based upon material well-being.’ As for Mr Dickinson’s remedy — his preparation for a true social order by means of ‘breeding’ — I confess that it seems to me as wild as the scheme of the builders of Babel. And what sort of men are we to breed! At first, as I have pointed out, the author seems to say that we are to breed healthy men who will succeed in business; later he would appear to assume that we can breed ‘good’ men — men of common sense, decent instincts, and public spirit. I doubt whether it is possible, by taking thought, to produce the former; I am very sure that it would be as easy to run a phoenix-farm as to breed good citizens by careful selection of the parents. Think of the complexities of the law of heredity; think of John Ridd’s reflections in Loma Doone, that the father is thankful if his foals have four legs, not three or five. Imagine the reversions to type in the best-managed human stud-farm — St Francis of Assisi, Mr Charles Peace, and Napoleon Buonaparte — suddenly appearing in Mr Dickinson’s placid stock-yards of voters intent upon material well-being.

I am sorry that the space at my disposal does not allow me to do justice to this admirable and thought-provoking book. I have indicated my disagreement with its main doctrine; I wish I could quote the eloquent and beautiful passage in which the writer confesses his belief that man, ‘sown into the womb of Nature,’ was ‘sown a spiritual seed,’ for it is in that eternal fact that we must seek the answer to the riddle of the Sphinx; it is in the celestial origin of man that we must look for the great work of redemption. Both theory and practice have been busy upon the other hypothesis — that the happiness of Man is to be sought in the region of material good. Both ‘Socialism’ and the modern ‘muddle’ — or industrial system — are based on this premiss; they differ merely as to detail. Neither the one system nor the other seems to be aware that human bliss dwells in the region altogether remote from economics, whether competitive or co-operative.

THE ART OF DIVINATION

THERE IS A certain theological term which I do not know how to translate. It is ex opere operato, and I think it is a near relation of the more familiar ipso facto, but as to this I am not quite sure. At any rate, its force is this: if you are tied to the mouth of a cannon and the charge is fired, you will be blown to bits ex opere operato, and if you are placed in a certain position under the guillotine blade and the lever is pulled, you will be beheaded ex opere operato. In each case, that is, the result is independent of your own will, of your own dispositions; and, by way of making the case clearer, I may say that roast beef is not nourishing ex opere operato. That is, it would probably kill a typhoid patient, since his body would not be 'disposed' to receive the nourishment that roast beef contains for the healthy. And I am glad to see that this distinction is clearly recognised by 'Grand Orient,' the author of A Manual of Cartomancy, Fortune-telling, and Occult Divination.

Now, I do not think that it is a matter of belief or of faith or of hypothesis that the prophetic faculty is occasionally found in man. It is clearly a matter of knowledge. I do not even admit that the case depends on the quantity of the evidence, or the number of cases that may be adduced. One dead man is as good a proof of the proposition that humanity is subject to death as ten thousand dead men; one penny, duly superscribed and stamped, demonstrates its existence as well as ten thousand pence. If I have seen one balloon in the air, I am completely and fully convinced of the existence of the balloon: whole fleets of balloons could not make my conviction more of a conviction. Certainty does not admit of degrees. Faith does admit of degrees. Many men might have sufficient faith in a proposition to give up all their worldly goods for the sake of it, and yet the same men might not be willing to offer their bodies to be burned in the same cause. But, there being nothing truer than the truth, or more certain than certainty, it suffices to say that the existence of the prophetic faculty is a truth and is a certainty. I quote the first example that occurs to my mind, that of a Cornishman who undoubtedly prophesied the murder of Mr Perceval, the Prime Minister. Here is one balloon: the prophetic faculty, then, is as certain as death, and more certain than the taxes. So far, so good; but now the question arises: is the faculty latent in every one and capable of being called forth in every one by certain ascertained means? A certain method or methods being followed, can any and every human being prophesy ex opere operato? Precise analogies might be rather difficult to find, but we may say roughly, that any man, not being an imbecile, may be taught that the result of adding 15 to 15 is 30. Can we say that, as any man can be taught to calculate to a certain extent, so any man may be taught to prophesy to a certain extent? Well, my own inclination is to return a decided negative; but I am checked by the recollection of the conclusions upon astrology formed by the late Dr Garnett, of the British Museum. Dr Garnett was a man of immense learning, and of a distinctly sceptical disposition, but he certainly came to the conclusion that the abstract principles of astrology were true, though I think he had doubts as to the possibility of their practical application. It is possible to have a firm belief in the existence of cosmic laws and yet to hesitate over the question, ‘What will be the exact state of our earth in ten million years?’ Speaking generally and practically, then, we do come to the decision that the prophetic faculty is as the Poetic faculty: an inborn and rare gift which cannot be taught, for which there is no recipe. And this, as I understand, is the opinion of ‘Grand Orient.’ He is good-humoured enough to tell us ‘how it is done’ in many ways — by the ‘wheel of destiny,’ by invoking spirits in the crystal, by ‘Egyptian’ fortune-telling, by the common cards, by the tarot pack, by cabalistic enumerations, and by astrology; but he gives us to understand that, in his opinion, all these things are vanity — vanity, that is, if regarded as methods ex opere operato. To put the matter very plainly, ‘Grand Orient’ would not, I think, deny for a moment the possibility of seeing visions in the crystal — or in the teacup, for the matter of that; but he would maintain, very firmly, that the visionary power resides in the seer, and not in the instrument of vision, whether it be crystal, or ink, or the geomantic calculation, or the planetary positions, and he would say also that the old magical farmulæ — the ‘consecrations’ or ‘chargings’ — are wholly subjective, and not at all objective in their influence. Or, in his own words, ‘whatever the process, whatever the instruments, they are simply aids to elicit clairvoyance, and to cast the seer for the time being into a subjective or interior condition.’

I think it may be as well to say a word or two as to the practical aspect of the matter. It is quite true, I believe, that dynamite is a high explosive, and that if a sufficient quantity of it were duly detonated it would blow Westminster Abbey into dust and fragments; it is also quite true that the cholera bacillus may be cultivated. But the truth of these propositions would not justify me in manufacturing dynamite in my back-garden, or in setting up a bacteriological shelf on the kitchen dresser.

OUR ABSURD EDUCATION

I SAID TO a teacher, who was a man, as I looked down on the dirty floor, ‘Those girls would be better learning how to scrub this floor than learning how to make hydrogen.’

These words, quoted already in T. P. ‘s Weekly, seem to have been, as it were, the low and distant muttering that precedes a storm; since they were reported the storm has burst. The Daily Mail has thrown open its columns to the opponents and the partisans of our educational system; the debate has certainly not been wanting in briskness. To begin with, Mrs Close, who is President of the Children’s Farm Home, declares that the whole of our elementary education has been a miserable sham; Mr Cyril Jackson, Chairman of the Education Committee of the London County Council, replies that Mrs Close is ‘completely ignorant of the whole subject,’ that her facts are inaccurate, and that ‘her criticism is thirty years old.’ A medical officer of the County Council Education Department agrees completely with Mrs Close, and calls the system absurd; the head of a well-known commercial college says that 90 per cent of the Council school children are ignoramuses, and that the standard of knowledge is ‘not a bit better today than it was twenty years ago.’ The chief of an employment agency says that, in his experience, young people of eighteen or nineteen ‘have forgotten all they had learned.’ A leading business man in the City condemns ‘the results of almost every branch of education in this country’:

After seven years at school the average London boy slouches into a business office or warehouse, mumbling or speaking through his closed teeth, unable correctly to copy an address upon an envelope, or to carry a message intelligently from one department to another.

A printer’s foreman writes much to the same effect, and Mrs Burgwin, a high official of the County Council Schools Department, declares that modern education is on the whole excellent, and that the manners of children, both in town and country, have greatly improved through the influence of the schools. On the one side, it will be seen, are two or three scholastic officials, on the other — almost everybody else.

Such, in brief outline, is the debate; but I think that it may interest my readers if I give some detailed extracts from Mrs Close’s act of accusation.

What is the sense (she says) of spending months in teaching country labourers’ children the manufacture of raw silk, lead pencils, and raw cocoa, aided by costly boxes of samples of graphite, plumbago, cocoa beans, and silk from the uttermost parts of the earth? The unlucky teacher’s knowledge of these substances is, of course, most elementary, and the children know the whole thing to be a sham.

What is the use of teaching our southern counties children the names of the ‘villages’ between Stockport and Manchester, some eleven miles of practically continuous town, this being followed by a list of twenty rivers in Hindustan, and the amazing information that the Mississippi runs up hill! I should say that it was explained (?) that this was due to the position of the river relative to the Equator, but we remained as much in the dark as before… The ‘domestic economy ‘classes are, if possible, even more ridiculous. I see girls, not one of whom is much above the charwoman type, studying for weeks together the analysis of the contents of an egg — the quantities being given in decimals, which no one understood. The final item of some dozen being ‘mineral matter, 00.03,’ it is not surprising that in the school-yard the girls told me an egg was a mineral containing decimals.

And ‘Medicus’ supports Mrs Close by relating how girls in the slums are taught to keep house on three pounds a week, and to make puddings requiring half a pint of cream as an ingredient. In some schools, it appears, the girls go through a solemn ritual of polishing grates that never have any fire in them, and of cleaning knives that are never used. Now, first of all, I should like to make a distinction. Are cooking, knife-cleaning, and so forth proper subjects for education at all? Or, in other words, what is education, and what is its object? Setting aside the question of religion as hopelessly controversial, I should say that education is, properly speaking, a method of developing the intelligence, of training the faculties of the mind. If this definition be accepted, then it seems clear that the making of puddings (with cream or without), the cleaning of knives (soiled or spotless), the scrubbing of floors (clean or dirty) are very far from being ideal methods of mental training. Equally must we condemn the strange practices of egg analysis, hydrogen manufacture, and plumbago inspection. I do not say that there is no intellectual gymnastic required in these odd pursuits — an idiot can make neither a pudding nor hydrogen — but I do say that there are infinitely preferable ways of teaching children how to think. Given the first elements, the three R's, on which, I suppose we are all agreed, the teacher might hand a copy of Lorna Doone to one child, a Rob Roy to another, a David Copperfield to a third. The result would, I am sure, be infinitely better than anything that a wilderness of hydrogen bottles could produce. Of course, there is a certain difficulty to be faced. Many people will tell me that in the case of poor children, at all events, education does not mean a course of intellectual training, but does mean a course of instruction in the useful arts of getting a living and keeping alive. Well, if this be so, the case for our present system is no better, but rather worse. If our boys and girls are to be 'educated,' to earn so much a week in this, that, or the other occupation, for Heaven's sake let them be educated properly. If a boy is to be a clerk, then let him be taught to write well, to type well, to be an expert in shorthand. If French be regarded as a money-making accomplishment, let him be taught real French, not the queer dialect that Mrs Close heard spoken, which dialect she supposed to be Yiddish. And if a girl wants to be a servant, by all means let her learn the business of a servant. There is much room, certainly, for some such course. I have been in theatrical rooms, in the houses of well-to-do people in Lancashire, where one might imagine that the secret of boiling a potato was as lost as the Great Word of Hiram Abiff, and that the art of cooking a steak transcended the wit of mortal and fallible beings. Let us choose, I say, one system or the other; let us try to make the children intelligent and civilised human beings, or let us make them practical wage-earners, hoping that all such superfluities as thought and civilisation and humanism may be, somehow or other, added unto them. But do not let us continue in the present hopeless muddle, which hesitates between these two objects and achieves neither. It is bad enough for a boy to be devoid of intelligence; but it is deplorable when, being unintelligent, he cannot copy a letter, deliver a message, or spell the commonest words in his mother tongue.

Then there arises the question as to whether a school is the best place for the learning of many crafts. For those which are concerned with pen and ink school is, or ought to be, the best place possible, but there are crafts which can only be learned by actual apprenticeship. Thus, one would say that the future carpenter, having acquired enough reading, writing, and arithmetic to serve all the needs he is likely to experience, had better be apprenticed to his trade as soon as possible, so that the rough elements may be conquered while he is still young. We hear every day that competition is fierce, and grows still fiercer; that the number of men unemployed and half-starving is terrible to contemplate. Clearly this is not the age in which to waste time in gibbering about plumbago, in egg mining, in tracing the course of the Mississippi, or in dilating on the exports of Borrioboolah Gha. I do not suppose that the workmen employed by Chippendale knew anything whatever about the place of origin of their mahogany, but they knew a great deal about making chairs and tables out of the mahogany. Again, I say, let us not halt between two opinions, spoiling good workmen and making bad scholars. Let us choose one way or the other, and, if we are to be practical, let us be practical altogether.

THE CULT OF THE SECRET

THE OTHER DAY, according to the daily Press, an old offence was furnished with a new excuse. The offence was, indeed, painfully unoriginal — it has provided comic writers with material for thoughtless merriment for I don't know how many years. It was simply an affair of an errant husband, of a man who crept upstairs at one in the morning, whereas he should have been at home at six p in eating his high-tea. But this bad man's explanation of his conduct was novel and startling. He came home late, he said, because he was a member of a secret society! I forget how the little dispute ended, but one cannot help wishing well to the teller of a daring tale. And, after all, it might have been a true story: perhaps our friend was simply a Freemason who liked to combine the picturesque with the truthful. The interesting point is that the husband's excuse, though it strikes one as something strange and new when exhibited in the cold columns of the daily Press, is, or might be, one of the most ancient in the world. I have just mentioned the Freemasons; there are those who profess to find the strongest resemblances between the rituals of the Craft and certain ceremonies of ancient Babylon. And, so far, Babylon is the oldest civilisation of which we know anything; its records, I believe, carry us back to the dim borders of the year 7000 B.C. Egypt, too, had its secret rites; though I do not know what authority there is for the theory that the famous Book of the Dead is in reality the ritual of an Initiation Ceremony. In itself this view is not improbable. The Book of the Dead is an account of the passage of the soul from this world to the world to come, and it is possible that by the dramatic representation of this great journey the living were supposed to be prepared for the inevitable and actual experience of death and judgement. However this may be, we know that ancient Greece abounded in rites of secret initiation. There were the mysteries of the Cabeiri at Samothrace, the mysteries of Dionysus (or Bacchus), and, chief of all, the great Eleusinian mysteries, which were amongst the most important features of Greek civilisation. Africa of today (which is in all probability extremely like the Africa of five thousand or ten thousand years ago) is honeycombed with secret societies, which are not without their terrors even to Europeans; the Australian Bushman, who represents man in a very early stage of development, has his initiations; so has the Red Indian, so had the Polynesian. It is clear that the gentleman of the newspaper paragraph was telling an age-old and a worldwide tale.

But, after all, it is not necessary to decipher Babylonian tablets or Egyptian papyri, to visit the Congo or the innermost parts of Australia, to learn that the ‘Discipline of the Secret’ is both ancient and universal. We do not always remember that here in England — nay, in London itself — we have amongst us the most primitive race in the world; that inset, as it were, into our modern and commonplace and surface civilisation there is another civilisation, antique (or rather prehistoric), fantastic, and hidden. It is hidden because it is everywhere seen, because it is eminently visible; because its rituals and ceremonies are given names that disguise their real significance. It is a commonplace of human observation that the object which everybody can see and everybody does see is apt to become dark and obscure and occult. Familiarity may not always breed contempt, but it certainly breeds indifference and ignorance; and so the world had to wait a long time before the falling apple received its true interpretation And so it is with the mysterious race to which I am alluding. Even as I write these lines I happen to glance out of the window and see the Strange People engaged in their mysteries.

It is a fine September evening. Men and women are passing to and fro; the workmen are leaving their ‘job’; one can hear quite plainly the heavy rumble of the ‘Underground,’ the hum and rattle of the motor-bus, and the clatter and jingle of the drays. Nobody seems to take the slightest notice of the Strange People. But there they are in the flushed, fading light — some fifteen or twenty of them, dressed in robes of all colours, in the very middle of the street. One, who is in dark attire, stands in the centre, and the others, hand joined to hand, revolve slowly about this figure, chanting as they do in an odd, barbaric mode. I cannot hear the words of the song, and even if I could it is quite possible that they would be unintelligible to me. (I wonder how many of my readers know the meaning of ‘Eener, deener, deiner duss,’ one of the solemn chants of this People.) But I can see that a distinct ceremony of some kind iÿ being enacted. The revolving figures change places; one suddenly appears standing beside the central personage in the midst of the circle, another is cast into the street without it, and then the rite is interrupted by a hansom cab. This is a faithful description of ‘children at play’ in the north-western district of London, and it is probable that if one wished to know the exact meaning and purport of these proceeding; one would have to search the graves of Palaeolithic men or the ‘Proceedings’ of the Anthropological Society. Some of the pleasantest of these ‘games’ are dramatic representations of the primitive custom of immolating a human victim and of placing the corpse in the foundations of any new building.

And now that we have got our truly primitive race under close observation we can see how absolutely human is the desire for ‘a secret,’ a mystery. If you watch three children together you will probably find that Jack and Bill have an inner word that may not be imparted to Ned; he is ‘uninitiated.’ One may say, then, that a ‘secret society’ in its rudest form is well-nigh a necessity of life to average children; it is an instinct which must be gratified, or else there is a sense of vanity and emptiness. As the child grows older the first crude beginnings are naturally elaborated; I believe there is hardly such a thing as a boys’ or girls’ school without its ‘secret society,’ a formal and elaborate affair, with a lodge — it may be in a shrubbery, it may be in a barn, with its passwords, its symbols, its vows to keep ‘the mystery’ hidden for ever from the world. And when the boy grows up he very probably becomes a Freemason, a member of a body which, in spite of learned research, remains still obscure and mysterious in its origins as in its ceremonies. It is not, perhaps, so very difficult to discover the fate of Hiram Abiff as it is exhibited to the brothers; the question is by whom, when, and where were Hiram and his history first imagined? I suppose that there are thousands, nay, millions of perfectly ordinary, respectable, commonplace people, who go into the City, or on the Bourse, or to Wall Street, or to the Great Fair of Nijni-Novgorod, who pay rates and taxes, and cultivate their gardens, and go to church without ever suspecting that they belong to a society which for some centuries was, in the strictest sense, a secret brotherhood, with its initiation ceremony, its second degree, its great third (or Master’s) degree, its passwords, symbols, countersigns, and reserved and hidden doctrine. Yet such was the Christian Church of the first centuries; and still in the East the deacon cries before the most sacred portion of the Liturgy begins:

‘Let all the Catechumens (the uninitiated) depart.’

ROUGE ET NOIR — AND THE UNKNOWN

HERE IS A paragraph from a daily paper, which has just attracted my attention:

> Lord Rosslyn's first day's trial in the demonstration of his system for overcoming 'the bank' at roulette… resulted in his being loser of £189 out of his capital of £10,000. His opponent, Sir Hiram Maxim, maintains that no 'system' can win in the long run.

Now, I have not followed this great contest day by day; in the first place I am not a betting man, and, secondly, any system which demands a capital of £10,000 is emphatically no concern of mine. But from an abstract point of view the question is not without interest, since if Lord Rosslyn proves that his method is really infallible it is clear that gambling on roulette will become a thing of the past — for the rich, at all events. For, on the one hand, the gambler goes to Monte Carlo to enjoy the pleasures of uncertainty, and, on the other hand, the owners of the bank rely on the supposed percentage of chances in their favour. And since rich people can always find unspeculative investments for their money, it is clear that the backing of numbers and colours will become the luxury of the poor!

On the face of it the instinct of gambling is one of the oddest oddities of human nature. I was once in the company of a number of people with pink faces and high collars and light clothes and binoculars, who 'talked horse' without intermission; the odds had evidently entered into their souls, and their knowledge of 'form' was quite amazing. I felt like a man ignorant of mathematics at the Wranglers' Club, but I took the expert who wore the largest checks apart and asked for his candid opinion on 'racing,' from the commercial standpoint, and he answered, quite frankly, that it was 'a mug's game': a yearly loss, he said, was almost certain. Now, I believe that this would be the verdict of almost any betting man; and one only needs to read the paper to see cases — almost daily cases — in which a ‘certainty’ has turned out, indeed, a certainty of ruin and bankruptcy and disaster — sometimes with hard labour thrown in. It is true, of course, that bankers sometimes lose their money, and that grocers come to grief, but then these are exceptional mishaps. As a rule, the banker and the grocer who stick to their business are pretty well assured of a comfortable living and an old age secure from want; but how many country houses, how many comfortable villa residences have been earned by backing horses? No; it is clear that my friend with the check suit was quite right: it is ‘a mug’s game,’ a desperate adventure, with the probabilities dead against one, with an almost certain loss at the end of it. And, in spite of all this, man has always gambled and always will gamble, whatever commonness, morals, a care for the main chance, and the jaws of his country may say to him. It is clear that when we define man as a rational animal we must do so with some grave reserves.

For the fact is that man is not a rational animal, he is sometimes a supra-rational animal and sometimes an infra-rational animal. It sounds paradoxical, but it is certainly true that the gambling instinct is a perverted and corrupted form of the greatest human qualities. If little boys did not waste their money and imperil their positions in life by taking an interest in ‘all the winners and S. P.’ — well, in the first place there would be fewer evening papers in London, and secondly, there never would have been a Homer, a Shakespeare, or a Turner; and the autumn poets, who are now being reviewed in scores, would never have written a line. You cannot imagine a bee backing the winner (or, more probably, the loser), and an ant playing Blind Hookey is a mere nightmare; but then it would be equally ridiculous to imagine the bee writing a book and the ant modelling in clay. In other words, our vices and follies come from the same stock as do our gifts and graces; and the name of that stock is certainly not reason. It is unreasonable to put ten thousand pounds on a horse; it is unreasonable to volunteer on a forlorn hope; it is unreasonable to make lyric poetry or to enjoy it; there is no reason in pure music or in falling in love — but in all these processes and actions there is abundant humanity.

From what has gone before it seems quite clear that the love of gain is not at the root of the gambler’s passion. The miser — the man who loves money for its own sake — will toil for gain, will starve himself for gain, and perhaps murder for gain; but he will not risk the loss of what he holds so dear. No: the charm of the wager is the charm of the hazard, of uncertainty, of the voyage into the unknown; in the very risk lies all the delight. Gambling, in fact, is the poetry and the adventure of the unimaginative man; it is his poor attempt to satisfy his human instincts; it is his method of escaping from the prison of dullness, of commonplace, of matter-of-fact. It is one of many such methods, most of which are as futile or more futile. Here, again, one sees the strong distinction between the man and the bee. The latter, it is evident, is the happiest of bees living in the best of all possible hives; it is compact of certain strong desires which are perpetually being gratified; it is incapable of trespassing for a moment beyond the bee-world — for it the hive can never be out of joint. And on the other hand man suffers from an eternal dissatisfaction with himself and his surroundings, with his thoughts and his actions; he is like one beating at the doors of a palace, ever striving to enter in. In dreams, perhaps, he has seen a vision of the wonders within, or he has caught through cracks and crevices of the walls glimpses of immortal and satisfying delights; his ears have heard faint echoes of an enchanted song. To use a common idiom, man is a fish out of water, who is perpetually trying to get back into water.

Well we know the names of those who have succeeded; these are the saints and the sages, the poets, the musicians, the painters, the architects, the great artists of the world. But the tragedy is that while all desire, few attain: few can understand the means of attaining. Some succeed in killing the impulse altogether, and ‘settle down’ to a life which is almost animal — so many hours of work, so many hours of sleep, sufficient beef and beer, and a little money in the bank. But there are others who back the Red and ‘have a bit on’ a favourite horse. In the East there are people who take bhang and haschisch and smoke opium, in the West there are those who inject morphia and drink huge overdoses of alcohol; they set out for the enchanted palace of their dreams and awake in the gutter, in the hospital, in the home for inebriates.

I have often thought that the ignoring of this secret and ‘irrational’ tendency of human nature is the cause of many failures, the explanation of the disaster which has overtaken many well-meant schemes. For instance, I believe the chief dogma of Democracy is that all men are born ‘free and equal.’ This may be true; but then most Democratic thinkers must have added (in an undertone, perhaps) ‘and logical’ — which is not true. So with ‘Temperance’ Reform, so with ‘Anti-Betting Leagues; they attack a symptom, but not the disease itself; or, to resume my former metaphor, it may be that by some accident or series of accidents certain legitimate doors to the palace have been gradually closed; hence the frantic endeavour to press in by ways that end in failure only — or perhaps in destruction. At all events, it is certain that any survey of humanity which excludes the imaginative faculty and provides no outlet for its exercise is bound to lead to error in theory and to disaster in practice.

THE MOTH AND THE FLAME

LAST MONTH THERE was an inquest on the body of a woman found drowned on the seashore.

It was stated that she had told a relative that the sight of water always had a powerful fascination for her, and that when she saw it she seemed to have no control over herself… The coroner remarked that incidents of water having a fascination were not unknown. Some people experienced a similar feeling when looking down from a height.

The report from which I have quoted is a brief one; and one wonders whether it occurred to anybody present that Poe had written a curious essay on this very subject, ‘The Imp of the Perverse.’ The great American writer points out that many men — perhaps all men at one time or another — are subject to this extraordinary instinct impelling them to seek their own destruction. Like the coroner at the inquest, Poe instances the man on the brink of the precipice: his flesh shudders with horror, all his physical being revolts from the sight of the awful depth and the rocks beneath, and yet he lingers, drawn by some mysterious impulse, to his own destruction. Then there is the instance of the murderer who, in spite of himself, feels that he must proclaim his terrible secret to the world, thereby becoming, virtually, his own judge and executioner. In a phrase, we might say that man is subject to the fascination of destruction.

I was reading some time ago a very interesting explanation of the well-known behaviour of moths confronted with a bright light. Everybody has seen the wretched creatures beating about a gas-globe, endeavouring to come to the flame, and success means, of course, scorched wings and death. And yet one has also seen a moth slightly burnt, presumably in pain, returning again and again till it is consumed, or till it can fly no more. Well, the theory that I read, which is that of a very distinguished foreign scientist, is to the effect that the moth, with its peculiar vision, mistakes the candle-flame or gaslight for daylight, that it is trying to get out of the darkness, as man lost in a winding cavern might rush forward on seeing a sudden gleam in the distance. Now, speaking with due diffidence, I cannot accept this explanation for a moment, for the reason that the moth is a native of night and of darkness, and avoids the true daylight to the best of its ability. Sometimes one of these creatures, flying into a room at night, conceals itself in a curtain-fold. If you chance to disturb it the next morning, and in doing so expose it to the daylight, it will immediately do its best to take refuge in darkness behind another fold; it is evidently distressed by the rays of the sun. Clearly, then, the only light which attracts the moth is a light of destruction and death; it does not desire the star or the sun, but only the candle-flame. And again, birds, which must have a very different kind of vision from that of insects, will dash themselves to pieces against the windows of a lighthouse; presumably they, too would fly into the flame if it were not too strongly guarded.

I am sorry to say that I have no theory to propound in place of that which I have rejected. The moth and the candle are to me a mystery, since the creature seems to be acting in direct opposition to the whole course of Nature, to the law of self-preservation. So with the birds: they often develop a superhuman sagacity in the detection of snares, in the avoidance of men with guns; and yet they fly madly against the lighthouse window, and fall dead into the sea. Sportsmen have told me that you must use the contrivance of a Machiavel if you wish to get a shot at certain birds, and yet these wary and cautious creatures will dash themselves to pieces in the effort to get at a brilliant light, which they cannot possibly regard as something good to eat! Salmon, too, can be lured to the surface — and to the spear’s point — by the exhibition of a flaring torch; and I have heard that there is no better bait for this fish than a morsel of scarlet cloth. Now, the salmon does not feed on burning torches, nor — so far as I know — on large scarlet flies; and yet these objects are an irresistible attraction to it. What is the explanation of this and of the similar conduct of the moths and the birds?

Whatever the solution of the enigma may be, it is interesting to note the parallel between the moth and the man. Both the one and the other suffer from the fascination of death and destruction. Is this a mere coincidence, or have we here varying manifestations of one instinct? In the case which I cited at the beginning of this article the jury, very naturally, brought in a verdict of 'Suicide while of unsound mind'; but we must be careful to distinguish between this impulse and ordinary suicidal mania. The unfortunate woman whom the water drew to death had no delusions of any kind or sort; she did not drown herself because she was persecuted by imaginary enemies, because the Emperor of China was plotting against her, or because she had committed the Unpardonable Sin. She perished through a fascination which exercises a certain weak power over most of us, which in her case swelled to an irresistible command, which bore her to the depths of the water as the singed moth is borne to the heart of the flame. And — to quote a very different instance — readers of Martin Chuzzlewit will remember how Bailey Junior, certainly not a morbid character, lingered behind on the roof of 'Todger's' to walk on the parapet, 'contemplating with a delight peculiar to his sex and time of life any chance of dashing himself into small fragments.' Bailey, in brief, was obsessed by the 'Imp Of the Perverse.'

Now the death of the woman was evidently of no service either to herself or to anyone else; it was both spiritually and materially unprofitable. But the question arises whether this instinct, in a modified form, is not demonstratively of the greatest service to humanity. To take an instance. We speak of a great soldier's contempt of death: should we not rather say his love of death or of the chance of death? Perhaps the most wonderful actions of the battlefield have been performed, not by men who overcame their natural fears through a sense of duty and a sense of shame, not by men who by nature or by training were indifferent to danger, but rather by men who loved danger for its own sake, who found in the expectation of instant death the most poignant of all pleasures. And may we not imagine that some of the most heroic rescues of men by men have been the work of those who knew the wonderful fascination of deadly peril? The history is silent as to the after-life of Bailey Junior; but one would not be surprised to hear that he went down a precipitous cliff to rescue some victim of the advancing tide, contemplating with a more exalted delight the 'chance of dashing himself into small fragments.' And, again, there are the explorers, the mountaineers, the men who venture into the waste of ice or into the waste of sand; these, too, must know something of the 'Imp of the Perverse.' There must be this mysterious force impelling them to leave comfort, honour, and profit for some desperate adventure of the wilderness or of the rocks, for the risk of a parched or frozen death. The inventor, too, must often be of the same company: the first balloonist, for example, was doubtless acquainted with the joys of peril. And in the spiritual sphere it may seem a paradox, but is it not possible that the martyrs in the flames were men tasting the supremest bliss? The mathematicians tell us that there is a sphere — they call it infinity — in which parallel straight lines meet; it has often struck me that this axiom may apply to worlds that are not mathematical — that the supreme life may be the supreme paradox. According to the natural order — or what we think the natural order — the instinct of life is the strongest of all instincts; perhaps if we carry our analysis a point further we may discover that the instinct of death is stronger still. Then, returning to the moth and the flame, is it not within the bounds of possibility that it and the other creatures who seek their own destruction in such (apparently) aimless fashion are in reality displaying one of the greatest of all human qualities in its rude and primitive condition, in its inchoate state? There is a vast gulf between a hen and her chickens and a mother and her children; but from small rills and petty fountains the great deep of maternal love draws all its mighty and blessed waters. So the moth burning in the candle-flame may be alike the symbol and the physical origin of the highest joy of self-sacrifice.

BRIDLES AND SPURS

ONE OF THE most tiresome men I ever knew was always talking about nature. I don't know what he meant by nature. I don't believe that he knew what he meant by nature. Usually, I think, he spoke of it as something good and just and beautiful, discerning and dividing the true from the false. Thus, a very wealthy man of his acquaintance became ill, and was glad of the company of my tiresome friend. 'In spite of all his money,' said the tiresome one, 'when Dame Nature gave him a tap on the shoulder — there he was.' I have no notion of what this means. I doubt whether it means anything at all. I told the fellow that he was talking nonsense; that nature simply meant the sum of things; everything that is; that if a sunset was nature, so also was a louse; in short that if nature were 'a holy thing' in the words of philosophic Snawley, she was also 'a rum one,' in the definition of philosophic Squeers.

It has always struck me as marvellous that Johnson was afforded grace — I would almost say — to give Rousseau the lie, to cast down his false doctrine and stamp upon it. For Rousseau, as we all know, preached to foolish and too-attentive ears the doctrine of the state of nature, and of the return to nature. He saw that things were very much amiss; and, indeed, he was right, since they always are amiss. But he went on to say that they were amiss because man had departed from the state of nature, and might be put right by man's returning to the state of nature. And what did he mean? I don't think Rousseau was in so hopeless a state as the tiresome man: he had a meaning in what he said. By a state of nature, so far as can be gathered, he meant the state of savagery; a condition of things in which man lives without laws or institutions of any kind, civil or ecclesiastical; in which there are no conventions, no customs, no immemorial traditions, no usual habits which have grown by long and general consent to have the force of law. For example, supposing yourself to be the guest of a Duchess: there is no law in England that I know of to Prohibit your spitting on Her Grace's drawing-room carpet, if you be so inclined. Yet, I am very sure that there are many people who will rob and swindle their neighbour, and covet his goods, and bear false witness against him, and injure him in body, soul, and spirit gaily and freely, who would be quite incapable of defiling that noble carpet. And I spoke of long consent as giving custom the force of law. It need nor be so very long. When Dr Johnson was in Paris amidst the exquisite elegancies and politenesses of the old regime, he saw a lady of quality spit on her drawing-room floor, and rub out the spittle with her foot.

But at all events: when Rousseau preached that gospel of a return to nature he was thinking of savagery, a state of things free from all law, all custom, all convention, all hierarchy, all rule and all rulers. It was pretty much the state that Shelley viewed, when he wrote:

Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, but man
Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless,
Exempt — from awe, worship, degree, the king
Over himself.

And, as I say, Johnson would have none of it. He knew that it was all poisonous nonsense, and declared that it would give him very great pleasure to sign Rousseau’s sentence of transportation, as a bad man, as one of the worst of men. And here is the marvel: that Johnson believed that Rousseau’s picture of the savage state was a true one; that there were people living in these conditions, without king, priest, custom, or law. ‘Very well,’ said the Doctor in effect, ‘I allow that there are such men, and I say that they are no better than wild beasts.’ We know better. There are no such men. The farther back we go, the more elaborate the structure of human society becomes; the more complicated the vast corps of rules and regulations, ordering not only public actions and transactions, but also the most domestic, private, and intimate details of every day life.

Take the case of Mrs Green, the wife of the South African missionary. Mrs Green went into her kitchen to confer with her two black servants as to the work and business of the day; the subject of dinner naturally being included in the discussion. A basket of fruit was produced: would it do for a tart? ‘No,’ said the mistress. ‘I think it’s too green.

The two black girls turned ashen grey, and waited for the bolt of heaven to fall. Mrs Green had been guilty of a frightful infraction of their law. She had uttered the name of her husband: a horrid transgression. She should have varied her phrase, and said: ‘It’s not ripe enough.’ In extreme cases, in which no paraphrase would serve, the proper course would be to summon a boy of under five years, whisper the tremendous name of Green into his ear, and bid him whisper it in turn to the person concerned.

That is real savagery; about as remote from the false and idle dreams of Rousseau and Shelley as anything that the mind can conceive. No doubt, the levee of King Louis XV was a complicated business, a highly ceremonial business, a business of many intricate rubrics, rules and regulations. But courtiers are a limited class, and levees come to an end, and wigs and court dress can be exchanged for loose caps, soft slippers, easy gowns. The life of a savage is a perpetual levee, in which every minute detail of his life is ordered. Civilisation may be good or bad; this, perhaps, is uncertain. But it is very certain that civilisation is a process which makes more and more for simplicity. I can remember the days of frilled shirt fronts, and later, the splendid liveries of the Row.

What Rousseau really meant, then, was that man might gain happiness by ceasing to be a man and becoming a beast. This, no doubt, is a false proposition; but, yet worse, it is a loose proposition. What sort of a beast? An antelope, or an ant? An antelope, I suppose, has perfect liberty, till a lion, also enjoying the blessings of freedom, makes a dinner of him. Is that the life which Rousseau and Shelley had in mind; or did they propose to subject man to the iron, inevitable, merciless discipline of an ant’s nest? Likely enough: it must be remembered that when the Pilgrim Fathers hanged Quakers, they called it the enjoyment of liberty of conscience. It was not only Habbakuk who was capable de tout.

But to return to that nature, from which we started: can we say more of it than this: that it is really Pan, the sum of everything that is, from Wordsworth’s Ode on Intimations of Immortality to the untrapped bacillus of influenza, still roaming free from the tyranny of man: ‘equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless, exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king over himself.’

Is that all we can say of this famous nature; beyond the fact that the word has been the fruitful parent of more intolerable drivel and nonsense than any other word to be found in the dictionary? I think there is one thing to be said, at all events; and that is that in nature there is a boundless and persistent difference, inequality, or, in Bacon's phrase, strangeness of proportion. One oak leaf is very like any other oak leaf; but it is never a replica of any other oak leaf. You can see the difference if you will take any two oak leaves, and examine them closely. So with mountains, so with minds: there are no two mountains, no two minds exactly alike. It is quite certain, then, that whatever sense you give the word equality, there is no such thing in nature.

There is a saying often quoted. I have forgotten who first uttered it, and I quote from memory; but it goes something like this: 'I can never believe that one set of men is born, saddled and bridled, ready to be ridden; while another set of men is born, booted and spurred, and ready to ride them.' I am sorry that the gentleman, whoever he may have been, was never able to believe this — since it happens to be the exact and certain truth. A melancholy truth, perhaps; it is a melancholy truth that water drowns and fire burns; but it is true. You have only to turn into any history book, or into any industrial town, or open any newspaper to be convinced of the truth of the proposition which the man couldn't believe. Of course, there are good riders and bad riders, kind rulers and cruel tyrants, amongst the kings of the earth and of big business. But as to the dictum of the riders and the ridden; one may say that it is the truth: 'Megis yr oedd yn y dechreu, y mae yr awr hon, ac yn y wastad, ac yn oes oesodd.' From the beginning of all beginnings, and at this hour, and into the waste of time, and to the age of the ages.

A FORGOTTEN BOOK

HAS ANY ONE here read Beroaldus Juvelius on the Fallibility of Human Judgement? I daresay not. This great folio, printed at Lubeck in the year 1615, when the Rosicrucian controversy was at its height, as it might be a living and blazing example of that fallibility of judgement which the prudent Juvelius weighed, examined, anatomised, was in its own day overwhelmed by the occult follies of the age. It slept as it was born; and no one has been curious enough to awaken it.

Yet the book deals with matters of everlasting interest, and everyday interest too, to every one of us. We are making judgements every other minute of our lives, every jack man of us, from the highest mathematician to the man who feeds the pigs. Einstein forms his judgement as to Space-Time; the pig farmer forms his judgement as to the capacities of the pig with the black spot for fattening up — and some one in between the two forms a judgement as to my prose, and decides that it is horrid. And there goes a man to the scaffold, and a noose, and violent death: on the judgement of twelve of his fellows. What right has any one of these to his judgements; from Einstein to the juryman? What grounds have we for receiving them, for giving them our assent? Can we test them? If so, what are the tests?

Such, in bare outline, are some of the topics which engaged the attention of the learned Swede — or, more probably, Finn — of the early seventeenth century; and it seems to me that they are as alive now, in the early twentieth century, as they were then. Indeed, I have had an instance of this urgent modernity within the last twenty-four hours. Last night, Mr Desmond McCarthy, an esteemed critic, an admirable judge of a good book and a bad book, and of the difference between them, was broadcasting his opinion of that queer production, the Life of George Bernard Shaw by Frank Harris and George Bernard Shaw. ‘I read every word of it with interest,’ said Mr McCarthy in effect, ‘but it is a literary monstrosity,’ And he went on to compare it, immensely to its disadvantage, with the Life of Hendrik Ibsen, recently translated from the Norwegian: a perfect biography, according to Mr McCarthy; a great picture of a great man.

Very good. But this morning I open the Daily Telegraph, and read a criticism of this very life of Ibsen, by that most eminent and judicious critic, Mr J. C. Squire. And Mr Squire says, quite frankly, that he found the book so intolerably, so intensely dull that his strongest resolution was needed to carry him through it. It was a black London fog to him, with only here and there a ray of light, when Ibsen was allowed to speak in his own person.

And the best of it is this. At the beginning of his article, Mr Squire quoted two or three paragraphs from the Quarterly Review. The reviewer, poor man, had to deal with Endymion by John Keats. He read the first book, he says, and could make nothing of it; and so he felt that it would be safe to leave the other three unread. Mr Squire agrees that the Quarterly critic was wrong; but wishes that he had the courage to follow his example in leaving three parts of the Life of Ibsen unread. That is his point; but how admirably the passage from the Quarterly illuminates our meditation on the fallibility of human judgement. The Quarterly Review was written by scholars, by men of literary experience, and of approved merit: it can find nothing in Endymion but unintelligible nonsense. And a few years later, Jeffrey, of the Edinburgh Review, declared that the only poets of the age who would survive were — Rogers and Campbell. And do not let us forget that Johnson considered Lycidas to be a compound of bad taste and worthless poetry; while to Keats and his friends, Johnson's poetry was a joke. Carlyle, again, found nothing in Keats but a 'maudlin, weak-eyed sensibility,' and discovered Lamb to be a drunken cockney, with a 'frostified,' very offensive, humour.

And these, judges and judged, were great men; some of them among the greatest of men. 'If they do these things in the green tree…'

But, after all, these are merely literary judgements? What, then, about the judgements of those useful, homely, practical, organs; the palate and the stomach? They have in Touraine, the land of Rabelais the land of stout eaters of fine dishes, of chosen drinkers of good wine, a great delicacy; little cheeses made of goats' cream. I saw them, snowy white, nesting in green vine leaves, as they put on the dessert in that sixteenth century inn, La Crouzille. I helped myself with eager anticipation: received the essence of a whole herd of mountain goats and thought my mouth was withered forevermore. And, you remember the Banquet after the Manner of the Ancients in Peregrine Pickle? The host said that he was a little uncertain as to the nitron of the ancients; so in making the classic soup, he had used asafetida instead. Well; the French marquis declared the soup was excellent, on his word of honour; but he was taken home in his sedan chair, in a sad state, soon afterwards. But the German baron finished his plate and asked for more.

Do you know what is the great Christmas dish in Germany at the present day? It is carp, boiled in beer, and eaten with sweet cakes. You think, I suppose, that such a dish would be horribly nasty; sickening perhaps. But my Tourainian friend, M. Venier, told me that he had once eaten lamb with mint sauce. ‘I didn’t like it,’ he said, and there was a bitter emphasis in his tones that let me know he was putting his judgement into gentle words, to spare my English feelings. I am free to confess, on the other side, that young lamb without mint sauce is to me as a sonnet that lacks the final, crowning line; a thing imperfect, maimed; joy turned into sorrow and regret.

Let it be understood that all the while I am following my author, old Beroaldus Juvelius. The argument, if you can find it, is his: I have merely fitted it with modern, or more or less modern, instances. And, still following him; let me relate how I was sitting one afternoon with some friends, at Henekey’s, in the Strand. One of the men said to another: ‘You know Confucius has come through?’ He lowered his voice a little, but I heard him and exclaimed, ‘What?’ in a voice of such rasping virulence that the waitress started, and regarded me with surprise and rebuke.

But what ground had I for my implied judgement: that the spirit of the great Kung, who died about two thousand five hundred years ago, had by no means manifested itself at any séance of the Spiritualists?

THE STRANGE TALE OF MOUNT NEPHIN

I WAS SAYING that I once heard X say to Y: ‘You know, of course, that Confucius has come over?’ — and that I didn’t believe a word of it. Well, I didn’t and I don’t; but, if one comes to think of it, I should find it difficult to justify my disbelief on strictly rational grounds. Who are we to pretend to understand the laws of the kingdom of the unseen? Confessedly, demonstrably, we blunder daily, we blunder hideously over the laws of our own region. We condemn innocent men, we acquit guilty men. We stone the prophets and the poets; we laud and laurel horrible quacks and impostors. Germany makes certain of tremendous victory; and comes to the most appalling grief. And betting men back horses as ‘dead certs,’ which, somehow, crawl in at the tail of the field. Evidently, we know very little about things seen: how shall we presume to be dogmatic about things unseen? What right had I to be derisive and incredulous about the supposed manifestations of the great sage of China?

None whatever, taking the proposition— ‘Confucius has come over’ — simply as it stands. I know nothing whatever about the present state of the spirit of Confucius or its possibilities; and I have no right to any opinion on the subject. My defence for my derision must be founded on the fact that this was the pronouncement of a Spiritualist. Now I know from long experience that the Spiritualists are highly credulous folk, that they have been deceived, cheated, humbugged again and again, and that they never learn caution or the critical habit of mind. The medium with the faked slate is found out; and is succeeded by the medium with the faked photograph; and the exposed ‘spirit’ photographer yields place to the manipulator of ectoplasm — which turns out, in due time, to be cheese cloth. So, on the whole, I think I was justified. I may yet be brought to believe in the apparition or manifestation of Confucius; but not on Spiritualistic evidence. Emphatically, what the Spiritualist says is not evidence; when he speaks on his own topic. When he talks about chess or chemistry or the culture of roses he may be the most trustworthy of men.

So much for grounds of disbelief; now for the more difficult matter: grounds of belief in one of the strangest stories that I have ever heard. And let me say at once that it appeared in Light, which is the principal Spiritualistic paper in England, and that, for all I know, the narrator herself may be a Spiritualist. I do know one thing: that she was most unwilling to publish her experiences, lest she should be thought a fool. And it is to be further remarked that whatever may be thought of her tale, it is certainly not a Spiritualistic tale. Its atmosphere is wholly remote from that of the séance.

Well: to our adventure. On or about July 20th, 1929, a party of six people set out to climb Mount Nephin, by Lough Conn, in County Mayo, Ireland. There were three men and three women, and of the women, one, with an injured knee, turned back after an hour's climb, and was to wait at the cottage where the party had left their car. It was a clear and sunny day. The climb began at eleven, the summit was reached at a quarter to three, and at three o'clock the descent began.

We started down in groups and singly, my husband by himself, F.H., James and myself together, and the other man quite a bit ahead of us. Suddenly, F.H. turned away, and vanished over the shoulder of the mountain. Little was said, for she often took her own way down the various mountains we climbed during the summer. James and I continued our way for a while, then turned to each other and said 'Something has happened to F.H.!' We felt so sure of this that we called to the other two men, who returned. We agreed that they should go back to the mountain to where she was last seen, and search for her, while I should continue down, and meet them at the cottage.

The teller of the tale set out on her way down the mountain, keeping a sharp lookout for the missing F.H. She sat down and heard 'a funny kind of crying' behind her, the crying of a lost child. She looked about her and saw a figure which she took to be James, waving to her. She walked towards the figure; but there was no one there. She sat down again, and admired the view, and 'someone laughed,' directly behind her. The figure that seemed James again appeared and disappeared, and the narrator at last reached the cottage, expecting to find there the girl with the injured knee.

The cottage people told me she had not been there all the afternoon. Presently she came in very angry, saying that early in the afternoon I had come down the mountain and waved to her, but had not waited for her to come up. (She had not gone very far, as she stumbled in a bog, and found the walking too hard.) Obviously I had not done any such thing.

At half-past seven, the men came back. They had seen nothing of the missing girl, F.H. One of the men, James, had twice seen, ‘out of the tail of his eye,’ a club whirling down on him, and he had, each time, taken flying jumps to avoid it. The party were feeling extremely worried about the disappearance of F.H., and the narrator began to question the man of the cottage. Were there holes or quarries on the mountain into which one might fall? Nothing of the kind. Might there be children on the mountain? All the children had been at school.

Then:

‘What about the Little People?’

He became very severe, and turned to go out, saying ‘We do not talk about that.’

And poor, missing F.H.? They found her, at last, in a police station at the foot of the mountain. And she told a very odd story.

She does not know, (writes the narrator,) she cannot possibly imagine what happened to her. She can only say that it was as though she had lapsed into, complete unconsciousness, and all the while thought she was walking beside us. She was in reality walking straight away from us. She does not know what it was that ‘took’ her suddenly; she said it was as though there were no time for a moment, and some strange force were pulling her away. Then she realised that we were not there, and heard the crying of voices. She went in the direction of the sound, thinking she would find someone; on crossing a ravine, the voices were still audible, and she heard someone blowing a horn, but no one was in sight. Then she thought she saw a small person beyond and below her, possibly a child; she went down towards it, but on crossing another ravine, found no one, though the voices still continued. After this, she realised she was lost, and headed for the white roadway below her, and walked about eight miles to a police barracks, where we later found her.

I believe every word of that strange story; but I find it difficult, or rather, impossible, to give the grounds of my belief. Sometimes we can appeal to the character of the teller of the tale; but I know nothing of the character of the lady who tells this tale of Mount Nephin. She is, or was, a university lecturer; and it might be urged that university lecturers are not in the habit of making up outrageous fictions. This is, probably, a true proposition; but it falls very far short of demonstrating the veracity of the story. I can only say that, to me, the whole narrative reeks of the truth; I am convinced that the persons of the tale really experienced the impressions and sensations which they say that they experienced.

And what, or who, caused these impressions and sensations? There, I must be content to symbolise with F.H., who lost her way. ‘She does not know, cannot possibly imagine, what happened to her.’ I neither know, nor can I conjecture the causes of the things that happened to this party of hill climbers. Were they harried and misled by the Little People, the Daioine Sidhe, the fairies? I am with the ‘man the cottage’ here; I don’t want to talk about that — because I know nothing of it. Tradition, even wild tradition, is often trustworthy in a high degree: I could bring forward many instances in proof of that proposition. But the original traditions of the Little People have been hopelessly corrupted by literary inventions: the fairies of Shakespeare, and Herrick and the other Elizabethans have travelled far from their native hills and wilds. I dare not say that the people who climbed Mount Nephin in July, 1929, were beset by fairies; but I think we may say that experiences such as theirs were the foundation of the older fairy lore.

PICTURES ON THE CARDS

A VERY PLAUSIBLE case might be made, I believe, for the proposition that life would be intolerable — if it were not for its evils.

Nonsense? Well, take one evil; worry, anxiety, that painful obsession of the mind which has been held responsible for so many shattered souls. ‘It is not work that kills men; it’s worry,’ I once heard a famous divine declare; and I have often felt inclined to agree with him. It is not work, however hard, that poisons life. Often, in old days, 1 have gone into the hay fields and watched the mowers with their scythes advancing across the meadow; scythes, arms, legs, bodies swinging in perfect measure. The sun beat down, the mowers steamed with heat; the work, so they say, uses and tries every muscle of the body: but it all looked jolly — to use an old word — and they looked jolly; and with what a relief they lifted up the great stone jars of small cider or small beer that were kept cool in the shade of the pollard beech. Then, after a mighty draught of the cold drink, back to the work again, and the long sweet swathes fell before the shining scythes; and so till then sun went down behind the mountain wall in the west, and the mowers went home, tired and cheerful. A hard day’s work, but a good day’s work, without a pang in it.

Such hours as these do no harm to any man; such work, as the clergyman said, does not kill. I admit that there is work of a very different order. I often wonder how any man can be a coal miner; and yet the men of the mines are often cheerful fellows. ‘You can’t keep them out of the pits,’ a Welshman once said to me. Then there are the house-breakers, who stand on a high wall and hack at it with their picks, and the men who wheel barrows of bricks at a brisk trot on a bounding scaffolding plank, I know not how many feet above the ground. But such forms of work are so dangerous that they only need to be taken up in the right social quarters to become highly fashionable sports. Work, then, is endurable, and may be enjoyable. But worry…

It is the slow, but burning poison of life; a worm that dieth not, a fire that is not quenched; an anticipation of hell itself. It is the black care that sits behind the horseman; the terrible companion that draws the curtain at night, and appears, strangely, awfully disguised in the dreams of the sleeper. It wakes with him at dawn, and strikes a pang through his breast. It mingles venom with his meat and his drink, with all his thoughts, and words, and deeds. We had rather meet a stranger than his dearest friend; for with a stranger one can act a part. He cannot read his well-loved books: good wine breeds but greater loathing on a fevered palate. He is almost ready to cry: Who will put me out of my misery?' and, often enough, finding life unendurable ends it by his own violence.

And the strange thing is that we go to pains and labour to make counterfeit cares, imitation anxieties, feigned worries of all sorts. As if a man's real troubles were not enough for him, he invents a tortuous enigma called chess, grows pale over its problems, and racks his brains by way of resting them. And, as if chess were not difficult enough, he refines upon its tortures, and plays the game in a dialogue, without seeing the board; plays three, six, a dozen games at once: seeks out any device to increase his troubles. Then there is another popular torture called bridge. Some time ago, the world gathered round a bridge table in New York. The doings on that table formed an important item, day by day, in our English newspapers. We read how the players worried so over the game that their nerves got on edge, and they addressed each other with considerable acrimony. At last the contest came to an end; and I must say that the only sensible comment on the affair that I read was in a provincial American paper And that was: 'What of it?' What of it, indeed? Haven't we, most of us, enough real and actual cares without these phantasmal anxieties. There are Kings and Queens of darkness with powers of life and death and torment, and Knaves in plenty to rob us of all we have: and yet we must, of our own free will, call on the pictures on the pictures on the cards to harry us.

But the paradox goes all through life. We cannot keep our pet dogs in peace. Mrs Smith, the owner of the famous Pekinese Ling Pu, shows him, and bursts into tears because her pet is beaten by Mrs Brown's Wang Lu. And I daresay that the heart of the grower of roses is often pierced by a like thorn. I remember once calling on some people at Wimbledon. There was a beautiful garden, and I knew that my friends were proud of their roses. It was the day before the local flower show, and the weather was showery. We strolled out on the lawn after tea: and there, instead of roses, were umbrellas. All the umbrellas, parasols, sunshades that the house could provide were stuck here and there about the beds; the object being to protect the precious blooms from the assault of the rain, so that they might be perfect for the show next day. Here, I thought, is a taking of anxious thought for the morrow: these people are worrying about their roses, instead of enjoying: them.

And the moral of this grave discourse is to the address of the fanatics, the cranks, the red-hot reformers of the universe. By all means let us help the lame dog over the stile and raise the blind man from the ditch. But do not let us endeavour to abolish stiles and ditches; since, if we had none, we should at once proceed to construct them with immense pains, labour, and expense. In Mr Aldous Huxley’s latest book, there is a picture of a world without evil. It is an unspeakably awful place.

THE ANCIENT SPEECH

MR AGATE, ONE of our most distinguished literary and dramatic critics, said a very striking and arresting thing in one of his articles. He was reviewing a book, the author of which had declared that in his opinion, great music, the music of Mozart and Beethoven, was the very climax of civilisation: in itself Civilisation, and the pure essence and expression of civilisation.

Mr Agate would have none of it. He swept music aside, and with it architecture, sculpture, painting, all the arts; including, I suppose, literature, though I don’t think literature was expressly mentioned. ‘None of these things,’ he said, ‘counts. When I speak of civilisation, I mean good sewage.’

Let us not endeavour to score off Mr Agate. It would be very simple to ask him why, holding that good drains made good men, he passed his days in judging plays and books; matters, according to his doctrine, of no consequence whatever. I suppose his answer would be: ‘Because I want to earn a lot of money, so that I can afford to live in a house where the sanitation is perfect; and so I give in to human folly.’

But we will not cross question Mr Agate; there is always something unmannerly, almost brutal about the argumentum ad hominem, the confronting a man with the consequences of his own opinions. I have quoted this saying about sewage, because I believe it to be a survival, because I believe that it is the utterance of a doctrine now dying, soon to be dead.

With a kind of brusque and biting humour, no doubt, Mr Agate intended to signify that he was a utilitarian and a materialist; a believer of the school of Jeremy Bentham, of the elder Mill, of the sect known as the Philosophic Radicals, who uttered their voices in parliament as Bright and Cobden, who are expressed in literature by Mr Gradgrind, the Hard Fact man. The sect spoke in a leading article in The Times, when William IV was to be crowned. ‘What nonsense all this is,’ said, in effect, the weighty article.

‘What possible good can be effected by greasing (anointing) the person of the sovereign?’ And the gentle, though shallow, Macaulay prophesied utilitarianism when he spoke of ancient philosophy; of Socrates, Plato, Aristotle and the rest. The leaves of this tree of ancient philosophy are beautiful indeed, Macaulay allowed. But, he asked, where is the fruit of the tree? Do Plato and Aristotle lead to the gas works and the locomotive engine? If not, what is the use of philosophy?

And, be it said in all sincerity and gravity, this utilitarian faith is by no means to be blown away with a contemptuous puff of the breath. It appeals, in one way or another to all of us. Before we laugh at it, let us ask ourselves whether we are completely indifferent to our bodies, to our comforts and discomforts, to the body’s sickness and health, to its starvation or repletion. Suppose I say that I don’t think that Macaulay’s engine, or our motor cars and airplanes matter twopence, that it is of no real consequence whether we go fast or slow. Very fine; but my friends would tell me to walk to London and back, fifty-two miles in all, the next time I have to go to town; and then to say how I liked it. No; there is no denying that utilitarianism is a faith of universal appeal, of high cogency. There is only one thing to be said against it, and that is, that it is entirely incredible. We may be reciting the ‘I believe in one Utility,’ the ‘Our Father Bentham,’ the ‘Hail Sewage full of chloride’ and the rest: and the wind in the trees, or the glitter of the brook, or a line of Keats will scatter it all away; and we awake from nightmare, and know that the well being of the body is the means; the joys of the spirit the end. Utilitarianism, materialism are dying creeds: I shall yet see Mr Agate on the mourners’ bench of a better faith.

You can see signs of the change in all quarters and in all manners, both high and low. I hardly venture to touch on the esoteric doctrines of the sciences; but it has long been evident that Prospero’s exposition of the universe is far nearer the truth of things as modern science sees it, than the science, or rather, nescience of the Tyndall, Clifford, Spencer school of the ‘seventies of the last century. The very names of these people have already something obsolete about them; they will soon be utterly forgotten.

But let us not say more of these matters, which as I have confessed, are too high for me. Let us seek our signs in familiar things. Here is my instance.

Some ingenious person has invented a new cough-lozenge, a sort of medicament in which we are necessarily and perpetually interested, here in England. The benevolent inventor has called his dose (we will say) ‘Bung.” He advertises it, and his advertisement has just caught my eye on the back page of the paper. Here it is:

Teacher says:

Bung is best to ease the throat and warm the chest.

You observe that this eloquent appeal is in verse. Why in verse? To attract attention the better. But why should a jingling verse attract attention? It certainly does. The pleasing example I have cited is one amongst many: solid men of business, great concerns, the keenest professors of the art of publicity — a word I dislike — all entreat our custom with their simple rhymes. There is the Underground Railway of London: that sings:

Underground everywhere:
Quickest Way, Cheapest Fare.

And it was said that the late Lord Northcliffe, that great master of the art of advertising, paid a heavy fee to the author of:

Weekly Dispatch Best of the Batch

It attracts. But why does it attract? Let me ask you another. Why did Hesiod, who lived in the eighth century B. C., write his Works and Days in rolling hexameters? The Works and Days is a ‘Poor Richard’ book, a collection of the simple maxims of unsophisticated country folk, who love to hear their own experience, their own rough-hewn common sense corroborated and condensed into a phrase. ‘The half is greater the whole,’ says Hesiod to the man who will go to law, resolved to have his claim satisfied to the uttermost, forgetful of lawyers' costs. 'Many things fall out between the edge of the cup and the lip,'

'Potter hates potter, and one craftsman another' — one sees the origins of our 'There's many a slip 'twix the cup and the lip,' and 'Two of a trade never agree.'

But why did this remote, ancient, primitive Greek put his keen observation, his homespun wisdom into verse?

The reason is that poetry comes before prose, just as singing comes before speaking. Chanted poetry is the natural utterance of primitive man; spoken prose is a later artificial invention. All poetry was contemptible to the utilitarians, the materialists, the rationalists, the Benthamites: it was a senseless jingle, worthy only of savages.

And now; see how we return to the old way, and recommend our cough-drops with a song.

The fact is, that if we have anything of real consequence to say, we say it in poetry; and it is only natural that a man who has goods for sale should deem them of the utmost consequence.

MUTTERINGS IN THE DARK GROVE

‘FROM ENVY, HATRED, and malice,’ prays the Litany, ‘Good Lord deliver us.’ Black vices all of them; immorality of the most essential kind, since they proceed from the soul of the man, not from the body merely, like the ‘immorality’ of conventional — and corrupted — popular teaching. And of these three forms of wickedness, the strangest is envy, since it has no material justification, no rational incentive. You can put up a sort of defence for the vice of covetousness. Covetousness is practical, even though it be villainous. Here is a man with an ox and an ass, and I have neither. I covet the fellow’s cattle, and I will do my best to get them from him for my own use and benefit. At all events; covetousness has a material good in view, and can plead a defence in reason. But envy is a sort of transcendental form of vice; it is, like poetry and music, beyond reason; a corruption of the higher, not the lower, parts of a man.

To use a familiar idiom; you get nothing out of it. A few years ago, I was talking to that eminent man of letters, George Moore; and he was giving me a brief, rough sketch of a little play he had in his mind to write. The: period was the sixteenth century; and Bacon, with vast designs hidden deep in his mind, hovers about the Globe theatre in Southwark. Something about one of the actors arrests his attention, and he asks man’s name. ‘Shakespeare.’ The name attracts him; perhaps the contrast between the gallant and knightly picture in the word and the mean condition of the poor player who bears it amuses the mighty sage; and he determines that this illiterate actor, with barely enough of letters to learn his part, shall be the mask through which Bacon is to utter profound, immortal wisdom.

‘I like the notion,’ said my author. ‘It appeals to me very much. I think I shall do it.’

I wondered why he liked the notion. I asked him if he a lover of dons — the learned, professional class.

‘No,’ said he, ‘it’s not that. But the thought of pulling down the great figure of Shakespeare entertains me.’

There you have Envy. Note that, as I have pointed out, it is quite irrational. The envious man, if he succeed, gains nothing; since he only magnifies Bacon at Shakespeare’s expense. He has not even the horrid satisfaction of the Puritan, as he hacked and destroyed the carved work of the churches. The Puritan could boast that he had lessened the beauty of the world to an appreciable extent: but the Plays remain, whatever you say about their authorship. But there it is, and there you have the root of the portentous folly called Bacanianism. It has certainly brought about its own punishment, by beguiling its professors into such an abyss of imbecility as the world has never known before. It has gone far beyond its origins and primitive doctrine: that the plays accredited to Shakespeare were really written by Bacon. It has made Bacon the author of all the great literature of the age, both English and foreign. Montaigne’s Essays and Cervante’s Don Quixote are expressly claimed for him; and these claims are justified by arguments which would be quite incredible; if they had not been advanced. The occultists have taken a hand in this queerest of queer games. Bacon, they say, was the founder of the Rosicrucians and the Freemasons; and he was the secret director of the papermakers, who embodied the concealed wisdom of the persecuted Albigenses in their watermarks. It is all hideous balderdash. Its very existence is a sort of miracle of nonsense; it is all the result of the strange vice of envy.

And Shakespeare is by no means the only victim of this extraordinary passion. A distinguished author has written a book about the Brontes, and to my astonishment he revives in it the fable that Patrick Brontë deserves some of the credit generally given to Emily Brontë alone for her book, Wuthering Heights. Nothing that can be called evidence is adduced to prove this assertion. A great deal of old literary gossip and idle chatter has been told anew, but repetition cannot turn what the soldier said into evidence. Emily Brontë was reserved, averse from society, difficult of approach. This is true; what is not true is the deduction: therefore it is impossible that she should have written Wuthering Heights; with the further deductions that Patrick Brontë must have written it for her, and that Charlotte accepting the book as wholly and solely the work of her sister was a deliberate liar. It is all wild extravagance; as wild almost as the Bacon-Shakespeare delirium, and like it, due to the mysterious sin of envy: the desire to lower a high figure. It is strange; but there was an attack directed against this high and tragic figure of Emily Brontë from another point of view. Between forty and fifty years ago, somebody — I forget his name — wrote a book in which he asserted that the story of Wuthering Heights was, in fact, the story of the Brontë — or rather, Prunty — family in Ireland; that the Pruntys had been dispossessed and ruined by an interloping Heathcliff; and that Emily, writing her book, was merely retelling the family legend, as she had received it from her father. Proof? Not a vestige of proof, not a scintilla of evidence; no reason to suppose that there is a word of truth in the tale: and yet it proceeds from the same motive as the assignation of the authorship to Patrick. The process of thought is more obscure, far less offensive in its method, far less repugnant to ordinary common sense; but the trend of it is plain enough. If Emily Brontë were no creator, but merely a reteller of a family tale: then, evidently, she is by no means so great a person as we supposed. The end of the one attack is as the end of the other.

— By the way, and quite apart from the main argument, it is odd to note how men vary in their tests as to the possibility of one or another having written the books assigned to them. The Baconians say that a man who wrote such a vile and crabbed hand as Shakespeare could never have written the plays. But when Charles Kingsley received a letter from Dean Stanley one morning, he took it to the window, and said at the end of ten minutes: ‘I am sure this is a beautiful letter of dear Stanley’s, but, so far, the only word I can read looks like ‘damn’.’ And Andrew Lang had a special compositor assigned to him at the printing house; the only man who could read his copy. Shakespeare’s father was a general dealer: and so they say that Shakespeare could not have written the plays. Keats’s father was a groom, who married the widow of the man who kept the Livery Stable in Moorfields: but they do not say that Keats could not have written the poems. Shakespeare has been called a ‘yokel’ — as American would say, a ‘rube,’ a ‘hayseed’ — and so they argue that he could not have written the plays. But Hogg, the Ettrick shepherd, was, by his origin an illiterate boor and remained a boor all his days: yet nobody denies his authorship of the exquisite and mystic Kilmeny. I do not know why the standard applied to the one is not applied to the other. —

Well, envy, as we have seen, is a hideous vice, highly to be avoided — especially since it leads us to make such dreadful fools of ourselves. And yet, like the toad, ugly and venomous: envy has this use, that it is a witness to the existence of the secret dweller in man, that strange creature who is both above the beasts and below them. Envy, as I said, is a transcendental vice, a sin of the spirit, not of the body. Man has his habitation in the streets and in the market-place; but he dwells also in an ancient grove. He hears there the song of the nymphs: hic cantat et saltat aetemus nympharum chorus. But he hears also the evil mutter of the Ægipans.

THE OLD GRAMMAR SCHOOL

A CORESPONDENT IN America wrote to me a while ago, and asked me for my views on education. I gave them; and they were much to this effect, though I quote from memory. There is only one way of education, I told my friend, wrapping purple and dictatorial robes about me. You must go to school in an ancient town; rather, if it can be managed, in an ancient cathedral city. I will not say that cloisters are absolutely indispensable, but if they may be had, it will certainly be very much the better. A quiet green quadrangle, a close within a close, will do a great deal of good, and there should be grey walls about these green still places, and late fifteenth century stone mullioned windows looking out on them, and behind these walls and windows the abodes of Priest Vicars, or Vicars Choral, or Minor Canons. Gardens, where peaches ripen on old red walls, slope down to the river; the mystical mount of the cathedral rises above all; and somewhere in a nook near all these delights, is the old grammar school, built itself of old stone, founded five hundred years ago: though a thousand year old foundation, if you can get it, is better still. To such a school, thus girt about with beauty and peace, must you go when you are ten years old or thereabouts, and for the next eight or nine years you must devote yourself to Latin and Greek and to very little else. You must grind away at the dry grammars of both these tongues till the knowledge of them is mechanical, subconscious: like the technique of the violinist. Year after year, the process must go on, till you are ready to render the Stock Exchange Article into Latin Elegiacs, and the Lady's Page into Greek Sapphics with careless facility. Then you can go — and learn anything you like. You have been ground; you are sharp. If it be, unfortunately, your destiny to earn your living by talking or writing nonsense, you will be able to do so with a far rounder relish than anyone who has not gone through the classic mill.

Thus, in writing to my American correspondent, I was given the craft to keep back the truth, I acted the old tag: Simulo quod non, dissimuloque quod est. I pretended that the educational scheme I have indicated above was still at work; I dissembled the true state of things. The parent of today would have to fight the head master to secure for his son the true classic curriculum. I picked out for my own son the oldest foundation within my means. It was only early Elizabethan, I regret to say, but it had the repute of being a place which stuck to the ancient ways; and I was careful to enter the lad on the classical, not the modern, side. Before long, I found that he had given up Latin verse and was, instead, reading a text book called, From Metternich to Bismarck, and was also endeavouring to master the history of the political intrigues between the great Whig families of the eighteenth century. Indeed, this latter affair is one of the profoundest chapters in the huge, unedited History of Nothing] but growing boys are not ripe for such deep studies: it is, or should be, the peculiar use and privilege of their age to learn something; even if it be only: Dum, in the sense of until, is followed by the subjunctive. Indeed, I remember well a friend puzzling over a prescription that the doctor had given him for his neuralgia. Sumendus dum dolor absit ran the signature; and the patient translated cautiously: 'To be taken while the pain is absent.' I bade him recall his boyhood, before the shades of the prison house of the Higher Mathematics had closed about him. ''Dum in the sense of until,' I whispered low. "To be taken till the pain goes.'

'True, the chemist would, most likely, have set him right; but why trust to the chemist?

I allowed, then, my American to suppose that England was still devoted to the two great literatures of the ancient world. He wrote back enviously. 'I love your system of education,' he said, 'for its complete lack of democracy,' and added that in his opinion democracy was responsible 'for half of our troubles.' I daresay he was right enough there; but he was wrong in thinking that the old grammar schools were undemocratic. At all events, my old grammar school was very far from being exclusive. The boys were the sons of county parsons, of doctors, lawyers, squireens, farmers, and the town tradesmen. It was not that the grocer and the ironmonger wanted 'to turn their sons into gentlemen.' In two instances that I remember, the lads went cheerfully from Sophocles to the shop. The ironmonger, I recollect, was especially anxious that his boy should become an elegant Latin versifier. The grocer's son was somewhat to seek in this art, and I did his elegiacs for him; my fee being a pound of Roquefort cheese, which, I suspect, cost him very little. And now, I hope, both of them flourish in Blackfriars Street and the High Way. They must long have passed the Chair, but I have no doubt that they follow His Worship the Mayor in all their bravery to the Cathedral on the great feast days of the year. The old grammar school was a good, sober, altogether English thing. It was not high minded, it had no proud looks, nor windy pretensions. It undertook to teach Latin and Greek thoroughly. It did so; and it is gone.

RIDDLES AND SYMBOLS

HOW ARE WE to explain the enormous attraction that a puzzle, a riddle of any kind has for nine-tenths of humanity?

To take an example, the thing called Crosswords. It became a popular diversion, I suppose, ten or twelve years ago. I noted its arrival, I remember thinking that it might last a year or perhaps two, and then be forgotten. So far as I can see, Crosswords are more popular than ever. And they are not merely the delight of the simple; there are Crosswords for the learned, enigmas that require deep and curious reading for their solution, towards which no little hand-books of allusion nor easy dictionaries will avail. For all I know Crosswords will outlast Democracy. And there I set a little Puzzle of my own: is the period implied long or short?

At all events, and whatever happens, and even presuming the extinction of those odd, chessboard diagrams: we may be sure that some successor will be found; mankind will still continue to delight in enigmas of one kind or another.

But why? Because, as I said before, worry is such an essential part of life that if we have no actual worries we must go forth and invent them? That may be part of the explanation, but it is too general; we want something more specific if we are to elucidate this all but universal passion for the riddle. And, perhaps, the answer is that we love enigmas because we live in an enigma; and riddles may be as necessary to our spiritual, or mental, health as oxygen is to our bodily. Indeed; lacking oxygen, we perish; and it may be that man deprived of puzzles, would also perish, would cease at all events to be man as we know him. There is a well known text about seeing in a glass darkly; the Latin version is per speculum in aenigmate — in a glass in a riddle. We see, not the real things, but the symbols of them; and there is this deduction, which, I think, is permissible: the symbols may be utterly unlike the realities. To take a very familiar and easy example: we say that an anchor is a symbol of hope. Very simple, a little too simple, it may be, to be impressive. As an anchor preserves the ship in the storm of deep waters, so hope preserves man in the tempest of his life. But how little resemblance there is between this pronged and barbed mass of iron, and the emotion, the resolution of the soul that we call hope. And how futile would be the work of the surgeon who should make an autopsy on the body of a notoriously hopeful man, a man of whom they said, ‘he always kept hope in his heart,’ thinking that he might discover a small iron anchor imbedded in that muscular organ. I wish this were an extravagant instance; since I do not like to believe that our age is as stupid as many hold it to be. But it is by no means extravagant. In quite recent years, an eminent man of science, demonstrating in an easy and jocular manner the non-existence of angels, showed that if the angels’ wings were to have any power of propulsion, the angels’ breast bones must project immensely; at least eighteen inches from the main structure of the body, if I remember rightly. In other words, he proved that anchors cannot be part of the structure of the human heart, and, therefore, that there is no such thing as hope.

The confusion of the personage who picked the angels’ wings to pieces is, of course, a confusion over a very simple symbolism, a confusion such as one would look for rather amongst literal and unsophisticated savages than amongst civilised men. But there may be symbols more obscure than the pictured intimations of security and swiftness; chiefly obscure perhaps, because they are not generally recognised as symbols at all. Take for example the science of arithmetic, a steadfast thing, so we would all declare, feeling that, though often tiresome and inconvenient, it is more surely founded in hard fact than are the bases of the everlasting hills. But consider this old, old riddle of the Greek philosopher, whose name, I regret to say, I have long since forgotten.

You are to imagine a race; a speed contest. And, oddly enough, the two runners are, Achilles, the swiftest of men; and the Tortoise, the slowest of the beasts. Let us say, if you please, that Achilles runs a hundred times faster than the Tortoise — you may say, if you like, a thousand times; but the puzzle is not affected, and a multitude of noughts do not decorate the page. Very fairly, the swift-footed hero is penalised or handicapped: Achilles stands poised at scratch, while the Tortoise has a start of a hundred yards. They are off: and you expect to see Achilles flash past the tardy reptile almost with the speed of light.

But it is not so. Let the difference between the speeds of the competitors be remembered: it is the ratio of 100 to 1. Therefore; when Achilles has run the hundred yards that separate him from the Tortoise; that beast has run a yard. Achilles spurns that yard behind him: but the Tortoise has still the advantage, though it be but the hundredth part of a yard. Achilles may well think that the race is over; but he is mistaken. The Tortoise is still in front. Not by a great deal; only by the thousandth of a yard; but it will serve. And so into the waste of infinity the race goes on. The space that separates the two eternally grows less and less, but cannot be annihilated: the Tortoise is in advance for ever.

And this shocking enigma has weighed upon the world for two thousand four hundred years or more. Many solutions have been attempted, but, so far I know, none has been successful. One of the most futile is one of the oldest: solvitur ambulando: try it and see what happens; get your quick runner and your tortoise, see the man go past the reptile in a flash, and think no more about it. But this will never do. As De Quincey points out; the essence of the puzzle is in the opposition between theory and practice. Of course we know that in fact Achilles would be vanishing in the distance, while the Tortoise was still crawling painfully across his first foot of space; but arithmetic opposes her Everlasting No; to this monstrous goal does our belief in the science of two and two make four lead us.

I believe that the philosophic inventor of the riddle considered it as an argument against the possibility of motion. It might equally be taken as an argument against the validity of reason. Or, again, it might be held to annul and make void the whole art of arithmetic with all its laws.

But I believe the sane conclusion to be that arithmetic is a symbol, just as the points, lines, plane surfaces of geometry are symbols. These things, as we know them, are not realities. We can draw a mark on the paper, and say that it is a line. It is not a line; for a line, by definition, is length without breadth; and no mortal hand can form that, nor any mortal eye behold it. But the mark on the paper is a symbol of a line, and sufficiently serves our limited ends and purposes.

There is, doubtless, a real geometry and a real arithmetic; but they are not to be discerned in the dim glass of humanity. They belong to another order of being; to the world of the clear vision.

THE HOLY GRAIL

'IF WE ARE to enjoy life as it should be enjoyed,' I said to the company sitting under the sixteenth century beams of the King's Arms Inn, 'we must have mystery; some sort of enigma, or puzzle, or problem to solve. To each man, his mystery according to his measure: a Crossword Puzzle — or the legend of the Holy Grail.'

It is the truth, though nobody will believe it, though many have fought with the mysteries and with the mystery of life itself as if these were wild beasts at Ephesus. One of these fights is called the Reformation; and from the seeds sown on that sad battlefield grew popular Protestantism, and Vegetarianism, and Teetotalism, falsely called Temperance: all the grievous and weary table of taboos which make life — a trying business at the best of times — a little more trying, a little more hard to bear than it need be.

Then there was another rising against the mysteries: the battle against the mystery of the Lord's Anointed. I have seen the ceremony, and heard the words of the rite— 'Be thou anointed on the breast with holy oil' — which make a man into a King. Well; this mystery was found to be intolerable long ago; and thus came Democracy — which is now beginning to be found out in all sorts of quarters, some of them unexpected enough. The rule of Stalin is not exactly democratic. 'We don't want to hear about majorities; we are in a minority, and we mean to get what we want,' says An Poblacht, the organ of the Irish Republicans, Professor Unamuno was, perhaps, the most eminent Republican in Spain: before the Republic. A few months ago, he said, 'This government — the government of the Spanish Republic — is worse than the Inquisition.'

But all this by the way; to be considered as an argument in favour of the mysteries in general, and as an introduction to one of the greatest of literary mysteries; the origin of the legend of the Holy Grail. Here is a puzzle which is complete in every respect; since it is hardly possible to utter three words on the subject without qualifying them directly afterwards.

For example: the Grail romances were written between 1170 and 1220. What did the word, Grail, mean to the readers of these romances? Well, it meant to them a very big dish, of a certain depth. It was the dish on which the show piece of the medieval banquet was set: the Boar's Head, or the Peacock. One must think of something very like the dish set before Papa at the midday Sunday dinner of the early and middle Victorians. There was Papa, and Mamma, and the eight children. There was Aunt Anne, and Cousin Ottery, and her two little boys. There was the Governess. There was the Curate. And for this company and for the four or five servants, a big sirloin was needed, and a big dish to hold it and its accompanying gravy. And just such a dish, of precious metal, certainly, came into the mind of the twelfth century reader of the romances of the Grail.

But, you will say, this is, from every point of view, intolerable. The Grail is a Chalice. Exactly. Robert de Borron, one of the earliest writers on the subject, says so. He says that the Grail was the bowl in which Joseph of Arimathæa gathered the Blood of the Lord, as he laid His Body in the tomb. But he also says that the tomb itself was an image of the Chalice, while the stone covering the tomb was a figure of the Paten. And then he proceeds to speak of the Chalice as if it were the Paten; as if it held the Bread and not the Wine. It will be said that this is a pack of inextricable confusion. Indeed it is nothing else; and here, be it remembered, we are dealing with the work of one writer. Another of the early romances, the Grand Saint Graal, describes the Grail as the Paschal Dish of the Passover, the dish that held the Paschal Lamb; and this identification, it may be noted, is consonant with the meaning commonly assigned to the word in the twelfth century, but entirely dissonant from the Chalice conception.

We vacillate, then, between the contradictory images of Chalice, Dish, and Sepulchre; but we are by no means at the end of our perplexities. In the Parzival of Wolfram von Eschenbach (written before 1210) the Grail is neither Tomb, Chalice, nor Dish. It is a Stone, on which a Dove from Heaven lays a Consecrated Host once a year, on Good Friday. This Stone is named Lapis Exilis, which I believe to be Lapis ex coelis, the Stone from Heaven. And its ordinary office is to supply the Knights who guard it with a perpetual feast of meat and drink; preserving them also in eternal youth. It is not difficult to understand how a century or so later the word Grail meant in Germany a revel, a debauch. Finally, it should be said that the late Dr

Skeat, of Cambridge, the philological expert, derived the word Grail from a conjectured Low Latin word, cratella, a diminutive of crater. This would mean, a small bowl.

And so, at the very beginning of the study of the subject; rather, before we begin to study the subject, we are involved in a maze of confusion and perplexity, of irreconcilable definitions of the Vessel about which the Romances revolve.

And how to account for this very extraordinary state of things? Strictly speaking; there is no true explanation. That is, we cannot show that Chalice, Sepulchre, Dish, and Stone were really the same thing; that there is nothing irreconcilable between the various definitions of the sacred object. They are irreconcilable; just as Shakespeare's account of the colloquy between Hamlet and the Ghost is irreconcilable with Hamlet's later definition of the grave as that bourne from which no traveller returns. There is a dissonance here which cannot be resolved; but we may guess how it happened. Shakespeare was refurbishing the old play of Hamlet, and introduced his own disbelief in ghosts, without noticing, or, perhaps, without caring that the Ghost remained the hinge on which the drama turned. So, with this Grail puzzle: the solution of the dissonances, or, rather, the explanation of the way in which they came about has its analogies with the solving of the Shakespearean difficulty. We have not one man rewriting an old play: but we have several men working on several ancient legends and adding to the old stories new matter of their own.

Some years ago, Professor Saintsbury, the man who had read everything, and was reputed to be the most learned literary student in the world, was confronted by the Grail riddle. In spite of his all but universal knowledge of literature, he gave it up. He could find no trace of the legend in the first half of the twelfth century. Geoffrey of Monmouth, the glorifier — though not as some hold, the inventor — of King Arthur, knows nothing of the Grail. The Mabinogion, embodying some very old Welsh legends, has not a hint of it. And then, in a few years, as Professor Saintsbury expresses it, 'the heather is on fire.' One Grail romance follows another. The Professor leaves the riddle where he found it.

And I propose almost to follow his example: excepting for a hint or two to be taken or left, as the reader pleases. And, in the first place: no quester, however curious in his research, will find any trace of what may be called the Chalice Motive in pre-Grail literature. The Holy Cup, with its most sacred Content, was an invention of the twelfth century; not a Celtic legend of remote antiquity. And note here that the Parzival, the early thirteenth century version, written by the German, Wolfram von Eschenbach, knows nothing of Chalice or of the Bowl. The Grail of the Parzifal is a Stone.

But, though we shall find no mention of Chalice or Bowl containing the Precious Blood of Christ; we may find in obscure places, the first elements of the conception, the root from which it grew. Professor Saintsbury was an omnivorous reader; but, probably enough, if he so much as heard of the Legend which William of Malmesbury wrote about the year 1130 for Glastonbury Abbey, he would have classed it, unseen, as one of those books which are no books. But, in this Legend, written, no doubt, from information imparted by the Glastonbury monks, it is stated that somewhere in the Abbey precincts there is buried the body of St Joseph of Arimathæa, and, with the body of the Saint, two vials containing the Precious Blood. And here we have the origin of the Chalice Motive.

Again we must search in strange quarters, remote from literature, as it is ordinarily understood. A Welsh bishop of StDavid’s, who called himself something like Rhygyferch, but who was known in Latin as Ricemarchus, wrote the Legend of St David, somewhere towards the end of the eleventh century, say, about 1090. He speaks of an altar — a portable altar is, no doubt, intended — given to St David by his consecrator, the Patriarch of Jerusalem. In this altar, the Body of the Lord had been laid. It was called the Mystic Altar, and the Gift from Heaven. Since the Saint’s death it had not been seen by mortal eye. It remained hidden, covered with skins.

In such dark places, then, he who would know the origins of the Grail Romances must make his search. He will find, or so I believe, hints of the decay and ruin of a great Church, which once pushed its outposts to the very gates of Rome, and spoke with the Pope on equal terms; of its Liturgy, (‘the Grail Mass’), proscribed; of its mystic altars hidden away from profane eyes and profane hands.

If he be more fortunate: than I he may also discover how the pagan tale — a bit of folklore — of a magical feeding vessel was joined to the Christian and sacramental legend of the vanished, or almost vanished, Celtic Church: to the infinite confusion of the Grail romances and their readers.

And, in any case, the important thing to do is to get The Holy Grail: Its Legends and Symbolism, by A. E. Waite. It embodies the research of the last thirty years, and tells the whole tale, so far as it can be told, from beginning to end.

THE BITTER IMPATIENCE

IT IS NEARLY thirty years ago — to be exact, twenty-eight years ago — since I first saw Richard Middleton. We met at the New Bohemians; a club which flourished in its queer way from about 1900 to 1914. The War ended it. Some of the old members met again in company about ten years ago; but things had changed and we with them. We could neither laugh nor quarrel in the old way: it was all over.

The New Bohemians was a club in a pub, and came therefore of a very old and honourable ancestry, deriving from Johnsonian, nay, from Shakespearean origins. When I joined in 1906, it held its weekly meetings at the Prince’s Head in Buckingham Street; a narrow, undistinguished street that goes down from the Strand, not far from Charing Cross, to the river. Every Thursday evening, if I remember, a room on the first floor of the Prince’s Head was at our disposition. Here was a long table with chairs about it, and at one end members who came early, between six and seven of the evening, would find a white cloth laid, with knives and forks. Perhaps one, or two, or three would avail themselves of these facilities, and have a chop, boiled potatoes, and a pint tankard of bitter beer at a cost of eighteenpence or thereabouts. Others would drop in by degrees, and join in the beer and conversation. By half past seven or eight, a dozen men might be in the room. The cloth was drawn, a chairman was elected, and the set order of the night began.

In the first place, the waitress set before the chairman an old cigar-box with a slit in the lid. The chairman slipped a coin or coins through the slit, and passed the box round, the way of the sun. Everybody put in a coin or coins. Then, each man gave his orders: ‘half tankard of bitter,’

‘Scotch,’

‘bottle of Bass.’ The first named drink cost twopence, the other two, threepence each. The waitress brought them on a tray, the chairman opened the cigar-box and paid her; and somebody got up and said: ‘Mr Chairman, I beg to propose a motion that Toryism (or Liberalism) is the curse of the country,' or, 'that Paradise Lost is unreadable,' or 'that the English Church is an illogical compromise,' or 'that a great deal of Tennyson is negligible,' or that Swinburne is entirely wanting in true passion.' It might be anything; but whatever it was, we went at it hammer and tongs, till the tankards grew dry, and it was time to pass about the box again, and order another round of drinks.

But note that contrivance of the cigar-box with the slit in the lid. We were all sorts of people, following all manner of crafts. There was an admirable little fellow, with a taste for the play, who was a journeyman tailor, and used to set our table in a roar with stories of the tailor's shop and the Polish Jew master; stories of the Potash and Perlmutter order. There was an Admiralty official, a steady, stout good humoured fellow. There was a city solicitor, who had learned Latin on his daily journeys in the train. There were three or four journalists. There was an officer of the Customs, a newspaper cartoonist, a novelist or two, a musician, an actor, a writer of 'lyrics' for musical shows, and a few whose occupation remained a secret. Not one of us had money in any solid sense, but some had (sometimes) a little more than others. Hence the box with the slit; each man gave what he could; and thus no one member knew what the other gave.

Such was the society in which I found Richard Middleton; and I am bound to say that I do not think he was very happy in it. At that time, he was a clerk in some Insurance Office; but the desire of poetry already consumed him; and I believe that he found everything that was not poetry irrelevant and unpleasant. He was, I suppose, one of the youngest members. It is said that youth is a serious time. It is not so always; there are (or were) plenty of young men as careless and lighthearted as you please; but it is certainly true that when youth is sad, it is sad indeed, and Middleton saw a very gloomy world. Our fooleries irritated him, he was apt to take offence at harmless nonsense, and when he heard two members gravely discussing the comparative merits of the Sarum and Roman Rites, he felt that time was being scandalously wasted. Now and again, when 'Scotch,' and 'Bass' and 'Bitter' had gone their cheerful rounds for three or four lively hours, and it had been fully determined that La Belle Dame Sans Mercy was the greatest lyric in the world, quarrels, three parts burlesque, might break out with great (apparent) asperity, and members would be addressing each other as ‘Sir,’ in the heavy Johnsonian manner. We knew it was all nonsense, but Middleton took it seriously, and, as it seemed to me, enjoyed our ill temper much more than our good humour. There was an affinity between his spirit and the bitterness of things. A laugh would vex him, or at least give him very slight pleasure; but there was a sense in which he enjoyed a snarl. There are many good people who are, quite unconsciously, most at their ease and in their element when trouble seems brewing.

I have thought at times how much more fortunate Middleton and these other young fellows were than I in the days when youth and the desire of letters and poverty were upon me; these three things that are hard to bear when they come as companions. There was no jolly table at the Prince’s Head spread for me in those far off ‘eighties, there were no tankards filled, no friends to wrangle with and laugh with. I was allotted the solitary cell, and I have sometimes thought I was hardly treated. But perhaps not. Perhaps the bitter bread is best eaten alone, I incline to think so at the last from the example of Middleton. Here was a man of an intensely melancholy constitution, with a strong and just belief that he had the matter of poetry within him, with a burning impatience for success and acknowledgement; here was a man, you would have said, for whom the New Bohemians should have been the best medicine in the world; distracting him from his sad contemplations, from those sudores et angores et dolores which are so often the portion of lettered men. The cure for these dismal maladies is, one would think, just the jollity and nonsense and good fellowship and argument to be taken in a tankard of beer that our old Club proffered. Avalez, ce sont des herbes, the New Bohemians cried cheerfully; but on Middleton this good dose had no effect. It was to him ineffective gall and bitterness, like the rest of life; and he had not the patience to wait for the transmutation of the cup.

LOST BOOKS

READING DICKENS… IT is strange to see, emerging from the novels he wrote, like fumes from a cauldron, the vague cloudy emanations of the novels he never achieved.

That is a quotation from Miss Sylvia Townsend Warner’s introduction to The Week End Dickens, a book that every good Dickens man must buy very quickly. For its title tells its purpose. It is not at all meant for that feeble and unworthy race who are content to study their authors in books of ‘selections’ and ‘choice passages’ and ‘wit and wisdoms.’ It is by no means for your tit-bits scholar. On the contrary: it is intended for the man who knows his Dickens backwards; for deep students who can reel off the plot of No Thoroughfare and indicate the scheme of the Mudfog papers.

The case is thus. The good lover of Dickens now and then leaves his home and his books; perhaps for week ends, as Miss Warner suggests, perhaps for waste places. He cannot take with him the whole seventeen volumes. He cannot exist without Dickens. The position is desperate; but The week End Dickens solves the problem. It goes into a small pocket; and all the essences of Dickens are contained in it.

But that by the way. Our affair is with that sentence in the Introduction concerning those tales that Dickens never wrote. I believe that the point is well taken. Miss Warner particularises. Dickens had floating in his consciousness— ‘mind’ were too precise — a dim notion of a novel about the Marshes. This became Great Expectations. And then, again, there was the great London novel:

… dark with fog, daubed with the rich colours of cheerful taverns, or red blinds screening warm parlours; a London of tangled alleys, lost graveyards, solemn deserted wharves at night, with the mysterious river running through it.

That novel, we may say, is dispersed through the volumes. A great deal of it is contained in Pickwick. Look in The Old Curiosity Shop for the passages describing the end of Quilp: that is a tremendous chapter of the London novel. The plot of Little Dorrit is most tortuous, most futile; and Clennam is almost as uninteresting as the people we meet every day. But the Marshalsea chapters: there is a splendid fragment of the great work that was not to be; and the bit about Dockhead in Oliver Twist — the scene of Bill Sikes's taking off — there is a purple passage from the lost opus. But one has to read all about little Oliver, not a very entertaining child, to get at it. And, worse still, there is Rose Maylie and her excellent clergyman: they are not to be avoided on the road that leads to Dockhead. And so I am always inclined to declare that Pickwick remains the best of all Dickens's books. There are better things in David Copperfield than anything in Pickwick. Mr Pecksniff and Mrs Gamp in Martin Chuzzlewit are supreme: so is Quilp in The Old Curiosity Shop. But think of that shocking bounder Steerforth, of the appalling Agnes; of young Martin and Mary; of Little Nell and her Grandfather. There are no such terrors to avoid in Pickwick. When you have once skipped the infamous first chapter, you are safe.

It is a curious thing, but it is true, that some of the greatest writers have had the severest struggles in finding the just medium in which to express that which is within them. Sir Walter Scott is a notable example of this paradox; and he succeeded, as perhaps Dickens succeeded, in spite of himself. I have no doubt Sir Walter intended with all his heart to write a Legend of Montrose, and did his very best to write a Legend of Montrose. What he did was to write a Legend of Dugald Dalgetty; and we are thankful for his splendid error. Sometimes, the two elements meet. A very striking instance of this is given by Leslie Stephen. Bailie Nicol Jarvie, of Glasgow, has been taken prisoner by Rob Roy's wife, and proceeds to plead kinship.

'I dinna ken,' said the undaunted Bailie, 'if the kindred has ever been weel redd out to you yet, cousin — but it's kenned, and can be proved. My mother, Elspeth Macfarlane (otherwise Macgregor), was the wife of my father, Denison Nicol Jarvie (peace be with them baith), and Elspeth was the daughter of Farlane Macfarlane (or Macgregor) at the shielding of Lock Sloy. Now this Farlane Macfarlane (or Macgregor), as his surviving daughter, Maggie Macfarlane, wha married Duncan Macnab, of Stuckavrallachan, can testify, stood as near to your gudeman, Robin Macgregor, as in the fourth degree of kindred, fur —

The virago lopped the genealogical tree by demanding haughtily if a stream of rushing water acknowledged any relation with the portion withdrawn from it for the mean domestic uses of those who dwelt on its banks.

But it will be noted, Scott does not really tell us what Helen Macgregor said. He paraphrases her remarks, gives us a polite précis of her speech. I am inclined to think that he knew quite well the actual words that the lady uttered; and that he found them a great deal too coarse for anything but a vague and stilted indication of their content. Still; it is often true that Scott falls into false heroics, into melodramatic bombast. The reason may be not that he was incapable of the true heroic, but rather that the weight of his time and world made the expression of it impossible. There was an heroic Scott. This man was a fervent Jacobite, a devout Catholic, and a firm believer in occult mysteries. And what would have happened to him, if he had spoken out and uttered himself in the Edinburgh of 1820-30, when Jeffrey edited the Edinburgh Review? It must be noted that Scott was no hypocrite; rather, his intellect conformed to the general thought of his age. As a rational being he submitted himself to the judgements of his contemporaries. They said that the rule of the Stuarts was bad and tyrannical, and had been well ended. It must be so, said Scott, everybody says it is so. But: at the same time, he was a good deal relieved by the death of the Cardinal of York, the legitimate Henry IX of Great Britain and Ireland. Henceforth Scott felt that he could give without any reserves or secret hesitations his loyal allegiance to King George III. So with the occult arts: they were absurd superstitions, relics the dark ages, to hint a belief in such things was to put oneself out of the court of intelligent and educated men. And, indeed, Guy Mannering cannot laugh too much at the astrology which he has picked up at Oxford, the last home and retreat of outworn faiths. But it will be noted that every one of his predictions is fulfilled to the letter. And Scott was accustomed to speak in terms of extreme severity of the Roman Catholic religion: and died murmuring the old Latin hymns. He was, in fact, a man divided against himself so far as these matters were concerned: it is no wonder that he was incapable of clear utterance when heroic speech was needed. His heart was fixed on the one side; his reason conformed to the common judgement of his day. And so, the books that he might have written are lost for ever.

TRUE TO LIFE

SO THEY ARE finding out, after all these years, that Dickens was a considerable man. I am amused. I knew that in 1873 or thereabouts, when I first opened the pages that I shall never close. But, through most of my working years, I have always been conscious of an undertone of contempt — of kindly contempt — when Charles Dickens and his books were mentioned. It was funny; you could hardly deny that. But Punch and Judy was funny, or the children thought so. And you would scarcely compare Punch and Judy with serious drama. I did, by the way. I said that Punch and Judy would outlast Judah, a very serious drama, by Henry Arthur Jones. And I believe that I was not far out in my prophecy. Still, that was the state of things so far as Dickens was concerned. People were indulgent. They said: ‘Excellent reading for boys’ — and changed the subject to Stendhal and the Chartreuse de Parme. As if you were to change the subject from Rembrandt’s ‘Mill’ to the anatomical drawing of a louse’s stomach!

Well; I gather that all this nonsense is over, or getting over. People acknowledged to be intellectual are writing books about Dickens. It has been pointed out that Proust was an earnest and indefatigable student of Dickens, that Proust discovered a deep and profound symbolism in Dickens. And so — as I gather — there is no more to be said. Dickens is a great man.

Am I delighted? Not vastly, I fear. I never am so much pleased as I ought to be on these occasions. For example; I know a good dinner when I have it. A little soup, hot, and clear, and strong: a roast fowl with a lettuce or endive salad: a dish of spinach done with cream, or green peas cooked, not in water, but in butter: a bit of Roquefort and a pear, or a few grapes: there, I say, is a good dinner; and when it is despatched, both body and mind cry gratefully, Amen. And I do not think that I am in the least gratified when Medicinæ Doctor, that well known scientific authority, comes along and begins to babble about proteids and carbohydrates and vitamins, and more especially about vitamins: and tells me at last that I have died scientifically, even to the last fraction of an ounce: ‘a perfectly balanced diet.’ No; I am certainly not well pleased; not a bit of it. For the fact is; that in my heart, I don’t believe Medicinæ Doctor knows what he’s talking about; I have a suspicion that the chatter concerning vitamins is humbug. And, furthermore, I hold a secret doctrine to the effect that, in the last resort, all science is a lie.

A lie, that is, as; a photograph is a lie; as a photograph of a landscape is a lie compared with the picture of it that Turner painted. Science deals in information; if you would have the truth you must go to the arts. For science is wholly of this world, but the arts communicate in their mysterious manner the secrets of that other world which lies beyond the vision of most of us. It is, doubtless, for that reason that people are willing to give enormous sums of money for the great masterpieces of painting. They want to see the truth, and that can only be seen through the eyes of the painter. Note well; there is no question of likeness. Clearly, it is beyond our power to ascertain whether Romney’s sitters were like the portraits that he painted of them. So far as I know, no possessor of a great landscape has troubled himself to visit the scene depicted with the purpose of verifying the painter’s accuracy. For, you cannot have a blueprint of the light that never was on land or sea. Though, by the way, the poet must have meant ‘the light that ever is on land and sea’ — if we have but the gift of vision to discern it.

Art, I say, is not chiefly concerned with likeness. And so, after certain devious wanderings, we are back again with Dickens. For, one of the main accusations laid against him by the foolish is just this: that his characters are not like anybody. That is; you, and I, and Tother, and even to Totherest, are ready to affirm and declare that we have never even been willing to say: ‘Though that bald man calls himself Mortimer and wears spectacles; yet we know him to be the veritable Wilkins Micawber.’ Very good; let it be so. And what about it? Where is the law providing that all characters in fiction must be like somebody that we have met? Who laid this law down? I know nothing of either law or legislator; nay, I am firmly convinced that they do not exist; otherwise, that the criticism of Dickens, declaring that his characters are not ‘lifelike,’ is nonsense. After all; the greatest romance in the world is Don Quixote and no man ever met or ever will meet anybody like Don Quixote. Of course we may say of one man that he is quixotic, just as we may say of another man that he is a perfect Micawber in his habit of waiting for something to turn up. But note the significance of that. By speaking in such a way, we clearly recognize the truth that it is the absurd heroes of romance who are real. They are the archetypes dwelling in the ineffable heaven of the imagination; we are their more or less feeble and confused copies. We see a man with certain qualities, and so we refer him to his archetype, Don Quixote or Mr Micawber. It seems fantastic; but I believe that if these great beings had the power of utterance as well as of existence, it is they who would say of the rest of us: ‘They don’t seem very life-like.’ Indeed, I think we must feel, all of us, how dim and shadowy we are compared with these immortals; how indistinct and vague is the figure that we make even in our own eyes. Many a man sets out in the morning glowing with high Quixotic resolutions, and slinks back at night a sunken, sorry Sancho Panza.

True to life? These figures of Cervantes, Dickens, of the great romancers are of the very heart of life, of the real life which art reveals to us.

INTRODUCTION

THE FOLLOWING ESSAYS on the matter of the Holy Graal were written in 1907. On its being proposed that they should be reprinted, I had thoughts of rewriting them; but I have changed my mind. In the first place, I am a bad hand at the new handling of old work; if I try to do so I find that the article, or the story, or whatever it may be, has, as it were, set; and is not to be made again into the likeness of anything recognisable. Secondly, I am not aware that any new light has been shed upon the mystery of the Sangraal. I have read Miss Jessie L. Weston's From Ritual to Romance, and have admired both its learning and its ingenuity. But Miss Weston has failed to convince me that the Graal Legend rests on the two bases of a fertility cultus and of a secret Gnostic sect which persisted in Wales up to the Conquest. As to the Gnostic sect; that, I think, is clearly a dream and a fable; there is no evidence of anything of the kind; and the hint given by Miss Weston that she has secret information from initiates is almost conclusive — to those who know anything about occultists. It is a melancholy thing: but a Dolorous Enchantment is laid upon these unfortunate persons, and the effect of this Enchantment is that they are seldom able to speak the truth.

The Fertility motive is not quite so simple. Let us grant, if you will, that the question of fertility, which is the question of life, both for ourselves and for our cabbages, is behind everything. If we go far back enough, it is clear that we can do nothing in this world if we are so unlucky as to be dead; and this applies equally to the phallic hypothesis of the origin of everything, which can be worked in very well with the fertility hypothesis. Sometimes there seems a conflict between the two, and on this point see Miss Harrison's treatment of the affair of the Maypole. Formerly — even as early as the unscientific age of Prynne the Puritan — the maypole was nothing more or less than a phallus, a gross symbol of the reproductive forces of nature. But Miss Harrison denies this. The maypole, she declares, was not an imitation phallus, but an imitation tree; it was originally hung with green boughs, and its signification was an appeal to the real trees in the wood to put out their leaves once more. Just as the sailor imitates the wind that he desires by whistling for it, so, says Miss Harrison, did the countrymen imitate the trees in the wood by making a mock tree, called a Maypole.

Now, supposing we choose to believe the one theory of the maypole or the other; or even both at once: what light shall we gain as to the actual emotions and intent of the seventeenth or sixteenth century people who danced about the maypole? I venture to say, none whatever. They were not moved at all by either consideration. They were not invoking the reproductive forces of nature by rearing up the image of the phallus. They were not addressing any invocation to the woods or to anything else. They were being jolly, or merry, at a certain time of the year, in a traditional manner. For all I know, our learned people may decide that the game of marbles was originally a reminder to the spheres to keep on rolling. If I am told so, I shall not deny the doctrine, but I shall maintain that the boys who handle their alley tors and commoneys on London pavements know nothing of it. Granted this hypothetical origin of marbles; it has nothing whatever to do with the game of the twentieth century as played by Bob and Bill in Southwark or Hornsey. So, dancing may have been in the first place an imitation of anything you like, an invocation of whatever you please, animal, vegetable, or mineral. But such considerations are wholly out of account if we are writing on the minuet or the gavotte; the fox-trot or the jazz. To put the same thing in a different way; if I call a friend — behind his back, of course — an imbecile, I am not thinking of a weak, old man tottering with a stick, but very likely, of a strong young man swaggering without one.

Or, to put the same thing in a different way again: the stimulation of fertility, animal or vegetable, has nothing in the world to do with the Graal romances of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and its connection, if any, with the legends from which the romances sprang is of the same nature as that which exists between ‘imbecile’ and ‘in baculo.’

In a word, I have read nothing in the books of the Fertility people which inclines me to modify or retract anything which I wrote on the Graal seventeen years ago.

And there is one last reason, a slight one, which has induced me to leave these notes as I find them. They open with a topical allusion to a tale which was current in 1907. I think it might be called the first of the foolish tales of Glastonbury. There have been many since, but in those days Brother Johannes had not forgotten his mother English and learned the speech of Wardour Street. The silly tale in question was to the effect that the Holy Graal had been found in a well or stream near Glastonbury, and in the first of these articles following I tell the story as it appeared in a newspaper. As will be seen, the newspaper, acting no doubt on information received, said that a British Museum expert had pronounced in favour of the antiquity of the supposed sacred vessel. I do not know whether this were the case, but I do know that soon afterwards an undoubted authority — I think the President of the Society of Antiquaries — declared that the supposed Graal was a modern forgery.

But the whole story was an odd one, indeed. It is a grief to me that I have forgotten many of the details, but in broad outline it was something like this. A gentleman is travelling in Southern France, and in the window of a curiosity shop he sees an object which attracts him strangely. It is a saucer-shaped vessel of blue glass, shot with silver. He goes into the shop, buys the object, and when he is back in England, shows it to his father, who is at once deeply interested and agitated. ‘This is most important,’ he is supposed to have said. ‘During my lifetime I must have charge of it, but when I die, it will come to you.’ I am not sure whether the tale represented the older man as adding: ‘This is the Holy Graal,’ or merely: ‘This is exactly what I conceive the Holy Graal to have been.’

Well, in due course of time the Blue Saucer descended from father to son. I do not know how long it had been in his possession before a voice or a vision or the sense of the fitness of things bade him place the vessel in a well or stream of Glastonbury. And I have forgotten, if I ever knew, how long it lay in the said waters, before voices or dreams or visions came to two young ladies of Bristol city and told them all about it. At all events they retrieved the object, and took it back with them to Bristol. It went on journeys then; it inhabited, for a while, a safe in a city office. And then, it would appear, it made a stay in the library of some great London house. Dom Adrian Gasquet was making some researches in this library at the time and was guided by the saucer, dropped, it seemed, somewhat unceremoniously behind the books on one of the shelves, to a volume, before unheard of, which solved all the difficulties of the thousand years dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. This fact I learnt from a document drawn up by a distinguished occultist; the very initiate who, a few years later, told a friend that the Germans who fell during the retreat from Mons were found to be full of arrows — shot, I suppose, by my own faithful Bowmen.

Somehow or other the ‘Graal’ found its way back to Bristol, where it was housed in a befitting shrine. Here it reconsidered matters in the light of modern advanced thought. It became liberal in its views and, naturally, strictly undenominational. Its standpoint approximated, so far as I can remember, to that of Brother Johannes, whom I have mentioned already, and it gave oracles on many topics, not being limited by the bounds of a narrow ecclesiasticism. After all, they didn’t know everything down in Caerleon or Camelot — or Judee. I heard of one of these oracles, from a friend of mine, who was then a teacher of singing. There was a concert at Bristol, and my friend was in the artist’s room with a lady, a pupil of his. He heard from the platform the strains of a violin playing a very indifferent modern composition.

‘Why on earth do they play that rubbish?’ he asked, with some appearance of contempt.

‘Oh, didn’t you know?’ replied the lady, shocked and awed also. ‘That piece has been ordered to be played by the Holy Graal.’

It must be fifteen years since I heard this history, and that was the last news that came to me of the Graal of Glastonbury and Bristol. Possibly it no longer manifests so openly; possibly it has been taken away and hidden in some secret place — say, in another curiosity shop. But I think the story was worth preserving. I have said elsewhere that I am quite sure that an invitation to witness the ‘Feeding of the Dragons: Morning Dress’ at Hampton Court would be pretty widely accepted.

There are two points which I should like to emphasise. It has been said by the upholders of the ‘pagan’ theory of the Graal legend that certain possessions and pageants in some of the romances can have no possible relation to Christian sacramentalism. This is true. These circumstances have no relation whatever to Christian sacramentalism. They come from the (doubtless) pre-Christian tale of Peredur or Percival; the Exile, Return and Vengeance story. They are presented before Percival to remind him of the wrong that has been done in his house, and to incite him to take vengeance on the wrongdoers. I have endeavoured to explain in the course of these notes how the two perfectly distinct stories were drawn together into one. The medieval romance writer believed, above all things, in combining his materials; and his materials were, more or less, anything and everything that came to his hand. A bit here from a missionary legend, a bit there from a folktale, a scrap from an apocryphal gospel, a reflection of the war between the Roman and the Celtic churches, a fragment of Welsh Hagiology, a notion gathered from the Lays of Marie de France, a 'high' doctrine of transubstantiation, 'traces' of bardic teaching, as much fighting as you please derived from the Gestes and human nature, the courtly story of sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere; these are some of the materials which the writer of Graal romances, 1170-1220, had in his mind as he sat at his desk. But, as I must repeat once more, while he revolved many things, there were two thoughts that were absent even from his nightmares: the thought of the stimulation of fertility, animal and vegetable; and the thought of the sect of Gnostic initiates who survived in Britain, almost into his own age. And if he had found himself thinking of the Spear and Chalice as sexual symbols, I believe he would have poisoned himself on the spot.

Then, another point: the case of the wounded, or maimed, or stricken King, who is the keeper of the Graal. It may almost be said that each romance has a different explanation of the King's condition. The confusion seems hopeless, the problem before the modern critic impossible of solution. But in the first place, one fact emerges: that since each romance writer gives a different reason for the Graal King's disablement it seems pretty clear that there was no reason to give; no reason, that is, in the legendary materials from which he drew his tale. One thing only was clear to the writer's mind: that the King, the Lord of the Graal Castle, the keeper of the Holy Mysteries, the entertainer of the questing knights was himself sorely stricken, unhealed by the Vessel of healing which he kept. Why? The authors of the romances did not know in the least, and so each one invented an explanation, the best he could think of. And it is my belief that the solution of this puzzle of the wounded King is to be found in the story of Bran, as told in the Mabinogion. In this story Bran is a British king who goes over to war in Ireland. He was remarkable in this, that he was so tall that no house could hold him. In fighting he is wounded by an enemy spear in his foot. Thereupon he calls his companions, the heroes, about him, and strangely commands that they cut off his head, and bear it to a certain castle or palace, promising that the head will give them as rich entertainment as ever he himself had done — so long as they forbear to open the door that looks on Cornwall. This accordingly was done; and for many years the heroes were enchanted by the Entertainment of the Venerable Head. They lived, as it were, in the state of Paradise, feasting and rejoicing, and listening to the singing of the Three Fairy Birds of Rhiannon, whose voices sounded close at hand and yet echoed as if they came from beyond the waves of ocean. The end will be guessed: one of the heroes at last opened the door that looked on Cornwall and Paradise was lost forever.

And here, I believe, we have the origin of the Graal King, Keeper of the Holy Things, Keeper of Paradise itself; and yet himself maimed, smitten, unhealed. And the odd thing is that a most curious parallel to the tale of Bran is to be found in the folklore of the Indians of North America. Mark Twain — of all people! — quotes it at length in his Life on the Mississippi. In the Red Indian story the primary fault was the neglect of a girl to observe a certain ceremony of puberty, whereon it became necessary that the head of her brother should be cut off, lest ruin should come upon the world. But, this severed head, exactly in the fashion of the Venerable Head of Bran Vendigeid, becomes ruler and administrator, guide and protector of the household.

It is barely possible that the Indian folklore has been ‘corrupted’ by Welsh missionaries. But this appears very unlikely, especially on consideration of the nature of the Indian story. And so, perhaps, the story of the Venerable Head is one of the oldest stories in the world. It went through its changes in Britain: the Fatal Wound remained, but the Head was no longer seen, save in one very notable passage in the Grand Saint Graal. The story was baptised, just as the demigod Bran became an early Christian saint in the estimation of uncritical Welshmen; and so in the end this strange figure and symbol of an infinite past becomes the mysterious Wounded King, the Lord of the Castle of the Graal.

THE SECRET OF THE SANGRAAL

It is really rather refreshing. ‘Scare heads’ are presumably inevitable; in the pleasing language of their inventors they seem to have ‘come to stay.’ Well; if we must have them it is much better to be confronted with:

MYSTERY OF A RELIC FINDER BELIEVES IT TO BE THE HOLY GRAAL TWO ‘VISIONS’ DISCOVERED AT GLASTONBURY than with an array of trumpet-toned capitals which tell us the King is going to meet the Kaiser at Marienbad. And the story told is quite a curious one. A saucer-shaped vessel, made of bluish-green glass into which silver leaf had been introduced, was found in a well at Glastonbury. The newspaper accounts leave its genuineness an open question; but we are informed that a British Museum expert who has seen the vessel pronounces in favour of its antiquity, and considers it to be of Phoenician workmanship. So goes the history of the matter; there is also a legend.

The legend is more difficult. It is an affair of spiritual voices, of visions declaring the vessel to be the cup used by our Lord at the Last Supper that He made, of seeresses who describe the object without seeing it, of dreams in which a woman appears holding the vessel in her hands, of a strange radiance which is diffused from this (possibly) Holy Relic.

But there are some curious points in the tale, apart from its supernormal ingredients. In the first place the cup reporters speak of the vessel as a cup. It is not a cup; it is a saucer; and therefore it is idle to speak of it as the chalice of the Last Supper. In the second place, the discoverers, who say it is the Holy Graal, once the great relic of Glastonbury Abbey, are apparently ignorant of the fact that Glastonbury never claimed the possession of any such object. William of Malmesbury, who wrote the Glastonbury Legend in the first half of the twelfth century, says that the body of Joseph of Arimæatha was buried somewhere in the abbey precinct, and that with his body there were two phials of the Precious Blood; the idea may have been suggested to Gul. Marisburiensis by the fact that a phial said to contain the Precious Blood had just been brought to Bruges. But so far as we are aware the monks of Glastonbury who ‘discovered’ the body of King Arthur in the reign of Henry II never ‘discovered’ the body of St Joseph or the phials.

Then, again, there is the consideration that, with one exception, the Romances insist on the final withdrawal of the Graal either into a vague region of mystery, or as in the great Galahad Quest, first to Sarras and finally to heaven. The one exception is Wolfram's Parzival, where the Graal is left at Montsalvatch guarded by the 'Templesiens'; but the followers of Wolfram, pressed probably by the universal tradition, bore away the Graal at last to the realm of Prester John. Of course, there is the question of what the word really means. Paulin Paris thought it came from 'Grail Book' (Mass Book); as a matter of fact the Gradual was called the Grail in the Middle Ages, and according to Ducange a Grail Service meant a morning service or mass. But more modern scholarship derives the word from a conjectural form, cratella, a diminutive of crater, and the word seems to have implied to the twelfth-century mind a sort of shallow desert-dish standing on a stem or foot. Now there is neither foot nor stem to the vessel just 'discovered' at Glastonbury; and yet it is odd enough that a sculptured stone at Nigg in Scotland depicts two Celtic priests bowing in adoration before something which resembles a saucer on a stem, over which hovers a dove bearing a Host in it beak. In this connection it must be remembered that the Graal was a vague object to the romance writers; in the High History, for example, the object assumes five different forms, the last of which is a chalice.

There is a very short and easy way of dealing with the legend. Somehow or other you get hold of a theory, make up your mind that it is true, and then manipulate your evidence. The simplest way is to select the particular romance which fits in best with the theory that you have acquired; and then you ignore all the other romances which may conflict with it more or less. The best instance of this method is Dr Sebastian Evans' ingenious and attractive In Quest of the Holy Graal. Dr Evans, it must be said, was the accomplished and admirable, if somewhat archaistic translator of one of the Romances, to which he gave the title The High History of the Holy Graal, and on this particular romance he founded his theory. It is an attractive one, as I have said; but it is quite terrible!

There is a very odd and inexplicable incident in most versions of the legend. Logres, that is Britain, is supposed to be in the doleful condition of enchantment; physically and spiritually the land languishes, and the keeper of the Graal is sick of a mystic wound. All that is required is for the chosen knight of the adventure to come to the Graal Castle; and then the holy vessel is borne before him as he sits in the hall. He must then ask what the Graal is and whom it serves; whereupon the evil enchantments will be annulled, the sick keeper will be healed, and all that is broken will be made whole. For one reason or another the knight does not ask this question on his first visit; consequently the doleful state of Britain continues and the wounded keeper of the mysteries is unhealed. It should be mentioned that the keeper is sometimes called the King Fisherman, sometimes the Rich Fisher; and this title, be it noted, is not the smallest of the many difficulties in this extraordinary tale.

Well; Dr Sebastian Evans knew what all this meant. I should first mention that in the particular romance which he selected Logres is not 'enchanted' on the arrival of Percival at the Graal Castle; misfortunes fall upon the land afterwards, in consequence of Percival's unhappy failure to put the question to the keeper. Here again is another illustration of the difficulties which beset the Graal student — the romances disagree with one another on the most important points. But Dr Evans' interpretation of the whole legend is, briefly, as follows. It is, he says, an allegory of the events which fell out in England in the reign of King John, when the realm was laid under an interdict by the Holy Father. Percival, the hero of the quest, is St Dominic; King Fisherman is the Pope, the King of Castle of Mortal (or Deadly Castle) is the Emperor. Sir Gawain is Fulke the Troubadour, Lancelot is the elder Simon de Montfort, and Galahad is St Francis of Assisi. The silence of Percival means that St Dominic omitted to ask the Holy Father a certain question. The circumstances were these: Dominic was conferring with the Pope on the Albigenses, with special reference to the question of the exemption from interdict enjoyed by the Cistercian Order. But he never thought of discussing the question of interdict and Cistercian exemption in any other country besides Languedoc; and so when England was laid under interdict, the Cistercians were not allowed to say mass — and this was the dolorous enchantment of the Isle of Britain.

This is the crudest outline of Dr Sebastian Evans' theory; and it must be said that it is worked out in his book with the greatest ingenuity and the nicest skill, and that some of the analogies between the history of the time and the High History are quite extraordinary. They are so extraordinary that I am almost tempted to believe that they were expressly contrived by the Great Enemy of the Literary Students — a very malevolent devil he — that Dr Evans might be led to adopt a theory which is, undoubtedly, quite preposterous.

It would be a tedious and long task to demonstrate the vanity of the Evans' theory; I hope its evident falsity will become apparent in the course of this note. But it may be said, by the way, that there is one fatal and manifest flaw which vitiates the whole argument, and that is that the Graal legend is the Legend of a Great Loss. The Graal in the High History is finally taken away into the unseen, in the Queste it is removed to heaven; another romance ends with the statement that it was henceforth seen of none 'so openly,' and the tales which carry on the legend of Montsalvatch remove the sacred thing to the realms of Prester John. But, in actual history, the interdict was removed and mass was once more freely celebrated; the discrepancy is quite fatal. And from another point of view: is it credible that a Cistercian, writing c. 1220 in Norman French, would ever dream of 'getting up' obscure Celtic legends and details of Welsh folklore with the idea of giving his ecclesiatico-political allegory a picturesque setting? Or, yet again: I am 'a man in the street,' I am sorry to say, as to the precise dates of the manuscripts, but I believe the learned are tolerably well agreed that some of the Graal Romances at all events were written years before the English interdict was heard of.

I have gone so far with Dr Sebastian Evans' theory because it is the most ingenious of all the 'straightforward' explanations of the Graal story. There are many other writers who are quite as certain, and not nearly so interesting. There is the 'pagan' school, which regards the whole story as a bit of pre-Christian Celtic folklore, into which 'Christian fetichism' was crudely and pitiably introduced in the twelfth century; there is the frankly nonsensical 'Sun Myth' theory, according to which Galahad and Merlin are 'sun-heroes'. This latter explanation has now gone the way of all such rubbish; but I daresay it has been succeeded by the equally ridiculous 'Covent Garden theory,' and for all I — know Galahad may now be explained in certain quarters as Caulahad, or Cabbage Hero. Then there is the notion that the Graal Romances are, somehow or other, a Templar manifesto, the veiled utterance of the 'secret doctrine' of the poor fellow soldiers of Christ. Here again we may say: how account for the introduction of obscure Welsh names, for the introduction of obscure Celtic customs in books which are supposed to represent the teachings of a cosmopolitan order of chivalry with its headquarters in the East? But the most decisive answer to this hypothesis is: that in the first place there is no earthly reason to suppose that the Templars had any secret doctrine, or, if we are to believe one or two very dubious charges made against them, their doctrine was distinctly anti-sacramental. And the doctrine of the Great Romances is, on the other hand, hyper-sacramental. It would be just as reasonable to declare that Ultra-montanism originated in the bosom of the Wee Kirk; but people will talk nonsense about the Templars. Then there is somebody who says that water was a symbol of purity, truth, wisdom, and salvation, and so the vessel which contained water became a symbol of these great things. It is fine; but as it happens the Graal did not contain water. There are other and still wilder theories, most of them devoid of the mere semblance of reason.

It seems likely that these attempts at explanation are so far from being satisfactory, because they attempt a task which is in the nature of things impossible. If you are asked to explain the Graal legend you are really being asked a dozen questions, not one single question; and the attempt to reply to all these interrogatories with a single answer is bound to end in failure. And, again; it is always a mistake to say that X is A when you know in your heart that you should have remarked that: 'There is a good deal to be said in favour of the statement that X is A' or even 'There is a bare possibility that X is A'. But it seems so weak to content oneself with such timid affirmations as these after a course of long and wearisome research; and so the bolder way is followed, and the truth is obscured. I want to say at the outset that I am content to be weak; what I know about the Graal is very little, but I have a vision of certain probabilities, some quite strong and some rather doubtful.

It is my opinion, then, that the Legend of the Graal, as it may be collected from the various Romances, is the glorified version of early Celtic Sacramental Legend, which legends had been married to certain elements of pre-Christian myth and folklore. I say legends, not legend, because it seems highly improbable that the numerous and important differences between the various romances could have arisen, if there had been one recognised legend, one Textus Receptus of the story. And the legend as we know it is a glorified version: it was the work of an age that knew how to transmute Norman architecture into the marvellous beauty of First Pointed, or Early English. I should think that this process in architecture, which we know did take place, offers a pretty fair analogy to the transmutation of scattered Celtic legends into the splendid and glorious history of Galahad and the Sangraal. Only, unfortunately, while we can point to tangible and mighty evidence in stone of the one process, we have only very fragmentary proofs of the other.

But I think we can say for certain that at least one X is A — that the origins of the Graal are certainly Celtic. Otherwise one would have to conceive the Anglo-Norman romance writer as ‘mugging up’ Celtic literature, learning Welsh, wandering over Glamorganshire and Caermarthenshire in search of obscure names on tombstones, which names he would presently carefully distort into a French form, making himself acquainted with the unending genealogies of the Welsh saints and heroes. He would, for instance, have discovered with some pains the name Avalloch in early Welsh pedigrees, and then have made it into Evelake, and have smiled at the result. He would have visited St Dogmael’s, inspected the Bilingual Ogham Stone with the inscription Sagramni maqui Cunatemi, and have gone on his way rejoicing, conscious that ‘Sir Sagramour’ in his forthcoming romance would be both melodious and entirely correct. I do not think that this was the way in which romances were written in the twelfth century; though a twentieth-century story-teller might well use some such methods. In the same way the High History has the following passage:

> The history witnesseth us that in the land of King Arthur at this time there was not a single chalice. The Graal appeared at the sacring of the mass in five several manners that none ought not to tell, for the secret things of the sacrament ought none to tell openly but he to whom God hath given it.

The history goes on to say that the last of the forms assumed by the Graal was that of the chalice, and that from the pattern seen in the mystery King Arthur caused chalices to be made for the churches of Britain, a ‘brief having been found under the corporal declaring that God’s will was that in such a vessel should His Body be sacrificed. Now in the Leabar Breac (written c.1097, but evidently following very ancient tradition) we hear that under the rule of Columcille or Columba there was a mass chalice in every church. It is difficult to determine the exact force of the these allusions, but Miss Evelyn Underhill (Mrs Stuart Moore), a very weighty authority in such matters, has afforded a possible explanation. She suggests that there was a strong Egyptian influence in Celtic Christendom, and points out that the hermits of the Egyptian desert showed a strong tendency to become Catholic Quakers; that is, to live solely the life of contemplation, without the use of sacraments. Hence, the command of St Columba in fact, and the command of King Arthur in the romance. This is, of course, a conjecture, but it seems to me a brilliant one. But I cannot imagine anything more profoundly uninteresting than an attempt to show that there is no connection between the passage in the High History and the passage in the Leabar Breac. Again, it is known, I suppose, even to those who know but very little of Celtic things, that every Saint in Britain and Scotland and Ireland had his holy bell — many examples of these bells still remain in wonderful preservation, some of them still retaining the reputation of miraculous powers — and in the chapter of the High History which has been cited the holy bell is almost of as much importance as the Graal itself. It was one of those that had been cast by King Solomon, one for God, one for Our Lady, and one for the honour of the saints. King Arthur thought that he had heard this bell ringing all the way of his journey from Cardoil to the Graal castle, and he commanded that bells should be made after the pattern of it. It is distinctly not conceivable that such details as these should be inserted to give an archaic and Celtic atmosphere to a twelfth-century tale; we are forced to conclude that the French or Anglo-French Romance writers were working on old Celtic materials; the people who say that the Normans made up the whole story out of their heads are clearly out of court.

So far so good: but now comes the difficulty: what did these Celtic materials amount to? Here knowledge ceases, and opinions, more or less probable, begin. But in the first place it would be well to be clear on one point: Percival was not the original Graal knight; though the first book (now existent) which utters the great word Graal of Chrestien de Troyes, of which Percival is the hero. It seems certain that Percival was not the hero of the old Legend, because the ‘Peredur’ of the Mabinogion, a late form of the Legend from which Chrestien doubtless derived his Conte, has no mention of the Graal at all: and such is the case with the English metrical legends of Percival. Peredur (or Percival), is, as Mr Nutt has pointed out, an Exile, Return, and Vengeance story, doubtless pre-Christian. Chrestien was engaged in turning the tale into French verse, hears some vague rumours of the Graal Legend, and mentions the Graal, so vaguely that it seems doubtful whether he knew what a Graal was. Wolfram von Eschenbach, who followed Chrestien, says, truly enough, that he had not got the right story; the appearance of the Graal is a mere dubious incident introduced without much reason into the tale of Percival. One can see, perhaps, what made Chrestien think of it; in the Mabinogion mention is made of a salver in which a man's head swims in blood; it was the head of Peredur's cousin slayed by the sorceresses of Gloucester; it was the reminder to Peredur that he must execute vengeance on these sorceresses. But a dish full of blood might well remind Chrestien of another strange story that he heard of a miraculous vessel; and so he, tentatively, introduces the Graal into his romance, into a tale of a quite distinct origin and meaning. Chrestien, then, does not count: but he coupled the name of Percival with the Graal Legend, and so we find later writers, such as the authors of the High History and the Parzival, adopting Percival as the Graal hero.

It is undoubtedly futile to make the story of the Sangraal a purely pagan legend, into which Christian Symbolism intruded at a late period. It is futile — to take one reason out of many — because the story of the Sangraal is essentially and chiefly a high, mystic, sacramental, and Christian legend: take away its Christianity and it is merely a queer bit of folklore. The Gargantua has, of course, folklore elements or traces, perhaps in the proportion of.0001 to the thousand, but the book does not owe its value or its interest to the old farmhouse tales about a giant. It is pretty much the same case with the Graal histories. There are, undoubtedly, pre-Christian elements in the mythos; the 'feeding properties' of the Blessed Vessel are, are, perhaps, the most distinct of these, and carry one back to the Bardic Cauldrons, to the mwys of Gwyddno Garanhir, who, it may be noted, derived his revenue from a salmon-weir, and may have thus counted for something in the invention of the title 'Rich Fisherman'. These were miraculous feeding-vessels — illustrations of a conception which is, perhaps, worldwide, which is certainly not peculiar to Celtdom, since there is a mill which will give a perpetual supply of flour to Kalevala. And one sees that these cauldrons of eternal refection could well be married to the instrument of the dulcissimi convivii, for there are numerous authorities which might be cited in favour of the belief that the Eucharist feeds not only the soul but the body. And on the other hand, the pagan cauldron was not wholly physical: it would not ‘cook the food of a coward’. We can see, I think, without much difficulty that the Cauldron of Ceridwen might well be fused with the Chalice of the Eucharist; and we may allow that certain properties of the Sangraal were suggested by the basket of Gwyddno Garanhir, the horn of Bran Galed, the cauldron at Tyrnog, and pan and platter of Padarn Beisrudd and other such food-and-drink-multiplying rarities of the isle of Britain.

And there is another point in which pre-Christian legend may have had an influence; that is the ‘quest motive’. Arthur ventured into the depths of the underworld in search of magic treasures, and here, I think, we have the origin of the search for the Graal, which I do not believe formed part of the sacramental legend in its earliest form. This was a legend of vanishing and of loss, not of finding; the two motives have been combined with wonderful skill in the Queste, where Galahad achieves the Graal, discovers the holy and thermaturgic object after many perils; and yet in the end Galahad dies and the Graal is borne up to heaven. And I really think that when we have admitted these traces we have given all the credit that can justly be given to the pagan elements in the story. And even in the matter of the quest idea which is decidedly most important; I am not sure that we have a purely pre-Christian motive. The wanderings of the Celtic monks may count for a good deal; it is wonderful to think that the typical adventure of the medieval knight-errant — the leaping into a boat without oars or sails, trusting utterly to the deep and the design of God, was, one might almost say, part of the ordinary routine of the average Celtic monk.

It is curious to note the final manifestation of the boat without oar or sails. It descended from the Celtic monks or hermits to the Arthurian knights, and from them it came down to the fantastic ‘literary’ knights of the Spanish romances of chivalry. And from these it passed to one who is, in a sense, the most glorious of all knights — though he is also the most glorious of all jokes. When Don Quixote discussed the matter of chivalry with the Curate and the Barber in the first chapter of the Second Part, he spoke thus:

No one now, issuing from the wood, penetrates yonder mountain, and then treads the barren, lonely sore of the sea — mostly a tempestuous and stormy one — and finding on the beach a little bark without oars, sail, mast, or tackling of any kind, in the intrepidity of his heart flings himself into it and commits himself to the wrathful billows of the deep sea… and finds himself, when he least expects it, three thousand leagues and more from the place where he embarked.

So much for the theory; and when it came to practice, the Knight was not found wanting. As Don Quixote and his Squire were riding by the banks of the Ebro, they discovered a small boat, without oars or any other gear, that lay at the water's edge, tied to the stem of a tree growing on the bank. Don Quixote at once dismounted and ordered Sancho to dismount. Sancho, a notoriously obtuse man, failed to draw the obvious inference and asked why. Whereupon the Knight answered:

> Thou must know, Sancho, that this bark here is plainly, and without the possibility of any alternative, calling and inviting me to enter it, and in it to go to give aid to some knight or other person in need of it, who is no doubt in some sore strait; for this is the way of the books of chivalry and of the enchanters who figure and speak in them.

And, in sober fact, even so late as the reign of King Alfred such a boat, with three monks in it, drifted on to the coast of Cornwall from some 'cell' on the shores of Ireland, and when the Northmen came to Iceland they found there a population of such adventurers. Celtic 'monk-errantry' is a strange matter; one does not know how far these voyages were the expression of missionary zeal, how far they were due to the desire for a greater solitude than might be had in the cell, for the 'desart in ocean' that St Columba's monk tried to discover, or how far they were really voyages to the semi-pagan, semi-Christian paradise, deep Avalon of the apple-blossoms far beyond the waves, the Glassy Isle where, some say, Merlin is hidden, having with him the Thirteen Rarities of Britain. In these voyages, undoubtedly, we have the origins of all that is most poetic and most romantic in the romances of chivalry; and the journeys of the Celtic monks may have had some share in the Quests of the Knights of the Graal.

There is another possible element which must be examined and estimated for. Though Dr Sebastian Evans is undoubtedly wrong in his main thesis, I should like to think that there is 'something' in another theory of his. Dr

Evans holds the view that Geoffrey of Monmouth’s curious book was written to order, written to further certain ambitions of the House of Anjou, which dreamed of a British Empire and a British Church — the latter independent of the Roman Curia. Geoffrey wrote of the glories of the British kings, and these glories, according to Dr Evans, were to be taken over by the Normans, as the legitimate successors of King Arthur. One wonders whether this were so; if so it would explain certain things which are at present hard to understand; it would explain, for example, how men dared to set up Josephes, an imaginary son of St Joseph of Arimathæa, as a rival to St Peter — as infinitely superior to St Peter. Christ himself, according to one of the Romances, makes Josephes bishop, styling him the Moses of the New Covenant. Was Josephes intended to be the legendary founder of a British Christianity, not merely independent of, but infinitely more exalted than the Christianity of St Peter and his successors the Popes? This is a question on which more light is needed; but if it were established it would certainly do something to explain the odd air of contemporary allusion which some of the Romances possess.

II

The evidence for the Celtic and Sacramental origins of the Graal legend is to be found, directly, in the lives of the Welsh saints, especially in the life of St David. Indirectly, it may be gathered from many works which treat of early British Christianity.

Now, before we began to trace certain analogies between our legend and the ecclesiastical histories, it will be well to say a word or two about Celtic Christianity. And in the first place, there rises the question: was the Celtic Church of the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries the continuous successor of the Christian Church which undoubtedly existed in Britain during the Roman occupation? Or, again: did Christianity conquer the whole island during the Roman rule, or was it confined, with exceptions, to the garrison towns and to the country adjacent to such towns? There is no certain answer to either of the questions. But the more probable opinion seems to be that the Christianity of St David, St Dyfrig, St Teilo, St Iltyd, and their successors was in the main a new, or a greatly modified form of Christianity, grafted perhaps on certain remnants which had survived the Roman exodus. There are reasons to be given for these (probable) conclusions. There are no early Welsh legends which profess to give the story of the first introduction of religion into Britain, though all the legends take it for granted that the faith was established from early times. The hagiology of the British Church begins, for all practical purposes, with the post-Roman period, and tells how Pelagianism having overwhelmed the island, certain saints from Gaul came over, routed the heretics, and established orthodoxy. It has been suggested that for Pelagianism we should read Paganism, and that the two saints, Germanus and Lupus, were, in reality, the evangelisers of Britain. No doubt, there were Christians scattered about here and there; but the rather late monumental stone, with the inscription Homo Christianus fuit, inclines one to believe that Christianity was the exception rather than the rule. Celtic scholars have wondered how an imaginative people could have been attracted by the heresy of Pelagius — which is more stupid and unenlightened than the common run of heresies — and the answer may be that the British never were attracted by this New Theology of the fifth century. Of course, there is the story of Bran Vendigeid; but here we have an evident transmutation of a purely pagan demi-god into a Christian saint. Gildas (a contemporary of King Arthur) knows nothing of this legend, nor indeed of any material whatsoever for the early history of British Christianity. We may take it then as a working hypothesis at all events that the early Celtic memory could go no further back than the period of the Saints Germanus and Lupus, and this period, therefore, would be, so far as our inquiry is concerned, the epoch of the Christianisation of Britain.

From which tentative but highly probable conclusion it follows that the Celtic legends which were available for the Anglo-French romance writers of the twelfth century were legends which referred to the saints of the fifth and sixth centuries, and not to the saints or missionaries of the first, second, and third centuries. These doubtless had existed; but for one reason or another they had not succeeded in dwelling in the Celtic memory. And so, when we read in a romance of Joseph of Arimathaea coming from Palestine to Britain in the first century, we may translate that sentence into: X came from Gaul to Britain in the fifth century. In other words, the British Church of the Romances is a glorification of the British Church from *c.*420 to *c.*666, about which time Cadwallader, the last king of Britain, died, the Relics of the Saints were removed or lost, and Celtdom and the Celtic Church began to suffer their long death-agony.

Now, the lives of St David, St Carannoc, and of other saints of the same period are accessible in histories which date from the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century; but whatever may be said of the date of compilation, the material used is certainly antique. There is little or no trace of Norman or Roman influence, and the manner of the legends and of the incidents described is exactly similar to the manner of the seventh century life of St Columba by St Adamnan. As an example of the primitive and uncorrupted state of the Welsh hagiologies, I may mention that Arthur, whose name occurs a few times, is very far indeed from having attained the position which he occupies in Geoffrey of Monmouth; he does not even foreshadow the Arthur of the Romances. In one tale 'a certain tyrant named Arthur' is punished by a saint for his impiety; in another Life he is represented as being in a district about twenty miles from Caerleon, the splendid capital of the later Arthurian legend, and Arthur does not know in the least where he is! Of course there may have been another set of early Welsh stories in which Arthur was already a mystic figure, indeed it is almost certain that this was the case; but the absence of all romantic treatment of him in the lives of the Welsh Saints proves, I think, pretty conclusively that we may accept them as handing on faithfully traditions of the seventh and sixth centuries.

These traditions, then, are legends of the Christianising of Britain, and of the great men who carried out the work — and such done into high romantic dialect is the story of the coming of the Sangraal. To take the case of St David first: his birth was foretold to his father by an angel in a dream. Sant (or Sandde) was to go out hunting, when he would find three things — a stag, a fish, and a honeycomb, prophetic of the son who should be born to him; and the adventure duly fell out as the angel had foretold. The honeycomb prophesied David's wisdom, 'for as the honey is in the wax, so he will hold a spiritual sense in an historical instrument' — a sentence which I venture to think a very remarkable one. But 'the fish denotes his aquatic life… therefore David will be surnamed David of Aquatic Life.' Note here the analogy of the saint and the 'Rich Fisherman' of the Graal Romances; and while this point is under consideration it may also be remarked that in South Wales there is a 'Church of the Watermen' — they were rescued from the water and nourished by miraculous fishes — and that one of the saints — Ilar is actually called Bysgottwr, or Fisherman. It is certain, then, that early Celtic Christianity was acquainted with the Icthus symbolism, and it would appear that at a later period the significance of the fish had been forgotten. The phrase ‘denotes his aquatic life,’ the title ‘vir aquaticus’ seem to show that the writer of the Life was ignorant of the fact that the fish is Christ, and more especially the Christ present in the Eucharist. It is not difficult, perhaps, to imagine that from this ignorance, this confusion, arose the figure of the Roi Pêcheur, the Rich Fisherman, who keeps the Graal, the Holy Vessel which held ‘the Mighty, Unpolluted Fish,’ that is the Body and Blood of Christ: panis ipse verus et aquce vivce Piscis. In the earliest of the Romances the ancestor of the Graal keepers is made to catch a fish, which gives him his title; it is not difficult, I say, to suppose that such a story should be invented to account for a forgotten symbolism; and the associations which I have noted between certain of the Welsh saints and the Fish are at least worthy of attention.

There are many curious circumstances in this Life of St David. At the Synod of Llandewibrefi it is said that David was acknowledged as ‘sovereign of the saints of the Isle of Britain… as God gave Mattheus in Judaea… Christ in Jerusalem, and Peter in Rome… so He has given St David to be in the island of Britain’. The passage is a curious one; there are already traces of the extravagant claims made for Josephes in the romances. Still more curious is another passage. The Patriarch of Jerusalem, who is represented as the consecrator of David, gave him: ‘a certain hallowed altar in which the Lord’s Body had reposed, which abounded in innumerable virtues. Never was this altar seen after the death of the bishop [St David] by any son of man; but it lies hidden, covered with skins… And hence the common people call it the Gift from Heaven.’ And in another passage this altar is called anceps (doubtful, perilous, mysterious), which may be interpreted by a passage from the life of St Carannoc, to whom ‘Christ gave an honourable altar from on high, the colour of which no person could comprehend.’ In these three quotations, it seems to me, one has already the germ of the Graal, and of the claims made by its keepers. For it should be noted that in the early romances the chalice idea is by no means a fixed and constant one. We have seen how in the High History the Graal assumed five forms, the last of which was the chalice, while in the metrical romance of Borron, and in the Grand Saint Graal, the Holy Vessel is taken as the antitype of the sepulchre in which Joseph of Arimathæa had laid the Lord, and Wolfram says the Graal is a stone called Lapsit Exillit — lapis ex coelis? It should be remarked also that the word graal (cratella) implies not so much a chalice as a shallow bowl on a stem; to the medieval mind it must have given the idea of a vessel something like the dishes on which dessert is served. St David's altar was, in the earlier legend, a gift from the Patriarch of Jerusalem, later it became a gift from heaven; and its 'virtues,' its thaumaturgie powers were due to the fact that in it, dominicum jacebat corpus. It is an altar, and yet there is already the suggestion of hollowness in its shape, and above all it is an altar in which the Lord's Body had been laid; it is not difficult to see how the name of Joseph of Arimathæa was suggested to later writers. And if the gifts which were called afterwards e coelo venientia were at first, in a more sober spirit, presents, though miraculous presents, from the Patriarch of Jerusalem; then, it would be likely enough that St David, at first consecrated by the Patriarch, should ultimately be consecrated by Christ from heaven. And the equations of St David with St Peter, with Christ Himself are undoubtedly in the same line of thought as the wild and extravagant claims made for Josephes in the Great Saint Graal. It is worth noting, too, how there is already something mysterious about the appearance of the Object; it is called dubius, anceps; the similar altar given from heaven to St Carannoc is of a colour that no man can comprehend; St David's altar was not seen openly after the saint's death, even as the Graal vanished in the romances. So, when William of Malmesbury was 'writing up' Glastonbury Abbey (c. 1130, perhaps sixty years before the earliest of the romances written) he speaks of St David's altar, known as Sapphirus, as one of the treasures of the place; lost for a long time and then recovered. I do not think that it is temerarious to say that in the legends of these Welsh saints, hallowed in the east, endowed with miraculous altars of divine origin and of wondrous form, evangelisers of Britain, there is the probable ancestry of the great romances of the Graal.

So much for the direct analogies between the Celtic legends and the Graal books; the indirect are, perhaps, as interesting. It is difficult, I think, to read the Lives of the Celtic Saints without recognising that a great deal of the atmosphere of the romances derives from the hagiologies. Take the following passage from the Life of St Columba by St Adamnan:

For three days and three nights he allowed no one to approach him, and remained confined in a house which was filled with heavenly brightness. Yet out of that house, through the chinks of the doors and keyholes, rays of surprising brilliancy were seen to issue during the night. Certain spiritual songs also, which had never been heard before, he was heard to sing. He came to see… many secrets, hidden from men since the foundation of the word, fully revealed.

One of St Columba's monks saw him on another occasion enter the church; 'and along with him at the same time a golden light that came down from the highest heavens'; this light was seen several times, and when the saint died the whole church was filled with heavenly brightness. It would be impossible to read of these appearances of celestial light without being reminded of the glorious brightness that accompanied the manifestations of the Graal. So when St Cadoc (to whom the Church of Caerleon is dedicated) died: 'a great brightness shone on the people devoutly engaged in performing his funeral rites, so that no one of them was able to sustain it'. And again in the life of St Fechin, a Scotch saint, we are told that when St Fechin entered his church the multitudes saw light shining from the windows and the doors. Another topic of the romances is illustrated in the legend of St Tathan, who found a little ship, without oars or sails, and entering boldly, was borne to Britain; and in the strange story of the Sacred Fire of St Cadoc, we hear how his holy relic, having been defiled by the profane, vanished away, and the hurts and doles were healed no more. St Iltyd, again, solitary in his cave by the shore, saw approaching a ship, on which was 'an altar divinely supported'. The oarsmen gave St Iltyd 'the perfumed body of a very holy man, whose name they told him, which he was never to utter'. Taking these and other similar tales into consideration; we might almost pronounce that the heroes of the romances are Celtic monks in armour; there has been a certain fusion between the 'monk errant' of the Celtic legends and the knights of Charlemagne, and from this admixture, which one may say was being realised at the time in the Templar Order, proceeded Galahad and the knights of the Graal.

Now, it is to be noted very carefully that when a Celtic biographer speaks of the 'relics of the saints' he does not mean their bones. He means any holy vessels or objects which have belonged to them: such as the altars of which we have spoken; books, bells and croziers. This is of great importance in considering the passage in Geoffrey of Monmouth, who repeats the prophecy of the angel to Cadwallader, the last king of Britain. Cadwallader died in foreign lands — in Rome, according to the Normanised Welshman of the twelfth century, but probably in the East, perhaps in Jerusalem, in the original legend. Prosperity shall return to Britain, says the angel, when Cadwallader's bones are restored to the island and when the relics of the other saints, which had been hidden on account of the fury of the pagans, should be revealed. Here, we see, there was an old legend which connected the vanishing of certain holy objects with the great loss and doom of Britain. In the romances the loss is a final one, so far as the relic — the Graal — is concerned; in the Celtic tradition there was to be a restoration of all things; Cadwallader was to return, Saxons were to be eradicated, and bards were to flourish, in the words of a poem in the (twelfth-century) Red Book of Hergest, which, however, makes no mention of any relics. The romances contemplate a certain fashion of restoration — Arthur was to return and rule once more — but the Graal, it would appear, has gone forever. Does this mean that the House of Anjou still clung to the idea of a British Empire, but had given up the thought of an independent British Church? I do not venture to give even an opinion, much less a judgement; I scarcely dare suggest the possibility of the politics, ecclesiastical or civil, of the time having had any influence in the concoction of the Romances. Wolfram, it is true, following a Graal tradition which differs curiously from the tradition of the Anglo-French romances, refers to the Chronicles of the House of Anjou as one of the sources by which he corrected Chrestien's imperfect and erroneous story: this may be either an important clue or an empty compliment to a powerful reigning house: I take refuge in confessed ignorance.

It is now time to examine a curious fact in Celtic tradition — that is the extraordinary veneration given to the relics of the saints, the remarkable powers ascribed to these relics, and the strange story of their hereditary keepers. We have already seen that in the Celtic Church practically every saint left relics behind him — bells, books, croziers, etc. So far as I know, the honour given to these objects, the miracles ascribed to them are quite unique in the history of Christianity; and I am strongly tempted to believe that the 'relics' were, in reality, the sanctified successors of tribal palladia, of certain objects which, mutatis mutandis, had exercised the same powers and commanded a like veneration in heathen times. The saint's relic, in Celtdom, could do almost anything: the prosperity of the tribe (afterwards, perhaps, of the race) was bound up with its safe preservation and reverent custody; and terrible penalties sanctioned the due observance of the relic ritual. Only those authorised by hereditary or acquired powers might so much as look on some of these objects; and in most cases they were enshrined in reliquaries, rich with all the splendour and mystic symbolism of Celtic art. And I think that it is worth noting here the very great difference between the Roman and the Celtic attitude towards such relics and holy objects. Briefly, the difference was this: the Roman view was that the more you looked on the relics the better for you; the Celts, on the other hand, held that unless you had certain special qualifications you had better not come near the relics, under pain of blasting or death. The Book of St Columba was borne in battle, and brought victory to the clan, if carried by one of pure heart — it is curious to note here the motive which, perhaps, developed into the conception of Galahad. Other relics gave oracles; there was a bell that refused to ring save in the hand of the saint for whom it was destined by God; another bell sailed through the air guiding its saint to an appointed place, other relics were angel-borne from heaven; one, being removed from its shrine and habitation cried aloud, day and night, till it was restored. Some healed diseases, others detected criminals or restored lost cattle. In a word, it would be very difficult to exaggerate the immense importance which these relics occupied in the Celtic mind; and at the present day the healing cup of Nant Eos is revered in Wales, not only for its potent cures, but also as ‘a Venerable Gift of the Almighty’. So late as 1887 a harper, to whom the relic had been solemnly exhibited, felt profound remorse for having treated the holy thing lightly and irreverently. The man came again in a miserable condition of mind, and he was only pacified by a second exhibition of the relic, to which he paid devout reverence. In Scotland and in Ireland many of the relics also survive; and some, wonderful to say, still belong to the descendants of their original keepers. Indeed; the keeping of certain relics was in many cases incorporated into the feudal system; charters are extant granting land in return for the due custody of some holy bell or crozier, and in one or two instances the keeper was even a sort of popular title of nobility. Sad enough are the ends of some of these old songs; a battered iron bell, with faint traces of its former splendours still surviving, turned up by the plough, or found by boys playing in a cave by the seashore; a poor Irish schoolmaster of the eighteenth century, last of the keepers, bequeathing some wonderful piece of Celtic workmanship to the man who had befriended him — such are some of the last chapters of these strange histories. The keepers, it should be remarked, were in almost all cases the collateral descendants of the saints whose relics they had in custody; and there was more than a trace of the belief that something of the original virtue and sanctity of the saint descended to his successor in the guardianship of the relics. It was remarked that the Irish of the twelfth century were so ignorant that they believed the possessor of St Patrick's relics to be ipso facto archbishop of Armagh. Such are the facts as to the hereditary relic keepers of Celtic Christendom: it is for the student of the Graal romances to judge as to the probability of the existence of these keepers having originated the wonderful story of the hereditary guardians of the Holy Graal.

M. Paulin Paris had a most interesting theory as to Galahad. We have seen that Cadwallader, the 'last King of Britain,' was in Welsh legend expected to return once more, restoring all things, and bringing with him the 'relics of the saints'. Cadwallader, indeed, loomed a more heroic figure than Arthur in the Welsh imagination; Celtdom canonised him, and the churches bearing the name Llangadwaladr were built in his honour. It is noteworthy that while all other Welsh saints are styled sant (or sometimes agius), Cadwallader shares with the mystic Bran the title of Blessed, or Vendigeid (benedictus). One does not know what was the true history of the real man's life and death, there are various stories; but it is certain that the date assigned for his death coincided with the death sentence of Celtdom, both in Church and State. The 'yellow hag' — some form of plague — swept away the Cymri by thousands, the Saxons tightened their grip and extended it over the whole island, and strangely enough, the making of Celtic saints ceased. The Celtic monk-errants had swept all over the continent of Europe; they had set up the rule of St Columbanus at Bobbio, by the Pope's door, and Columbanus had addressed the Holy Father as an equal, not without a hint that any case of error or heresy on the part of the Chief Bishop of Christendom would meet with due correction from the Celtic monk. But the tide turned. Cadwallader died, the 'relics of the saints' were lost, or taken into concealment, and everywhere the Roman power prevailed, abolishing Celtic customs and rites, and doing its work so thoroughly that no Celtic liturgy has survived. A dreary enchantment (from the Celtic point of view) fell upon the sanctuaries of the saints, and the abomination of desolation, in the form of the Roman missal, succeeded the High Offering of the Perpetual Choirs of the Isle of Britain.

Now M. Paulin Paris thinks that the name and the tale of Galahad are derived from the name and the tale of Cadwallader. In the case of the name (which was sometimes spelt Catgualart and Catgualatyr). I think M. Paulin Paris is right; and for the tale — well, there is a good deal to be said for his point of view. As Galahad, the last possessor of the Graal in the Queste, went to Sarras, carrying the holy vessel with him, so Cadwallader went to Jerusalem (for ‘Rome’ in Geoffrey of Monmouth is almost certainly a substitution, partly due to a confusion between the names of the Welsh hero and a Saxon king) carrying with him, presumably, the ‘relics’ which are to return with him. It is to be noted, also, that as Galahad was of the lineages of Joseph of Arimathæa and of Our Lady so also was Cadwallader descended collaterally from the Blessed Virgin and St David. But it would be rash, I think, to assert that the story of the British king was more than a rough sketch for that splendid and glowing figure of Galahad. The romance writer had heard an old legend, perhaps, a wandering and uncertain and broken tale with the last glow of the Celtic fire still shining dimly from it; and from these poor fragments he built up the miracle of the Queste. It would be unsafe to say that the Celtic legend counted for much more than a hint in the execution of that wonderful romance.

III

It will be understood, I hope, that these papers do not pretend, in any sense whatever, to be so much as an outline of the great literary question of the Sangraal. They are merely notes and hints and suggestions on certain interesting points in the legend; and my hope is that they may stimulate more learned and more fortunate questers to a deeper research.

It is not altogether necessary, then, for me to apologise for omissions; since if I once began to do so, I should never have done; but there is one point which I should have mentioned in my first chapter, in treating of the ‘pagan’ elements in the story. This is the very singular and significant appearance of ‘a Head so rich and beautiful that never mortal saw aught so glorious’ in the wonderful description of the Graal worship at Sarras, in the Grand Saint Graal. This Head was borne by one of the angels in red vestments, who served the great Rite; it is impossible, I think, to deny its close relationship to the venerable Head of Bran, which would have made an eternal paradise for the heroes — if they had not disobeyed a certain prohibition. Meat and drink and entertainment, and the enchanted song of the Fairy Birds of Rhiannon were the portion of the followers of Bran — till they opened the door that looked towards Cornwall; and then all delights and pleasures vanished away. The ‘Rich Head’ of the Graal Romance is undoubtedly the pre-Christian demigod or deity, consecrated to the service of the Holy Vessel; it is interesting to find so positive a proof of the Celtic origin of the Legend. By the way, it may be remembered that there are many traces of this Head cultus in Celtdom; in Pembrokeshire, for instance, there is a well, sacred to St Teilo, the water of which heals sickness, if administered by the Hereditary Keeper in the skull of the saint. In Scotland, again, there was a saint’s skull which was washed, ritually, and the water of the washing was regarded as holy and salutary; and I should like to be instructed in the real meaning of such place names as Holyhead and Penzance. Do they mean ‘the Holy Headland,’ or do they imply that in these places there was a special cultus of the ‘Venerable Head’? It is interesting to note that Penzance bears as arms a head on a dish, supposed, of course, to be the Head of St John the Baptist.

But, for our especial purpose this ‘Rich Head,’ strangely introduced into the Graal Ritual, is of very high interest. For one cannot help thinking of that other Head — the head of Peredur’s slain cousin, exhibited to him in a dish full of blood. This latter was not a holy object; it was, apparently, an incitement to vengeance on the murderers. The dish full of blood, the spear ever dripping with blood, cried to Peredur for vengeance; we have here, I suppose, an instance of the traps and confusions and coincidences which lurk in the Romance Literature of the Sangraal, and also an example of the way in which two streams of quite distinct origin are joined into one.

To pass on to the more immediate purpose of this article: there are many reasons for supposing that the Romances celebrate and glorify the curious and ancient quarrel between Roman and Celtic Christianity. In some of the earliest versions of the Legend, we hear of a distinct rite called the ‘Graal Service’. This ritual was performed at Terce (the medieval hour for the principal mass of the day); it was called ‘going to Grace,’ and it would seem that the worshippers were rapt into an ecstasy. Again, in the High History we hear of ‘the priests and hermits of the Graal,’ who are removed by the Lord God into a sure place during the usurpation of the King of Castle Mortal; and in the Queste the ‘service of the Holy Graal’ was performed divinely in the precious chapel where the Holy Graal used to appear. To me it seems difficult to avoid the conclusion that in such passages as these we have highly romantic allusions to the Celtic Church; the possessor of sacrosanct and Eucharistic Relics, e coelo venientia, and of a distinct Eucharistic Rite. How far we may take the Romance allusions is conjectural, and perhaps will always remain conjectural. It may be that the allusions of the High History and the Queste are fairly accurate accounts of events which really happened, it may be that they have the slenderest historical foundations; we do not know and probably we never shall know.

And now as to the peculiarities of the Celtic Church as distinct from the Roman. Here many we are in a region of few certainties and again possibilities and probabilities. One thing, at least, is certain: the anti-Celtic fervour of the Roman authorities was so thorough that there is no such thing as a Celtic Liturgy in existence; and, perhaps, the latest reference to such a thing dates back to the twelfth century, when the remnant of the Culdees are reported as celebrating ‘some kind of barbarous rite’ in a corner of a Scotch church. There are few certainties beyond this; but there are probabilities.

I have already said that I accept as a working hypothesis the theory that the Celtic Church was really the work of the fifth century, and that it was organised by Gallican missionaries; and that being granted it follows necessarily that the churches of Britain and Ireland were of the type that is called Oriental. Of course, all Christianity is, in origin, a Syrian mission; but for whatever reason or reasons, the local Roman Church became differentiated from all others at a very early period, and developed a Liturgy — the Latin Mass — which it is convenient to call Western. It would be tedious in the highest degree to examine minutely the variations between the Rite of Constantinople and the Rite of Rome; it will be sufficient to say that the most important of the many differences between the two services is the presence of the Epiclesis in the Eastern, and its absence from the Western Eucharist. The Epiclesis is the Invocation of the Holy Spirit on the Elements (in some Eastern Rites on the congregation also), and in the Divine Liturgy of St James it runs as follows:

Have mercy on us, O God, according to Thy great goodness, and send upon us, and upon these proposed gifts, Thy most Holy Ghost who descended upon Thy holy Apostles in the likeness of fiery tongues in the upper room of the holy and glorious Sion, at the day of Pentecost: send down the same most Holy GHOST, Lord, upon us, and upon these holy and proposed gifts, that coming upon them with His holy and good and glorious presence, He may hallow and make this bread the holy Body of THY CHRIST.

People. Amen.

Priest. And this cup the precious Blood of THY CHRIST.

People. Amen.

It is by this formula, or by some equivalent prayer, that the present Orthodox Church of the East believes the mystery of the consecration to be effected; the West — the Roman and English churches — on the other hand, make the efficacy of the sacrament to depend upon the due recital of the Words of Institution. And yet I believe that the Eastern Church would hardly declare all the consecrations of the West to be void and of none effect.

This, then, is the Epiclesis, and it is almost certain that the British Liturgy possessed some such formula. It is not absolutely certain, because, as I have stated, there is no Celtic Liturgy in existence; but the probability is very high — indeed, considering the derivation of the Celtic Church of the fifth century from the Church of Vienne and Lyons, is almost inevitable. It should be noted, by the way, that the early Gallican Church in question occupied a peculiar position with respect to the Epiclesis. The formula was not, as in the East, an integral and essential portion of every Mass; it occurred in the Eucharists on certain saints' days, and not on those of others, and such, we may presume, was its place in the ritual of Celtic Christendom — unless, indeed, the Celts followed the more primitive and allied Mozarabic Rite, in which, I think, the Invocation of the Holy Spirit is invariably used.

Now, in some of the Graal Romances there are curious references to certain 'secret words' used in the Eucharist; a claim is made, if the expression may be allowed, for a super-valid consecration. Robert de Borron, for example, says that he dare not speak of the secrets revealed to Joseph, and if he would he could not, without the Great Book:

Ou les estoires sont escrites,

Par les grans clercs feites et dites,

La sont li grant secre escrit,
Qu'on nomme le Graal.

Is this a reference to a Celtic Liturgy, or rather to a vague rumour of a Celtic Liturgy? Are the 'grant secre' of the Graal Service the Prayer of Invocation? I think there is a remote possibility that this is so; I dare not say more. Wales conformed to the Roman Church between 750-809; and therefore we may conclude that the prescription of the Celtic Liturgy began towards the end of the eighth and the beginning of the ninth centuries. It is quite likely that the native ritual was not extinguished without a struggle; it is quite likely that it continued to be celebrated by patriot recluses, by 'saints' who had oratories among the rocks and among the woods for a long period after the Roman Missal had become the only legal use; it is quite likely that the primitive Liturgy endured long enough for the rumour of it to have reached the ears of the Romance writers. The Graal Service was said divinely in the precious chapel where the Graal itself had once been wont to appear. This may mean that the Celtic Ritual was used, after long pretermission, in an oratory where once some venerated altar, reputed to be of heavenly origin, had been preserved — it would be temerarious to say more.

There is another probable argument in favour of this identification of the Graal Service with the British Rite. In the Grand Saint Graal, the first Mass is described — in connection with the alleged Apostolate and Primacy of Josephes, son of Joseph of Arimathaea. The passage is as follows:

Laiens fist Josephe le premier sacrement qui onques fust fais a celui peule, mais il eut moult tost accompli, kar il ne dist que celes paroles seulement, qant Jesu-Cris dist a ses dessiples a la chaine: 'Venes, si mangies et chou est li miens cors qui pour vous et pour maintes autres gens sera livre a martire et a torment.' Et autress; leur dist del vin: 'Tenes et si beves tout Car chou est li sanc di ma nouviele loy, li miens meismes, ki pour vous sera espandus en remision des pechies.'

Now the Roman Formula of Consecration is, for the bread:

Hoc est enim Corpus meum, and for the wine:

Hic est enim Calix sanguinis mei, novi et æterni testamenti: mysterium fidei: qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum.

The question is: where did the author of the Grand Saint Graal get his formulae? Professor Warren, an authority on Celtic Christianity, thinks that there is ‘ground,’ but not ‘proof for confrangetur, as the word in use in the lost British Liturgy. It may be noted that there is proof of very early intercourse between the Egyptian and Celtic churches, and that the Coptic consecration formula is similar to that of the Romance in its use of the future tense. Again, it is not wise to do more than suggest a probability. It would be delightful if one could point to the words of the Grand Saint Graal as an undoubted fragment of the lost Ritual of our fathers: but to do this were to play the Higher Critic in his wildest moods. It may be that here we have a remnant of the Celtic Liturgy; we must not be more positive. The general position — that the ‘Graal Church’ symbolises the Celtic Church — is, I think, probable in a very high degree; the particular conclusions must be left in doubt and in mist.

There is one very odd circumstance about the Parzival of Wolfram von Eschenbach. We have seen that he accused Chrestien of having told the wrong story; he himself professes that he corrected Chrestien by the Chronicles of the House of Anjou, and by the narrative of one Kyot, or Guiot, a Provencal. However that may be, the Parzival is in one most important respect entirely distinct from all the other romances. A graal, as we have seen, probably implied to the readers of the romance, a shallow bowl (or deep dish) on a stem and foot, and we have noted also the curious uncertainty which seems to have existed as to the exact shape of the Holy Vessel. In one romance it assumes five forms, the last of which is the chalice, in another it is an image of the sepulchre in which Christ’s body was laid by Joseph; the paten being the stone slab placed on top of the grave. It is at once a chalice, and also the vessel in which Christ willed that His Body should be offered and sacrificed; there is a singular ambiguity. One story says that it was the vessel in which Christ washed the Apostles’ feet; another that in it He ‘made His sacrament’. And one cannot help thinking of St David’s Altar, in quo dominicum jacebat corpus.

In the Parzival the Graal is a stone called Lapsit Exillit. It was hallowed, its virtue was ever renewed, by a Dove that brought on the Good Friday of each year a consecrated Host from heaven, laying It on the Graal. There is no reference whatever to the Precious Blood; and it seems impossible that the Graal of Wolfram's conception could have served any of the uses of a cup or chalice. It was a stone that had fallen from the crown of Lucifer when the great angel was driven from heaven; a precious stone presumably; and one is reminded of William of Malmesbury's reference to St David's Altar lost, and restored (so he says) to Glastonbury, and called Sapphirus. I do not say that Wolfram's story proves that the Graal was originally an altar and not a chalice; I am content to affirm that it is evidence strongly in favour of that hypothesis. The sculptured stone (eighth or ninth century, I believe) at Nigg, in Scotland, would seem to illustrate an idea not remote from Wolfram's. In the centre of the stone there is figured a vessel like a very shallow champagne glass, or a saucer on a stem; above this hovers a dove, holding in its beak a round disc, resembling a wafer. On each side an ecclesiastic bows in adoration; and below two lions crouch to the ground.

Now, accepting as an hypothesis the altar theory, the question naturally arises: How did the altar become transformed into a chalice? This, I think, is not an insoluble enigma; and the answer may probably be obtained from William of Malmesbury's eulogy of Glastonbury Abbey, in which there are several notable points. Firstly, it is said by William that the body of Joseph of Arimathæa was buried somewhere in the precincts of the abbey, and so far as I know there is no earlier mention of Joseph in connection with Glastonbury or with Britain. The story dates from c. 1130-40. Secondly, it states that with the body were buried two phials containing the Precious Blood of Christ; and here, it seems to me, we have the secret of the Graal of the romance writers. Nor is it difficult to trace this invention of the legend to its origin. Somewhere in the thirties of the twelfth century, a crusading knight had remitted to the town of Bruges a phial said to contain the Blood of Christ, which the Church of Antioch had given him, in reward for great services rendered against the miscreants. The phial in question, which is still preserved at Bruges, and venerated by the faithful, is adorned with work of the seventh or eighth century; beyond that date, of course, history must give place to legend. But it is certain that in the beginning of the twelfth century the cultus of the Precious Blood received a great impetus; and the inventive William endowed Glastonbury with a Relic which would be certain to enhance the prestige of the convent. It does not seem hard to imagine that the Norman-French romance writers combined two distinct objects, the altar of St David or of some other Welsh saint, with the supposed phials of Glastonbury, and that the union of the two instruments produced the Sangraal. An altar could not hold blood; a phial would not serve in the Eucharistic connection which attached to the altar, and so a compromise was effected and the Holy Graal, at first a vague and ill-defined object, put on at last the form of the chalice, and yet was spoken of as the vessel in which God willed that His Body should be offered. There is no proof of all this: most likely there never will be; but it seems to be a very probable solution of a most difficult question.

Then, of course, there is the substitution of the name of Joseph of Arimathæa for our (hypothetical) Welsh saint; and here again the difficulties do not strike me as insuperable. So far as I know there is no reason to suppose that the Legend of Joseph as the Evangelist of Britain existed before the beginning of the twelfth century. But it was fashionable, if we may use the term, for every Church in Christendom to claim an Apostolic or semi-apostolic origin; and it is easy to understand that such names as Dewi and Carannoc, Iltyd and liar, had no particular prestige or enchantment for Norman-French ears, or for readers of Paris town. The Precious Blood cultus had suggested the phials, the belief of the Glastonbury monks that the body of Joseph was buried in their abbey, was, possibly, a convent tradition; it was simple to put things together, to make Joseph the founder of British Christianity, and the possessor of a priceless relic. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus supplied the tale of his imprisonment by the Jews; his voyage to Britain was probably suggested by the Legend of the Saintes Maries de la Mer, and, indeed, one of the names occurring in the Grand Saint Graal is taken bodily from the Provencal story; and so the romance grows, mingling Celtic legends, apocryphal gospels, missionary tales, a popular cultus, and sheer invention in books of the most wonderful and glorious inspiration. And this last is, after all, by far the greatest element. Matters of varying merit went into the crucible; it was the power of the medieval artistry that was the red powder, glistering and glorious as the sun, which transformed, transmuted, re-created, glorified, changing copper into gold, wandering and broken legends into splendid romance. The change seems to me not improbable; for the thirteenth century was the age in which Salisbury Cathedral was built, and the time that could raise the rough ashlar to such power and glory and dominion and spiritual life, was doubtless able to form rough literary materials into the great temple of the Graal Romances.

THE STROLLER

I

SOME JESUIT IN the eighteenth century said of Ælillar the younger that he was ingeniousus puer sed insignis nebulo; and I always think that the phrase applies most beautifully and perfectly to Mr George Moore. He is a mighty clever chap — and a confirmed ‘rotter’. His last book, a sort of pocket Casanova, is the work of a ‘rotter,’ and his nonsense about the English language being worn out is the talk of a rotter. Casanova is inimitable (luckily, on the whole, I think), and the English language is infinitely the finest in the world, if people will give themselves the trouble to learn how to use it.

But one work of Mr George’s is in a different category: the Mummers Wife is quite a good story as far as it goes; it is perhaps the only work in English which attempts the problem of writing about the stage in a serious spirit. There are plenty of other books of course on the same subject, some of them very amusing, some of them great nonsense (Mr Horace Wyndham should know that the stage manager does not put up the train calls), but the Mummer’s Wife is easily the best of the lot.

But the stage is such a big subject. George Moore’s book is, I should think, an excellent transcript of life in a Cloches de Corneville touring company (c. 1880), and it isn’t a bit like the stage life that I knew something about, and I have seen some varieties and odd contrasts too.

I first used grease paints at the Comedy Theatre, about seven years ago. I went up a good many flights of stairs and found myself in an odd, bare little room, on the door of which my name was written with others. It was an excellent dressing-room, really; experience has told me that, but at the time it struck me as uncomfortable. A wardrobe man came in presently and gave me a bundle of clothes, and I put on the trunk hose and a sort of russet cassock and girdle. When I had just finished buttoning the thing up, the wardrobe man came in again, and explained that it fastened at the back. We made the alteration. Costumes mostly button up the back, I suppose to ensure the existence of the race of dressers. So I was all right, except for my face. Then, happily for me, old Gobbo came in, and I asked him how about 'make up'. He said, 'What do you want to look like?' and I told him that as a member of the Venetian mob, I thought an olive hue would be the correct thing. He translated 'olive' into the words 'Three, Eight, and Ten,' and went into the next room to borrow sticks of grease paint of these numbers from Morocco. Morocco was busy; he was bellowing like an angry bull at two unfortunate Doge's Trumpeters, who were 'breathing' their instruments; and the bellowing of Morocco was louder than the blast of the horns. I got the paints and put on a fairly successful coat of colour for a first attempt. The reason why old Gobbo did not lend me paints himself was that he did not use them. His skin was sensitive, and he painted it in water-colours with a camels-hair brush. He was (and is) a great artist in make up, with an eye for detail. I remember I saw him putting a little grey crêpe-hair on the tip of his nose, to indicate extreme old age.

I got on the stage in good time: they were just beginning to call 'Overture and Beginners, gentlemen, please,' and I stayed on it a couple of minutes, and then I had nothing to do till the Trial Scene was called, and then I went down and helped to hoot Shylock from a rostrum something like a flowerpot stand in a greenhouse. The hooting was easy enough, but the 'displaying of emotion' in dumb show was quite the most difficult task that was ever given to me on the stage. Englishmen are not gesticulatory, and when they do use gesture in common life, their gestures are usually horribly ungraceful; but when they try to use gestures on the stage they are ridiculous, especially if they are new beginners. I must have looked from the front like a bad case of St Vitus's dance, complicated with idiocy. Still, I had 'gone on the stage'.

It has happened, since then, that the people who were so good to me, a middle-aged ignoramus, have got on. Old Gobbo is one of the cleverest and best-known character actors in London, and Morocco — he that drowned the blast of the trumpets — is the manager of a great London theatre at the present moment; and there are many others whom I have not mentioned who are as celebrated as these two, and deserve all the fame that has come to them. For the greatest good fortune that can befall a beginner had been given me; I had joined Mr F.R. Benson's company.

One must be patient with heresy: I suppose the Inquisition was rather a mistake. So one must bear as quietly as one can the statement that is sometimes made — that there are other companies besides Benson's. Of course I know that this proposition is ridiculous on the face of it: I always move away from a man who talks like that; he is sure to be on the verge of mania, and of violent mania too. Before I joined the company I used to meet such persons occasionally. They told me that the Bensonians were very nice gentlemanly fellows, who played cricket and football capitally — it was a pity they couldn't act. Later, when I knew more, I understood the value of this criticism and something of the status of the critics. These were mostly people who had been touring with the 'Gramophone Girl Company Number Three' and the 'Baron and Barmaid Company Number Four' for quite a number of years. One of them had played the same part in Charley's Aunt on tour since the early nineties; he was very severe on the Bensonian lack of talent. People who have seen Mr Oscar Asche's Maldonado and Petruchio say that he has quite a good notion of acting, and Mr Lyall Swete has his admirers, I understand. And one has gathered that, Mr O.B. Clarence's 'old men' are rather excellent in their way.

But the best days with the Bensonians were the days on tour, and, above all, at Stratford-on-Avon. The Memorial Theatre there is quite hideous — a sort of cross between a German town hall and an Independent meeting-house — but it stands on a meadow by the river, and one could sometimes escape by a newel stair for a few minutes and listen to the nightingales' chorus sounding from the other banks. And the old town is quite wonderful; and there at night one realises the tremendous force of the phrase about hearing the chimes at midnight. At eleven o'clock Stratford-on-Avon is all dark and quiet. There is a tavern there where they make real beer — an operation which one had supposed to be a lost secret, like the arts of the old glass painters, and the fashioners of raised gold glories in illuminated manuscripts. Some people whisper that at the Windmill, Stratford-on-Avon, they make beer out of malt and hops; and I believe the big brewers think that that sort of thing ought to be put a stop to.

There were great gatherings at the Windmill and at the Shakespeare too. I agree with Dr Johnson. He had a very poor opinion of a man who did not mind his belly. I go further, I think nothing of a man who neglects his beer. Such an one is probably a Protestant; and I can't say worse than that. We Bensonians would, I think, have satisfied Mr Belloc of our Catholicity—'wine' being taken in its universal rather than in its particular sense. There were great gatherings then in the old taverns; and it must be remembered that the Benson company of those days was a sodality of old friends who had vagabonded over England together for ten years and upwards. They must have been something like a company of wandering craftsmen in the Middle Ages, with their sense of companionships and their sense of their craft. For they really liked their job and took it seriously; and I believe it is quite archaic now for a workman to take his work seriously. In time, no doubt, when we get really advanced, engine-drivers and pilots and signal-men will all be dashing amateurs — like 'modern' actors and novelists. Then there will be some sport in travelling. I am afraid I was too old and stupid to learn very much from the Bensonians; but, at all events, I know that one has to kneel on the knee next to the audience.

We played about twelve plays in the fortnight we spent at that exquisite and lovely Stratford-on-Avon, They gave me little 'bits' in most of the plays; sometimes I spoke the words, sometimes a great horror of forgetfulness seized me and I 'dried'. There is no feeling like the sensation of 'drying': you are sailing along with tolerable complacency through a sentence, and four or five words from the full stop you realise with lightening-like suddenness that you haven't the remotest idea of how to begin the next phrase! Your heart does something strange and unpleasant, you grow white under the paint, the stage swims round you, and you hear your voice dying away to a miserable quaver. Very likely the prompter is away from his corner; or if he is there one is usually too far gone to profit by his remarks. I 'dried' horribly in 'Mouldy', and I haven't forgotten it yet, though it is a good many years ago. But I managed to utter all 'Joseph's Servant's' remarks; and impersonated no end of 'Lords' and 'Countrymen' and 'Messengers' who flit through the great Histories. And then, on the last Saturday of our stay at Stratford-on-Avon, the stage-manager told me that I was to play 'Nym' in the Merry Wives on Monday night at Worcester.

II

It certainly was 'a bit of a pill'. I mean that for a beginner to be word-perfect in 'Nym' and to be easy in all the business and positions at such short notice was something of an undertaking. But here one gets a glimpse of the various regions and dialects of the stage. If I had used the phrase 'bit of a pill' to a Bensonian he would not have understood what I meant, or if by some chance he knew the idiom he would have told me with a coldly corrective air that the Benson company had no part in the worlds of musical comedy and melodrama.

I remember an illustration of this diversity of language happening at a London theatre a year or two after I had gone on the stage. Blank (a very good actor and a Bensonian) was rehearsing, and spoke a line something in this fashion:

'I remember with what an air y' flung y'r verses at me.'

'Not so much of the "old," Blank, not so much of the "old,"'said the actor-manager, who was taking the rehearsal.

Blank did not know what the manager meant. He had been more years on the stage than I had spent months, but his experience had not been so various as mine. I was able to explain that the manager had expressed a desire for a less melodramatic style of elocution; for 'you' and 'your,' instead of'y' and 'y'r.' The Bensonians have a dialect of their own; they and they alone are aware that the tavern nearest to the theatre is a properly called 'The Hog and Bristles,' whatever its sign may be; to 'boil' with a man signifies to occupy the same rooms on tour; and 'ancient stoal' and 'aged mackerel' are ways of indicating an elderly individual. Then, again, there is another region and another language: dubious these and verging on the 'portables' or booths. There are exceptions, of course but, as a rule, it would be unwise to associate over intimately with an actor who knows the meaning of the phrases 'nix munjare' and 'omee of the caser'. Experts in thieves' slang will recognise the words, and I have met players who could carry on a conversation of some length in this dialect.

By the way, I wonder whether Dickens was right in his interpretation of the important word 'ponging'.

'Missed his tip at the banners, too, and was lax in his ponging,' said Master Kidderminster, and member of Mr Sleary's Horseriding Company, in Hard Times. 'Was short in his leaps and bad in his tumbling,' Mr Childers (another member of the company) interpreted.

Now, a Bensonian who said, 'I went on and ponged for all I was worth,' would mean that he rolled out his speeches in a declamatory manner; but with the actors of the booths the word implies improvising, inventing speeches and dialogue on the spur of the moment.

Well, anyhow, that ‘Nym’ was a bit of a pill. We had been rehearsing Richard III all the morning of Saturday; it was the only rehearsal that we had. There was a matinee in the afternoon, and the performance of Richard III at night; and when that was done the company adjourned in a body to a certain inn and stayed there. There is a legend that a round of drinks came to eighteen shillings on that occasion, but I think this must be an exaggeration. But there was no time for learning ‘Nym’ on Saturday, so I did my best with it on Sunday afternoon at Worcester. Of course, an actor of experience would have had the part at his fingers’ ends in an hour; but I was an actor of inexperience and my heart sank. I had a rehearsal next morning; it was in itself terrible. The leading man, who played Ford, did not come, and I don’t blame him; so one had to imagine his presence, and the prompter read his lines. One had to imagine a lot. The rehearsal was in a tavern room, and a table stood for a house, and a three-legged stool for a grassy bank, and a terrace and a flight of steps remained without symbols of any kind whatever. It was all a dreadful and confusing game of make-believe — for a beginner.

My name is Corporal Nym: and I speaks and I avouch ’tis true: — My name is Nym, and Falstaff loves your wife — Adieu.

‘Up the steps and half-way along the terrace at adieu, Mr Dash,’ said the prompter. I climbed the steps that weren’t there, and went along that noumenal terrace.

I love not the humour of bread and cheese; and there’s the humour of it. Adieu.

‘Now, then, go off left and turn on your exit and say’:

My name is Nym, and Falstaff loves your wife.

‘Thank you: that’ll be all right at night.’

I did not think it would be all right. I felt sick; my sensations reminded me of the first day of term after the holidays. And it was an awful experience. There were three scenes: Act I, Scene I, where Falstaff and his followers meet Shallow; the room in the Garter Inn; and the scene with Page. I ‘grinned like an idiot’ (in Coleridge’s phrase) as I uttered that final Falstaff loves your wife, and went up to change into one of Ford's servants who bear the luck basket. I believe I got through pretty well, considering: I know the Old Woman clapped me on the back afterwards and said something about 'the nervous ones doing best'; and I remember that my terror rose to such a height in that last, rather 'tricky' speech, that it soared above me, as it were, and I forgot all about it I was only conscious of being intensely annoyed by Page's attitude of smiling incredulity; and I suppose that is the mode in which a player should do his playing — if he can only keep control over his memory.

Well, that was the Bensonian system of rehearsing; it was a case of learning to swim by being pitched into the water. No end of things were left to the player's own taste and fancy. I believe that in the whole history of the great company there are only legends of two dress rehearsals having taken place; one, I think, for Richard II and one for Anthony and Cleopatra. The rehearsal which I have described was exceptionally sketchy; we often rehearsed on the stage with the scene set (more or less). I remember that we had five rehearsals in all for that year's production at Stratford-on-Avon — King]ohn — and everybody felt comfortable — except myself. I had to pull away the cloak from the body of Prince Arthur, saying: Who killed this prince? It sounds simple enough, but I wasn't. A took me aside and showed that the action must precede the word, B pointed out that the contrary process was far more effective, and C demonstrated over a tankard that words and movement should be simultaneous. And then Mr Benson asked me what my opinion was. I said I hadn't got any; and he laughed. It was a little confusing perhaps; but one sees by such an incident how the Bensonians interested themselves in the show as a whole; how they were ready to help a raw beginner over his fag and trifle of a part. I am afraid that the average actor cares no twopence for any part except his own, and is not apt to worry himself over other people's performances — unless these performances affect him personally.

Of course, there is something to be said against this scant and somewhat conversational method of preparing a piece. It is not likely, perhaps, to make for a show that goes like clockwork — smooth, complete, polished to the last degree. I daresay that there were a few rough edges in a Benson production till the company settled down into their parts. But there may be something of truth in William Morris's indictment of nineteenth-century art and craft as being altogether too smooth for perfection, too much polished by mechanical means to give true pleasure. And I think this dictum applies to a certain extent to stage-work, especially to the playing of the minor parts and to the management of crowds and tumults. You get ease and certainty and polish, doubtless, with your two months' rehearsal at the London theatre; but it is a question whether you do not lose vigour and 'go' and the dash of originality that often accompanies technical deficiency. The piano-organ makes no mistakes, and the greatest player may blunder once or twice in a piece. I believe the Bensonian London crowd was a wonderful piece of work, and Sir Henry Irving's trained supers are said to have run round in rings like mechanical mice. So much for the audience's point of view; there is, of course, no question that the Bensonian method is infinitely better for the actor. It makes him think, it makes him inventive, he feels that he has some responsibility and some importance. The other way produces automata, who naturally act like automata. Besides, thinking it over calmly, is the audience's point of view of any consequence? No artist worth his salt cares what his readers or his audience think about his work: his object in life is to express himself in his art to the very best of his ability — and by so doing he does please the only audience that matters: the audience of the intelligent and understanding. As for the people who go to theatres and enjoy the 'drill' of musical comedy — they don't count; not as critics of legitimate stage-work, at all events. Their taste, such as it is, is most fitly gratified at the Military Tournament or at a review; and there is certainly something to be said from one point of view for symmetrical order. But the play, the Shakespeare play, I mean, should have its rough edges, its counterfeits of the odd corners and varieties of life; and this end is certainly best attained by few rehearsals and large individual liberties.

III

We stayed a week at Worcester. It was an old ramshackle theatre in those days, thick with dirt, and a happy hunting-ground of insects. Some of our ladies suffered horribly, and one of them, I believe, used to undress every night over a sheet with a view to making captures. It was all done up and clean and bright when I returned to Worcester two or three years ago; and the mention of that second visit reminds me of how some actors were deceived by a minor canon of the cathedral. The good ecclesiastic had no intention of deceiving; the actors' disappointment was of their own contrivance. It happened thus: The company in question was being ‘feted’ to a certain extent; I believe that one hospitable woman went to the length of asking all of us to afternoon tea — I do not know whether meat and eggs were provided. Anyhow, the players who went were certain, for once in a way, of a meal of some sort, and it was, no doubt, very gratifying to the intellect and fashion of Worcester to see live actors eating. On the top of this wild revel there was an invitation from the Cathedral to the men of the company if they liked to come round one of the minor canons would be happy to show them certain parts of the building to which the ordinary public were not admitted.

Now, the average actor, I am sorry to say, knows but little of Gothic art; but he generally has an indistinct notion that the medieval architects were occasionally guilty of marvellous improprieties; and, then, the invitation was to ‘men only’. On the whole, the affair looked promising, and a joyous band sallied forth, their eyes round with anticipation. They only saw some odd corners of the crypt, and a disused chapel or two: Worcester had no musée privée for their amusement. It was felt that a rather ungenerous deception had been practiced on a simple and unsuspecting race.

Mr Benson turned me out at the end of six months. I wanted more money, and the management, I suppose, felt (with some reason) that beginners should be cheap; and so I left. I should have been content with what I had, for I might almost say that six months’ practice with Benson is worth six years with another company. I remember a lad (who is now a ‘star’) asking where else he would have the chance of playing three several parts (each with, some ‘character’ in it) in the course of one evening: one can imagine the difference between such a training as this and the usual ‘‘oh’ and ‘ah’ with others’ part, which may go on, night after night, for six months on end. I did not see this at the time, so I left, having previously got an engagement at an important London theatre for a great production. The manager had happened to look in on one of our performances at a suburban house, and I was playing a ‘bit’ so unimportant that it was not mentioned in the cast; it was an official who says a couple of dozen words and reads a letter in one of the Shakespeare plays. I believe I ‘scored’ by being simply official and indifferent, instead of displaying a vivid, almost an hysterical interest in the progress of events; anyhow, the great man gave me an engagement — which lasted for two years. This story has two morals. The first is, that it as wise to do one’s ‘bit’ as well as possible, even if the part be beneath contempt, the place a rather out of the way theatre, and the occasion a Bank-Holiday matinée. The second moral, which is much more important, is that it was all bad luck. I have played a very important part at a very important theatre in London for several months as well as I knew how — and nothing whatever came of it, except the weekly salary. It would be easy to say, of course, that while I might read a letter and keep quiet well enough a real part was beyond me, but I believe this explanation to be untrue, though unflattering. One of the most promising of our dramatists wrote of his own accord to me, saying that I had played the part ‘quite admirably’ — but his admiration had no practical results, so far as I was concerned. Nevertheless, it is wise to do one’s ‘bit’ as well as possible, whether it be Hamlet or a Sea Captain, and whether the scene be set in a West End theatre or in a barn at Stow-on-the-Marsh. Anyhow, one will have the satisfaction of knowing that one is co-operating with the angels. The other plan always annoys me. I think the actor who ‘cods’ and ‘fluffs’ and ‘dries’ — I should say the actor who plays jokes on the stage, knows his words imperfectly, and breaks down — because the management is poor or unimportant, or because he thinks there is nobody of consequence in front, is a dirty dog, and a dishonest dog too.

The production for which I was engaged was not due for several months — it turned out to be nine — and I wanted to ‘fill in’. To begin with, I got a three weeks’ engagement in ‘Pastorals’. Nearly all of the players were Bensonians, so I was still amongst friends. We had three wonderful weeks, which are still dear in my memory. The sun shone all the time, and under such conditions the theatrical shepherd’s life is a delightful one, though it is sometimes rather laborious.

Of course, the conditions are very different in many ways from those of the theatre. The finer touches are impossible — it is out of the question to cultivate the nuance, the delicate tone of meaning in the open air. All such shade and half-tones of significance would be drowned by the noise of the wind amongst the leaves, or would vanish into empty space. Some ‘pitches’ are much better than others. I remember a delightful one amongst the pine-woods of Hampshire. The players strolled down a hillside, through trees and bushes, bracken and heather, and the rising ground behind the ‘stage’ reverberated their voices to the audience. Near Derby, too, there is a pleasant dell, in which the conditions were somewhat similar; but even in such favoured spots as these ‘breadth’ is essential, and the real delicacies of such a part as Malvolio are apt to be lost. Then, again — a point of purely technical interest — the make-up has to be very different from that of the theatre. Under the electric light of the ‘limes’ many things are possible. A streak of ‘blue-liner’ will look like a natural shadow, and dark red, properly applied to the eyebrows, will give the effect of black much better than black itself — dead blacks are nearly always weary on the stage, they look hard, unnatural, obvious paint, and the same maxim may be applied to crépe-hair. But on a sunny afternoon, on a smooth lawn, with your audience perhaps a yard away, it is out of the question to smear your face with blue and crimson: one must go more closely to nature, and I fancy that people who have been in pastorals always make up better than those who only limelight know. There is, of course, a school which thinks that the more crazy a make-up looks in the dressing-room, the better it will appear from the front, sed de hoc dubito. Breadth is no doubt essential; a maze of little lines, a ‘Clapham Junction’ make-up, cannot possibly carry for more than the first few rows of the stalls; and there are many actors who do not seem to be aware that the most cunning effects, if they be not large, simply merge into a pale white patch from the point of view of the dress-circle. Everything must be enlarged; eyebrows must be broader than they are by nature, a high light must be painted on the nose that it may stand out, and so forth; but one must be aware of certain conventional exaggerations, such as light patches of colour laid on spots which are not naturally highly coloured. ‘Juvenile’ actors, for instance think that dabs of carmine on the temples give them a youthful appearance; but they are probably mistaken. In the pastoral play make-up is necessary, because the ‘character’ parts have to paint to obtain their effects, and the natural hues of those playing ‘straight’ parts would look dull by force of contrast; but the tinting should be delicate and slight, and powder should be used with a very sparing and judicious hand.

We went to some odd places on our tour. I remember being hugely pleased at Northampton. I had been recommended to some rooms, and, knocking, the door was opened to me by a very nice old lady with ringlets. She spoke with that pleasant distinction which the old English bourgeoisie once possessed, and we were coming to terms when she asked suddenly whether I was one of the actors. I said yes, and the good old soul drew herself up and said: ‘We are poor, but we have not quite come to that yet. Good-day and thank you.' So I had to go to a 'temperance hotel'. There is one good temperance hotel in England: it is not at Northampton, but at Newark-on-Trent. I have never been at a dirty temperance hotel, and I have never known an establishment of this sort except that one that was not infinitely more disgusting than the dirtiest cabin in Ireland. I do not know why these places are so nauseous; it may be the pitchpine panelling, or it may be the thick glasses from which one drinks.

We were giving our show — As You Like It and The Two Gentlemen of Verona — in the grounds of a large lunatic asylum at Northampton. It was melancholy to hear the howls of the raging maniacs from within the asylum, it was more melancholy to see the blank, settled misery on the faces of our audience. Our Touchstone was a merry fellow, but his quips and grimaces did not break through that gloomy curtain of melancholia. We fixed on one man as the maddest of all — on his face alone there was a constant chuckle, a distillation of infinite imbecility. We heard afterwards that he was the chaplain of the asylum, and the chuckle was in appreciation of our efforts.

IV

There are some strange exits and entrances in the Pastoral Play. I remember once — it was at Stafford, I think — our green room was a haystack by a stream, the side of the haystack furthest removed from the audience. This position was not far from the audience, and we could hear the dialogue pretty well — when the wind did not sound too loudly in the willows. A man would wait, in great comfort and security till he heard the play approaching to within a page of his entrance; then it was necessary to climb an iron fence, walk down a little lane, and cross a bridge. Some shelter was afforded by the trees and bushes that grew by the bank of the stream; he would creep cautiously along in their shadow as the dialogue went on, and at last break away, and crossing another bridge, enter the 'stage'. Of course, all this was a matter of some judgement; it is one of the varieties which lend charm to the pastoral life. Sometimes there is a regular stand; a stage is built up and screened with canvas, and one gets on and off the stage at a minion's warning, as though in an ordinary theatre. I reprobate this practice; it is not 'playing the game,' in my opinion. I remember once in Hampshire, Rosalind and Orlando, Jaques and Touchstone, and the rest of that company of forest wanderers, made their entrance by strolling down under the pines, knee deep in heather and bracken; and I should think those fantastic figures, glinting amongst the green, must have added no small charm to the show.

It is a pity that one cannot be a pastoral player all the year. In a wicked, tiresome world such as this is, when men earn their living for the most part by ‘doing business’ or by such other evil and squalid tricks, there seems nothing more innocent or more charming than this device of wandering from wood to wood in odd dresses, in doublets and trunk hose, with false beards and painted faces, speaking Shakespeare’s lines, and trying to murmur the airs of Arden in the fairy age to this dull and gloomy time. But the pastoral hour is, by force of circumstances, a short one; and odd things succeed it. I found myself back in London without work, and going along Fleet Street one Sunday I ran across a former stage-manager coming out of vanished Thanet Place. I told him firmly that I wanted a shop, and after a few moments’ reflection, he remembered that he had accepted an engagement, which he could not possibly fulfil, in a moment of enthusiasm late the night before. So he passed on the address to me, and in some dim southern suburb I interviewed the management. It was a lurid little drama of love, jealousy, and intrigue, called The Just Punishment, and we played it at a theatre which I will call The Old Jago Varieties. The street where the house was situated has been described by East End experts; it is one of the seething pits of modern civilisation; I should doubt whether there was an honest house within a mile of it. There was a notice in the front of the house, relating the adventures of a client who had argued with the business manager. The Jago gentleman had made his points with a broken ginger-beer bottle, applied to the manager’s skull: ‘two months hard’ was the end and term of his story. The stage-door-keeper, a gigantic Highlander, who told me that he spoke ‘the Gaelic,’ and that his real name was something like Vich Ian Vohr M’Callum Conochie, informed me that the real industry of the district was coining; robbery with violence and picking pockets being diversions and sports of leisure hours. The dressing-rooms were dark and dingy dens, just behind the orchestra; I should think I dressed within two feet of the big drum. Rats ran in and out like kittens, and sometimes popped up cheerfully from the one wash-hand basin at the end of the passage. I played a comic (but good-hearted) Irish servant; and that Jago audience were even more terrible than the pastoral audience of old ladies following one in the text of As You Like It at a distance of three feet off. In the ordinary theatre people usually keep quiet till they find the actor intolerable and not to be endured; at the Jago one entered on the scene and confronted a howling mob, yelling, fighting, shouting, roaring. The actor simply had to roar them down — if he could. It was a great training of the nerves.

The Sketch lasted for a fortnight; and then I went into melodrama. It was an odd play enough. A naval lieutenant had rescued a gorilla, who lay wounded somewhere on the West Coast of Africa. The grateful animal had become fondly attached to the lieutenant, who, for reasons to me obscure, brought the beast to France and housed him in a barber's shop. I gather that the lieutenant had retired from our Navy; but he wore the uniform on all occasions, and the band heralded his entrances by a few bars of They all Love Jack. I cannot attempt to unfold all the tortuous windings of the story. There was a golden-haired woman called 'Pretty Louise,' who eventually became the lieutenant's own; she had been brought up by an old gentleman, who was the father of one of the worst of men. I forget what his criminal associates called him; but he wore a black moustache, and smoked no end of cigarettes. He killed the old man in the first act, and did something illegal and tortuous as well, which had the effect of driving out Pretty Louise into the world, penniless and unprotected. The villain — who had, of course, the worst designs — hoped that she would be at his mercy; but she fled and took a garret above the barber's shop where the gorilla lived, where two comic French Gendarmes resorted for shaving, where a very cheerful soubrette brought home the barber's (comic) wash. There, I cannot tell the whole story; but, looking back, I don't think that the gorilla came from the West Coast of Africa, or from anything like it. I think he came straight out of the Murders in the Rue Morgue. He climbed up to the garret at the end of the play, in the nick of time, for Pretty Louise lay helpless at the villain's feet. The gorilla did not precisely make short work of the scoundrel, for they had a regular set-to to weird music; but I need scarcely say that justice was done. I should have said that earlier in the play the Bad Man had tried to purchase the gorilla, with a view to torturing the poor beast with boiling water and white hot irons. The lieutenant looked at him fixedly for a moment, strode down to the footlights, and said:

'Sir, this Ape is my friend; and we Englishmen don't sell our friends.'

I think the horridly pathetic death of the beast, which ended the piece, was a mistake in melodramatic art, for the tour only lasted six weeks. We had opened in Leeds, had gone north to Byker, an ugly suburb of Newcastle-on-

Tyne, had descended then on Ipswich — a charming place with notable Pickwickian associations, where the stage is supposed to have a greater 'rake' than any other theatre in England, or in the world for all that I know. Then a week in Margate — quite empty, and quite pleasant, and quite useless, from the theatrical point of view; and finally the 'drama' house at Eastbourne saw the last of the Gorilla and the Villain, and Pretty Louise. I was a family lawyer in the first act, and I had been so conscientious as to buy my collars and neckties at a Soho draper's. I looked all right, I believe, but I didn't look in the least like any French notaire that I have seen, and I have known several. But, then, a French notaire in real life is not a bit like the English idea of a lawyer, and it does not pay to be too realistic, least of all in melodrama. In the second act, and for the rest of the play, I was the barber. It was a tolerably quick change, but an easy one. The hair wetted and brushed to a peak on the forehead gave the notion of a close French crop; the frock coat was replaced by a white apron, and moustaches and an Imperial made the disguise complete. The lawyer was more or less intelligible, but the barber, though a much longer part was to me a puzzle, and prolonged reflection has failed to suggest that the barber meant anything at all. His conversation was distinguished by a complete lack of point or purpose.

Before I packed from a very pleasant, though unfortunate, management, I had got another engagement, and after a week's rehearsal we opened at Maidenhead in a piece which I shall call The Professor and the Poppet. I had been 'under-rehearsed,' the part was rather long, things were not going very well with me generally, from London to Maidenhead (inclusive) there was a thick, cold, white fog, and the theatre at Maidenhead is, or was, much less comfortable than a decent barn. It was a damp, chilly barn, without anything so pleasant as straw in it, the ethos of the company did not much appeal to me, I was hideously nervous — on the whole I was, perhaps, more thoroughly miserable than I have ever been, before or since. I am afraid I did but little justice to my part of a drunken (and impossible) actor-manager of a provincial company.

V

I had about six weeks with the farcical comedy which I have called, I think, The Professor and the Poppet. At the end of the fourth week — to use, a technical expression — I 'bunged in my notice,' not being able to stand the management any longer. The management was, I believe, the most honest and the most offensive that I have ever encountered. Its word was its bond, and was never broken; its manners were beastly! Mr Williamson, as I will call it, had a curious experience, which was, perhaps, accountable for a good deal that was not charming. He was a Yorkshireman to begin with, and frankly, I don't like the Yorkshire character. A man in the train observed to me the other day that the Yorkshireman says what he thinks; 'and the worst of it is,' he went on, 'he always thinks such nasty things'. Then Mr Williamson had gone on the stage via the 'Gramophone Girl,' Number 3 Company; he had sung in the chorus, and had done a little business managing. This was his experience of the theatre when somebody left him money, and he started The Professor and the Poppet on its foolish, but fortunate, career. He had the most futile ideas as to the way to manage a company; he compared the art to that of the trainer of a restive, or even vicious horse; 'one must keep one's company well in hand,' he observed to me; and the way in which he kept his company well in hand was by making the most offensive remarks that he could imagine. Nothing was ever right; a man's show was 'rotten,' his collars were too high, his coat was too short, his voice was too low, in his great scene he 'just missed it'; and so on and so on.

I should like to write a little catechism for managers. It would begin something like this:

Q: Are you out for your health?

A: No; I am out to make money.

Q: How are you going to make money?

A: Partly by the excellence of my 'advance-work' and partly by giving a good show.

Q: How do you propose to ensure a good show?

A: Firstly, by choosing my actors carefully; secondly, by rehearsing them efficiently; and, thirdly, by praising them constantly.

Q: Why should you praise them?

A: Because an actor can only play well when he is feeling pleased with himself.

Q: But suppose you praise a man and he continues to play badly?

A: Then I give him his notice.

Q: Is there no other alternative between praise and notice?

A: NONE WHATEVER.

I do not know how the other way, Mr Williamson's way and the insane way, is ever adopted; but I am afraid it is not very uncommon. It invariably leads to the worst results, as might be expected. Fancy standing by a painter and hissing in his ear as he worked that his perspective was all wrong, his anatomy childish, and his colouring that of an oleograph in a bar-parlour. He would not produce his best; he would kick you, promptly; and here is the actor's folly that he too often refrains from kicking. We hear on all sides lamentations as to the wretched state of the theatrical profession, and the reason of this wretched state lies wholly in two grave defects of the average actor's character; he is a coward, and he is selfish, and selfish in a peculiarly short-sighted fashion. The men who have 'arrived,' who sit in the comfortable arm-chairs in the London Club, are utterly and entirely indifferent to the miseries of the less fortunate, of the unhappy hordes who stray about the country at the mercy of the 'management' — swindled, 'done down,' humbugged, lied to, left to starve by the roadside now and then. It is nothing to Mr A and Mr B, who are getting £25 a week with ease and comfort, that their brothers are delivered over to wretchedness; and when Mr A is to join the society which means to fight this miserable state of things, he says: 'What good will it do me?' While B may observe that he strongly disapproves of Trades Unionism. A and B, in a word, are selfish brutes, without bowels of compassion, without sense of brotherhood, nay, without ordinary prudence. For, sooner or later, the wheel may turn, engagements may fail, and then A and B will descend into the pit that they have suffered to be dug for others. The cowardice of actors is much more pardonable; since it is the cowardice of slaves. So long, it seems, have the players been under the managerial heel, so often have they seen the man who has dared to resist tyranny trampled on, none of his fellows finding courage to stand by him, that they accept the present state of things as a sad necessity; not one of them has the fire in his belly to resist, to incur the stigma of being ‘a troublesome man to have in a theatre’ a managerial idiom which signifies a person who objects to being swindled. It will be incredible, probably, to craftsmen of other mysteries, but it is true that the great majority of contracts today are ‘seven-show contracts’: in plain English, the actor acts for nothing if he acts in the afternoon. Imagine a bricklayer setting his bricks gratuitously at midnight — the nearest analogy I can find for the matinée which brings in something to the management, but nothing at all to the actor. And then, again, there is another notorious trick. The actor is engaged at a certain salary for, say, twelve weeks; he accepts, weekly, small pay in consideration of the three months’ employment that (he believes) is guaranteed him. A tour list is supplied, with all the towns which are to be visited — and, it may be, after the company has been ‘on the road’ for a fortnight, the wretched players see a document on the call-board, informing them that the date from August 20th to August 27th has not yet been filled in. This means a ‘week out,’ a week without pay, and very possibly after seven more weeks another call goes up, and the company learns that the tour will terminate in a fortnight’s time. I believe that such proceedings are wholly illegal, besides being morally abominable and the actor bears it. He does not grin (except, perhaps, with the grin of incipient starvation); but he does nothing. He may talk a little in his dressing-room, but no murmur ever reaches the managerial ears, if it did, the murmurer would be set down as a ‘troublesome man in the theatre,’ and his name would be entered in the Great Black Book of the Touring Managers’ Association, and he would get no more engagements — or so he fears. Now and then, of course — very rarely the actor-worm does turn, goes to law and wins his case, if the fraud has been violent, open, and impudent in a very high degree. This is the worst offence of all, and I am sorry to say that I have known actors to discuss such a case and to side with the fraudulent management. I cannot conceive a much deeper depth of cowardice and slavery than this. It is, in itself, a witness to the power and extent of managerial oppression; it is on a level with the behaviour of Mr Squeers’s pupils, compared with it the occupation of the ‘copper’s nark’ — a policeman’s spy — is of Spartan courage and of the martyr’s virtue.

A point of less consequence is the state of certain theatres ‘behind’. A week or two ago I was at a place called Gainsborough. The dressing-rooms were beneath the stage level, and they were somewhat malodorous; but these are little things. But they were lighted by unguarded gaslights; and here I think the generous heart of the public ought to be moved. De nobis facile est; scelus est comburere auditores. It wouldn’t matter, of course, if the actors were burned to death; there are plenty more of them to be found in Maiden Lane, at ‘one one,’ or ‘thirty bob a week, old chap.’ But in all probability the fire kindled by the roasting actors and their belongings would spread to the auditorium; and that would be horrible. The other case I have noted was in Morpeth, in Northumberland, and here my dressing-room steamed and ran with water. There was a great pipe high in the wall, and from this pipe the drops fell thick on the clothes hanging below; all the walls were in streams and rivulets; the air was that of a neglected crypt. If the local management would kindly provide an open grave or two the arrangements would be quite complete. And one descended, hot from the stage, into this dismal, icy and dripping vault.

I remember some years ago doing a week with a very important company indeed, at the Borough Theatre, Stratford, in East London. I was on the stage during the second act of a great costume play; somebody was being defied with large gestures and great rolling phrases, when, suddenly, there was a hiss (as Stevenson says) of the indignant pit: the whole stage was illumined by what might have been blue light-ning-flashes, and swirls of evil smelling vapour curled slowly from the back. It was only a ‘walker-on’ narrowly escaping instant death by electrocution. I do not understand the technique of electric lighting; but, so it turned out, some simple and necessary precaution had been omitted by the local management, and the wings bristled with possible death-traps. The ‘walker-on,’ who was in full fifteenth-century armour, had sat down on what looked like a harmless piece of board — it was quite dark behind the scenes — and he was instantly surrounded by flames and flashes; he escaped destruction by happy chance.

If ‘the profession’ likes all this; if it likes to be bullied, and swindled, and humbugged, and underpaid, and cheated; if it likes to exist at the mercy of the touring managers; if it likes poisonous stinks, death by fire, death from dripping vaults, from electric currents — then there is nothing more to be said. But if it does not like these things — it had better join the Actors’ Union, and be quick about it.

WHEN I WAS YOUNG IN LONDON

I

I WAS OUT hunting the other day; and the scent of the old chase came back to me across the bridge of thirty years and more.

I have often wondered whether I am still alive and going about the London streets with the same eager wonder and curiosity, the same sense of voyage and travel and discovery in strange seas by marvellous capes and outland continents. I mean that I wonder whether the young man from the country still wanders about the streets with that thirst of knowledge in him, that desire for the rare and singular in literature, and that old delight of hunting for it at a cheap rate in the confusion of the bookseller's dusty shelves. With the same desire of knowledge I say: and I hasten to explain, of knowledge for its own sake, for its own delight, for its own great pleasure; not the desire of that knowledge which puffeth up and passeth examinations. Before I went forth to revisit the old hunting-grounds I took counsel with the bookseller of the Great Turnstile, whom I knew well in the old dear dusty days. He said everything was changed.

It's all a different style of thing from what it was in our days. Then there were piles of dusty, dirty books on the floor, and everywhere, and a man with a clay pipe stood behind the counter. The old snuffy book-buyers would come in, and one minute they would be grubbing on the ground on all fours, and then they would be on the top of the ladder amongst the cobwebs — they didn't care for cobwebs — and they would wipe their hands with a handkerchief that looked a week old.

Now we keep the books nicely dusted in glass cases, and there's a carpet on the floor. The customer drives up in a smart motor-car, and we put him in a comfortable chair, and tells him exactly what he wants. The old-fashioned book hunters knew what they wanted.

So much for the opinion of the trade. Having obtained it, I went on my way and tried to find my old London and the old shops. I struck across Lincoln's Inn Fields and sought out Clare Market, by Clement's Inn. The Inn has gone; the old courts, the gracious seventeenth-century hall, the pleasant house in the middle of a garden. Of Clare Market, ancient, dirty, and smoky, hardly anything is left — and my bookshop has departed in the last few months. There I once bought Lumen de Lumine for ten shillings; and the Turnstile man had told me that the book would fetch three guineas in these days. What is Lumen de Lumine about?

I don't believe anybody knows. It is by the brother of Vaughan the Silurist, author of'They are all gone into a world of light'.

Coming down south, I tried to rebuild the eastern end of the Strand as I had known it in those days when every stone of London seemed precious and magical. I set up Holywell Street again; that narrow antique street, more tortuous in its dealings than in its direction. For here there were artful men who tried to persuade us that the histories of Gargantua and Pantagruel by Master Francis Rabelais were high-spirited, amatorious, lively reading; and I often chuckle at the thought of the lad who plucked Rabelais from between Maria Monk and Gay Life in Paris, and out-moded sculduddery of G.W.M. Reynolds, and began to read eagerly one of the most difficult and profound books in the literature of the world.

And there was a big shop on the left hand of Holywell Street as you went eastward. It was piled mightily and hugely with tall folios and thick parchment quartos, and big labels told you that here was an Elzevir going for eighteenpence. There were Elzevirs, true enough, with the Sphere on the title-page, and they were not dear to anybody who wished to give his shelves a grave and learned air. But seriously, they weren't worth twopence; very few Elzevirs are; and only deep experts, armed with a millimetre rule, should attempt to buy these.

Holywell Street has vanished utterly, and Nutt's in the Strand has been translated to Long Acre. I reverence Nutt's in the Strand. I had wondered about Sappho for years. I had heard of the majesty and splendour of Sappho, of a lyric beauty that seemed more fit for the stars than for the earth. Sappho for me had become one of the things that are almost too good to be true; theoretically one admits their existence, but practically one does not expect to have actual experience of them — I had to pinch myself when I took my ticket for Arles and Avignon and Tarascon by Rhone.

Well, one gloomy, rainy, gaslit afternoon in the autumn of’81 I went into Nutt’s in the Strand, and said I wanted Sappho. I don’t think I would have been astonished if the shopman had ordered me out of the shop. Instead, he went to his shelves, brought down a book in dark blue paper covers, and said, ‘Sappho; four shillings’. And so I read in Greek — I can’t read Greek now — of immortal Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus, high on her rainbow-throne; and felt almost like De Quincey when he bought opium on a wet afternoon from the chemist in the gloomy Pantheon, and found, all amazed, that happiness could be put into a bottle and sold for a little money, with change given.

Blessed for ever be the memory of Nutt’s in the Strand. The shop stood, I think, somewhere between the two churches, near the shop of the butcher who said that he sold Welsh mutton, and floured all his joints to show that he spoke the truth.

And there was another old bookshop, across the road, where one Saturday afternoon I found a book in a faded brown cover which brought me face to face with the Absolute.

II

Where is ‘Chocolate as in Spain’; where is the rich smell of Rimmel’s soap; where is the shop of the filter and the ball, falling and rising in the fountain? What has happened to the Strand Theatre? In the place where it stood there seems to be a railway station; but I know better. I feel certain that as the night falls the booking clerks and the liftmen of the Strand station on the Piccadilly Tube glance quietly at one another:

Do you remember, sweet, a roaming
Just before the day’s decline?
The poets call it in the gloaming,
And other folks the hour to dine.

At the Ivy Inn they laid us covers,
But we would not say what fare,
And, like a silly brace of lovers,
Unto the waiter did declare:
O talk not of meat or of drink,
But by yonder starry sky above,
If we must eat, why, we think
Some strawberries and cream, the food of love.

No, it is not exactly great verse — and yet, rather, it is high poetry, for Marius sang it in 1880, and Florence St John was with him and Ashley played the old Marquis in Madame Favart in the vanished Strand theatre.

Alas, many features of the Strand have vanished since I first saw it on that July evening, thirty-three years ago. Not only have the old theatres disappeared. Old houses by the dozen have given place to new hotels, ancient purlieus and byways and passages and Inns of court have made way for palaces of buildings and waste gardens of purple flowers; and there is more than all this; the very spirit and soul of the street have changed; it no longer gives one the sense of being in the very heart and core of London, of participating in the very quintessence of the capital.

I do not think that this mystic mantle of the Strand has fallen upon any other street of the quarter. It isn't merely a case of the old Strand theatres, the Globe, the Olympic, and the Opera Comique having been pulled down; for if these be gone, new theatres have been built in their places. It isn't the theatres that made the old Strand; there are plenty of them in Shaftesbury Avenue; but the old spirit is certainly not to be sought there. No: I think the secret is that the London of my young days was concentrated, whereas the London of 1913 is diffused. There is no longer a centre to it; you can no longer say 'here, and here alone, I am at the heart of the wonder and the gaiety and the excellence of London'.

The first play that I saw in town was The Pirates of Penzance at the Opera Comique, in Wych Street. I did not care for it very much; for one thing the Norman pillars in the second act waved gently in the theatre breeze; and if I knew little of back-cloths I knew a good deal about Norman piers and arches. Then the music was too good; it reminded me of the glees and madrigals of the Philharmonic Society at Hereford, where I was at school; and I did not want to be reminded of school in any way.

But I remember that my father, though a clerk in holy orders, was delighted with a remark of the Pirate King's to the effect that piracy, compared with respectability, was almost honest. I was too young for such high wisdom as this, and I enjoyed myself more at Les Cloches de Corneville, Madame Favart, and La Fille du Tambour Major. This last piece was given at the Alhambra, a theatre in those days. We dined at the Cavour; a large bottle of violet-coloured and most delicious wine being included. In 1880, not merely priests, but bishops, archbishops and patriarchs might have dined there at six or seven or eight. But I do not think that they would have cared for the supper scene between eleven and twelve.

More serious theatrical memories came to me yesterday as I passed the bottom of Wellington Street. There still stands the Lyceum portico; and at the Lyceum I saw Irving as Romeo in the spring of'82. I believe that Irving's Romeo was not a success; but it impressed me with its poetry. The lover was gaunt and hollow-cheeked; and so much the better lover, it seemed to me; and for effect of the theatre I have never seen the dawn from Juliet's window surpassed.

All the ground about here is full of memories. There are the shops of the theatrical costumiers; once they seemed magical places, but later recollections associate them with wigs, well-fitting and ill-fitting, the smell of grease-paints, and the sting of spirit gum. Drury Lane Theatre amidst change is unchanged; but a scarlet corporal's guard marched under the colonnade thirty years ago; and I can't think that the latest autumn drama is as good as the first. I can never remember whether it was Youth or The World, but I know that the ship was blown up by an infernal machine, and that Augustus Harris fought with the villain on a raft in mid-ocean, and was rescued, to the happiness of us all.

The other day I was talking of the old bookshops, and as I turn into York Street remember that I have stood behind the counter as well as before it. One day, in happy ignorance, I sold a seven and sixpenny book for ten and six, and when my master heard of it he appeared to think that I might yet do nobly. But a week later I disposed of a ten shilling volume for five shillings; and the bookseller seemed almost to despair.

The counter was only my place occasionally. My real business was in a dim garret in Catherine Street, above the publishing offices of Vizetelly. Here, musty, fusty, dusty, in crazy confusion, were all the mad dreams and a few of the high visions of the world. The Catherine Street cock-loft — a street now goes over the site of the house — contained a wonderful collection of occult literature, and it was my affair to catalogue these English, Latin, Greek, French and German books, and write notes under their titles about devils and witches and the Sabbatic Goat and the Spagyric Stone and the Furnace of the Wise.

And one afternoon, as I wrote assiduous in the midst of these great labours, the hot summer Strand became tumultuous. A murmur swelled into a roar, the street was tormented into a ringing chorus of shrill clamant voices. The newsboys were selling the Pall Mall Gazette containing the first instalment of a remarkable series of articles called The Maiden Tribute of Modem Babylon.

III

In 1880 London was manifested to me as a city all glorious and glittering with light. And if that town of my boyhood could be reconstructed now, with its old lighting, I should find it sombre and gloomy, an abode of shadows and dark places, ill-lit with flickering and unsteady yellow flames.

But, in truth, I came up to town in that long ago time with the very greatest advantages. How great these advantages were was brought home to me a year or two ago on a night when I was a guest of the Omar Khayam Club. On these occasions it is the unhappy lot of one of the votaries of roses and red wine to say something civil about the guests of the evening, and on this particular night I was glad to hear myself praised for a translation of the Heptameron that I had made in the prehistoric times of which I am writing. I was glad; everyone likes a hand, as Foker very rightly told Pendennis; but my thoughts went back to dearly-loved wintry fields, and the deep narrow lane under the hedges and the black woods. By that dark lane, by those lonely fields, I went evening after evening with my packet of manuscript, and waited by the stile where the footpath to Caerleon-on-Usk from Llandegfeth crosses the road. Presently the postman's horn would come faintly sounding through the still twilight air; the postman himself appeared, stumping along stoutly. I gave him my packet, and went back home along the dark lane; faint lights twinkling from the farmhouses on the hillsides far away, a dim moon rising from the obscure depths of the forest of Wentwood, above the waters of the Usk.

And then one night in July I saw for the first time all the glittering gas lamps of the Strand, lamps glittered on the thronged pavement and the crowding people and the hurry and rush of the street. All the air was alive with gaiety and cheerful faces, and the shops were all brightness and wonder; as it were, very treasure houses, illuminated places full of Arabian marvels that one had heard tell of, but might scarcely hope to see. The crowds pressed about the theatre doors, about these amazing theatres, where they acted plays; and to and fro the swift hansoms went flashing, to the music of jingling bells.

And yet greater wonders: I walked down Surrey Street from the dingy, comfortable, private hotel, and there was the great sweeping curve of the Embankment, a semi-circle of resplendent silver moons. It was the electric light of vague surmises, the incredible was made visible, and I felt that I was now taken up into the great ineffable glory of London. Grandeur and splendour were fulfilled on me.

And yet, as I say, it was but a dim place to the London of today. The silver-blue electric lights only shone on the embankment and (I think) in front of the Gaiety Theatre. The rest of the town was lit by the old yellow gas, flickering and wavering before the wind, in its square lamps. It was fifteen years at least before the coming of the green incandescent gas — which is of the hue of the glow-worm's light — twenty before the general adoption of electricity, twenty-five years before Oxford street was lit by electric lamps of rich glowing amber. And there were no electric signs in those days; no inscriptions in green and gold and ruby and yellow, flashing and flaming and changing against the sky; no fiery serpents writhing upon a dusky wall, no phoenix in its burning red, dying and re-aspiring, no torches with rushing fires to emblazon the darkness.

But, as I say, I saw London for the first time under the best auspices; it shone for me bright and haloed in glory against the background of the dark wood and the still, wintry fields, and the lonely lane that climbs the long hill to Llanddewi Fach from Caerleon-on-Usk.

It was a good many years after this when I succeeded in renewing something of my own first impressions in the heart of a friend. Strangely enough this friend was a French confrere, an inhabitant of Paris. Now my recollections of Paris at night — which are faint enough, represent it to me as a well-lit and glittering city; but somehow or other M. Roulet — he was meridional and pronounced his name Roulette — left London convinced that it was a city partly of mysterious and aweinspiring gloom and darkness, partly of sudden flashing fires, but chiefly of blazing, flaring, glittering gaiety, outdoing and surpassing the brightness of the towns of the South.

I think it was accident which fashioned this picture in his mind. We went to see the pictures in the National Gallery one afternoon. M. Roulet admired Hogarth heartily, passed through the modern British room with the remark, 'Voila une impression de très mauvaise peinture,' and standing on the steps outside formally and firmly denied the proposition that Trafalgar Square was the finest site in Europe. Then a fog came on, and took him down by Somerset House— 'belle architecture de ville' — to the Embankment.

The river rolled black, funereal. Clouds and whorls of yellow fog surged and drifted across the sky; even as we looked it blackened and thickened. Out of this terrible darkness Waterloo Bridge loomed tremendous, and the confusion of buildings on the other shore, now appearing, now vanishing, put on unearthly shapes. Roulet was amazed, awe-stricken. 'I have never seen anything like this,' he murmured. This cannot be London; it is no modern city; it is rather the magical resurrection of Babylon, dead for ages.'

Suddenly from the summit of a dark tower across the water a light flamed up and died down again into blackness. A temple of fire-worshippers,' said my French colleague, and he would not hear me when I said it was an advertisement of a brand of whisky.

And as for the other aspect of London; I took him night by night to the Leicester Square quarter. He saw theatres, music-halls, cafés all brilliant and lighted up; he trod pavements as thronged and bustling as the Cannebière at Marseilles — and the Café de l'Europe let him help himself to absinthe. And so it seemed to him that he had never seen anything aught so gay.

I did not tell him of another London that I knew; of the suburban streets that then wandered out westward with sparse gas lamps, of how these lights got fewer and farther apart, till at last the suburban street became a road, and the road a muddy lane, and looking back one could see all the fires of London reflected dimly in the sky, as if far away awful furnace doors were opened.

IV

The other day a man who had been reading these recollections of a vanished world asked me why I didn’t try my hand at an article on the restaurants and chop-houses of the early ‘eighties. I said I would see what I could do, but I grinned as I said it, the reason of that grin may appear below.

Not that I am entirely ignorant of the tavern of thirty years ago. I have said that I dined one night at the Cavour in Leicester Square, a restaurant which has not altered much, I think, since 1880. I did not dine there again until 1900, and I can only remember one great change; he bottle of violet coloured wine was no longed included in the price of the dinner, and, as far as I know, this custom of included wine has become rare in London. I am sorry for it, since that (apparently) free vintage reminds me always of France, and there is nothing that I like better than to be reminded of that pleasant land of warm sunshine, red wine, and good roasting cooks. Then, again, I once went into the vanished St James’s restaurant, sacred, I believe in many a tender heart as ‘Jimmy’s.’ It is not sacred in my heart; I had roast lamb and mint sauce there one day in July, 1880 and the lamb was distinctly and unpleasantly high. I never entered St James’s again.

Another and a better tavern comes up in my memory. This was the old Cock in Fleet Street, the place where Tennyson drank that famous pint of port, and received the myth of the origin both of the titular bird and his attendant head waiter. I remember well eating my chop in one of the old boxes near the Jacobean fireplace. I had got odd notions in my head about Fleet Street, derived, I think, from the early study of Boswell. I had lunched once or twice at the Cock; but one day I resolved to go there late and make a night of it. Templars and wits and scholars no doubt would be there; Tennyson, I understood, had left town for the Isle of Wight; still English literature would be well represented, and I might make valuable acquaintances. So I entered the tavern somewhere between nine and half-past — and found the waiters making ready to close the place for the nigh. I suppose I was only about fifty years too late in my visit at that hour.

Another ancient and departed house that I visited occasionally was the Bell in Holborn. It was the last complete and perfect example of the galloried Inns of London; there were, I think, two tiers of galleries running round the courtyard; the Phiz picture of the Southwark Inn in Pickwick might pass for a portrait of the Bell in Holborn as I remember it. I did not go there for food; but for the pleasure of drinking beer in tankards in grave, antique, and dignified surroundings. I have a feeling that the company in the parlour at night was chiefly composed of detectives, graziers, and commercial travellers from the North.

But why did I grin when it was suggested to me that I should recall my experiences of the old chop-houses and restaurants? Why, because during my early years in London I so rarely had anything to eat. I did not exactly know what it was to sleep at the sign of the Beautiful Star — though I have often wondered how I managed to keep a roof over my head — but certainly I knew very well what it was to dine with Duke Humphrey. For me the ‘half a loaf is better than no bread’ saying was no mere vague proverbial metaphor, but a literal statement of my experience for days and weeks and months and years. I lived in a room in Clarendon Road, Notting Hill Gate. I wish I could say that it was a garret, but it was not; there was no slope in the roof. Still it had the advantage of only measuring some ten feet by six; and this, I think, is smaller than the average literary garret space. A step-ladder for ascent to the roof in case of fire was hung horizontally on the wall of the landing, and between the rungs I had disposed my library. I used to read Homer in Greek for fun in those days, and for really light reading — on lazy Sunday mornings, for instance — I had Burton’s Anatomy of Melancholy, a work on which I look back with tender reverence and delight.

They were good days; after their severe and austere and ascetic fashion. I had picked up Aldrich in one of those dusty grimy hunts in the second-hand bookshops about the Strand, and I became entranced in the study of the Scholastic Logic — which is the only real logic, and a science infinitely offensive to the spirit of the present age. And so failed to acquire that knowledge of the chop-houses that should have decorated this column of reminiscence. I would go into town by the smoky and sulphurous District

Railway, resolved to dine well, if plainly, at the Cock. But the good shabby old books drew me; and I spent the chop money on a copy of Whateley; and went back to Clarendon Road all a flutter of joyful expectation, and set about the Elements as I drank green tea and munched dry bread.

I am sorry that I did 'the right thing,' and played to the gallery with such an unfailing enthusiasm for the old traditions. I feel that the buying of a book on logic instead of buying a good grilled chop is perilously like something out of a book — and a somewhat melodramatic book, at that. I can't help; it actually happened so.

But, in common honesty, I must confess that I had moments of sensual indulgence. I remember finding in a shop in Acton a History of the Literature of the Middle Ages that filled me with delight. I read in it for the first time Walter Map's poem Mihi est proposition in taberna mori, and I was so enchanted by the rich rhymed Latin that I felt the occasion must be fitly celebrated. So when I came to the baker's shop opposite to the Uxbridge Road station I not only bought a loaf of common bread, but two solid chunks of gingerbread. It was a terrible debauch. And once a week, when times were reasonably good, I used to have an excellent chop and potatoes at a pleasant old public-house on the Chiswick Road, just before you get to Turnham Green. I am not certain whether it still stands unaltered or whether it is the tavern I saw being rebuilt and utterly ruined for all decent people a few months ago.

V

Looking back upon the Clarendon Road period of my early experience in London, I gladly remember that I had a heart for poetry as well as for the logic of the school-men. I read all of the poetry I could get hold of; and my researches were delightfully unsystematic. Everybody knows the 'hundred best books' method of reading, and I daresay that for many people it may be a good plan to work with a chart, which will give you at a glance your scheme of lyric poets, arranged and dated in their centuries. But such a scheme would never do for me; I was rather like those early mariners who worked a vague reckoning by the stars, and yet had the consciousness of being on a voyage of great discoveries.

Thus on a fine summer afternoon with shillings in my pocket I enter the old Denny's that stood at the westward end of Holywell Street, and buy Swinburne’s Songs before Sunrise, which is brave work when one is seventeen. Again, on a gusty winter’s night, I am wandering along the high road at Hammersmith, and finding a second-hand bookshop at the corner of a quiet street I go in and find one volume of The Earthly Paradise, and buy it for three and six. Another day gives me Waller — stiff, stilted and insignificant save for ‘Go Lovely Rose’ — and Cowley, both in eighteenth century duodecimos. I lit upon Warton, but even my enthusiasm could make but little of him, though Dr Johnson said that he loved the fellow. I think I discovered him in a shop in Acton Vale, opposite the brickfields. But were the book good or were it bad, it was ever an adventure, the portal of a new world.

And I not only read poetry, but like other young men with what is called a taste for literature I wrote a large quantity of verse. It was all very bad and imitative and hopeless; still my first instinct of composition made me metrify what I called my thoughts. And here, it seems to me, is the disproof of all the arguments of the rationalists. For no one can maintain that verse is a rational mode of expression; we do not in practical life utter our desires in measured feet or in the jingle of rhymes. But, unfailingly, the young man, burns for poetry, and tried to declare whatever is in his inmost heart by ‘morrow and sorrow’ and ‘moon and swoon’ and ‘mountain and fountain.’ The fact is, the natural man is also the ritual man; and poetry is one of the greatest of the rites and sacraments of life.

It was only rarely at this period that I ventured into what I call the real London, the London of the Strand and Regent Street and Piccadilly. For a brief time I worked in a publisher’s office in Chandos Street, which was then paved with cobbles. I had a desk in a room where a number of young men were doing something or other — I don’t know what — with photographic albums, and an electric bell above my head summoned me at intervals to the presence of my chief who had succeeded Walter Besant as ‘editor’ to the firm. I was just going to describe the nature of my employment, but I am sorry to find myself as vague about my own occupation as on that of my companions who did something with albums. I remember that I had to write daily reports to the chief office in Belfast, but I have no notion as to what I reported. I only know that these documents were required to be written in a fair hand, to have a nice and even margin, and to bear the letter and number ‘Dl’ at the head of this margin. The House was extremely kind to me, and offered to raise my wages when I said I was going, after a month’s trial. But though I have forgotten what my work was, I well remember I didn’t like it, and do I left Chandos Street.

It was then that my wanderings on the western verges of London began. I taught a little Latin and less Greek to small children, at first for the whole day, and then in the mornings only. This was the great time of the dry bread, green tea, and tobacco diet, diversified by the occasional chop at the Chiswick tavern, and now and then by a meal of a biscuit, cheese, and a glass of beer at a little tumbledown public-house on the road between Turnham Green and Gunnersbury. It was a queer little place — a trim row of villas has long ago marched over its site — with a high-pitched roof of red tiles and an immense growth of ancient ivy that quite covered one sagging end. At the back were market gardens stretching all the way to Acton. That reminds me of yet another fashion of my dinners. I would buy two or three penn’orth of a certain square flat biscuit in which currents were embedded, and take the bag to a gate on a lonely road that wandered through these dank market gardens. The I would sit on the gate and munch, and afterwards smoke, and old women who worked amongst the cabbages would now and then beg tobacco. I always gave liberally of this, and enjoyed doing so.

The reason for my enjoyment was an odd one. I lived a life of such desperate loneliness that I might almost have been Robinson Crusoe on his Island. I had few friends in London, no friends at all of my own age, so during months which drew into years I did not know any real speech of fellow to fellow; though I walked daily amidst myriads I was yet alone. Thus there were moments — too many of them — when the sense of isolation was nigh to overwhelming me; I was, as it were, a ghost, who moves among the multitude of living men, desirous of speech with them, and yet unable to communicate in anything. So I was grateful to the old market-garden women who asked for tobacco for their clay pipes; they demonstrated to me that I was still alive and had tastes which were shared by other human beings.

I do not often find myself in those western suburbs now, but whenever I go Acton way, or through Brentford, or by Perivale, or stand in Kew Gardens looking at Syon House, I think I see the young man with the moustache slouching along the roads, always alone; sitting on the stiles of the by-paths, peering into the windows of the suburban bookshops, or eating those famous currant biscuits for his dinner. Sometimes the young man wished that the March winds were not quite so piercing, or else that his old great-coat might be made a little warmer.

Day after day I wandered about in this fashion; and in the wintertime I was glad when I got home of nights that my room was so small. For, wanting a fire, the gas jet warmed it, and when the weather was at its coldest I kept on my great coat. Once in my room I lit the spirit lamp, and made a great brew of tea, and sat down to my books and — usually — to happiness. One night, I remember, I had found Pomponius Mela and the other ancient geographers in the Portobello Road. It was a fine edition, a Stephanus of 1520 or thereabouts, and I made a great night of it in the little room. There was much green tea, a thick cloud of tobacco, and all the wonder of the writer who tells of the eternal dances of the fauns on the African mountain, of the clanging cymbals of their companions sounding in seamen’s ears from a wild shore — tinnitus cymbalorum per oram maritimam.

THE GLITTER OF THE BROOK

MR. AGATE, ONE of our most distinguished literary and dramatic critics, said a very striking and arresting thing a few weeks ago. He was reviewing a book, the author of which had declared that in his opinion, great music, the music of Mozart and Beethoven, was the very climax of civilisation: in itself civilisation, and the pure essence and expression of civilisation.

Mr. Agate would have none of it. He swept music aside, and with it architecture, sculpture, painting, all the arts; including, I suppose, literature, though I don’t think literature was expressly mentioned. “None of these things,” he said, “counts. When I speak of civilisation, I mean good sewage.”

Let us not endeavor to score off Mr. Agate, as we say, referring to that sacred British institution, cricket. Let us not get gay with him, as I believe you say in America. It would be very simple to ask Mr. Agate why, holding that good drains make good men, he passed his days in judging plays and books; matters, according to his doctrine, of no consequence whatever. I suppose his answer would be: “Because I want to earn a lot of money, so that I can afford to live in a house where the sanitation is perfect; and so I give in to human folly.”

But we will not cross-question Mr. Agate; there is always something unmannerly, almost brutal about the argumentum ad hominem, the confronting a man with the consequences of his own opinions. I have quoted this saying about sewage, because I believe it to be a survival, because I believe that it is the utterance of a doctrine now dying, soon to be dead.

With a kind of brusque and biting humor, no doubt, Mr. Agate intended to signify that he was a utilitarian and a materialist; a believer in the school of Jeremy Bentham, of the elder Mill, of the sect known as the Philosophic Radicals, who uttered their voices in parliament as Bright and Cobden, who are expressed in literature by Mr. Gradgrind, the Hard Fact man. The sect spoke in a leading article in The Times, when William IV was to be crowned. “What nonsense all this is,” said, in effect, the weighty article. “What possible good can be effected by greasing (anointing) the person of the sovereign?” And the gentle, though shallow, Macaulay prophesied utilitarianism when he spoke of ancient philosophy; of Socrates, Plato, Aristotle and the rest. The leaves of this tree of ancient philosophy are beautiful indeed, Macaulay allowed. But, he asked, where is the fruit of the tree? Do Plato and Aristotle lead to the gas works and the locomotive engine? If not, what is the use of Philosophy? And, be it said in all sincerity and gravity, this utilitarian faith is by no means to be blown away with a contemptuous puff of the breath. It appeals, in one way or another, to all of us. Before we laugh at it, let us ask ourselves whether we are completely indifferent to our bodies, to our bodily comforts and discomforts, to the body’s sickness and health, to its starvation or repletion. Suppose I say that I don’t think that Macaulay’s engine, or our motor cars and airplanes matter twopence, that it is of no real consequence whether we go fast or slow. Very fine; but my friends would tell me to walk to London and back, fifty-two miles in all, the next time I have to go in town; and then to say how I liked it. No; there is no denying that utilitarianism is a faith of universal appeal, of high cogency. There is only one thing to be said against it, and that is, that it is entirely incredible. We may be reciting the “I believe in one utility,” the “Our Father Bentham,” the “Hail Sewage full of chloride” and the rest: and the wind in the trees, or the glitter of the brook, or a line of Keats will scatter it all away; and we awake from nightmare, and know that the well being of the body is the means; the joys of the spirit the end. Utilitarianism, materialism are dying creeds: I shall yet see Mr. Agate on the mourners’ bench of a better faith.

You can see signs of the change in all quarters and in all manners, both high and low. I hardly venture to touch on the esoteric doctrines of sciences; but it has long been evident that Prospero’s exposition of the universe is far nearer to the truth of things as modern science sees it, than the science, or rather, nescience of the Tyndall, Clifford, Spencer school of the ‘seventies of the last century. The very names of these people have already something obsolete about them; they will soon be utterly forgotten.

But let us not say more of these matters, which as I have confessed, are too high for me. Let us seek our signs in familiar things. Here is my instance.

Some ingenious person has invented a new cough-lozenge, a sort of medicament in which we are necessarily and perpetually interested, here in England. The benevolent inventor has called his dose (we will say) “Bung”. He advertises it, and his advertisement has just caught my eye on the back page of “The Daily Mail”. Here it is:

Teacher says:
Bung is best - to ease the throat and warm the chest.

You observe that this eloquent appeal is in verse. Why in verse? To attract attention better. But why should a jingling verse attract attention? It certainly does. The pleasing example I have cited is one amongst many: solid men of business, great concerns, the keenest professors of the art of publicity - a word I dislike - all entreat our custom with their simple rhymes. There is the Underground Railway of London that sings:

Underground everywhere:
Quickest way, cheapest fare.

And it was said that the late Lord Northcliffe, that great master of the art of advertising, paid a heavy fee to the author of:

Weekly Dispatch
Best of the Batch

It attracts. But why does it attract? Let me ask you another. Why did Hesiod, who lived in the eighth century B.C., write his “Works and Days” in rolling hexameters? The “Works and Days” is a “Poor Richard” book, a collection of simple maxims, of unsophisticated country folk, who love to hear their own experience, their own rough-hewn common sense corroborated and condensed into a phrase. “The half is greater than the whole”, says Hesiod to the man who will go to law resolved to have his claim satisfied to the uttermost, forgetful of lawyers costs. “Many things fall out between the edge of the cup and the lip”, “Potter hates potter, and one craftsman another” - one sees the origins of our “There’s many a slip ‘twixt the cup and the lip”, and “Two of a trade never agree”.

But why did this remote, ancient, primitive Greek put his keen observation, his homespun wisdom into verse?

The reason is that poetry comes before prose just as singing comes before speaking. Chanted poetry is the natural utterance of primitive man; spoken prose is a later, artificial invention. All poetry was contemptible to the utilitarians, the materialists, the rationalists, the Benthamites: it was a senseless jingle, worthy, only of savages.

And now see how we return to the old way, and recommend our cough-drops with a song.

The fact is, that if we have anything of real consequence to say, we say it in poetry; and it is only natural that a man who has goods for sale should deem them of the utmost consequence.

LONDON THIRTY YEARS AGO

WHEN I FIRST came up to London the days of the great revel were already over. Deep down in Wales, of winter nights, when the lanes were hedge-deep in snow, and we gathered close about the flaming logs, I had heard men speak of the gaieties of the entertainments of London. They babbled of Cremorne, of the Argyll Rooms, they chuckled as they recalled the Chief-Baron Nicholson and Judge and Jury, they praised the Alhambra as the home of all delights. But when I first saw the glow of the myriad gas lamps the curtain had already fallen on all these wild doings. London no doubt amused itself much as before, but not so openly. One danced, perhaps, as merrily as ever; but one did not dance in the open air as at Cremorne, but behind doors made tight and fast; and thus, no doubt, a highly important moral principal was asserted. A year or two ago on a stifling summer night I tried to dine under the sky at some exhibition at Shepherd's Bush. I found that this orgy could not by any means be sanctioned; and though the flesh craved for a cutlet and a cool jar of Munich beer in the fresh air, the spirit was delighted to find that virtue still reigned in London. In our better moments, of course, we all know that beer and cutlets consumed under the stars are immoral.

But I must not dilate upon these forbidden pleasures. In 1880, when I first saw London, I was most of all curious about 'the play'; and in the second place I wanted to see 'the sights.' It is Thackeray, I think, who interprets the enthusiasm for 'the play' in the orthodox fashion. It was no sectarian passion: it did not discriminate between this play and that: in those simple days the problem drama, now becoming so curiously old fashioned, had not come into existence. The lad from the country, at all events, drew no nice distinctions between Shakespeare, melodrama, Gilbert and Sullivan opera, and opera comique from the French; he rested on his innocent faith that the theatre was heaven, and the rising of the curtain the final revelation of bliss. It really didn't matter what the play was or was not; one was seventeen and in the pit, and the footlights were brightening — that was sufficient joy. And oh! the wonders and the savours and the colours of those Neapolitan ices that they brought round between the acts! I always used to get the book of the words when the play was comic opera: it was part of the delight to follow the chorus in such literary gems as:

The coach is come, the coach must dine Out with the meat, out with the wine.

Meanwhile ere on the food we rush, We think we'd like a wash and brush!

Well, we certainly relished the play amazingly, we harmless simpletons of the early 'eighties, and looking back and peering into my heart I believe that some of our pleasure was due to a vague, latent sense that the theatre was, if not exactly wicked, at least a hazardous and daring sort of institution. I did not come of Puritan stock, I am thankful to say; my relations had no sort of formal or specified objection to make against the playhouse. But in 1880 actors and actresses were a part of the great magic of the unknown world before me, and their realm, the stage, was perilous, desirable fairyland.

The theatre was certainly a principal part of the enchantments of London, but it was not all. In the rectories of the early 'eighties we still believed in 'the sights.' I have said that we were a simple folk. So when I first came up to London I was taken to see the sights: and I am bound to say that they profited me very little.

Then we went to the Crystal Palace. The generation that came before me had admired this glassy monstrosity with single hearts. Dickens had said that there was nothing like it in fairyland, and none but Ruskin was found to reply sarcastically that Mr Dickens was quite right; that fairyland held nothing so hideous. But no father from the country would have felt at ease in his mind, if he had not shown his son the Crystal Palace; and so we went to Sydenham. The place bored me, I am glad to recollect, but I was interested by the endive salad that they served there. I tasted it for the first time; salad meant lettuce in the country, and nothing but lettuce.

I escaped the monument and Madame Tussaud's Waxwork: I don't know how. But I saw the exhibition at the Royal Academy and liked the pictures very much. At the Tower of London a countryman put his head on the block and grinned. I climbed up to the Whispering Gallery and St Paul’s Cathedral and the verger whispered, and I declared I heard what he said. I didn’t hear anything, but I thought I would follow the line of least resistance. And I went to Westminster Abbey and Westminster Hall. On the right hand side as one went in there were doors in the wall, and going softly through one of these, I found myself in one of the Law Courts which sat there in those days. The new Law Courts were opened a year later.

And looking back through all the years and, and questioning myself as to what I thought of it all, I am constrained to confess that I thought nothing at all. I realised nothing; the dome of St Paul’s was then no marvel to me, though now I admire and wonder every day, as I go down Fleet Street, and see Wren’s great magistery. The only thing I liked at the tower was a big raven and I was heartily glad to see that there were still ravens at the Tower, when I went there the other day. Again I confess: when I was sixteen I would have given the History of England and all its works and arts and monuments for the moment when the curtain went up at the old Globe, and the chorus began to sing:-

Just look at that, just look at this,
Don’t you think we’re not amiss,
A glance give there, a glance give here,
Tell us if you think we’re dear.

And the tune they sang and the melody of the singing voices ‘ring in my heart for aye’ — to quote a ballad we liked in those days.

THE JOY OF LONDON

I

TO THE IMAGINATIVE man, I suppose nothing has so great an attraction as that which has some savour of mystery about it. He who is something more than a mere automaton, a mechanical performer of certain mechanical tasks, returning day by day, feels instinctively that he is born to voyage in the unknown, to live always in contemplation of a great perhaps. And here, I think, we touch on the secret of one of the most powerful of the many attractions of London.

Its people are numbered, its trades are classified, all the circle of its vast ‘O’ is mapped and charted, it is divided and subdivided to a nicety; and yet he who truly knows London will confess that he knows it not, and is most sure that he never will know it. It is mapped and charted; but only for the logical understanding, never for the imagination. London in its essence, is an object of faith, not of science.

The sense of all this dawns upon one slowly and by degrees. I do not know how this may be with the born Londoner, or whether such an one receives by right of birth the inspiration and the dream of London’s infinitude, of the unplumbed seas of its multitudinous life. But speaking as one of those who have come up from the silent lanes to the sounding streets, I say that the perception of the mystery of London is of slow growth. I saw it first as a place of unimagined gaiety: the Strand and Regent Street and Piccadilly and Bond Street all ablaze with splendid shows and theatres — places of alluring enchantment — and lines of glittering lamps: this was my London, a glorious but limited city.

It was, as I say, by the experience of years that I came to learn how small a part of the cast territory of London I had charted and explored. I moved about from one quarter to another, gradually drawing near to the centre; from Wandsworth I passed to Turnham Green, from Turnham Green to Holland Park, from Holland Park to Bloomsbury, from Bloomsbury to Soho; and so the infinite varieties of London and its life were, little by little, brought home to me, and the lesson was made plain by R.L.Stevenson's New Arabian Nights. From that time forth I thought of the great town as a sailor may think of the ocean or an Arab of the desert; as an object always to be studied, and explored, but never to be known fully, as a region of perpetual surprises and discoveries and adventures of the spirit.

In the eastern tales one reads with a curious and deep satisfaction of the man who, passing along an accustomed road by a track which he has trodden every day of his life, espies suddenly a door in the wall which he had never noticed before. The man opens, enters in, and is made a partaker of the great sacrament of wonder; a new and unsurmised world is shown to him. Such an adventure, I repeat, we read of with a keen relish, as I maintain, due to the fact that door leading to an unknown territory is a symbol of the adventures for which the human spirit is made, as a hot and dry and dusty throat is made for the brook by the way, for the cold water that wells rejoicing from the heart of the rock.

And so, when I think in the most general terms of the pleasures and advantages of London, I think of this Arabian quality that it possesses in such a supereminant degree. There is always a door in the wall, the existence of which one had never noticed or suspected; to surprises and discoveries and inventions in London there is no end. I have trodden the pavements of the Strand now for close on thirty-four years; and a week or two ago I set foot for the first time in a street somewhere near the Little Theatre, an 'old fashioned' street of queer little shops, from which one ascends a steep flight of steps into the main thoroughfare.

I had long known Pentonville as a dreary, dusty hill; but on an autumn day as I climbed it, I saw one of its grey, grim housefronts all glowing purple with rich bunches of ripe grapes. Dionysius crowned and triumphing on that sad mount of Pentonville; the southern Latin vine glade and flourishing in sicco; this was as good and joyful a thing to me as the blaze of the blossoming gorse to the botanist Linnaeus. And yet; I do not know that it was better than the discovery of the Writing Master. He lives or lived in the same street, a little higher, and he had placed his show case on his garden railings. Here behind the glass were specimens of an art that I had thought lost, of flourished and elaborate and conscious penmanship, relics of an age when people wrote well and legibly, because they had been first taught to write beautifully, to take a pleasure in writing for writing's sake. I think the Pentonville writing master's chief specimen was a swan exquisitely flourished with one stroke of the pen.

There are always surprises. Not so many now as there were thirty years ago; it is difficult in these days to fall suddenly upon the old-fashioned country town or hamlet. Once one had only to walk from five to ten miles away; though the advance guard of the raw red villas had already come within a field of the corn-merchant's shop with the bow windows and the small square panes.

The villas have mostly come and conquered since those days, and the old inn has been rebuilt and spoilt; still, here and there you can see the dip of a roof that was set up when Charles II was King. The sixteenth-century barge-board has long gone from Brentford, but there are still fascinations in that queer old town, and I agree with Dr Johnson in preferring it before Glasgow.

Then, the eccentricities of London architecture have their peculiar wonder. There are still left, I think, a few odd specimens of a former delight of the retired London citizen; the summer house in the garden.

I remember gothic ruins made of clinkers in Gunnersbury, but I believe these have vanished. There are still good things left, however; the fanciful ironwork of balconies dating from 1830-40, and examples of sham-gothic from the earliest to the latest period. See for a very fine example of the Horace Walpole gothic the doorway of the hall of Staple Inn, in Holborn, and if you will walk around the streets between King's Cross and Islington you will find the medieval idea struggling, with indifferent success, to express itself in the tracery of the window-panes. Fanlights are a special study.

And then, beside these odd remnants and oddities, there stretches the vast expanse of the modern suburbs; all red and new, shiny and flimsy, climbing the green hill before your eyes, breaking into the heart of the old wood. And the myriads who live in these new houses; who are they?

City clerks, very likely, for the most part, but there will be a sprinkling of high mystics, and here and there an alchemist who watches for the Engendering of the Crow, and hopes yet to see the glory of the Son Blessed of the Fire.

II

A few years ago when I was still, theoretically, on the stage, but practically already off it, a fallacious old person said he had taken the Britannia Theatre, Hoxton, and steadfastly proposed to revive the golden days of Mrs Sarah Lane and her stock company. He enlisted me in his band, after ascertaining, by tape measurement, that I was not too short nor too broad for parts of moderate and tempered heroism, and the rehearsals began. And they soon ended without the play coming to the judgement of the Hoxton and Shoreditch amateurs of the drama; but in the meanwhile I had a very agreeable experience.

I was walking up from the trams to the Britannia and looking into the shop windows when I saw in one of them certain objects that swept me back some thirty-five or forty years. Somewhat old, somewhat battered, somewhat weary, somewhat doubtful of the famous stock company that was to be, suddenly became a boy again and saw scenes that had once been very dear and enchanting and familiar.

I was staring into the window of the original toy-theatre shop; and there before me were the very scenes and the very characters of my own toy-theatre which I had not beheld since 1875 or thereabouts. To tell the truth, it was so long ago and so many things had happened since those days, so many and such deep waves had gone over me — my fellow countrymen will remember the phrase ‘plant yr tonau’ and understand — that the foolish, dear toy-theatre had passed quite out of my consciousness. It was only when I stared into that sacred shop window in Hoxton that I perceived that it had never been forgotten.

With what a rush it all came back! The gallant figures, blue and yellow and green and red, that one cut out with mother’s scissors and set marching and in action in slender frames of tin; here they all were, gay on their sheets. They were of an old type when I first knew them; 1840, I suppose, was stamped on their ingenious countenances; but empires had gone down and they were still unchanged. And the proscenium of the theatre itself was unaltered; the same whiskered conductor raised a baton that had never fallen through all these heavy years; the same ladies and gentlemen in evening habits of yellow and blue gazed in perpetual delight from the private boxes on either side. Here were the sets for Masaniello and Timour the Tartar, what Neapolitan richness in the one, what craziness of Oriental architecture in the other. There are scenes in Timour which are like nothing on earth — saving the Brighton Pavilion and a house that used to stand, and may stand still, for all that I know, between Torquay and Paignton.

I had found the toy theatre again, and it was the true theatre. The rehearsal of our new play at the Britannia appeared the phantasm; and indeed it was so from all practical points of view.

And all this is an example of the manner in which dreams are realised in London, and, as it were, made concrete. The toy theatre of my boyhood had come to me out of the vague; now, after all these weary years I had found its place of origin, of its source and its begetting. It is, as I have said before in The Evening News, in the country that one reads of Sappho, and imagines wondrous things of Sappho; it is in London that one goes into a solid shop in the solid strand — alas! since then both solidities have vanished like cloudwrack at sunset — and buy for earthly shillings Sappho in the original Greek and in blue paper covers.

Sometimes, of course, the town does not realise the country dream. I remember how I used to walk four or five miles to a certain railway station where the London papers were obtained. I read them eagerly, even to the advertisements, and especially the theatrical advertisements. They were announcing The Shaughraun, Les Cloches de Corneville, and Madam Flavart in those departed days, and at the end of each advertisement one read, ‘For Cast, see Under the Clock.’ The reference was really to the lists of the actors and actresses set forth under the picture of a clock in another column of the paper; but quite in good faith, I chose to make up for myself the image of a vast architectural clock somewhere in the heart and centre of London, at the base of which the various casts were displayed.

This I found not to be so, ‘far from it,’ as Mr Pecksniff said of his youthful speculations concerning pickled onions and elephants and castles. But as a general rule it is nevertheless true that, in small things and great, London confirms the fancy of the country; it shows to the eyes that which the imagination had conceived.

Think what brave words the country boy reads in books! Mrs Gaskell tells us how that one brave word ‘London’ itself had so impressed itself on the imagination of the poor, distracted Patrick Bronte that he had studied the great town as if it were a science, and was able to set Londoners right concerning short cuts and obscure passages, as he talked to them in the Haworth inn. Patrick Bronte never realised his dream of the immense city; and one is sorry for him, but many of us who have come from places as obscure as Haworth or much more obscure, have known what it is to dwell on these words and at last to realise their force in concrete fact and experience. And London provides and marks the term of many of these journeys of the spirit.

And, though I urge a point which is somewhat opposed to my own philosophy of things in general, I cannot but confess that in many instances the actual thing equals and even surpasses the thing imagined. I must say that I found Provence even more beautiful than Provence imagined; I will not believe that any thinking person can honestly say that London has ‘disappointed’ him. It is greater, more wonderful, than the images that we have made of it in our minds. For once, the actual giant within the tent is vaster than the pictured giant without.

But the words, as I say, that one reads, and dreams of, one sees at last realised in one or other of the myriad streets. The boy reads of swords, and perhaps has a toy sword as a plaything, a ‘sword’ comes to him almost a symbol and a sacrament, some-thing splendid and terrific and vague like ‘Bagdad’ and ‘Rome’ and ‘martyr.’ He comes up to London and sees the Guards at Whitehall; awful figures all shining and scarlet, with actual drawn swords in their hands, glittering and terrible, and eloquent of sudden death. And faith is realised, and more than realised.

III

It was only the other day that, speculating on the immensities of London, I pictured, or tried to picture, its uttermost limits, and, and showed the serried lines of raw red houses covering the fields that were green yesterday, climbing the high hill, penetrating into the deep heart of the old wood. I asked who it was that inhabited all this great array of houses and streets, and the answer, I think, was: ‘City clerks for the most part, with a sprinkling of high mystics and a few convinced alchemists.’ I knew that this was no mere rhetoric, and a day or two later I received the current copy of the Journal of the Alchemical Society. And several of the most prominent members give addresses in suburbs that most people would call commercial and commonplace. 'Kelly' is a sage, doubtless, but much is hidden from him. He is quite unaware that the chief English authority on the Kabbala is domiciled at Ealing.

And then again, it was once my mission to penetrate to the newest — and therefore the obscurest — parts of Croydon to talk to a certain gentleman who ministered to some vaguely religious body there. The point — the journalistic point — about my quarry was that he has formerly served in the German army and had sailed on the northern seas as a whaler; such a career was justly considered somewhat out of the common. I found I had to leave all such homely and friendly things as railway stations and tram lines far behind me; I must put out in vastissimum pelagus, into the immeasurable sea of the suburb, if I would find my man. I dis-covered him at last in a new house in a new road that might have risen from the earth in the night the night before my visit, and now was finally sealed as part of greater, or rather greatest, London. The pastor received me with the utmost courtesy, and told me that all the reports that I had heard were true; furthermore, he had been a priest of the Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church, and was a Licentiate of the University of Salamanca.

A Licentiate of Salamanca! I had never dreamed that I should be found worthy to meet such a personage, save in golden Cervantes and the picaresque romances of Spain; I received as great a pleasure as I once imparted to a friendly business man from the North, in London for the first time, who finding me, all a stranger to him, drinking absinthe at midnight in the Café de l'Europe in Leicester Square, felt that at last he was seeing life — and devilry.

But hearing of Salamanca, I began to quote Barbara Celarent and to praise the scholastic logic. The pastor of… the Universal Church, we will call it, cordially agreed with me, and added that the Roman Catholic religion was the only Scriptural form of Christianity.

'If I were a Christian,' he said, 'I should be a Roman Catholic, but I am convinced that what the gospels embody is a distorted form of the worship of Adonis.'

I was talking about this gentleman to a friend a day or two ago in a Fleet Street tavern. My friend expressed his cordial agreement with the praise of scholasticism and declared that for a really able statement of the atheist position there was nothing to approach the opening section of St Thomas Aquinas's Summa.

Which reminds me that I once had a very agreeable discussion with a sub-editor on 'essence' and 'substance' at a newspaper dinner; also, that it was in the purlieus of Lincoln's Inn that a Chinese gentleman handed me a cup of that curious tea called 'Water Fairy,' and I have eaten as good bouillabaisse in Wardour Street as Pascal himself prepares at his tavern in the Old Port of Marseilles.

Here, then, is another aspect of the joys of London. He whose mind is rightly prepared is constantly affected by the sensation of strangeness, of that slight novelty which Coventry Patmore declares to be one of the marks of a work of genius in the arts. And strangeness always appears to me to be not perhaps the differentia, but, say, the inseparable accident of all excellence, whether it be excellence of life or thought or cookery or wine. We may be talking of a great saint, of one who carried out that almost intolerable command of Thomas à Kempis— 'love to be unknown, and to be thought of no consequence' — and we say, 'how could he do it, how could he really feel like that?' And we shall ask much the same question about Captain Scott and his companions, we shall feel that a great picture or a great poem is in fact a miracle — an accomplishment beyond all reasonable expectation — and as for an old Burgundy, there is no greater applause to be bestowed than 'What a wonderful wine!'

So it is with London. To its surprises of sense and of spirit there is no end. It has not only that joy, which I have pointed out before, of realising and more than realising one's expectations, of showing the boy who has read of crucibles in books, crucibles in a shop-window; but it continually exhibits something new and altogether unexpected. A cynical character in Mrs Leveson's latest novel says of marriage, 'one does not run after a bus when one has caught it.' London is a bus that no one has ever caught. It is an ocean that no one has voyaged all over, whether in body or in spirit.

I do not think that there are any more awful concepts presented to the human mind than the eternities and infinitudes of time and space. Not for one moment, as it seems to me, can one imagine beginning or end to time, or limit to space; and yet time without beginning or end and space without bounds are conceptions equally intolerable to the soul. We can neither deny nor affirm; we are left in a perpetual suspense.

And the sight of the map of London always leaves me with a sense of a kind of lesser infinitude — if the phrase may be allowed. Here are marked streets and alleys and squares and bye-ways, which strike the eye as past numbering. They were all here, in undoubted brick and stone and marble and mortar, and yet one feels that no living man has trodden them all; that to the most energetic and leisured explorer there must ever be myriads of streets that he will never enter. And, extending the notion, how many houses must remain unvisited; secrets throughout all ages to all but a very few?

Thus does London make for us a concrete image of the eternal things of space and time and thought.

RE-DISCOVERY OF LONDON

I

YEARS AGO, I remember, I used to wander, by day and night, about the western limits and outposts of this most vast London. I would go out and pass from street to street with the purpose of escaping from London and attaining the true country. The streets at last faded into open fields, and I would say ‘I am free at last from this mighty and stony wilderness.’ And then suddenly, as I turned a corner the raw red rows of houses would confront me, and I knew that I was still in the labyrinth.

Or, in the night, I had fled away from the burning of the myriad lamps and the patter of the ceaseless, restless feet, I stood on a hill in a sweet summer darkness, and relished again the scent of night dews and green leaves: and lo! across the dim valley, lines of trembling fires, and still I was shut in as by ardent walls.

This was thirty years ago or more, and since then London has swollen like a flood, and engulfed many fields and woods and thickets that were then green. Its extent is mighty almost beyond the power of imagination, huge in a way that no mileage figures can express. For it is to be noted, our minds place things in categories, and judge each by its own standard. The Chestnut Avenue at Hampton Court is broad, though one can cross it in a minute: and so London among cities is vast as Sahara among deserts.

So it was with something of awe that I set out the other day on the first of a series of explorations of this immensity. A chance word determined my direction, and I fixed on Tooting. I have been a Londoner for nigh on thirty-four years and I had never seen Tooting; I only knew it in connection with a foolish tale of a train that was ‘the two to two to Tooting.’

Now the ‘Londoner’ declared a week or so ago that for him it was useless to define the neighbourhood of Stroud Green by saying that it was near Crouch End, since he knew no more of the latter than of the former. So I will not say that Tooting is by Balham; I will rather assume a knowledge of the Strand, and more particularly of the eastern corner of Wellington Street on the south side of the Strand aforesaid. Here I took the Merton motor-bus, No. 48.

It bore me over Waterloo Bridge, turned into the York Road to the right, then into the Westminster Bridge Road — a quarter that I cannot love — so into the Kennington Road. I mark in passing that here we are in an eighteenth century suburb; I have just guessed a row of houses as c. 1790, when I pass a similar row dated 1786, and feel quite pleased to find myself only four years out. Here are some projecting iron balconies of attractive design; and a few houses are pleasantly shaded and embowered in trees of growth.

From the Kennington Road to the Kennington Park Road, thence into the Clapham Road, a broad way which passes through Stockwell and then becomes Clapham High Street. Here there is not much character, and on Clapham Common I perceive a tendency to baldness — what the doctors call alopecia areata — and also a tendency to accumulate an unseemly litter of waste paper.

About the Common a few of the old houses are left; in them, I suppose, once lived members of the famous Clapham Sect, a race notable for the length of their prayers and the size of their pineapples. But for the most part the old houses and lawns and gardens are gone; interminable red brick streets of little villas have surged over them. Over hills and down valleys the red brick lines rise and surge and dip and cover the plains, spreading far as the eye can reach, and one street is like another street, as wave is like to wave.

So by Balham Hill, by Balham High Road. Somewhere here is ‘Kosman Church,’ the church of ‘The Confraternity of Faithists.’ I know nothing of them, but I dislike both their English and their Greek. In Balham I see a few of the old houses still in occupation, houses of the old snug order, with stabling and coach-house. But here is one that has become a laundry, another is a printing office, a third is a political club, the front garden of a fourth is filled with tiles and drainpipes. To right and left more raw red streets, sometimes with waste patches of ‘undeveloped’ land between the rows.

The Balham High Road — calling itself madly at one point, ‘The Boulevard’ — becomes the Upper Tooting Road, and this comes to a sort of open place whence ways go in every direction. I conclude that this is Tooting, as much as anything is Tooting, and I get down.

There is nothing very remarkable here, a few seventeenth and eighteenth century houses, low and modest, still standing, a great many new red and shiny shops, a house covered by a climbing rose in full blossom. But walking along, I see on a wall the odd inscription, ‘Salvador, S.W.’ And Salvador turns out to be a narrow passage which winds and twists to right and left and leads, so far as I can see, to no where in particular. On each side of it there are homely, pleasant cottages, each of which has a delightful little garden. There are vines and creepers on the cottage walls, and in the well-tilled little gardens onions and hollyhocks and potatoes and carnations and cabbages all flourish together. I am delighted to think that there are still places within the great ring of London where a poor man may cultivate his carnations and cabbages and have a little house to live in; instead of two or three or four cells in one of those hateful, gaol-like ‘buildings.’

I am out again in the high road, and come to a dividing of the ways. On the left the trams go off toward Streatham by a broad, straight road that leads to a waste land. On a big board the merits of this land are proclaimed; it is said to be Ripe and Desirable; but for me its name shall be called Horrible and also Desolate. The sun is burning and flaming; the trams glide away on the straight road, glinting and scintillating and flickering in the noonday light, till they are received into a distant settlement of new red streets, beyond which, dim in the hot haze, is a wooded height.

The road to the right leads through a quarter called Tooting Graveney. Peering through chinks in some hoardings I see what remains of the Graveney Brook, trickling sadly by a broken hedge, through a field in ruins.

II

I do not say that this is the quickest way to Islington. You may get into the diving tram on the Embankment and be switchbacked to the Angel in no time, nor are motor-buses lacking to those who must be in Upper Street in a hurry; but the lover of the picturesque will follow the lines which I shall indicate and get to Islington by the Great Percy Street route.

The starting point is to be taken from Holborn, at the corner of the Gray's Inn Road. You cross Theobald's Road; Clerkenwell and the fabled East-end are to your right; Bloomsbury lies grey towards the setting of the sun. Guildford Street gives you a distant view of Russell Square as you go by, but these are regions comparatively well-known. Moreover, civilisation has made heavy inroads into Bloomsbury; I have heard a distinguished professor of the Fine Arts lament for it, as for a place whose old dim and dingy glories are departed. But to eastward and to northward still remain all the splendours of the unknown.

You draw on northward and pass the back of one side of Mecklenburgh Square on your left. Now is the time to leave the Gray's Inn Road. All the streets that go off to the right are valuable; Flora in Little Dorrit lived in one; in Acton Street there was an authentic apparition chronicled by Andrew Lang. But choose Frederick Street and prepare to wonder; for you will soon perceive that you have left the London that you know far behind. There is something different, something strange in the whole look of the quarter. It is hard to analyse, this separate quality; but I suspect it mainly resides in this: that whereas most of our known London is either new altogether or new in great part, here it is the rarest thing to find any building younger than sixty years.

Frederick Street, I conjecture, dates from 1810-20. It shows here and there stuccoed pilasters, a few elaborate iron balconies, occasionally a window with a curving iron canopy over it. One goes gently down into the King's Cross Road; here after long beating about obscure streets I once found in a window a fine example of wax flowers.

Then a steep hill rises you, and a green grove. The hill is Great Percy Street, the grove stands in the midst of Percy Circus. The architecture here seems to be of the 1840-50 period; and now, I would say, we are come into the Silent Land. Here should the studious man dwell, this is the very place for the poor student — are there any poor students now, by the way? — whose needs are peace and short distance from the British Museum. There is hardly anybody about; I passed through a short street without meeting a soul; there are no shops here to draw people; there is deep, leafy silence.

For trees grow everywhere in this happy place. They lean over garden walls, they congregate together in hushed squares, they swell richly from little patches of odd ground, from behind railings, in every unexpected corner, and there are short flights of steps which lead to mysterious alleys or passages or byways going to nowhere in particular; here, too, you shall find unexpected ash groves and sweet quivering poplars and little houses strangely tucked away. Here is no jangle of the tram, here no motor-bus snorts and rattles as the gear is changed. In half an hour's walk I saw neither taxi nor car of any sort; for the storms of our age do not beat upon this place.

It is hard to leave these quiet backwaters, but strike boldly on through Great Percy Street, by Amwell Street, into Claremont Square, which is built round a great cistern of the New River Company. Now we are on the highest peak of Pentonville, and look down on the mists that drape King's Cross. Let us reverently remember that Mr Guppy once lodged in Pentonville, and so pass on the Angel, the fair crown of Islington. For a little way comes High Street, then Upper Street succeeds. It is a broad street. On the left as you go north the houses on high ground are set in a shallow bow or bay. Here and there a grave red brick house two hundred years old: to the right a music-hall, once the theatre where Miss Emily Soldene danced and sang and capered in the early Offenbach days. On the left again the Agricultural Hall. This last, we may say, is the one known point in the region, for hither come the fatted beasts in December. If you are 'to Dunster' or 'up over to Porlock,' you may easily meet good country fellows who know the Agricultural Hall; and so it would be, I have no doubt, in far Highland glens, on Yorkshire moorlands.

But main roads are like capitals; one does not look in them for characteristic features. I take a turning to the left at random, and after the rackety trams and buses of Upper Street again the silences close upon me. I used to be a constant if unsystematic explorer in this quarter; but now for the first time I set foot in this little square. It is built of three-storied houses; the lower part stucco, the upper yellow brick faded with age. The trees in the enclosure grow as they will, the grass is unshorn and fast blotting out the paths; and no one comes that way. Then across Liverpool Road and into another square which is all grey brick and sham perpendicular. I know that square, and I know also that I am in Barnsbury.

A shy sort of a place, Mr Morgan in Pendennis called the Temple. I think I would call Barnsbury a shy sort of a place. It is the sort of a place that I would slink into very quietly if I wished for any reason to be rather latent than patent in the general scheme of things. I remember that I was not at all astonished to read that a nobleman of a very ancient race had retreated into Barnsbury and died there. A brave Liberal newspaper said that the nobleman had chosen Barnsbury because he wished to lead a simple, middle-class life; but I regret to say that it was brandy that led him to these quiet groves.

From the height of Barnsbury, then, I gaze down upon the valley of the Caledonian Road, which seems remote and deep and very far below. I stand by an open space, and on one side of it is a terrace of little houses, with old gardens in front of them, with luxuriant vines upon their walls, and here, a vine hedge parts one garden from another. I say old gardens, because I always feel that ages blesses a garden as it blesses good wine, as it blesses good building, softening all asperities and sharp corners in all three, giving that strangeness in the proportion which makes the chief delight in all things, both material and spiritual.

I leave this quiet corner, and find myself again in a square that I have never seen before, I think the ugliest that I have ever seen. Its four sides are like the four walls of a hideous factory.

Back in Upper Street; again a turn to the right, and I touch on Canonbury, where I find at the bottom of a lane a mews and then a field that was apparently forgotten by the builders of seventy years ago. Hereabouts I note tree-shadowed obscure back ways, with discreet, green postern gates opening on them from high garden walls. I look and am delighted and sigh; for a quarter of a century ago I should have gone home and found a tale to fit those green doors and shadowy passages, and now I can find tales no more.

I come back to the main road, and reach a point where Islington and Canonbury and Highbury and Holloway seem to meet and mingle; and the warm summer rain comes down upon me like a mist.

III

About 20 years ago I used to tear a friend of mine away from his studies in the higher magic and make him join me in a certain quest. We were both enthusiasts in all that relates to Edgar Allan Poe, and we wished to see with our eyes the old house in Stoke Newington where, for a brief while, he had been at school. So we would sally forth and explore and beat about first for Stoke Newington and then for that old house shadowed by old elms that Poe describes. To the best of my belief and recollection A. E. W. and myself failed to find the school; but we found many things, we enjoyed the delights of those that penetrate into unknown, virgin territory — and I verily believe that on some dull, wintry afternoon of ‘94 or ‘95 we must have set foot, all unaware, within the limits of Clapton. I have not visited it since, till the other day. I had the vaguest notions of its place on the vast London map, ‘north-easterly Epping Forest way’ was the nearest indication I could summon to my mind.

After investigation I fixed the starting-point at the southern corner of Tottenham Court Road. Here I took a bus and went by Theobald’s Road, past Gray’s Inn, into Rosebery Avenue. Look down from a sort of viaduct, you look into the Italian quarter that stretches from here to Hatton Garden; here long ago was Fagin’s den; here, a little higher, is Exmouth Street, one of the ways by which the Artful Dodger conducted Oliver Twist. So, by the cisterns of the New River Company, to Islington, and thence, we take the right-hand way which is Essex Road. Here are dark balconied crescents that the ash trees overshadow; to the left is bowery Canonbury; to the right a grim and arid region, a stony, untracked wilderness. Long, sad streets stretch away towards the City; ugly factories with tall chimneys, uglier churches, close these lamentable treeless vistas.

We turn to the right into Ball’s Pond Road, we touch on Kingsland and Dalston, and avoid these infames scopulos. Another bus crosses our track; it is chartered from Walthamstow to Camberwell Green. Thus are the most unlikely places brought near to one another in the facile London of today. The Graham Road leads into Mare Street, Hackney, and from this we turn northward into the Lower Clapton Road.

At first this seems just a street, like any other street. On one side there is a hugeous tabernacle of some dissenting community, of an architecture that is monumental and appalling. Then as I climb I find very grave and dignified Georgian houses of warm red brick standing in their gardens. Here is a red-brick row, windows flush with the walls, that must date from 1715-20. I come to an elaborately laid-out public garden with a pool and a fountain in the midst of it; and on one side of this garden are peaceful, ancient almshouses, one-storied, with red-tiled roofs and diamond window-panes.

I look down a street of small modern villas that diverges from the main Road on the right. This street goes down hill, and beyond it there is a prospect of and Italianate, campanile-looking tower rising high from a valley, and beyond again, rising ground and sunlit trees, blue in the distance. The tower, I find, rises from the edge of a wide green open space, thinly planted with trees. I return to the main Road — now called Upper Clapton Road — and find it early Georgian on the left, early Victorian on the right. It is to be noted that as late as 50 years ago they were building houses here of coachouse and stable rank.

Another turn leads me past small, genteel, lace-curtained, poor houses. Many children play in this road, which goes down to a ragged edge of that open space which I have mentioned. Here at the bottom are raw ends of raw red streets, a raw-looking dissenting chapel, a haphazard half-made track that leads to a factory and a chimney; I find a faint flavour of a Lancashire industrial village here.

From this point the Upper Clapton Road is most deliciously embowered in trees. The shops have ceased, on each side are old and elderly houses, well set-back from the pavement, grave in a sweet shade of limes and elms and beeches, cool with green lawns, with hints and glimpses of spacious gardens behind them. And here I come to an avenue, so well planted with limes and chestnut trees of growth that the green boughs meet over the roadway and cast a perfect shade. On either side of this avenue largish houses in well-timbered grounds and gardens; and at the lower end of this eminently dignified and pleasant and greeny way I cross another road, and I find the following astonishing prospect:

In the centre a ragged, untrimmed track leads to a factory with two chimneys. The foreground is nettles and docks and the disorder of an overgrown rubbish heap, and the rubbish heap descends to a railway line and a coal yard. Beyond are level fields — marshes the map calls them. A goods train goes slowly by on another line in the middle distance. To the right, in the background, are streets densely packed together, church spires, factory chimneys, high ground with houses climbing up it; to the left the blue water of certain reservoirs, and in the distance the wooded heights of Epping Forest, beautiful as if they rose in a dream.

Once more back to the highway and, crossing it, I fall into a system of leafy avenues. Here the houses are smaller, are in fact, ‘semidetached’; but so well are the roads planted that one has almost the sense of being in a wood. Indeed, I am just wondering if I am on the edge of some wild wooded place, still preserved in the midst of the streets, when my road suddenly becomes a double line of shops, and this goes past a railway station which is called Stoke Newington, into a broad, tram-traversed way which is Stamford Hill.

Finally, the Upper Clapton Road leads to Clapton Common, which is high ground, and feels high ground, for a brisk fresh wind blows across it. It is bordered with well-grown lime trees, it has a fine terrace of 1760 on one side, many snug habitations of later date on the other side; where the pool is, where the silver-green willows grow.

IV

The ship, I think, had done for ever with perils and deep waters and warning lighthouse flames. All its voyages have been accomplished, and now it rests in a sure haven till time and summer and winter shall at last resolve it into rust and dust.

I came upon this vessel as I was treading the mazes of Ferry Lane and the parts thereto adjacent. At the bottom of the lane is Ferry House in its walled garden, its grave eighteenth century front hung with creepers, its lawn tree-bordered. Its windows look over a muddy creek, then comes a kind of embanked walled island that seems to grow a crop of the grossest rankest weeds. Here are sheds of corrugated iron, beyond a hideous grey warehouse, at last the deep trees of Kew Gardens. And turning back I come upon this famous ship, Queen, derelict and aground in the mud of a narrow enclosed backwater of the river. On one side a wall, on the other a timber-yard; in the midst the little old tug. All her ironwork is rusted, weeds and grasses and flowers are growing in the cracks of the deck planks, her crumbling funnel is bowed humbly as before the decree of fate. That is what I saw in a corner of Brentford.

I have a hazy notion that somehow or other, and in spite of the City of London, Brentford is the chief town of the county of Middlesex. Still vaguer is a belief that there were once kings of Brentford; more precise the impression that up to recent years and living memories Brentford was the headquarters of the Middlesex elections.

You can get at it in various ways. There are two railway stations there, but I have never yet met a man who had got into a train or out of a train at a Brentford station. It may be approached from Hammersmith or from Shepherds Bush by tram, and I was set down at its gates the other day by motor-bus 27, which passes along the Marylebone Road on its way to Twickenham.

The bus turns into Kensington High Street by the parish church; it goes through Hammersmith, through Turnham Green; past the quiet villas and the still remaining orchards and cabbage gardens of Gunnersbury; and at Kew Bridge you must get down if you would peer into the secrets of Brentford.

It is one long wavering street. It begins with a high water tower, which is so ugly as to be almost majestic; it ends beyond the canal with late sixteenth or early seventeenth century cottages, which overhang the street; once there was an unmistakable fifteenth century house in Brentford, its gable adorned with a richly carved oaken bargeboard. This is gone; but between the two extremes I have noted there are gasworks — and dignified houses of the mid-eighteenth century. There are plenty of those bow shop-windows with small panes of glass that are now finding their way into museums; also there are plenty of tin sheds and dreary warehouses. Here a goods yard; next to it the deep shade of overhanging, intertwining boughs; hollyhocks look over the wall where they stack drain pipes and tiles ready for the barge below.

Well, to begin at the beginning, I give my usual tribute of admiring horror to that famous water-tower. I note that bulbous metallic growths have sprung up about its base. I shudder at them as I always shudder at elaborate mechanisms and apparatus which I do not understand; I know these green bulbous things under the tall tower will appear to me in the nightmares that are to come. As a relief, I cross the street and go down an alley past tile yards and timber yards to the muddy banks of the river. The tide is dead out; I look upon a valley of glistening slime; in the hollow of it a shallow trickle of water, and close by me, resting on the mudbank, is a barge with tawny sails, the ‘Yieldsted, Rochester.’

The sails glow in the fierce sunlight; on an adjacent barge there is a tremendous hammering going on. Straight in front, beyond the shallow water, rises the island, all dense undergrowth and high trees, ‘quivering with leaves’ like a nobler island in an old story, and indeed, it is pleasant in the blaze of heat and light to watch the poplar leaves dancing and to hear their rustle; not unlike the murmur of the sea heard from inland. Down the river towards Kew Bridge boys are bathing; and I hope that they know how to use that island, how to get wonder and Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn ‘adventures’ out of it.

I come up to the surface again, as it were, and please myself with the prospect of the seventeenth century Salutation tavern. All its lines dip and bend beneath the weight of years; and then going along the street I note how from this northern side Brentford breaks off into little alleys and passages which seem to lead into little arid courts and yards of grim cottages. Back to the riverside; up the river the view is of factory chimneys, cranes, mud — and the tender silvery shoots of a willow bed. Going further westward the gasworks are announced by a grey, dead wall and a noisome smell; and on the other side of the way are the gasometers, which are, surely, the most horrid things that the eye can behold — excepting, perhaps, an ancient church ‘restored.’

Little old ‘cottage’ shops with bulgy windows show the odd miscellany of such merchandise which belongs to such places; and behind the little shops one can see odd little back parlours of a triangular shape. Across the road a house stands back from the pavement, and so dense is the avenue of trees leading up to it that only its chimneys are visible.

There are some pleasant street names in Brentford. Running Horse Yard got its name, no doubt, from a vanished inn; then there is Town Meadow, which is now but back streets and courtyards, Half Acre, and The Butts.

I pass Montgomery’s Wharf. Once some business flourished here; it flourished in sheds and it used many barrels. The windows of the sheds are broken, the barrels lie scattered, and in the yard is a gigantic growth of burdocks, pale purple mallows, and thistles. I cross the road and take a turning to the right, a road furnished with tram lines, a free library, the vestry hall, two railway stations, and some newish villas. It has also a field, or rather waste, which appears to be the place where all the broken-down gigs and worn-out waggons of the parish are shot; and so they lie there broken and disconsolate, one waggon being loaded to the brim with rusty scrap-iron, which it will clearly, never deliver at any destination.

Going northward, this road shows on one side an eighteenth-century hamlet of half a dozen houses — why on earth were they ever planted there? — and goes on into the open fields.

But I turn back and come to the western end of Brentford by another way. I go through the irregular open space called The Butts — lined with old trees and old houses — and come upon the canal where the barges lie, gaudy with strange Egyptian ornament in red and green and yellow.

V

I believe that I should have known that a chimney-sweep lived in the alley, even if I had not seen one of the craft coming out of it. For those who have been curious in their observation of the byeways and odd corners of London recognise that the stones and regions of the great wilderness have their destinies and that these destinies are fulfilled. So there are certain quarters which are appointed as sanctuaries, and, as it were, cities of refuge and hiding-places; so there are alleys meant to harbour chimney-sweeps. And thus I was gratified but not at all surprised when I saw a chimney-sweep issuing from the particular alley in Pimlico that I have in my mind.

It goes off from the main Road, narrow, dark and obscure. It is made of little mean houses two storeys high. It is built of brick that was once a dingy yellow, and is now become of no particular colour; an ugly little way enough, and one side of it is the back wall of a row of gardens. But from over this wall a great and noble and glossy figtree has grown and flourished and spread abroad; and thus, in spite of all, my chimneysweep dwells in his alley like a Syrian, under a happy shade.

This is by way of introduction to a brief study of Pimlico. I owe it to the gentleman who confessed to me the other day that he did not know where Pimlico was; and though the matter be not of the highest interest, yet it is not altogether barren, as is evident from the true story of the Chimney-Sweep and the Eastern Figtree.

Pimlico, once extending to Hyde Park Corner, now lies south of Victoria, and I began my inspection of it by walking down the Vauxhall Bridge Road, which is dull and dingy, and not notable in any way. Here is Vauxhall Bridge; to the right, at the approach to it, the pleasant shade of Bessborough Gardens; to the left porticoed houses with Ionic pillars.

By the bridge there is a yard where they make garden furniture from the timbers of brave old ships; and here are the figure-heads of departed vessels; heads of old admirals who led our billowing sails to victory long ago. I turn now to the west and enter the long Grosvenor Road, which runs beside the river and makes the southern boundary of Pimlico. And here I remark on a feature which is characteristic of the whole neighbourhood. If I were so happy as to be writing, not in English but in Greek, I should certainly have to coin an adjective; I should speak of'myriad porticoed' Pimlico. For the quarter abounds in Porticoes, with pillars now of Ionic, now of the Doric order.

The effect is no doubt highly classical, but I find that the contemplation of avenues of porticoes somehow induces a gentle melancholy. Here by the river the porticoed houses are tall and substantial, and built, no doubt, for substantial householders; but I am afraid that the three bell-handles to each door signify a certain abatement in the fortunes of the place.

Now there are factories and warehouses and wharves on the river side of the street. The King’s Scholars’ Pond was once here for the Westminster boys’ bathing; now it is the L.C.C. Pumping Station, and has also some connection with hydraulic power.

Well-grown plane trees border the south side of the road, and presently by the river is Pimlico Garden. I look across the turbid water, silver-pointed by the sun, and in a haze of heat there rise the great factories and warehouses, and a dusky fume is over them in the still, stricken air. Cranes hang out over the water and dip and rise again, here a tall chimney, there a gasometer. Close to the garden barges with tawny sails wait by the wharves and take in loads of cement and beer barrels.

Then on the right side of the road is the green of St George’s Square. Here there are big houses, basement, ground floor, and four stories above, well kept and garnished with flowers. Through the trees and the misty of heat comes the sound of a strange song, of solemn ancient modulations. Almost I could think that a high voice was chanting ‘Miserere mei Deus’ with whatsoever in that psalm is after written. But I track the singer down and find a cart, three wild-headed children and a woman, and the woman is singing ‘Will you buy my sweet lavender?’

Wharves again by the river, grim, grey warehouses on the other side of the road. A steamer coughs and chokes and drags along a trail of black barges; then a passenger boat forges up the river, well laden, and furnished, I am glad to see, with a harp, an instrument which has always been necessary to the success of a true water party. Little houses on the right have pleasant creeper-grown verandahs, canopies over their windows and trees growing agreeably wild in front gardens; and so to Chelsea Bridge and Chelsea Bridge Road, the western boundary of Pimlico. The Guards Barracks are on the right, the Hospital Gardens on the left, and so back into the heart of Pimlico by Pimlico Street, and thence into a retired road, where the houses have Persian blinds, which, I observe, are not used. But the Virginia creeper grows thick over many of the windows and makes a better shade. There is peace and stillness in this place, and inserted in one of the fanlights is a plaque of St Francis of assisi, with his brothers, the birds, flying about him.

I get into the southern end of the Buckingham Palace Road and cross Ebury Bridge into Warwick Street. Here the portico is again supreme, and various tastes have left some of the pillars in their natural dingy stucco, while others are shiny black, yellow, green, red — and one specimen, I think, imitates the rich veined green of the marble called verdi de prato. In this part are the squares, Eccleston and Warwick, built, like all Pimlico, between 1805 and 1835; serious, solemn places, to be blessed for the green islands they afford amidst all this arid stoniness. To right and left issue dull streets in a monotonous maze of dingy plaster, tedious yellowy brick; and at last Warwick Street, having lost all its porticoes and most of its pride, becomes an avenue of costers barrows, a place wherein to buy tomatoes and bananas and miscellaneous literature, and so empties itself into the Vauxhall Bridge Road.

Personally, I feel that the fault of Pimlico is its uniformity. In this respect, if in no other, it resembles Salisbury Cathedral, the only English cathedral (I think) which is of one style throughout. No doubt the right eye could appreciate the austere beauties of the Pimlico porticoes; but I am a goth: I crave the element of surprise, the joy of the unexpected.

DR JOHNSON'S DISAPPEARING ACT

MOST READERS OF Boswell's Johnson are aware that there is a singular hiatus, a blank tract, in Boswell's minute survey of his hero's life, letters, and writings. Up to the year 1745, everything is carefully chronicled, and we follow the Doctor's doings almost month by month, sometimes from day to day. Business letters are put in, such as the following to Mr Cave, the founder of The Gentleman's Magazine:

'DEAR SIR

You may remember I have formerly talked with you about a military dictionary. The eldest Mr Macbean, who was with Mr Chambers, has very good materials for such a work, which I have seen, and will do it at a very low rate. I think the terms of War and Navigation might be comprised, with good explanations, in one 8vo. Pica, which he is willing to do for twelve shillings a sheet, to be made up a guinea at the second impression. If you think on it, I will wait on you with him.

I am, Sir, your humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

Pray lend me Topsel on Animals'

This is not a letter of the highest importance, though the 'rates per thou.' (about 4s a thousand words, with a problematic increase to 7s.) may interest the Author's Society. But Boswell put in every scrap relating to Johnson that he could find; nothing could be too trifling for his purpose. Hence the gap in the story during 1745-46 is all the more remarkable.

The year before, Johnson had published his life of Savage, a book that touched on a secret story and a bitter controversy and an extraordinary — and very bad — character. The Life of Savage probably did a good deal to get Johnson known, for he was still an obscure man and a very poor one. ‘His circumstances,’ in Boswell’s words, ‘were at this time much embarrassed.’ And yet, with one trifling exception, Johnson, badly in need of money for himself and his wife, seems to have been totally idle all through the years ‘forty-five and ‘forty-six. The trifling exception was a pamphlet: Miscellaneous Observations on the Tragedy of Macbeth, with remarks on Sir T. H.’s Edition of Shakespeare. This was in fact a prospectus of a new edition of Shakespeare which Johnson meditated; it could bring in no immediate profit. For the rest: silence for two years, Boswell conjectures at large: ‘As we do not trace anything else published by him during the course of this year, we may conjecture that he was, occupied entirely with that work.’ But his Shakespeare was not published till 1765; twenty years later. And, again under the date 1746: ‘It is probable that he was still employed upon his Shakespeare. It is somewhat curious that his literary career appears to have been almost totally suspended in the years 1745 and 1746, those years which were marked by a civil war in Great Britain, when a rash attempt was made to restore the House of Stuart to the throne. That he had a tenderness for that unfortunate House is well known; and some may fancifully imagine that a sympathetick anxiety impeded the exertion of his intellectual powers: but I am inclined to think that he was, during this time, sketching the outlines of is great philological work. None of his letters during those years are extant, so far as I can discover.’

It is certainly a puzzling matter, this sudden gulf of silence. Johnson seems to disappear utterly from the scenes of his activities; he neither writes ‘copy’ for the printer, nor letters to his friends. Nothing is known about him for two whole years. An explanation has been suggested. It has been said that he marched with Prince Charlie, that he was in the army of the Young Chevalier.

And there is, at first sight, some plausibility in the theory. In principle, Johnson was a Jacobite. He held that if a man had a right to his own property then the House of Stuart had a right to the throne of England. Moreover, he had an affection for the Stuarts. He would not suffer a word to be uttered against the Church of England — or Charles II! And, again, in his younger days at all events, he had an active hatred for George II, the de facto King of England in 1745. And in ‘forty-five Johnson was a young man of thirty-seven, and a strong young man, perfectly fitted to bear the toils of a campaign. Did he, then, arise and follow Charlie; and is this fact the reason for the blank in his life?

The conjecture is plausible, but impossible. Johnson was a truth-telling man; and Boswell heard him declare that ‘if holding up his right hand would have secured victory at Culloden to Prince Charles’s army, he was not sure that he would have held it up… so fearful was he of the consequences of another revolution on the throne of Great Britain.’ This is decisive.

Where then, was Johnson in 1745-1746? I believe it to be highly probable that his ‘embarrassments’ consigned him to the Fleet Prison, and that his sufferings there were such that he did his utmost to blot them out of his recollection, and to keep the dismal episode from his friends.

TOM O’BEDLAM AND HIS SONG

I

FROM THE HAG and hungry goblin
That into rags would rend ye,
And the spirit that stands
By the naked man
In the book of moons, defend ye,
That of your five sound senses
You never be forsaken,
Nor wander from Yourselves with Tom
Abroad to beg your bacon.

While I do sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?
Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.’

II

Of thirty bare years have I
Twice twenty been enraged,
And of forty been
Three times fifteen

In durance soundly caged
On the lordly lofts of Bedlam,
With stubble soft and dainty,
Brave bracelets strong,
Sweet whips, ding-dong,
With wholesome hunger plenty.

And now I sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?
Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.’

III

With a thought I took for Maudlin,
And a cruse of cockle pottage,
With a thing thus tall,
Sky bless you all,
I befell into this dotage.
I slept not since the Conquest,
Till then I never waked,
Till the roguish boy
Of love where I lay
Me found and stript me naked.

And now I sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?

Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.’

IV

When I short have shorn my sow’s face
And swigged my horny barrel,
In an oaken inn
I pound my skin
As a suit of gilt apparel.
The moon’s my constant mistress,
And the lowly owl my morrow;
The flaming drake
And the night-crow make
Me music to my sorrow.

While I do sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?

Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.’

V

The palsy plagues my pulses
When I prig your pigs or pullen
Your culvers take,

Or matchless make
Your chanticleer or sullen; When I want provant, with Humphrey
I sup, and when benighted,
I repose in Paul’s
With waking souls,
Yet never am affrighted.

But I do sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?
Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.’

VI

I know more than Apollo,
For oft, when he lies sleeping,
I see the stars
At bloody wars
In the wounded welkin weeping.
The moon embrace her shepherd,
And the queen of love her warrior,
While the first doth horn
The star of morn,
And the next the heavenly farrier.

While I do sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?

Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.'

VII

The gypsy Snap and Pedro
Are none of Tom's comaradoes; The punk I scorn
And the cutpurse sworn,

And the roaring boys' bravadoes; The meek, the white, the gentle
Me handle, touch, and spare not,
But those that cross
Tom Rhinoceros
Do what the panther dare not.

Although I sing, 'Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?
Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.'

VIII

With an host of furious fancies,
Whereof I am commander,
With a burning spear
And a horse of air
To the wilderness I wander; By a knight of ghosts and shadows
I summoned am to tourney

Ten leagues beyond
The wide world’s end —
Methinks it is no journey.

Yet I will sing, ‘Any food, any feeding,
Feeding, drink or clothing?
Come dame, or maid,
Be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.’

TOM O’BEDLAM AND HIS SONG

I

It has long struck me that the rationalists have neglected a weapon that should have been their chief instrument of assault. For, if we think of it, they are continually opposed by the existence of a creature that disproves all their arguments, and, by the mere fact of its being, reduces the whole structure of their intellectual position into a heap of rubbish.

Rationalism should be a term of the widest significance. It signifies, or it should signify, that all our thoughts, words, and works must issue from one principal only: that of the human reason. Not the philosophic Reason, with the capital letter, of Coleridge and his school; for this reason is a purely transcendental faculty, which is given to us — according to Coleridge and his friends — from on high in order that we may apprehend God, who is the highest, and then see God, the Divine Essence, in all things, so that mountains and seas and flowers and stars are all wonders and miracles, manifestations to our senses of certain realities which are above all sensible perception. This Reason, it is very clear, is by no means the reason of any rationalistic system; it is, indeed, exactly the principal which Rationalism exists to deny, ridicule, explode; it is mysticism: an extended sacrementalism, which finds the latens Deltas in all the regions of manifestation; which is ready to fall down and worship, like Linnaeus, at the sight of Wimbledon Common blazing with gorse-blossom; which will meditate in rapture at the sight of a little valley set about with dark old thorntrees, and see in a poor cottage with ancient beams and a bending red-tiled rooftree a veritable house in heaven. The frame of mind which responds in this fashion to the theatre of the universe and the spectacles presented in it, is, very evidently, not a rationalistic one; and perhaps Coleridge would have escaped some misunderstanding, if he had spoken of intuition rather than Reason.

The reason which the rationalists have in mind is, of course, the faculty which in Coleridge's system is called the understanding: the faculty which, as it were, stands under an object, scrutinises it, holds it up to the light, forms a logical judgement as to what it is, and why it is, and how it is. It operates equally in the most everyday affairs of common life, and in the elaborate investigations of science. You may say to a countryman: You must have come round by the highroad, three miles out of your way. Why didn't you take the short cut across the fields, and come by Green Lane?' He will answer: 'Because I knew that after all that rain this morning there would be three feet of water in Green Lane by the Mill.' Your friend is a rationalist; he can give a reason for his action, and his reason is founded on experience. And when a man of science assures you that, however unlikely it may seem to you, the water in the glass, in the well, in the ocean is a compound, in a certain fixed proportion, of two invisible gases, hydrogen and oxygen, he also is a rationalist. He also speaks from experience; from experiment. Of course there may be difficulties and doubts in the rationalist doctrine as there are in other doctrines. For example: if the countryman had said that he didn't take that short cut, because his only love had told him that she never wished to see his face again as they were walking together in Green Lane by the Mill; and he could never bear to go that way afterwards, then I can imagine a dispute arising as to whether the man's action in walking three miles out of his way were rational or not. The stricter professors, I think, would cast him out as a mystic; but a more liberal school might grant that, given these unpleasant mental associations, the man was wise to avoid the spot, since the mind can undoubtedly influence the processes of digestion. But one treads here on delicate and difficult ground.

However, speaking in broad and general terms, I believe we have a pretty clear notion of the rationalist position. It requires above all things demonstration, and it propounds as its end the physical good of man. No better example of true rationalism can be given than the well-known passage in which Macaulay proves the uselessness and futility of all systems of philosophy. Philosophy, he says in effect, never led to the invention of the steam engine; it bore no fruit; it did nothing to advance the material and physical well-being of man: therefore, it is useless. This is, indeed, rationalism in its purity; though likely enough Macaulay hardly realised all the implications of his sentence on Plato and Aristotle.

But this saying of Macaulay's leads me well enough to my point: Rationalism signifies, or should signify, a criterion applied to the whole universe. In practice, rationalist means an enemy of religion: a man who says, in the first place, that theology is not demonstrable; and, secondly, that religion is not obviously and certainly for the physical and material good of humanity. Very well: these are sound rationalist principals: but how is it that a man holding them is often an admirer of great painting, great architecture, great statues, great literature?

Years ago, I set an examination paper. Here it is.

II — Explain, in rational terms, the 'Quest of the Holy Graal.' State whether in your opinion such a vessel ever existed, and if you think it did not, justify your pleasure in reading the account of the search for it.

III — Explain, logically, your delight in colour and line.

IV — What do you mean by the word 'music'? Give the Rational explanation of Bach's fugues, showing them to be (a) as true as Biology and (b) as useful as Applied Mechanics.

V — Estimate the value of Westminster Abbey in the Avoirdupois measure.

VI— 'The light that never was on land or sea.' What light? Radio Active? If so, state the method of treatment, and the beneficial results to be anticipated.

VII— 'Faery lands forlorn.' Draw a map of the district in question, putting in principal towns, and naming imports and exports.

VIII — Show that ‘heaven lies about us in our infancy’ must mean, ‘wholesome maternal influences surround us in our childhood’.

So far as I know there has been no attempt to answer these questions. And I trust that the inference to be drawn from them is pretty obvious: that no true rationalist can admit the arts into his system of life and thought. He has no business to admire Malory. He admires the beauty of its style? Ask him when the quaint turn of phrase fed a hungry man or fired a blast furnace. Ask him where is the sense, where is the utility of pasting pigments on a canvas and making believe when you look at the result that you see mountains and rivers, clouds and trees. And, as Macaulay would express it, what is the fruit of music; how does it compare in its appetising and digestive properties with Worcestershire Sauce? And so on, and so on: our rationalist is confronted with this vast scheme of the arts, which he must confess, if he be an honest man, is open to all the objections he is ready to bring against the theological scheme and the religious scheme. God, he declares, is nothing but an undemonstrable absurdity. What, then, is Beauty? He is contemptuously amused by the symbolism of the jewelled and golden New Jerusalem, adorned like a bride?: with what face can he pretend to admire:

Full fathom five thy father lies:

Of his bones are coral made; Those are pearls that were his eyes:

Nothing of him that doth fade, But doth suffer a sea change Into something rich and strange:

Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell:

Hark! now I hear them, —

Ding, dong, Bell.

The description of the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse may be a mere piece of symbolism, not intended to be taken literally. We say of a friend: ‘He has a heart of gold” and nobody believes, or is intended to believe, that the man’s heart is actually metallic. But the lines quoted above are a mass of statements which are false, and demonstrably false. We know that submerged human bones do not and cannot turn into coral, and that pearls are a secretion of the oyster, and nothing else. It is clear, then, that Shakespeare’s lyric is without the rationalistic pale; that it is as intolerable to the rationalist as the Litany of Loretto. Undemonstrable beauty is no more for him than undemonstrable deity.

And yet — here is the difficulty — it is certain that man from the very earliest times had this desire of beauty. You dig deep into the earth, down below the great flood of Babylon, and you find all things made for beauty; you go amongst the rudest savages, and the common pots and pans of their poor life have on them marks and signs that are meant for adornment; you pierce far beyond the dawn of history into the stone age, and there was some unimaginably remote ancestor scratching the picture of the reindeer on the reindeer’s bone, after the beast had been eaten.

Here, then, is the position. Man from the beginning has been profoundly irrational; that is, he has sought for God, and truth, and beauty, by the ways of religion, philosophy, and art. What is the convinced rationalist to say to this? There is only one thing that he can say. I noted at the beginning of this essay that there was a creature which, by its mere existence, reduced all the arguments of rationalism to rubbish. That creature is man: the eternally irrational. And the only justification possible to the rationalist is to show that a mammal, very similar in structure to the apes, in the beginning went mad, and by so doing became man. It is by this madness that man is differentiated from other animals, and it is the business of rationalism to bring back man to sanity; that is, to bestiality. A pig would not relish his wash any the more because the trough containing it was curiously adorned; let the rationalist teach us to eat our wash from vessels as rude and as void of idle ornament, and their great work will be achieved.

II

I cannot conceal from myself that all that I have written above will probably strike most readers as a piece of elaborate irony. It will be supposed that I have marshalled arguments and gathered facts together with the purpose of reducing the rationalistic and utilitarian position to an absurdity; with the object of saying at last: ‘You see that on your own hypotheses it is as absurd to seek for truth and beauty as it is to seek for God; that if all theologies are to fall, then all the arts and all the philosophies must fall with them. In the end, therefore, you must confess that man, in so far as he differs from his fellow animals, is a madman; and that his only reasonable course is to retrace his steps, and become more a rational animal, as pigs, monkeys, and goats are rational.' Thereupon, our rationalist is to confess that such a conclusion, though it follow from his own premises, is absurd. And I shall say: 'Then give up your nonsensical system, and come to church like a good boy.'

I confess that all this is highly plausible; but it is altogether mistaken. It is not my object to entice the rationalist either into a logical pit or into church. I confess that it has always struck me as strange that men should jeer at the Quicunque vult of St Anathasius with one breath, and admit Euclid's definitions of a point, a line, and a plane surface with the next. They must realise, if they will reflect a moment, that no man hath seen a line at any time. But this is purely by the way.

As to the main position; so far am I from believing that the proposed definition of man as the mad mammal is monstrous on the face of it, that I can see a good man very strong and menacing arguments in its favour. And, in the first place, we have used the word 'monstrous'. Well, let us admit, if you will, that the 'mad mammal' definition is monstrous: why should we conclude that it is, therefore, untrue? I am not addressing those persons, if there be any such, who think that they understand the universe: I am afraid that I am in no doubt at all as to their mental condition. I take it for granted that to all of us the universe, the constitution of things, from the remotest stars to our own secret thoughts, is a profound mystery, an enigma which we recognise as beyond solution, even beyond conjecture. We have accumulated some useful facts — we can send telegrams though we have not the remotest knowledge of what the electric force is — we have made many guesses, some of them plausible; but as to the full, final, and perfect explanation of all things, we have never hoped in our wildest dreams that this ever will be, or ever could be, given us. How, then, can we regard 'monstrous' as synonymous with 'untrue'? For all we know, the whole universe is monstrous; nay, it is most certain that if we could understand it, it would appear monstrous to us; utterly incredible in the strangeness of its design — or in its titanic chaos.

But apart from this there are all the objections that have already been urged: the objections which show that the quest of God and the quest of Beauty are alike irrational. I confess that I see no obvious way of meeting these objections on rational grounds. If we allow, as we must allow, that the human race has been addicted throughout the whole of its history to these quests and pursuits, then it seems to me that we must also allow that the human race is devoid of reason, or, in other words, is mad. If we hear John Smith, of Tooting Common, declare that his suburb is an ancient Egyptian settlement, that it was named in honour of a well-known Pharaoh, and that the true spelling is Tutankhamen, we pronounce him mad. Why, then, do we proclaim the mighty genius of a man who says that human bones and eyes, submitted to the action of sea water, turns into coral and pearls?

And again, leaving the region of the arts, is a man who climbs terrific mountains, at the instant peril of his life, a sane being? Is a man who seeks, through horrible miseries and dangers, the North Pole or the South Pole, a sane being? Is a man who rows himself blue in the face in a boat race a sane being? Is a man who tortures his brain at chess a sane being? In each case, be it noted, the dangerous, painful, mind-tormenting action is done for its own sake, 'for the fun of the thing,' not for any material gain. Is the pursuit of pain or terror of mind and body, 'for fun,' as a species of sport or enjoyment, a rational pursuit?

And there are other considerations which seem to throw doubt on the sanity of man. He is tormented by a continual unrest, with a continual uncertainty, with a perpetual uneasiness, with an abiding dread and terror of things without and things within. He cannot make up his mind as to his position in the Universe; nor can he make up his mind what he ought to eat for dinner. The polytheist Hindus say that it is a mortal sin to eat beef; the monotheist Mohammedans are equally clear as to the iniquity of pork; the Western Vegetarians hold that all flesh is an abomination. Then, there is Christianity, divided against itself, on every possible point, and, for instance, on its principal rite. In the one hand, this rite seems undoubtedly to contemplate the drinking of wine; but many millions of Christians maintain that the consumption of alcohol in any form is a very grave offence. As with meat and drink, so with government and civil order: nothing is settled, everything is debated, and, often, to the shedding of blood. It would be possible, perhaps, to furnish an analogy with such a society as this: a society in which almost every member has his own fixed idea, which differs from the fixed ideas of all the other members; in which the most absurd delusions and pursuits abound; in which all kinds of restraints are necessary; in which violent outbreaks are a constant danger. But that kind of society is called a Lunatic Asylum.

But as to this continual unrest and uncertainty which seem to be characteristic of our race: we are told by science that we, like the other animals, are the product of evolution. How, then, account for the difference between us and them? Whence that unrest and doubt from which all the tribes of the beasts are free? To put it on the lowest ground: they know quite well what to eat for their dinners. You do not find a bee tasting a bluebottle in a tentative manner; nor do you see a blackbird endeavouring to make honey. There is no prophet amongst tigers urging them to eat grass, and it is idle to offer a cow a meat diet. The beasts are vexed by no uncertainties, doubts, shapeless terrors; no cares or sorrows are laid on them. Indeed, a mystic theologian has conjectured that they still inhabit that Paradise from which man was expelled. On the one side, then, perpetual peace; on the other, perpetual unrest. Which is to be called the side of sanity?

Thomas Hardy surveyed the spectacle of humanity, and found that on the whole, man was wretched, that human life was a tragedy. And he thought the source of our misery lay in this: that the human mind is so made that it craves from life joys and delights and satisfactions that life cannot possibly afford. Men, he would say, are as fish out of water; their lives a hopeless desire, an agonised longing for some element from which they are eternally separated. What is such a state but madness? The desire of the moth for the star: the desire that ends in fiery torment.

III

I think it would be difficult, or, rather, impossible logically to refute the proposition that man is to be defined as the mad animal; that the difference between us and the other animals lies in this, that their brains are ordered, while ours are disordered. We must be content, I believe, to say that it may be so, and then to affirm, without hesitation, that it is not so. It is possible that the whole universe, so far as we are concerned with it, is an infernal practical joke; but we make an act of faith and declare that the reason — the reason of the rationalists — is a quite secondary and minor faculty of the human cosmos, that its place in the hierarchy of our being is about is of about the same consequence as the Prime Minister's boot boy is to the fortunes of the realm of England. For the petty needs of our daily life we require reason; it is useful too in setting our thoughts in rank and order, as a junior clerk is useful in setting his master's papers in order; but it is wholly ancillary and subservient. Of itself, it can originate nothing, discern nothing, create nothing; it is only of value when it remains strictly within its very humble circle of duties. It is true that the reason may be right in declaring this, that, or the other to be extravagant, irrational, lunatic. For example, it would be right in declaring that Egyptian pyramids of two, three, four thousand years B.C. were not built to prophesy anything whatever concerning our labour market in the present century. But the reason is right only by accident. It can see that the pyramid proposition is highly improbable, and refuse to believe it. But the reason will also see that Homer's proposition, that his characters addressed each other in hexameter verse, is highly improbable, and hence conclude that Homer must have been mad: and we perceive that it is the rationalist and not the poet who is mentally deranged. Again and again this boot boy, this second housemaid, this junior clerk, that we call the reason, must be kept strictly in its proper place and must be severely limited to the narrow round of its proper functions. It may usefully admonish us that we have appointments with Bellows, Clarke, and Bixleigh before 1, that DOE dem. JIPES versus WIGZELL comes up again on Tuesday, that William the Conqueror began to reign in 1066, that sweet port is often unwholesome, that morning must not be rhymed with dawning, and that Mont Blanc is in France, not in Switzerland. There are many such useful and humble duties for this faculty to perform, and so long as it keeps within its limits it does well. Let it endeavour to transcend these limits, to utter laws for the weighty matters and the larger things of life: then there is confusion. It is the rationalist, the utilitarian, the Gradgrinds and M'Choak-umchilds who are the true madmen of the world. No doubt, the man who believes that he is the emperor of China is demented, and is properly shut up in a n asylum, since his delusion may be troublesome to his fellow citizens. But this poor fellow's error in believing is a small thing compared with the error of the rationalist in disbelieving. The delusion of the one is particular, of the other universal: for the rationalist delusion is that all the things which make life dear and precious and wonderful, all that gives their acutest savour to the rarest joys of men, all that lights up the dark place of this world and fills it with glory: all this power and magistry is at the best a tolerable madness, an uncertifiable dementia. May, it is assuredly Gradgrind who is the maniac: Keats is the sane man, and with him Euclid, who dared to soar into a world of wild contradictions, to discern the point which is without parts or magnitude, the line which is length without breadth.

It is hardly necessary, I suppose, to insist that man lives in a lower world, an animal world, as well as in a higher, a spiritual world. As a denizen of this lower world, it is his business to go to the beasts, the ant, the bee, and the rest of them and make due provision for the needs of his animal existence. He must gather a salary in place of honey, and store up investments in place of the squirrel's nuts. But so far is he removed from his fellow animals, that in most cases he finds this getting of his daily bread a painful necessity, a thing to be endured because it cannot be avoided. He knows that 'business' is not his true business. The bee is made to go to the flowers, but man knows that he is not made to go to the City; and if he has received proper theological instruction, he is aware that all this toiling for his daily bread is part of a curse and a penalty that is laid upon him. It is something that has to be done, and done as well as possible, with all his might; but the necessity remains a sad one, and the man still knows that his true world, his true life are elsewhere.

And the various aspects of this other world, in their infinite differences, make up a fantastic spectacle. It is incredible, and therefore — as we may say with that discovering Tertullian — true, that one man finds his way out of the City — out of the business of bread winning — through immortal verse or celestial music; another escapes by the track that leads over a golf-course, where he is eaten up by the zeal of knocking small balls into small holes. Some of these ways are difficult, dangerous, painful, desperate; for it is by no means the difficulty of the daily task that makes it odious. It is far more difficult and far more painful to climb mountains than to empty dustbins; and a chess player racks his brains more severely than any accountant. But of all ways of escape the surest and the best are — naturally enough — those that lead farthest away from the prison of the body to the free lands of the spirit. I need not say that man's true life is not in 'the City,' but in the other City: and there are strange festivals and entertainments in Syon

Of these entertainments one of the strangest is Tom o'Bedlam's Song. There are all sorts of signs and omens to tell a man that he is growing old; and Mr Frank Sidgwick's learned article on the Song in The London Mercury tells me of my growing years in an odd manner. For Tom o'Bedlam has been familiar to me from very early days. I read it again and again in a favourite book of mine, to which I was apt to recur, when half an hour or an hour was to be given to miscellaneous reading. The book was old Isaac Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature, a museum of queer, beautiful, strange, remote things: all the odds and ends that had attracted a browser amidst old books, a mind that was rather inquisitive than critical. It helped me to pass many a lonely evening with delight, and I had always thought of it as a resource to many. But it seems I have lived into an age which knows nothing of the Curiosities. For Mr Sidgwick begins his article with the sentence:

'Many readers of this generation must have met with Tom o'Bedlam for the first time, as I confess I did, in Mr Walter de la Mare's Memoirs of a Midget.'

From Mr de la Mare's romance, the Song was traced to Mrs Meynell's anthology, The Flower of the Mind, whence the author of Memoirs of a Midget derived it, and thence to Disraeli. But Mr Sidgwick went beyond the Curiosities of Literature, beyond Disraeli's source, a collection called Wit and Drollery, dated 1682, even to a manuscript known as *Giles Earle's Songboo*dated 1615, but made up of material which goes back to the great Elizabethan age.

The Song is put into the mouth of a Tom o'Bedlam. Bethlehem Hospital was overful, and its governors were glad to rid themselves of their more harmless cases, of poor fellows whose distractions and delusions were not likely to be harmful to themselves or others. 'There poor distracted men,' says Aubrey, 'had been put into Bedlam, where recovering some soberness, they were licentiated to go a begging; i e., they had on their left arm an armilla of tinn, about four inches long; they could not get it off; they wore about their necks a great horn of an ox in a string or bawdry, which when they came to an house for alms, they did wind, and they did put the drink given them into this horn, whereto they did put a stopple.'

This practice of licensing ceased about the time of the Great Rebellion. Afterwards, even in the first decade of the eighteenth century, there were men who showed badges and pretended that they came from Bethlehem. But these were impostors, and the Hospital formally disowned them, and proclaimed them knaves.

‘These are to give notice, that there is no such liberty given to any patients kept in the said Hospital for their cure, neither is any such plate as a distinction or mark put upon any lunatick during their time being here, or when discharged thence. And that the same is a false pretence to colour their wandering, begging, and to deceive the people, to the dishonour of the Government of that Hospital.’

This order was made in 1675, but the fraudulent Tom o’Bedlams are heard of as late as 1708.

It was one of the ancient, true, legitimate vagabonds who was supposed to chant the Song, wandering by moonlight or lightening or starlight in wastes, by blasted heaths, by marshlands, under black woods, in that old lonely England, where there were many desolate ways. Of course, the Tom o’Bedlam songs — several were written, and even a Mad Bess Song — were a pure literary genre, as pastoral poetry was a literary genre in all ages. Madness to dullness is nearly allied: Kit Smart with his Song to David is a rare exception to the rule. But the unknown Elizabethan poet made a Tom o’Bedlam in his own image, and mingled sublime imagination with haggard grotesques in this singular invention.

I must confess that I prefer the Disraeli reading of the first verse to that of Mr Sidgwick’s manuscript, which, of course, we must hold to be the textus receptus.

From the hag and hungry goblin
That into rags would rend ye,
And the spirit that stands
By the naked man
In the book of moons, defend ye.

Thus the manuscript, and thus, we must presume, the unknown author's vision of his dream. But, like as they say the folksong is formed by a sort of unconscious, unpremeditated collaboration, a phrase here, a word there; altered from generation to generation by one singer and another, often, I dare say, to suit the humour of the moment, a fancy, right or wrong that here was a rounder, or a madder, or a sadder utterance than the way of the old singers: so I hold it has been with our Song. For, Disraeli, following his printed text of the late seventeenth century, reads:

From the hag and hungry goblin
That into rags would rend ye,
All the spirits that stand
By the naked man
In the book of moons defend ye,

I believe this reading — say, rather, this singing — came to some light puisne of the Inns of Court in a dark, low room of the old Devil tavern in Fleet Street, of a night when the candles on the board seemed dimmed and a great and terrible wind blew and beat upon the walls till the beams of the house groaned and shook; and they looked out and saw how the white moon drove in a chase through the clouds across the heavens. They threw more dry wood on the fire, and laurel boughs to spurt and crackle in the flame, and as in all this heat and light the candles paled, the cups were filled anew with enchanted Gascon wine, and a dark young man with long black hair began the old Song of the golden age of Elizabeth. He had looked at that shining victorious moon, and saw the spirits of the moon high above all the dusky, ugly shapes that prowl about midnight woods and hide amongst grim rocks, and gather round slimy pools in outland places. And there came to him also, as he sat at the board and saw the jewel glowing in the wine, the memory of an ancient written book he had once glowered at, and read only a line here and a line there, and had stayed a little longer before some of the figures. And there was one of these figures lettered, Microcosmus Exaltatus seu Homo in Coelis sub Nomine: that is, The Microcosm in Exaltation, or, the Man in the Heavens, under the name Kether. It showed a naked man, with the Pentacle, the Five-pointed Star, shining over his head, and his arms stretched wide, and signs and symbols of an old wisdom inscribed on all the parts of his body, the sun and the moon to right and left of him. And as the young man remembered this, it mingled with the madness of the old Song, and so when his turn came, he chanted the first verse as they printed it afterwards, in the shape that Disraeli copied.

‘The madness of the old Song’: say rather the high, supreme sanity of the old Song. For, since we have abjured rationalism and all its irresistible and most false conclusions, we see that it is man’s true difference and mark that he can soar into regions that, like Keat’s faery lands forlorn, are not to be charted on any map of the earth or the stars. The wise old saying went that all things are lost in mystery; there are flaming walls that bound the world of our thought; pillars of Hercules beyond which no ship can sail. And yet it is our privilege that now and again there is one who has passed beyond these walls, these bounds, these pillars, who has looked on the other side and has brought back its secrets, which are only to be uttered in symbols. It is the light which shines beyond the fiery walls that enlightens us and all the sensible world about us; that can take the common words that we use in our common life of every day and set them in such a pattern that they become incantations of power to enrapture men through ages of ages. Think of all the sentences that have been uttered and have perished since the day of Isiah and Homer: But their words endure forever. Homo sapiens: yes, but only sapiens in so far as he transcends all that the prudent men call wisdom: only wise in so far as he sees that the wisdom of Polonius is worth nothing.

The Song speaks of the wildest visions that are to be seen beyond the walls of the world. A man may go on a journey, and see cities of climbing spires and golden palaces, he may view rich vineyards purple and gold in the sunshine, laughing harvests, towering mountains. But, if he cares to stray a little from the highroad, there are deep, dark, and secret places. There are haggard rocks that grin and mouth at him, as if the hag and hungry goblin had been changed to stone. There are hollows in the gloom of ash trees, places holy and enchanted, upon which the traveller will gaze in silence, hardly daring to enter. There are paths that lead down lonely hills, and when the twilight falls, it is evident that they must end in fairyland. There is a valley that I know, not very far from the common road; narrow, surrounded by steep hills on every side: a place of marsh and strange reeds and rushes and ghostly flowers. All about it the woods hang on the hills, and down by the marsh many of the trees have perished, and still stand in that hollow place, where the wind is silent; stand white, phantasmal, with white branches piercing out of the green leaf. And so with the journeys of the spirit; on these also there are wild and haggard and desolate places to be seen. Coleridge had viewed them, Edgar Allen Poe also, when he forgot to listen to his Raven and his Bells; and the unknown author of Tom o'Bedlam moved amongst them as if a native of their darkness. He knows not the ways of the sun; his moon and stars are enchanted; he sees in the heavens the wars and the wantonings of the older deities; the wood where he lies of nights becomes to him the old Gothic cathedral of St Paul's, many pillared, high vaulted in darkness, inhabited by the waking, whispering spirits of the dead.

Fortified by his journeyings and sojournings in such waste lands, he goes forth to the last encounter of the spirit, to meet the ghostly knight who dwells beyond the ends of the earth.

'Methinks it is no journey.' No, indeed; for it is the shortest of all journeys, since it is accomplished in the twinkling of an eye.

THE ONLY WAY

PEOPLE HAVE BEEN gaping and wondering over the famous Quinn Sale at the Anderson Galleries in New York. The great feature was the collection of Conrad manuscripts; the manuscripts of a writer who suffered many years of deadly, frosty neglect while blown out, inflated nonentities were swelling and ballooning and flaunting to the skies in a quite amazing and monstrous manner; going into their fiftieth, seventieth, hundred-thousandth editions, and being treated generally by the press and public as if they were veritable substances, not fortuitous aggregations of wind and emptiness.

These balloons have all burst long ago. The flatulent books are all forgotten. The wastepaper man and the pulper know how the end came. But the manuscripts of the neglected man of genius have just brought — how much was it? Twenty-five thousand pounds; thirty-thousand pounds? At all events a huge sum; greatly to the encouragement of all enemies of the balloon and windbag species.

But I am afraid, also to the discouragement of many worthy lovers of such rarities. There are, of course, many good booklovers who have no devotion for the relic, who do not desire to touch the book that Shakespeare's hands touched, or to see the words that he wrote with his own pen. But there are others whose hearts are kindled by the sense of personal communion that such things give them. They would gladly possess a few lines written him on the flyleaf, a proof sheet with his 'dele' marks and second, happier thoughts scribbled on its margins. And these will say, as they read of manuscripts, sold for £1000, for £1200, for £1600 each:

'It's no good. Collecting is a rich man's game.'

That's where the mistake is. Collecting, the real sport, the adventurous quest, the voyage of discovery is a poor man's game — provided that the poor man has the necessary enthusiasm, the necessary scent of literature. It does not imply much skill or a large allowance of the spirit of adventure for a man to buy a gold-mine or an oilfield after the gold or the oil has been discovered and assayed and proved. The real man is he who divines by certain mysterious indications which he would, perhaps, be puzzled to explain or define, that gold is hidden beneath the barren hill, and acts on his belief.

So with first editions, with manuscripts, with all sorts of odds and ends that lie scattered about the great track of letters. You must be rich, indeed, if you would buy these things after their value has been discovered; let it be your place to be the discoverer of their value.

I was talking the other day to a man whom we will call Robinson, a man, I would say, by no means in the first order of merit, and yet collected in a small way. He was showing me an old scrap book he had kept many years ago.

‘Look at that,’ he said. ‘You see it is a mere pamphlet, a thing of twelve or sixteen pages, I wrote it as an advertisement for a publisher. He used to put it into his books and parcels, with other lists and leaves and leaflets. Three or four people, goodness knows why, kept their copies for thirty-five years or so — and one changed hands the other day for ten pounds!’

Those three or four people divined that the advertisement ‘mud’ contained gold in paying quantities. That is the method of the true collector.

And another instance. Only two years ago a friend of mine — not Robinson — wrote a few paragraphs for a theatre program. The generous management gave the program away to the audience. This summer a London bookseller sold a copy of one of these programs to an American gentleman for twelve-and-six; and the American gentleman is aware that he made a very good bargain.

And the undiscovered gold-fields are to be found everywhere. They are to be sought in catalogues, in bookshops, in the twopenny box, in street stalls, in bundles of old dusty magazines, in newspaper cuttings that have grown yellow with forgetfulness at the bottom of the cupboard.

Like the old alchemists, we can truly say: ‘The matter of our work is everywhere present.’

THE GRAY’S INN COFFEE HOUSE

WHEN DAVID COPPERFIELD came back to England and London after three years’ absence he put up at the Gray’s Inn Coffee House. Used to sunshine and light air, and gay little dinners under dancing leaves, he saw, as he says, ‘more fog and mud in London in a minute than he had seen in a year.’ And the Coffee House: that at first — was somewhat heavy & oppressive.

It had such a prescriptive, stiff-necked, long-established, solemn, elderly air. I glanced about the room which had had its sanded floor sanded, no doubt, in exactly the same manner when the chief waiter was a boy — if he ever was a boy, which appeared improbable; & at the shining tables, where I saw myself reflected, in unruffled depths of old mahogany; and at the lamps, without a flaw in their trimming or cleaning; and at the comfortable green curtains, with their pure brass rods, snugly enclosing the boxes; and at the two large coal fires, brightly burning; and at the rows of decanters, burly as if with the consciousness of pipes of expensive old port wine below…

From all this, and from ‘the slow comfort of the meal’ and from the pint of special port which seemed to come of its own accord to the table of the old gentleman in long gaiters, David drew the conclusion that London was a place of slow progress, & that his friend Traddles would hardly make a living at the Bar under twenty years — even if he made it then.

This conclusion was all wrong. Traddles had already excited & interested the legal profession by his argument in DOE dem. JIPES versus WTGZELL, & was getting on very well. So, there being nothing whatever to be said on this score against the Gray’s Inn Coffee House and its ways, we may consider ourselves free to enjoy our dinner there — if we can find it.

That is the hard part. I can remember taverns that were like it, or something like it, forty, thirty, twenty-five years ago. I never saw anything quite so choice, discreet, orderly & comfortable as that vanished Coffee House by the Holborn Gate of Gray's Inn: but there were snug places where you could get good meat and good drink, and enjoy the flavour of a long tradition with your food. People have told me that the good clubs still provide good food. It may be; but at one, of established dignity, I found that they did not know how to cook Yorkshire Pudding. At another, of a gayer, perhaps wealthier, sort, the same pie, the plat de la maison, as my host informed me, was full of the bones of the birds of which it was composed, and at the third, well reputed amongst thoughtless men who like to eat well, the curried fowl was an excellent boiled fowl which had been spoilt by the addition of a little raw curry powder to the white sauce.

The question is whether it is possible to reconstruct the Coffee House that David, or rather Dickens, loved in his heart, though he hankered at first for the sunlight and the gaiety of the boulevard.

The material aspect of the place might not be difficult to recapture. Tables and partitions of dark, well-polished mahogany; are, no doubt, to be procured; green curtains are easy, and the electric lamps can be well-kept. Electric, not oil lamps. One must beware of mere antiquarianism; and so linoleum of obscure hue would replace the sand patterns of a hundred years ago. And the head waiter of that period wore knee-breeches if he served at an establishment of repute; but if I saw a waiter of these days dressed so, I should fear lest all the goodness of the soup had bought the fancy dress. The open fireplaces, with good, flaming coal burning in them, we can manage easily; and also brass plate - warmers with piles of plates: a comfortable sight to the diner. All really simple enough: it only remains to see about the dinner.

Only the other day a man was talking to me about his native place and the annual fair held in the High Street, and the roasting of the ox whole. 'And what does it taste like?' I asked.

He replied with emotion:

'It tastes as beef ought to taste.'

I knew what he meant. And what he meant was that nine-tenths of the beef we eat most emphatically does not taste as beef ought to taste. It is not in the least nasty; not, I suppose, unwholesome. It is almost flavourless. No great violence would be done to the palate or the understanding if one were told it was mutton. It is pale and woebegone: it might almost be veal, so far as the colour is concerned. The outside fat, what there is of it, is a sickly yellow, in place of a rich crinkle of the darkest brown. I have forgotten to mention that you will find your sad slice of this stuff all leanness, whereas in real English beef, as Jos Sedley so rightly noted, the lean is throughout intermingled with fat. And as for flavour; I wonder how many there are who can recall with me the delicious sapidity of the ‘Christmas Beef of the old days, beef that had been fattened for the feast, beef at its best and highest. It was accompanied by Yorkshire Pudding — not a solid and a greasy and a viscous slab, sodden and detestable, but a dish that seemed to have gone through some great convulsion of nature and the oven, and to have emerged triumphant. There were golden plains and valleys all smiling before you; but here & again internal heats had blown the smooth regions into volcanic and mountainous appearances, blackened as by hidden fires. Below all this, bland delight, fit to mingle with the full flavours of the smoking beef. Add to this, if you are of dry, austere habit, the shred horseradish, fresh dug from the kitchen garden; or perhaps, your heart being set on richness, that same horseradish, pounded & compounded & made velvety with cream. For vegetables: potatoes, in the brown jackets of the yeomanry, huge, stout fellows, which, broken, fall in a dry, white flour on the plate; and, if all this is not enough, you may add a dish of Jerusalem artichokes, simple in themselves, without sauce, save, perhaps, for a dab or two of butter, added when they are laid in the dish.

And there you have a feast too good for any but Britons, or very hungry, honest men.

And I wish I could tell you where you can go and get it, & pay your four or five bob for it — with crusty bread & ripe Stilton included — and be thankful. We all know where we can enjoy the exquisite dishes of the French in their finest perfection. It is not difficult to dine, & dine very well a la bonne cuisine bourgeoise — mussels, pieds de porc grilles, roast fowl and salad with a petit brin d’ail to inspire the latter, & a dish of epinards a la creme. I know the place where after you have eaten the famous chicken soup with the minced chicken in balls, & devoured cold plaice fried in olive oil accompanied by monstrous pickled cucumbers, you put out your cigarette as the sun sets — if it be a Friday night. In the same street I have relished lobster in the Canton fashion, dressed with bamboo shoots, & eaten the dish called the 'Hundred Buddhas', with old Rice Wine, & the pale golden tea, 'Water Fairy', to follow. There is, or was, up in Soho, a hestiatorion, where stuffed aubergines cry out garlic with full voices, as they repose in hot oil, and the landlord, though a native, makes such wild work with his Greek quantities as would cause the Head to grope for his thickest cane. And there is the lobster's claw, hidden in the Japanese custard pot, decked with delicate & tiny herbs — close to Shaftesbury Avenue.

But where is that dish of good roast beef with vegetables, Yorkshire, and horseradish?

I don't know; and so I wish we could restore the Gray's Inn Coffee House.

It is a question both of the meat and the cooking of it. The tasteless, forbidding trash that usurps the honoured name of beef may be cow beef from a dairying district, or hungry pasture bed that has never known the taste of 'cake.' But most probably it is colonial or foreign stuff, bred in far, dreary plains and prairies where the herbage is not at all like the rich, dark green grass of our English meadows. The meat has been chilled or frozen, thereby loosing any flavour it may have possessed originally. It is cheap; & food in its shabbiest form. And so with all the accompaniments of the dish. The eggs that made the Yorkshire Pudding were weary with their long journey from the ends of the earth; and the cook didn't know the rules of the Yorkshire game. The potatoes were the cheapest obtainable, from the clay lands. They had been boiled by a person who did not recognize that there is an art of boiling potatoes. In colour, they were green & yellow; in texture, waxlike; to the taste, offensive. They were ugly, stony things: petrce scandali et lapides offensionis. The other vegetable was probably cabbage, slabbed cabbage, perhaps, cut in squares, with a reek to sicken a starving man.

The Gray's Inn Coffee House, rastitutus, would take care that its beef was bred and fed in England or Scotland by approved breeders of fat stock. Having obtained its prime joints, it would not dream of putting them into ovens. They would be duly spitted & roasted & basted in front of blazing coal fires. Baked meat is not roast meat; though we may flatter ourselves that it is the same thing, or, if it isn't, that it is just as good. But, as Bishop Butler remarked, things are as they are and the consequences of them will be as they will be.

So there, illustrated by one example, a dish of roast beef with its attendant circumstances, we have the principles on which the good English tavern must be restored, if it is ever to be restored.

The great difficulty is this: that the average man who likes a decent meal has, through long years of bad practice, ceased to connect the notion of good eating with English cooking. He has his lunch at some place near his business: he regards it as a necessary process of 'stoking. If he wants a nice dinner, he goes to a French or Italian restaurant. It will be hard to convince him that plain roast beef can be a rare treat.

I have forgotten one point. It is a most vital point, but they are calling 'Time, gentlemen, please!' and I must go. But with this moral story.

About the middle of the eighteenth century, a very bold, bad man, named Casanova, was running wild all over Europe. I think it was in Cologne, then under the happy rule of the Prince Archbishop, that something very nice was served after a monstrous good dinner. In tiny, gilded glasses there came a drink that was dark amber, with the light of gold shining in it. They asked Casanova what he thought it was. He said:

'Is it some rare Imperial Tokay?'

It was old English ale.

We were once a great people.

A NOTE ON POETRY

‘THERE IS A world elsewhere; its language is called poetry.’ And that is one of the many attempts to define the indefinite.

Others are, perhaps, better known. Wordsworth said that poetry was emotion recollected in tranquillity; with Mathew Arnold, it is a criticism of life; Milton held that it must be simple, sensuous and passionate. To Edgar Allen Poe, poetry is the rhythmical creation of supernal beauty. And, no doubt, there are other essays towards the definition of poetry.

But to be concrete; to approach the question in the spirit of Thomas Gradgrind, the Hard Fact man: here are some lines from the work of a great and venerated poet

… danger cannot but attend
Upon a Function rather proud to be
The enemy of falsehood, than the friend
Of truth, to sit in judgement than to feel.

The Function, it may be explained, is the attempt to subject the poetic process to systematic and logical prose analysis; and the quoted lines express Wordsworth’s opinion that this procedure is incompetent and ineffective. Probably, Wordsworth was right; but the question is, whether the passage itself is poetry in the true sense of the word.

Poetry, not prose, came first in time, and at the very beginnings of poetry in Europe, something strange happened. With all respect to that great multitude of Bards and Seers and Skalds, who uttered their incantations without record remaining, I suppose we may say that the verse of Europe began with Homer and Hesiod. Conjecturally, one lived in the ninth century B.C., the other in the eighth. It doesn’t matter in the least what views you may happen to hold upon the authorship of the poems called Homeric; it signifies little that Homer — if there were a Homer — was probably born at Smyrna, and that Hesiod's father came from Cyme, also in Asia Minor. It remains that the body of literature in verse which stands under these two names is the earliest known in Europe. Homer, they say, wrote somewhere in the ninth century B.C.; Hesiod in the eighth. Both used the same dialect of Greek, both the same metre. But, while Homer's hexameters uttered the splendour and the terror of the great battle beneath the walls of Troy, and the wonders and enchantments that befell Ulysses before he won back to Ithaca at last through many perilous seas: Hesiod wrote of simple things for simple country people. He had nothing to say of the great clanging battle for Troy, nothing of the Lotus Eaters, of that land where it seemed always afternoon. He never touched at Calypso's fairy isle, or showed the horrid transmutation of Circe's magic cup, or partook of the fruit that ripened all the year in the gardens of Alcinous. Instead of all this, he made the music of his rolling hexameters discourse wise saws and simple instances. He had a dispute with his brother about their father's will, and advises that a friendly settlement on a fifty-fifty basis may pay better than taking the quarrel into the Courts. Hesiod, in fact, held that, even in sleepy Boetia, the law was 'an edged tool of uncertain application, very expensive in the working, and rather remarkable for its properties of close shaving than for its always shaving the right person.' And so he says, summing up the case, 'the half is better than the whole.' The proper study of mankind, in Hesiod's opinion, is eminently man: the man in the street and on the land, going about his everyday business, given sometimes to odd tricks and manners, occasionally prejudiced, sometimes over-optimistic. Hesiod notes his ways: he observes in a fine line that 'Potter hates potter, and one craftsman another,' or as we put it in simple prose: 'Two of a trade never agree.' He has advice to offer: 'Don't be too sure: a good deal may happen between the lip and the brim of the cup.' Such is the sense of his resonant, heroic lines, and here we agree with Hesiod that the warning word deserves to be set to music; and so we say, 'There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip' — and that, not a doubt of it, is sound sense. But again, the question arises, as it arose over that passage from Wordsworth: whether in resonant Greek or in simple English, is the line poetry?

However that may be, the double tradition of Homer and Hesiod maintained itself through all the ages of European versification. There is the exquisite felicity of the Horatian ode, with its sad undying music of all love and pleasure and delight passing away, of all the flowers fading, of the cypress as the sole abiding tree. But Horace also walked the streets of Rome much in the spirit of Thackery perambulating St James’s and Mayfair; amused, acute, observant of men and manners. He wrote, too, an excellent versified manual of dramatic poetry full of weighty precepts, many of which are as applicable today as ever they were; in the spirit if not in the letter. Thus, Horace bids his playwright to beware of solving those difficulties in the last act by producing a god from the machine, ‘unless,’ he says, ‘you have got your plot and your characters into such a terrific knot that there is no other way of loosening it.’ Bearing this maxim in mind, our common reviewer of novels may often murmur to himself as he comes to the last page: ‘rather a case of much ado about very little,’ and ‘that last coincidence was a bit thick.’ And then, there is:

... mediocribus essepoetis

Non homines, non Di, non coneessere columnce.

‘Neither angels nor men, nor publishers can stand second-rate poetry.’

Cross authors will note with gratification that Horace considers publishers to be sub-human; but, this little stroke apart: what a sensible, what an excellent observation; a sort of ‘Trespassers will be Prosecuted’ notice on the gate which leads to the Sacred Grove of Poetry.

But why on earth didn’t Horace say it in prose? One is reminded of the story of the theatrical luggage and the Stuttering Tenor. At the last moment, just as the Guard was going to wave his flag, the Prima Donna Assoluta became anxious about the Company’s belongings. She hailed the Tenor, the first man she saw, and urged him hysterically to run and make sure— ‘or we shan’t be able to open at Hanley on Monday night.’ He ran like a hare down the platform, recollected that it would take him three or four minutes to deliver the message in common speech, and so chanted to the porter in resonant recitative from Trovatore-. ‘Is all the Company’s baggage in the van?’

And, then again, there is the similar and even more striking instance of Virgil, who wrote in the Æneid that tremendous epic of rise and majesty of Rome. He felt that a Treatise on Farming in all its Branches would fit the times and the will and pleasure of Augustus Cæsar; and so he cast his maxims, cautions, processes, and recipes into hexameter verse and the measure of the Æneid. One of these recipes instructs the beekeeper how to get a swarm of bees by burying a calf. I believe the method is now obsolete, at least in scientific apiarian circles.

The traditional of delivering in verse matter, which most of us would emphatically declare to be an affair for prose, persisted through the ages. I believe that there are circles where the late A.E.Housman is honoured, not for his Shropshire Lad, but for his critical edition of the Astronomica of Manilius; a poem on Astrology in five books, says the Classical Dictionary. Skipping a few centuries, and coming to our own century, we have Tusser's poem on Husbandry. Later there is Dyer's Fleece. But Dr Johnson objects 'that the woolcomber and the poet appear to be such discordant natures, that an attempt to bring them together is to couple the serpent with the fowl.' There was a poem also on how to grow apples and the right way of making cider — technically excellent, said an expert — and there was Grainger's Sugar Cane, made immortal by a passage in Boswell.

Having talked of Grainger's Sugar Cane, I mentioned to him Mr Langton's having told me, that this poem, when read in manuscript at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, had made all the assembled wits burst into a laugh, when, after much blank-verse pomp, the poet began a new paragraph thus:

'Now, Muse, let's sing of rats'

And what increased the ridicule was, that one of the company, who slily overlooked the reader, perceived that the word had been originally mice, and had been altered to rats, as more dignified.

And: I have never seen Darwin's Loves of the Plants — is it called that? — but I should suppose that the indicated attempt to suffuse a metrical manual of the Linnæan system of Botany with sentiment must be even more preposterous than Dr Grainger's cry to his Muse to help him to sing of Rats.

Well; this is but a bald and skeleton account of a long and curious history: the persistent and serious employment of verse on matters which are eminently suited for prose exposition. Among these matters I would reckon Hesiod’s advice to litigants, Horace’s hints for playwrights, Virgil’s treatise on farming, and Dr Grainger’s work on sugarcane. And I would include also Wordsworth’s discussion of the principles of poetic criticism in the medium of laborious and unmusical blank verse.

However, it is on a comic note that the history of the misappropriation of the verse-form ends. It has been taken into the service of commerce, and helps to sell useful articles of trade. Somewhat in this fashion:

When life is drear

Try Robert Elsmere and

Lost your pal?

Read Das Kapital.

Indeed, the art of wedding verse to advertisement is not so modern after all. It must be more than a hundred years since these lines were written:

If I know’d a donkey wot wouldn’t go To see Mrs JARLEY’S wax-work show, Do you think I’d acknowledge him?

Oh no no!

Then run to Jarley’s —

But the vital question is, not how this odd practice has ended, but how it began; and here the difficulties are great and the matter deeply obscure. To go back as far as we may into origins, I think we may take it as sure that men sang before they spoke. In other words, the common belief that ordinary modern speaking is natural, and singing artificial is false. To Jones of Surbiton, who prospers in the City, common speech is, doubtless, natural, and song an art to be acquired with pains and perseverance if it is to be a pleasing song. But if you could go back to Jones's grandfather, who liver Mynyddisllwyn way or in the parish of Llanfihangel Torfaen, you would hear that gentleman's voice rising and falling in measured tones, with eloquent modulations and singing closes. His voice had its ordered and various inflections and intonations; very much after the fashion of the Epistle Tone and the Gospel Tone which you may hear in church any Sunday if you like to go to High Mass especially if the Use is that of Sarum. Old Mr Jones's speech was in fact a song; though a very simple song. The tune of that old, natural speech was not always simple. In the year 1907, when I was enjoying that famous holiday of mine on the stage, I was touring in the fit-ups and the smalls, and found myself in the town of Morpeth in Northumberland. Three or four of the Company had got into the same rooms: very decent rooms, though the atmosphere suggested that no window and scarcely any door had been opened for fifty years. Well, somebody spoke of tea, and the lodging-house servant observed: 'You need not worry; your tea will be all ready for you in half-an-hour.' She 'observed'? Rather she chanted a strange and haunting melody, a fragment of song from a ruined realm of faery, or, perhaps, a curious variant of the Antiphon, Vidi Aqam.

And such was the first speech of man? Certainly, the first utterance of man that deserved the name of speech. But, perhaps, it may be lawful to conjecture that there was a time when this ancestral mammal deserved the title of stick-in-the-mud; he was of earth, earthy. He signified his wants and his emotions after the fashion of the beasts and birds, his companions. He had his vocal system, more elaborate, perhaps, than that of his fellows: an affair of growls and grunts, howls and screams and vague, murmuring noises; unformed, unshapen sounds that meant 'pterodactyls,' 'ware mammoth,' 'meat,' 'drink,' 'Mrs Mud, I want you,' and so forth. Indeed, there are people who still speak this ancient language: grunts and snarls and growls have survived the age of the iguanadon.

And then: something happened to this being; something very extraordinary. Its nature and effect are both in deep doubt. There are, roughly, two schools of thought who hold diametrically opposite views on the question. One body of opinion considers that from this far-off event, everything began to go wrong; but other men maintain that from this change, or development, or whatever you like to call it, everything began to go right.

Years ago, my very old friend, Arthur Edward Waite and I found ourselves in that pub of happy memories, the Yorkshire Stingo, in the Marylebone Road. Waite had observed the sign, and boldly asked for a glass of Yorkshire Stingo. The landlord laughed, said he hadn’t got any Stingo, and suggested Burton. Waite grumbled at the time; but afterwards he moralised the affair in a collection of aphorisms. The paragraph ran something like this:

Once, wandering by a dull and dusty byway of this mortal life, I came upon a tavern called the Yorkshire Stingo. I went in, and asked for Stingo; but there was none. So the Universe continually promises Stingo; but it has none to give us.

And, somewhat after the same fashion, Thomas Hardy, meditating on the general misery of mankind, thought that the human mind had so developed throughout the ages that it had come to demand of life the satisfaction of all manner of wants and desires, longings and aspirations, which life had no power to fulfil or satisfy. And the being who is consumed by a longing for the non-existent may justly be deemed mad. Waite, I think, held that, somewhere and somewhen, the traveller would be refreshed in full measure with the new wine of the Kingdom; but Hardy could not believe in such a festival. And so, a good materialist friend of mine once remarked to me that, though he loved high poetry, yet, as an alienist, he held it to be a form of mania. If he had been put to it, I think he would have declared that the lark was not a blithe spirit, but a bird; and that nightingales were not immortal.

And there, I believe, the dividing line between the two schools that are opposed on this question is clearly marked. The one party, if it would be frank, must hold that man went mad: the other set will have it that he got up from the ground and began to see life.

At any rate; he began to do very strange things. He found that he could not relish the content of pot or pan or bowl unless a rude ornament of one sort or another ran around the rim. He painted pictures of beasts and battles on the walls of his cave. He made graven images, he took to dancing in set measures. He turned the grunts and growls and howls of the old muddy days into a song. But I believe that it would be very dangerous to be dogmatic as to the origins of poetry: that strictly measured speech moving by sure laws, making its more special appeal to the ear than the speech of common use. Perhaps it was the specific language of rites and incantations, holy or unholy, celebrated in dark places and on high places: a sacred form of utterance reserved for sacred and secret things, gradually becoming known and used for the exterior as well as for the interior ceremonies. With Homer it was still an utterance set apart for the world of wonder and of terror and of beauty; but soon after Homer's day, Hesiod — as we have seen — was using his language of enchantment to enforce the homeliest lessons of practical common sense. It must be said, that he also wrote what might be called A Metrical Church Catechism; but in his most characteristic work, writing at the dawn of European literature, his viewpoint was essentially the same as that of Alexander Pope, writing in the Reigns of Queen Anne and the first Georges. This must remain a very strange thing: as if one set a recipe for apple-dumplings to the Londonderry Air — or told the strollers that their tea would be ready in half-an-hour in the song of the fair birds of Rhiannon. Perhaps, the fact was, that if a thing was to be written down it had to be written in verse-form. Prose was not regarded as a possible medium for the permanent. Prose, singing prose, was good enough for chat; but the thing that mattered, Literature, must be expressed in verse.

Anyhow; so it happened in the beginning of western literature, and so it has been happening ever since; and it does not seem that anyone found this common usage of a sacred speech strange, distasteful, or unbecoming. Nobody, it appears, wondered that Virgil should sing of the great deeds and adventures of pious Æneas and of crops that exhaust the soil in the same tones, to the same tune. Formally, the Romans of the Augustan Age still called any man who wrote in the verse-form 'a sacred bard,' but they evidently saw nothing queer, nothing objectionable in the bard using his sacred mode of utterance to describe Fast Life in Rome — or Beekeeping. Horace called himself Musamm Sacerdos, the priest of the Muses; speaking as a Hierophant of the Mysteries, he bids the profane, the uninitiated, stand far off: but he uses the liturgical language — that is, verse — for the telling of some very funny stories. In one respect, this use of the verse-form in treating of matters which have no relation to poetry in the proper sense of the word must be said to be justified. No one can be sorry that Dryden attacked the Whig dogs and the bad vercifiers of his age in verse: and one cannot think calmly of Pope's character of Addison being delivered in prose. Satire is not poetry, since satire is the expression of dislike, contempt, hatred; and these are by no means sacred or poetic springs; but the metre and the rhyme make ‘Atticus’ deadly. If it had been written in prose, it would probably have been merely ill-mannered and tartly disagreeable. Pope spoke nothing but the truth when he said he lisped in numbers. He was, by nature and of origin, numerosus; verse was his native speech and prose an acquired idiom. Honest Johnson held that Pope and Poetry were synonyms; if Pope’s work be not poetry, he said, then where is poetry to be found? But the Doctor wrote of Lycidas; ‘In this poem there is no nature, for there is no truth; there is no art, for there is nothing new. Its form is that of a pastoral, easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting.’ Johnson sincerely held that Lycidas was trash, and unpleasant trash at that, Yet: Lycidas is poetry, and Pope’s satire of Addison is not. And, why not?

Let us return to our definitions. There is Wordsworth’s famous ‘emotion recollected in tranquillity.’ Clearly, this will not serve us. The emotion thus recollected may certainly find its expression, and often does find its expression, in prose. Sir Walter Scott, roaming over the Cheviots as a young man in search of Border Ballads, experienced certain emotions which he recollected in middle age, and re-embodied them in Dandie Dimont of Guy Mannering. Dickens saw and smelt Debtor’s Prisons when he was a boy, and knew how the darkening day gloomed among the mists of the Medway marshes: look for the recollections and magic reflections of these emotional experiences in David Copperfield, Little Dorrit, and Great Expectations. Jingle’s flight with the Spinster Aunt, and the chase after him of Mr Pickwick and Mr Wardle are reminiscences of the reporters midnight rushes to catch the edition of the Chronicle: stormy weather, a world without of black darkness, ill-made roads, a plunging, jolting chaise, drunken postboys, and the transcribing the shorthand notes of Lord John Russell’s speech by the quivering glimmer of a carriage-lamp. It would be temerarious to assume that the mind of Emily Bronte was ever in a state of tranquillity; but her recollections of the dreadful heights and hollows of the Haworth scene took the form of prose in Wuthering Heights.

As for Mathew Arnold’s ‘criticism of life’: it really won’t do. In a sense, one cannot object to Life, because it includes everything, from a Meditation on the Four Last Things to the discovery of an obese caterpillars in the salad. In another sense, Life is as objectionable as Nature; both words, covering everything, therefore signify nothing. But if we are to use English in its usual and traditional sense, a criticism of anything is a reasoned judgement of that thing. It must exclude passion and emotion, it must shut out prejudices of every kind. It must banish all intuitions, half-hints, and intimations which are not logical propositions; it must view the facts and all the facts, and balancing the favourable evidence against the unfavourable, deliver its considered, final sentence — splendida arbitria.

Full fathom five is not like that. It is not a weighed and balanced judgement on life or on anything else. It is not based on facts of any kind. It is an outburst of simple, sensuous, and passionate emotion.

And that brings us to Milton's famous utterance. Poetry, he says, must be simple, sensuous and passionate. He is right; and that is why we are bold to say and bound to say that the Wordsworthian passage quoted above, is not poetry:

… danger cannot but attend

Upon a Function rather proud to be

The enemy of falsehood, than the friend

Of truth, to sit in judgement than to feel.

This passage is based on the syllogism — in Camestres? —

A fervid and friendly approach is required for the consideration of poetical questions.

A formal logical analysis in prose excludes such an approach.

Therefore: A prose analysis is not a suitable method of investigating the poetic process.

Clearly then, the verse is not simple, involving as it does the construction of a syllogism; it certainly excludes sensuous images — a Function sitting in judgement can hardly be called a sensuous image — and it is founded not on passion but on reason. Therefore, again, it is not poetry.

But though Milton gives us the qualities — or more of the qualities — of poetry, he does not define the thing in itself. He tells us what it is like; but not what it is. He omits, for example, the very difference of poetry which formally distinguishes it from prose: that is, its measured appeal to the ear, or rather, through the ear. Note and underline, ‘measured.’ Fine prose usually or always appeals to the ear:

And the door shall but shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird, and all the daughters of music shall be brought low.

Here, indeed, is an appeal to the ear, but it is not a measured appeal; it is not constructed according to a fixed metrical system. It perfectly fulfils the Miltonic definition by qualities, being eminently simple, sensuous, and passionate, and yet it is not poetry since it lacks metre. The matter of poetry is there, but not the mode. So, a speaker’s voice may be musical — that is, sweetly sounding — but his speech is not music, which demands a progression of tones moving by fixed laws.

Milton’s definition, then, must be rejected as insufficient: there remains the word of the marvellous Edgar Allen Poe. He defines Poetry and the rhythmical creation of supernal beauty; and I do not see that anything can be added to the phrase or taken from it. It expresses in exact and concrete form the vaguer, ‘there is a world elsewhere; it’s language is called poetry’; which Poe condenses into the one word. Supernal. It includes all that should be included; it excludes all that should be excluded: it is the perfect definition.

It seems, then, that accepting Poe’s essential definition, and Milton’s phrase as a qualitative comment on it, we are in a position to distinguish between verse, however fine, however exquisite, and pure poetry. But before we go further on our voyage of discovery of poetry, ten leagues beyond the wide world’s end, it may be well to look to our baggage. Some of it we cannot take with us. It is hard lines, perhaps; but it is absolutely necessary to leave our common sense behind. Lemuel Gulliver, at the court of Brobdingnag found, as he looked at the maids of honour, that his eyesight was microscopic; and that these lovely ladies were by no means what they seemed to their gigantic lovers. Gulliver's glances penetrated a little way and but a very little way beneath appearance; modern science, using more powerful and more delicate instruments, has comfortably assured us that the visible, tangible, phenomenal world of things does not bear the faintest resemblance in act or fact to that world as it is apprehended by science. Our common sense tells us that it is this, that, and the other; science declares, firmly and distinctly, that it is wildly remote from this, that, or the other. The table and chair as they seem to the ordinary man are not a bit like that table and chair as they are known by the scientific man. An old discovery enough: it was noted long ago that when the Astronomer Royal leaves his Observatory, his hat seems bigger to him than the moon. And, therefore, we may the more readily agree to refrain from talking of common sense when we look at that world of vision which is poetry.

For, apart from theories and theorems, facts are stubborn things. Here is one of them:

Full fathom five thy father lies;
Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes;
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea-change
Into something rich and strange.

There are, indeed, two hard facts here — the first is that those lines are poetry, and high poetry; the second, is that their content is wildly remote from common sense, or anything approaching common sense.

Again:

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
Bird thou never wert,
That from heaven, or near it

Pourest thy full heart
In profuse strains of unpremeditated art.

Common sense is convinced that a lark is a bird.

And finally, the best and highest of all — as I believe:

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I heard this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown:
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
The same that oft-times hath
Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

I do not think it is necessary to labour the point, that these lines are wildly remote from common sense. But it may be of interest to recall that a very few years ago, a critic of repute stated in his highly reputable newspaper that, since Keats supposed nightingales to be immortal, he was, evidently, a poet rather of fancy than imagination; that is, I suppose, a minor, not a major, poet.

But, in deed and beyond dispute, these lines, and, especially, the last two of them, are of the very heart, and core, and essence of poetry. Their loveliness, I take it, is indisputed; but it is not the loveliness of earth — of common sense — it is the loveliness of that world which is elsewhere, of that loveliness that Shelley spoke in Adonais — who is Keats.

He is a portion of that loveliness
Which once he made more lovely.

… A portion of the eternal, which must glow
Through time and change, unquenchably the same.

And, it is to this world of vision and ecstasy, to this world elsewhere, to Edgar Allen Poe's sphere of supernal beauty, that the whole body of poetry must be referred. The nearer it approached the perfect utterance of the poet.

As Wordsworth justly intimated in his laborious blank verse, common sense, or the logical understanding, is beyond its powers in attempting to adjudicate in the High Court of poetry. Many years ago, though by no means of the examining craft, I ventured to set a paper which dealt with our present subject amongst others germane to it. My poetry question ran —

'Faery lands forlorn.' Draw a map of the district in question, putting in principal towns, and naming exports.

We know that it cannot be done. We are in a fix. We cannot define, since the matter is indefinable. We cannot deny, since we know it is there. We must be content to follow in the steps of those who confess the most exact science of mathematics, and accept hints, symbols, words half-uttered, almost subterfuges. We see the flower on the wall; that is certain. It is also certain that we know nothing essential about it.

Flower in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies
I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower — but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,

I should know what God and man is.

It is true that botany will give us a good deal of information, some of it curious and interesting enough, about the little flower: but Botany deals in surface and appearance, not in being and essence. There might be people who would be interested to have information about the teeth in Keats's head; but this would not help them to know Keats.

So, after all, we must be content with such information as the poets afford us, if we wish to know something of their work and of that supernal world which they inhabit — now and then. As I was saying, we must be content with what we have, as the mathematicians are, presumably, content with what they have. We all know that no man hath seen a Line at any time, since length without breadth is, necessarily, invisible. It seems tolerably certain that there never were such creatures as Gorgons or Dragons; but there might have been; their existence would not outrage the laws of reason. But the Line of Geometry, and its Plane Surface — which has no depth — are contradictions in terms. They are not, and they cannot be. As for the Point, which has neither Parts not Magnitude; this belongs to pure transcendence. And all three elementary definitions of the most exact of the sciences are like nothing but those dreams which are shattered into glittering dust at the moment of waking, since they cannot endure before the presence of the waking world.

Nevertheless; we take a brave pencil and make a mark on the paper and make believe that it is, indeed, a Line. We draw something like a table-top, and are bold to call it a Plane Surface. Again, the pencil digs downward on the white expanse; and small black blob of carbon appears and stands for the Point — Which is, and yet is not. And, on these foundations of dream, a mighty science, and a pure science — as we believe — is firmly built.

So let Shelley's Lark remain in spirit, and let Keats's Nightingale abide immortal: in that world which is elsewhere; which is the very world.

Or, we may say — if you like it better so — that there is in the human consciousness, as it were, a space or tract which is sensitive to the approach and presence of poetry and painting, of music and architecture; to that dim, unconjectured region whence all these arise: in fine, to the arts. This tract is utterly independent of the logical understanding of common sense, and of reason — in the popular, and not the Coleridgean significance of the word. This territory, with poetry and the other arts which flourish in it, is not merely of the nature of man, it is man, it is that which makes man to be what he is. Its presence in the consciousness is that which differences man from pig, however Learned the pig may be.

If this tract must have a name, perhaps it should be styled Wonder; though Coleridge, in Kubla Khan, calls it Xanadu.

15th July 1887

To our trusty and well beloved, Harry Spurr, Greeting:

We arrived in these delicious solitudes on Saturday last, with minds and bodies somewhat shattered by the horrors of the excursion train; but the mountain air did soon refresh us. On Monday we went for a good long walk to a place called Wentwood Chase and ate our lunch under the greenwood tree. Tomorrow we hope to go to a place called Uske; and propose to undertake several small excursions of the same kind till the time is up. I am devoting to a large extent to the consumption of tobacco and find that amusement more profitable than ever, since the scents of cavendish are mingled with those of meadowsweet and roses and honeysuckle… Yesterday I went to the ancient and honourable city of Caerleon-on-Uske, which is, in fact, my birthplace. They had some foolery called a bazaar, into which I allowed myself to be entrapped, and where I was most hideously bored, fussed, and worried. I am going to write to Mr Ruskin to ask his opinion of bazaars.

Well, as you may imagine, there is no news here to tell: and I lack wit to invent matter. So do remain,

Yours very faithfully and infernally,

Arthur Machen

22 July 1887

Dear Spurr,

… I have certainly had splendid weather, and we have tramped about hill and dale, by mountains and river through this delicious land to our heart’s content. We have tasted of the native beverage cwrw dda, as also of seidr we have drunk from holy wells and the mountain torrents, we have laughed, sung and joked in a thoroughly Silurian manner. I have read out your letters to Miss Hogg, who approves of them altogether and sends you her kind regards. My pipe is still going at high pressure, and as you say, the local vendors of the lusty cavendish and the bland honey dew begin to look out for investments and adopt conservative views… I cordially agree with Mr Ruskin, concerning bazaars. They are as you say, damnable institutions, altogether devilish and filthy, and cannot be regarded except as a preparation for the infernal torments of the Bottomless Pit… during my short holiday… things have been settled in the pleasantest way possible; the manner of which I will expound to you when we meet…

Well! here’s luck and to our merry meeting.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen Silurist

My dear Zingaro,

Or wanderer over the Realm of England both on this side sea and beyond seas; your epistle received this morning with much joy. It caused, however, several of those roars which you seem to deprecate. We have been going on pretty well at York Street, and have taken, one way or another, a good deal of money. The new Lucifer is just out, and with it an important leaf of mine of Works of Theosophy and Occult Science, skilfully faked by hand of the Phoenix. I forget whether the Doom of the Obscure Thing was pronounced before you left; I meant that sudden, terrible and final pronouncement of sentence, where no time is left for pleading, and all perceive the thing is bust.

After November no more Walford, praise the pigs. The High Class Gypsy has been in once or twice; I believe he spends most of his time in that Resort of the Learned Vagabonds, the British Museum, slogging away at his Lives of the Alchemists; to be published by us. I fancy it will be rather a good thing.

Now this is as long a letter as I can write you between breakfast and 10 o’clock, so farewell, and may fair winds waft you to the enchanted Region of York Street. Vale.

Yours very faithfully,

Arthur Machen, Silurist

My dear Spurr,

Many thanks: I am sorry you can’t come tomorrow; but that shall be for another near day.

I have been to a doctor at last. His prescription is simple:

Eat nothing that you like.

Drink nothing that you like.

Take an earthquake — in powder form — twice a week.

Still, it is beginning to do me good.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear Spurr,

There are some funny folks in N. Y. City. I will insert your explanation as you suggest. My real emotions were: ‘How this rumour would hurt the feelings of the Governors of Pentonville, Wormwood Scrubs, Broadmoor and other excellent and well-managed institutions.’

When do you return? I am awaiting the Precious Balms matter from the typist, and have just reminded her about it.

A ‘friend’ of mine in Chicago, Vincent Starrett, is issuing another private volume of my stuff with Covici-McGee. I just grin; there is nothing else to do.

I hope all prospers well with you.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Aug. 14.’24

My dear Spurr,

Thank you very much. I hope my business man did not in any way pester you. I told him that I did not want any money now: what I asked him was — how much was due to me on account of P.B. Precious Balms, I supposed he would find out that by reference to his own memoranda. However, no harm done.

have told you the terms on which I will sign etc the ‘Arméd Man’. I never change my terms.

With regard to Eleusinia: it is for you to consider whether this reprint can be made to pay, say, £100 for each of us. Literary merit, I suppose has little to do with an affair of this kind; but ‘E.’ is certainly boyish balderdash. I can manage the Introduction all right. I should think a facsimile of the original title would make a more suitable frontispiece than the caricature.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Moving, God help! tomorrow, to 28 Loudoun Road, N.W.8.

My dear Spurr,

1. — Do you happen to know the address of one Keating (I think 'T.F.') of New York? He is a great Conrad collector. I am doing a job for him, and in the horror and confusion of this move, his letter has gone astray. If you can send me the address, it would help me out of a horrid mess.

2. — Will you give me £20 for The Chronicle of Clemendy 1st edition?

You will infer, and rightly, that things are not too well.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Dear Sirs,

About 2 months ago I sent you a in s., called The Great God Pan, which you acknowledged at the time.

Could you give me any idea as to whether it is likely to prove suitable?

John Lane, Esq.

My dear Sir,

am sending you the pieces I mentioned in my last letter.

They are all pasted into a scrap-book, and I have ticked with red pencil the stories and articles which seem to me most appropriate for the purpose.

As a possible alternative to some of them, I also send a MS tale (10,000 words) called ‘The Inmost Light’.

I send in the scrap-book a proof of the etching I shewed you the other night. It seems to me a very good one, and I think we should have no difficulty in coming to terms with the artist. Don’t you think an etched frontispiece adds very much to a book: a genuine etching is now a perfect rarity. In the print-shops I see nothing but process work.

I remain Yours faithfully,

Arthur Machen

P. S. Mrs Machen has hunted in the back numbers of the Ladies Pictorial for ‘Penelope’ but without success. She also consulted the pseudonyms in Hazell, but ‘Penelope’ is not there!

March 8. 1894

John Lane, Esq.

My dear Sir,

I herewith return you the MS of The Great God Pan, and The Inmost Light.

I have done my utmost to meet the suggestions of your reader, as you will see by the paper enclosed with MS, giving particulars of what I have been able to effect, and of what I have been obliged to leave undone.

Suggestions II and I, which I could not carry out are really cases of 'can't'; I have tried and failed.

The only case of 'won't' is the suggestion to cut out the 1st chapter 'The Experiment' and with it the motive, from The Great God Pan. The 'credibility', the whole effect of the story rest on this. If I were writing in the Middle Ages I should need no scientific basis for the reason that in those days the supernatural per se was entirely credible. In these days the supernatural per se is entirely incredible; to believe, we must link our wonders to some scientific or pseudo-scientific fact, or basis, or method. Thus we do not believe in 'ghosts', but in telepathy, not in 'witchcraft', but in hypnotism. If Mr Stevenson had written his great masterpiece about 1590-1650, Dr Jekyll would have made a compact with the devil; in 1886 Dr Jekyll sends to the Bond Street chemists for some rare drugs.

I trouble you with all this explanation in order that you may see that my refusal to make this demanded change is not a case of common author's irritability, but a question of principle and artistic method.

I remain Yours faithfully,

Arthur Machen

John Lane, Esq.

Dear Mr Lane,

We are leaving town on Friday next. I suppose the in s of The Great God Pan is all right; I wrote to your firm in the sense you indicated.

May I ask you if in the re-arrangement of your business you are likely to have any vacancy in the editorial department? I should very much like to undertake editorial work, of which I have had a good deal of experience.

I remain Yours sincerely,

Dear Sir Paul England,

Thank you very much for your letter of appreciation. The instrument of language is such a delicate thing and is so usually ignored that a man who tries to use it to some purpose has in a general way to be content with his own applause, even if he can get that. It is a pleasure therefore to be assured from outside that something a little curious has been done. I always compare literature to Alchemy; the gold, the ideal book, is never found, but on the way one sometimes discovers rarities.

I should be very glad to see you; we are at home (nearly) every afternoon but would you come on Monday or Tuesday at 4? Let me have a line to say which day would suit you. You need have no scruples as to taking my time; a good talk is never an interruption.

I remain

Yours very truly,

Arthur Machen

Feb. 12.1906

My dear England,

think our last letters ‘crossed’: I wrote you an answer to your last but one, addressing it to the ‘School of Expression’: I hope you got it. I am glad you have come into your Johnson; it has always been a great favourite of mine. But, like Johnson, I have always been much fond of the Biographical side of literature: I had much rather read gossip about Pope than his verses: And there is something enchanting to me about the black darkness and barbarism that overshadowed the eighteenth century. Think of the life of an obscure man of letters in London over 1725-1750: There is something almost mystic in its dread obscurity and peril and ‘unknown-ness’; coupled as these qualities are with the utter spiritual obscurity that had settled on most minds at that time. Read even Smollett (a very clever fellow) on Gothic Architecture apud Humphry Clinker— ’tis a curious feast to the philosophic mind. I love in Johnson to come across the scrappy references to unknown poets — Hamilton of Bangour, for instance — of whom I want to learn no more, certainly not to read their poems — calf 12mo probably.

There is no news of any interest over here that I am aware of. The ‘Dream’ is coming off in a month or so; and is to be succeeded by ‘Measure for Measure’. Some anonymous humorist sent Stuart a bundle of blue pencils! We hear rumours that Garnet is returning with you; is there any truth in these? Leslie Faber is going to read Omar Khayyam!, to the accompaniment of a string quartet. Xtopher played over some of the music he has written for this festival: it struck me as beastly; and I believe I do not differ from Xtopher in this opinion. But what a horrible idea altogether. Leslie, I believe, says that he is to have a theatre of his own in two years time. I have been amusing myself lately by going to the British Mjuseum where I make researches into the origin of the Holy Grail Legend to gratify a curiosity excited by Waite’s ingenious but (I think) mistaken theory on the subject. He is inclined to believe the Legend the cryptic manifesto of the ‘Interior Church’; he would love to connect it with Cabalism, the Templars, the Albigenses. Now I am always telling him that nothing good ever comes out of heresy, but he won’t believe me. There is one circumstance that puzzles me; I wonder whether you can throw any light on it: the early Celtic writers make the epithet ‘glassy’ = holy or blessed or ‘magic’. Glastonbury is ynys written = the glassy isle: a certain book belonging to St Columba is liber vitreus: the monastic house on Bardsey Island is Ty gwitrin = the glass house, and Merlin in one legend vanishes in a glass boat. What is the idea, I wonder? Is it the shining brightness of glass, or its greenish (fairy?) colour, or what? On the general question of the Grail, I am happy to say that I do not think it will be possible to come to any cut or dried conclusion. Nutt and the folklorists have done their worst with it in the worst spirit, but it has eluded them. And I believe our Neo-Buddhists have spoken too!

Were you not amused with our general election? There is going to be fun in the House; not at first, perhaps, but later. As for the clergy and the schools, I cannot pity them. They have had the chance of teaching the Faith — instead of which they have taught Moses in the Lion’s den, Daniel in the Bullrushes, and (to the advanced) the one assurements of the Temple and the kings of Israel and Judah!

If you have not read ‘The Light Invisible’ by Robert Benson: do so quickly — liber vere mysticus.

I drink all good things to Garnet in ‘Garnet’.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear England,

We were very much grieved to hear from Williams this morning that you have got an attack of appendicitis. W. tells us that yesterday's news was good, and that you will escape an operation; so I hope that they will let you out of hospital before long. But one has so many troubles that it is a little hard to be bothered with the body. I have such excellent health myself, that I am sure I should regard appendicitis as a great impertinence.

I don't know that our news is much. We are so constantly occupied in wondering where next week's income is to come from, that ennui is perpetually banished. I had an interview the other day with old Brammall, the manager of the Britannia, Hoxton. He told me with an air of triumph, that he only got his pantomime past the censor on the day that it was produced. He seemed to think this a notable achievement: it made my liver glow with difficult bile (Horace) as saw a long perspective of similar follies, leading, I should think, to a tour round Hanwell, Colney Hatch, Bethlehem, Earlswood and Broadmoor.

Did you hear the last of the Belle Kennedy? It is just creeping into the papers. Last Wednesday she called at the D.M. Daily Mail office, and sent up a note to the Editor to the intent that she was at that moment poisoning herself in the waiting-room. The editor rushed down and found that she had done it — à la Mantaline. She is now doing well in hospital. The odd thing is that all this tale got into the American press, and was kept out of the English papers, till this morning.

We are anxious to learn news of Frank. You know, I think, that his neglect of his teeth brought him into a sad state of sickness — milk for ten days — and now I believe he is going to stay with the aunts at Milford and then with the Warners at Harrow. We have just signed the lease of our new flat, and Tom the Cat has been solemnly written into the Deed, so that 'other animal' is legally defined as 'not including a cat'. This is very gratifying.

Other items: a gentleman named Klingender wrote to me to say that he was going to commence publishing and to resurrect ‘Hieroglyphics’: what would I like to write for him? I told him what I would write, and he told me what he would pay — and on that we parted company. His nature was profoundly Klingenderish.

I have been asked to write for the English Review now under the editorship of Austin Harrison (dramatic critic of the D. Mail, and literary editor of the Observer). I get so many liberal offers that I can hardly believe that my boots are in holes. We were down at Warburton’s the other Sunday. He told me that he was playing the Bull in the ‘Blue Bird’, and shortly after, that one of his lines was, ‘You have now exactly 1395 seconds before you in which to choose.’ This struck me as most inconsistent in a Bull; and it turned out that he doubled Time with the Bull.

Well, I hope that you may soon obtain a good deliverance out of hospital and out of the pains of appendicitis.

With all our best wishes

Yours,

Arthur Machen

June20.1910

My dear England,

Many thanks for your letter; I hope you are making great strides towards a perfect recovery.

know Exmouth, that is, I know it as a ‘Blue Myth’ knows it. I have been there twice with Garnet Holme and Billy. The first time, I remember, there were great revelries on a place ‘the island’; the second time it rained furiously and we had to play in a hall. We were followed by no less a person than Courtice Pounds! Going to Exmouth as a ‘myth’ I have but vague impressions of the place; it struck me, I think, as a charming and delightful country, but lacking in that touch of wonder and mystery which the Welsh country seems to possess. But this may be the mere prejudice of a Welshman; or if not prejudice, that odd link between the man and his native soil, which certainly exists in some cases.

I think there are reasons why vagrant actors should be better than other people in that they are earning their living by doing work which they like. So few people are able to unite work and liking. So it is that very few actors are accidiosi; they are free, at all events, from that weary and lethargic boredom which — according to Dante — is a sure passport to hell. But when actors get on well, and get a ‘London engagement’, I am afraid that they become, very often, ordinary world’s people, declining into a sad state of pomposity and respectability, which is dismal to witness.

The Academy case gave me one of the most amusing days that I have ever spent. Of course the case should never have been brought into court at all; if I had been on the paper when Horton wrote his famous letter to the Daily News, I would have taken the skin off his back in the next week’s issue, under some such heading as ‘O Thou False Tongue’.

Still, it was great fun: to see how Carson set out to bully and found himself the bullied was as entertaining as can be, and the obiter dicta of Darling, J. were excellent. Darling, by the way, in his summing up made a much better speech for the Academy than that made by their own counsel, the amiable and feeble Cecil. Of course, a good many of the quips were spoilt in the reporting.

Thus:

The Judge: Now Mr Machen, what would you say of John Knox?

Mr M: My lord, I am quite unable to say what I think of John Knox — in this place! This was quite mangled.

As for the Academy article; it was atrocious in taste and unspeakably silly in argument; its offence was worse than anything of Dr Horton’s. But I do not regard Crosland as a responsible human being. Douglas ought to know better.

I would not call Barnaby Rudge tedious. It has such excellent things: The Maypole, Dennis, Tappertit, Miggs, Chester, the locksmith, and those scenes in Newgate. Dicken’s hatred of Protestantism is, as you say, very singular. It was quite unreasoning, I should think, and may represent a Catholic tradition and sentiment in their last stages. Ruskin, I believe, said of D. that he had the same sort of love for old churches and buildings as has a jackdaw! And this, I should suppose, was a judgement pretty near the mark.

I am going to the Pageant tomorrow for the Evening News. I do not dislike this sort of work, though I do not like it. The mischief is that there is not nearly enough of it! I am not at all good at smelling out what is going to happen and then ‘suggesting a story’.

I would advise the old mixture of a little gin with that lime juice. Gin does a world of good in the sick room.

Williams was around the other night: Pigeon I have not seen.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Monday

My dear England,

‘Helen’ is not very interesting.

Ruskin is utterly wrong about architecture, because architecture is the art of building, not of providing spaces for ornament and sculpture. To judge of a cathedral, I would say one should stand half-a-mile away. Its art is seen in its great proportions, in the relations of choir to nave, both to transepts, these to spire or tower, all to pitch of roof. Judge it as you would a mountain seen from afar, judge it with regard to its bases and foundations and its high peaks. Afterwards, you may view the ornaments and sculptures, as you may esteem flowers and grasses and mosses on the mountain side.

Wretched old fool! He reminds me of ‘John Halifax’ and ‘The Three Musketeers’. I used to ask myself why I had not read those books. Finally, I found them both in theatrical lodgings — and read them. I perceived how right I had been in neglecting them.

See the enclosed. How true it is that a filthy tongue is the index and prophet of a filthy people. The nation that is capable of the beastly word that I have marked, is easily capable of the beastly action in question; I’d ‘blasser’ them.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Sunday

My dear England,

The poet who loved a gross, gay tale was Tennyson. He did not demand wit; but that quality which is called Rabelaisian. I do think that there is genius in the fabric of ‘Charles Auch’, but there is folly also to an extent almost miraculous. The author’s father was a John’s man, and yet she could speak of Cambridge as ‘an academe celestial’!

quite agree with you as to Crabbe, speaking from a very slight acquaintance. He was a luminous man, though his light fell on mean places. I was brought up on Sala’s ‘Twice Round the Clock’, and re-reading after 35 years or so, was astonished to find how good it still tasted. Of course there are terrible phrases. ‘Piscatorial Bourse’, I think, for Billingsgate, a terrible fount of speech from which the dialect once called ‘Telegraphese’ flowed; but there was a real core in Sala. He was not a Roman in those days, and in fact, I believe, only became a Roman in articulo or pretty near it. He was received by Cardinal Vaughan. ‘Silence’ I have not read; ‘Transformation’ I looked into and disliked when I was a boy; but ‘The Scarlet Letter’: there, in the idiom of that great and friendly people, you have the goods!

Did you see that I have been down to Torquay to watch ‘the pictures’ being made? I enjoyed myself enormously; I do not know which I liked more; the pine trees in the sunlight on the cliff, looking Italy, or the company of the actors and the ‘shop’ of the stage. Canis Reversus; and I came back to the office feeling homesick. We had a lot of sailing and rowing to do, and when a picture was about to be taken the leading man suddenly said he was very sick, and would have to go ashore. Whereupon the management angrily declared that nothing could be done without ‘loyal co-operation’. But how can you rescue a drowning woman, if you are in the pangs of sea sickness? It would not look well.

Drink your absinthe as long as you can at Brighton; London is accursed.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Wednesday

My dear England,

Many thanks for your letter. The ‘Fragments of Life’ certainly cost me the most horrible pains, after the first chapter. I do not know how I ever got it finished. There is a version with a false ending in Horlick’s Magazine. I remember one oddity which accompanied the writing of the latter portion: my feet felt cold as ice, with a kind of non-natural chill. Which, indeed, I perceived to be the case; for, writing in the kitchen in Cosway Street, I opened the gas oven and lit the gas, proposing to put my feet inside! But on taking off my stockings, I found that by the test of feeling with my hands, the feet were not cold at all. This was very odd; it did not seem to me to promise a blessing on the work.

As for the ‘Chronicle’: the stories, qua stories are — really, Mrs Todgers — so very, very bad. But I began the book when I was 22 1/2and ended it when I was 23 1/2.

On Whitsunday morning I was rolling to St Clement Danes Church, on my way to the North Gallery. I will be with you next Saturday at 1.30.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear England,

I think that Moore can write very beautiful and delicate English: he is undoubtedly ingeniosus. But the nebulo is continually spoiling the ingenious one's work, reminding him that fleecy clouds are exactly like the lace on ladies' underclothing; that, owing to the hopeless degradation and vulgarization of the English tongue, the literature of the future must be written in Welsh and Irish; that Anne Brontë was the genius of the family: reminding him, in fine, of a thousand imbecilities. His early second-rate Zola was quite good in its way: 'The Mummer's Wife' is, no doubt, almost a photograph of some particular Cloches de Comeville company. I cordially agree with 'Mummer Worship'. I like actors very much indeed: when they are content to be actors. I judge from that amazing Garvin notice, that G. is trying to do his very best for a man he likes, who has written a bad book.

Did you see the 'advance' note about Sylvia's new poem in last Sunday's Observer? A good send off.

Tell Marques to buy his 5,8 and dark liver — quite enough to begin with.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

You were saying that I once saw a good deal of Moore: that was as the Evening News interviewer.

Grant Richards, Esq.

Dear Mr Richards,

Thanks very much for your kind letter of the 20th inst.

Now as to your criticism of Phantasmagoria: I can only say that very possibly you are right, but I hope not! The MS is ‘going the rounds’, and I daresay will not find a publisher, or certainly, not for some time. The Pan was written at the beginning of’91, and was published at the end of ‘94! Looking as clearly as I can at this present book, I think there are undoubtedly many and grievous faults in it, but I believe that as a whole it is on a higher level than the former novels, that there are things in it which beat anything I have done (see the comedy of The Critic!).

You object to the environment of the beginning; but it is the environment which largely shapes the character: it is these bacilli of the village which are largely responsible for the pathological condition of the patient.

The episode you mention is undoubtedly morbid, but it is meant to be morbid, and is, I think, good art. Good policy I am sure, with you, it is not, and I was not in the least surprised when you declined the MS. I should have been much surprised, though very glad, if you had accepted it. You will remember that almost my first remark was that you would probably find it ‘impossible’.

I wish you would come and see us here. We are at home nearly every day from 4 p m. We shall be away for a week from next Monday, but after that you will always find us.

Martin Seeker, Esq.

Dear Mr Secker,

I am sorry, but as I told you, The Secret Glory, if published at all, will have to fetch that £100 minimum.

But I am not in a hurry! The Hill of Dreams was written in 1897, published in 1907.

Please accept my best wishes for a prosperous beginning of your publishing career.

Yours very truly,

Arthur Machen

P. S. I have always been of the opinion that my books have not been properly handled. They should not be put on the market as ordinary 6/- novels, but rather in the style adopted — I think — for Marius the Epicurean: blue boards, white backs and a price like 10/6 net.

Dear Mr Seeker,

I should be very glad for you to publish The Secret Glory on these terms: £100 in advance of 25% royalty; this £100 to be paid now, on delivery of the manuscript.

The copyright to be leased to you for a period of seven years.

American rights on usual terms.

I will write to Savage; the proprietor of The Gypsy on hearing from you. I gave Savage the story for his quarterly; but as the August number is not yet announced, I hardly think that The Gypsy need be considered.

From a letter to an American correspondent:

5 May 1924

As to Starrett, I am sorry, but I am having nothing to do with him. He has turned pirate; both The Shining Pyramid and The Glorious Mystery are impudent piracies done without my knowledge, approval or consent. I passed over the former of the two offences because Starrett had done a lot for me, but the second crime has tipped up the scales. These affairs are causing me very serious embarrassment in your country. My publisher in New York blames me for not refusing the cheque for The Shining Pyramid. I laughed and told him that was an impossibility. I could not refuse the cheque since there was no cheque, and never has been a cheque. If those two books had been brought out by a smart bookseller under the Black Flag, I should have accepted the fact as perfectly natural. But I fail to understand the sort of friend who picks your pocket as he tells you what a fine fellow you are.

Dear Mr Carter,

Very good: I await communication from Elkin Mathews, and will discuss the matter with him.

There are morsels of this quarter, once so delicious, still left. But peculiarly evil flats are rising on every side, and will no doubt continue to rise, till there is nothing left of the old grace of St John’s Wood. And where an old house and garden still remain the owners in most cases lop their trees into revolting forms, suggestive of gout!

This is a very bad age in most things, and amongst its evils I reckon the ‘garden cities’ as the worst.

Yours sincerely,

My dear Savage,

Your letter came on the very Christmas morning: many thanks for your old-fashioned and good wishes. Blwddyn newydd dda y chwi - which is to say, a Happy New Year to you.

Indeed; may it be better than the last.’27 has been to us a year of sorrows and fears. Poor Hudleston is dead — a few days after you left England. He had a tremendous liking for you. We miss him most bitterly. I have written a brief biographical note as an Introduction to the English edition of his new book: Gentleman Johnny Burgoyne.

Our new house is a minor grief. It is much larger and more ‘convenient’ in every way than the old; and we loathe it, since it has no mystery in it.

Let your American friend send his book to: Victor Gollancz, 14 Henrietta Street, W.C.2.

envy you both away down there: beyond the rates and taxes. Here, as it seems to me, there is nothing but trouble.

Remember me to Flanagan.

With all good wishes.

My dear Savage,

Thank you so much for the Broadway House introduction. I have been waiting to write to you till the matter was concluded, and it is now settled; that I shall do them a treatise to be called ‘Sabazius’ — the name of the mystic Bacchus. Of course it will be nothing; I have been dead for some time, but I cannot afford to say so. You are alive, and I hope you get on tremendously with your novel.

No news, I think. The usual few at Henekeys on Jan. 7; the usual vain attempts to convince Gow that the ghost neither walks nor talks: Garland calm, watching the case on behalf of the Holy Father. I forget whether I told you that owing to the changes at the Princess Royal, we have moved down the road to the Duke of York, where the landlord has got in our customary drinks and does his best to oblige.

hope Flanagan is all right now.

I have been doing one or two articles for the cheerful and engaging Hayter Preston, of the Referee.

Arthur Machen

April 25.1928

My dear Savage,

We have been away, recovering from a minor influenza, for the last fortnight. I am writing this day to Gollancz, injecting a hint.

I am sorry, indeed, that you have no better news to report. I had a saddish note a few weeks ago from old Waite. I wrote back, miserable enough myself, to the effect that it seemed rather hard; that I thought each of us, in his own way, had tried to do his best for a good many years, that we deserved a happier ending, and so forth. Let me include you in our little list.

As for Caradoc: I passed on your notion, as I told you; but I did not hope for any good result. I have not heard from him for about 4 months.

Yet in spite of all, as I ended to old Waite: ‘Yet His Name is the Merciful, the Compassionate.’

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Dear Mr Wilson,

In the first place, please let me say that I thoroughly appreciate the position with respect to the Lectures.

As to the question, whether Philosophy can be of any service to workingmen, I think a ruling which covers this question was given on Saturday, July 30th, 1763, by that Chief Justice of Human Intelligence, Samuel Johnson. Johnson and Boswell had taken oars at the Temple Stairs for Greenwich. The question arose whether a knowledge of Greek and Latin was an essential requisite to a good education. Johnson said, ‘Most certainly’, adding that it was wonderful what a difference learning made even in the common intercourse of life. Boswell said that many people got through the common business of life very well, without any learning.

‘Johnson “Why, Sir, that may be true in cases where learning cannot possibly be of any use; for instance, this boy rows us as well without learning, as if he could sing the song of Orpheus to the Argonauts, who were the first sailors.” He then called to the boy, “What would you give, my lad, to know about the Argonauts?”

“Sir” (said the boy) “I would give what I have!” Johnson was very much pleased with his answer, and we gave him double fare.’

And the Doctor added that any man of uncorrupted mind would give what he had for knowledge.

This I take it, is the theoretical truth of the matter. In practice, there must be limitations. For instance, it would be a good thing — in theory — if a Durham miner were able to read Omar Khayyam in Persian and the Mabinogion in Welsh; but in practice he has no time for the studies involved. There is one study, I think, in which every one who has anything to do with the things should engage; and that is Logic, Scholastic Logic. By far the best manual is Elements of Logic by Richard Whately. I would have every man in your class go through this book: I think it of the very first consequence.

With all good wishes
Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Mr Morrissey,

Pray accept my most grateful thanks for your thesis. Naturally, I have read it with great interest, since every man is interested in his own works & days. And —— so far as a man can be a judge in his own cause — it strikes me as fair & judicious. You are quite right, for example, about the ending of ‘The Terror’: it is muddled and bad. It would have been much better to leave the mystery without explanation. And, as you say, I am no novelist. I do not like to see ‘The Hill of Dreams’ and ‘The Secret Glory’ discussed as novels. They are, or they are meant to be, Romances: tales of adventure of the spirit.

By the way: ‘Clemendy’ derives in no way from the ‘Mabinogion’.

I am afraid that the publication of your admirable thesis would not be a profitable adventure. Seven or eight years ago; I think there might have been money in it; but not now. Your country men ‘discovered’ me at that date or a little earlier; but since then they have firmly replaced the earth on my remains, and trodden it down hard. I judge by the Royalties my American publisher sends me. Over here nobody knows any thing about me. Still, I have found, on the whole, a very great deal of enjoyment in the writing of books.

If you can be troubled, I wish you would send a few photographs of Nashville and Vanderbilt University. And — here is a point of local learning — is there any old English origin discoverable for the Tennessee mountain idiom ‘we uns’ and ‘you uns’? It often happens that what we call Americanisms turn out to be ancient English words and phrases, long forgotten in England.

With renewed thanks for your most valued present

Dear Mr Morrissey,

In the first place, please accept my apologies for this long delay. Extenuating circumstances are; poor health, old age, and idleness.

No, I am not contemplating a new book. To the best of my (sorrowful) belief, I have said my say. It is a pity, since I always found writing a book made an excellent burrow: it keeps one warm.

If you had your thesis on hand, say, nine or ten years ago, I would advise publication. But now, to use an inelegant English idiom, I am ‘dead mutton’ in your country — and in mine. But I have had very good sport in literature. It was the whimsicality inherent in the constitution of the universe that arranged for ‘The Bowmen’ — not exactly a masterpiece — to be my one popular success.

I see you complain of the torrid summer of 1930. Here, it rained every day from July 15 to August 25. Then, for a week, the thermometer went up to 89°, 90°, 92°, 94°. And then it rained, roughly speaking, for the rest of the year. Now, we are having fine, sunny mornings and night frosts. You, I suppose, are beginning to feel the warmth of spring.

I hope the antique shop is turning out well.

With all good wishes

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr Owlett,

Please give Lady Watson my warmest thanks, and tell her that I should be proud indeed to possess the MS of one of his lyrics.

It is dreadful to think that a great English poet should be brought in his old age to such a pass; but this is the age of Greta Garbo and all guttersnipes: not of Poets.

It has been for some time my impression that we are entering on a period of barbarism quite as destructive of God and all goodness as that which followed the ruin of the Roman Empire.

Jan. 29.’31

Dear Mr Owlett,

I hope my delay in writing may have caused no inconvenience. I am sorry to say I mislaid your address.

To summarize our conversation of last Saturday: I think we agreed that the best way lies between two extremes. To invest the money and dole out miserable quarterly sums by way of relieving a man who may not live to receive more than two instalments is, clearly, out of court. It is a scheme which would only occur to a barbarian — or a man of business. On the other hand, I gathered from you that there were objections against handing over the entire sum forthwith. The middle course suggested was, I think, to pay out, say, £50 or £60 a month for the next six months.

Of course, should any special need or emergency arise, the Committee would have a free hand to meet it. Suppose, for example, that the doctors thought that a stay in Madeira — or anywhere — was advisable: then the Committee should make a special grant forthwith.

That, I believe, was the general trend of our discussion.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

My dear Jepson,

Thanks very much for No. 19. I am saying a word in season about it in the Nation. I have not pointed out that Marks is not a Welsh name, since I know that you harbour an obstinate superstitition on this point.

Scene: Fotheringay Castle Queen Elizabeth: I will give my virrrgin body to a mann —

Stage Manager: Gaze at Leicester on that line: he's the man you mean, you know.

Queen Elizabeth: Maikes it seem a bit warm, don't it? — and begett a race of (confidentially) kings etc etc.

But I have grave fears that on his noble piece the curtain will never rise. The management is a compound of bad record and present imbecility that is in itself a rich entertainment. I would not have it altered, but I am afraid that it is not good for business.

I once met a Colonel years ago. He was Colonel Trotter, I think of the 93rd. His manner was highly offensive and his wife was Evangelical. I trust that both have now come safe to Purgatory fire.

Every night and all as the old Lyke-Wake Dirge says; and that the gross, leaden, and peccant parts of Colonel Trotter (of the 93rd) and of his wife are now being refined away in the Immortal Athanor.

I know nothing of Astrology. I understand that it involves mathematical calculation; therefore I knew that it was not for me. As to my sign: I once heard the Young Man in Spectacles and a person known as Sephariel discussing in my presence whether I was under Libra or Aries: I do not know. Such of their arguments as I understood, struck me as childish and nonsensical in the extremist degree.

I think it quite well that Keep is gone to his own place, both phenomenally and noumenally. Mahatmas have (practically) ceased; but mediums abide for ever…

With kindest regards to you both,

My dear Jepson,

I am sorry to say that my memory for dates is so scandalous that I doubt whether I can supply the required date.

However, I know when I was born — March 3rd, 1863. I was married to A.H. in 1887; she died in 1899. I married D. P. H. on June 25th, 1903. I fear that this is not precise enough, but I can do no better.

I suppose you are on the point of going out of town. We leave on Tuesday for three weeks; two in Pembrokeshire and one near Esher.

I wish you had a few more editorships at £10 a week to hand on. At the present, affairs are in such a state that the mere English stoicism, however imaginary, is too weak for the occasion. I can only say… that the other day I read in the paper that some costermongers can make £1 a day in good times and rarely fall below 10/- a day in bad!

What price sour milk?

England will never be Merry England more till we return to the Catholic Faith, Beef Steaks (with an Onion, if you will), and the Strongest Ale: this last to be consumed in enormous quantities.

September 15 th 1933

My dear Mr Ireland,

I have wondered, now and again, whether I should issue another summons; but I concluded, to use your own phrase, that life was complex; that you had your reasons for silence.

But, let us try anew. Next Tuesday is Amersham Fair; an ancient, noisy, and gaudy business, stretching the whole length of this old street — which has altered little in the last hundred years. Will you come down and look at it, and listen to it? If so, we should be very glad to see you between 6 & 7. There will be a sandwich and a glass of punch. If you come, remember that this house is in the Old Town at the bottom of the hill. Over the door, is the inscription, LYNWOOD, and it is best to knock, not ring.

It is, indeed, hard to deal with the mysteries. Hard, as you and I know, to express them in art; hard even to speak of them. It was St Paul, I think, who heard things which it was not lawful to utter. And, it is to be remembered, that only a hair's breadth divides the mysteries from the blasphemies. That may be seen only too clearly in the pitiable obscenities of A Glastonbury Romance. And there is the other confusion: I have known Spiritualists to be styled mystics — wherein they are most vilely miscalled. I have seen a good deal of them in my day, and also of people of a somewhat higher order, who would call themselves occultists; but they are all in utter darkness.

I hope you will come on Tuesday. But if you are for quiet; then we will choose another day.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

September 17th 1941

Dear Dr Ireland,

In the first place: let me congratulate you cordially on being for the present hard at work, and on being stuffed with ideas for the future. What better fortune can a creative artist desire? Even a good and great drink at a happy hour in the right place and in fit company is not so choice a gift as this. I shall await December 29th with most pleasurable anticipation.

To your questions: there is a uniform edition of my books, called the ‘Caerleon’ Edition, nine volumes of it. I should think it might be had cheaply enough, since it was ‘remaindered’ years ago. As to separate vols: if these are out of print in the Adelphi edition, I believe they are all right in the original 7/6 editions. Anyhow; why not try for second hand copies at Foyles’, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

As to the man whom you wish to dose with the Silurian Mysteries; I think your plan is right: 1. Far Off Things 2. Things Near and Far 3. London Adventure 4. H*ill of Dreams.* The notion is to interest the desired reader in the author, in the concrete; before you lead him to the author’s imagined world. I should always recommend a reading of Mrs Gaskell’s Life of Charlotte Bronte as a preface to the works of Charlotte Bronte.

All my thanks for your most benevolent and active interest in my books.

Write again soon

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear Dr Ireland,

Many thanks for the Rameau. I am reading it with pleasure, though an ignoramus in the great art of music. The Fellows of All Souls at Oxford were formerly required to be mediocriter musice docti, to have a moderate skill in music. My standard is very much lower.

Could you get down here on Saturday, June 8th? Beat on our knocker at Noon; and we will go down to the King’s Arms and try and get something to eat and drink. We have lived into evil days on both counts.

Dear Mr Millar,

In reply to your question: there is no biography of me, recent or otherwise. The true story in the Western Mail cutting derives ultimately from an extinct paper, The Outlook, in which it was inserted by a friend of mine many years ago.

Fytton Armstrong (otherwise John Gawsworth) wrote a life of me, which, for one reason or another, failed to please the publishers.

Thank you for the article on Caradoc; I agree with you that it is temperate and judicious. Caradoc was always a bit of a farceur, inclined to caricature. But I am very far from saying that his violent attack is void of foundation.

I should be very much honoured by an honorary degree from the University of Wales. But — a delicate point — I am a man of very narrow means, and I do not think I should be justified in spending my guineas on the cap, gown and hood of the degree.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

April 19.1937

Dear Mr Millar,

I am delighted to hear that you are now for all practical purposes fit, well and recovered. As you say, the mere slip of the foot kills the Australian; while you happily survive a mountain whirlwind.

It is extremely kind of you and Mrs Collins to busy yourselves in this matter of the degree; but let me beg of you not to bother and worry yourselves. Don't give the affair more trouble than it deserves.

Here is my sketchy pedigree. My aunt Maria (daughter of Daniel II) just remembered the Old Red Priest, and used to say I was very much like him; especially in a big voice, and a trick of bellowing!

If I were in Australia; it would come upon me to arise, as the Highland song says, and get me back to Henllys!

don't remember receiving any letters from Monmouthshire folk about my work; with the notable exception of the late Major Addams Williams, Llangibby.

Note: it was The Great God Pan, not The Hill of Dreams that was translated into French: by the late P. J. Toulet, a literary man of some distinction.

I think (I do not know) that The Bowmen sold about 80,000 copies. The 2nd edition had several additional tales, & new matter in the Preface: this, I believe, was reprinted till the demand was exhausted.

You have my full authority to make enquiries of the American publishers. I am very misty about these details of editions and so forth. With our best regards to Mrs Millar and yourself.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Mr Millar,

Many thanks for your kind letter and good wishes. Pray receive in return our wishes; to you, your wife, and your family for all good fortune and happiness in 1938.

I am sorry to say that poor Waite is not yet himself again. He gets up for a short time every day; but is advised to keep as quiet as possible. When we get into the seventies, injuries do not heal readily; and I think he must be 78.

We are having but sorry weather here, and I suppose it is not much better at Newport. I have a vivid recollection of January 18th, 1881, when there began a snowstorm that went on for 36 hours.

Pray commend us to our Newport friends: Mr Collins, Mr Fletcher, Mr Hando.

I remain Yours sincerely,

Dec. 21.’43

Dear Mr Millar,

In the first place; let me wish you and Mrs Millar and all your house a very happy Christmas. Will your sons be at home? I hope they are well.

I think you are all a little harsh to the B.B.C. people responsible for ‘The Shining Land’.

Don Quixote is one of the greatest books in the world: but Don Quixote without Sancho Panza would be nothing or next to nothing. And Sancho was a very gross, illiterate, guzzling, swilling and knavish fellow. Compliment poor Davies & myself by calling us a composite Don Quixote: then, that Monmouthshire poacher, who called as a witness ‘my sister Blodwen’s eldest daughter’s young man’ may take Sancho’s place.

Look at it that way.

Next year, if we live, may we keep Christmas with open lights.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen — Leolinus Siluriensis

July 3.’39

Dear Mr Michael,

That cautionary, ‘if I can’, of mine was lucky. I don’t know anything about my own bibliography in any exact sense.

But here are one or two things I think I can correct in the enclosed:

A was the ‘Fragment of Life’ (and ‘The White People’) published as a separate book in 1906? If so,. I have forgotten. Both tales are included in the collection: The House of Souls.

B ‘Confessions of a Literary Man’. This, with a very few very minor alterations, was published under the title of Far Off Things.

C ‘The Way to Attain’. A few sheets of my complete translation of Le Moyen de Parvenir were printed. Danielson, I believe, had a few sets. The grossness of Béroalde, Canon of Tours (1610) sickened the printers. I rewrote, cut out here, added there; and the result was Fantastic Tales.

But if you want to resolve questions of Machen Bibliography, go to the Doctor of that Science, John Gawsworth, 33 Great James Street, London, WC1. If he is not too busy, I am sure he will help you.

I am likely to be more useful over literary questions:

‘What did you mean precisely by that?’

‘What is the allusion in this?’

And, largely in mere irrelevance, for example; that photograph was taken at Perth, in 1907, when I was playing Sir Daniel Ridgeley in Pinero’s, ‘His House in Order’.

And again: the Review that gratified me extremely. It was in the old Westminster: I forget what book of mine was under notice, but the reviewer said: ‘Mr Machen, whom some may remember as an impressive actor,’ etc., etc.

I have to break off. I have got your MS list of Additional Titles, and will refer to them when I answer your next letter.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

High St., Old Amersham, Bucks.

July 23.'39

Dear Mr Michael,

I have annotated the List to the best of my ability. As to The House of Souls: this was an 'Omnibus'. It contains: 'A Fragment of Life', 'The White People', 'The Great God Pan', 'The Inmost Light', 'The Three Impostors', 'The Red Hand'.

And as to the stage:

Joined F. R. Benson in 1901 — about a fortnight before the death of Queen Victoria.

Left Benson in June 1901. Was engaged by George Alexander to play a small part in Paolo & Francesca. In the meantime: Played in Pastorals run by Harcourt Williams and Garnet Holme: the company almost wholly Bensonians. This for 1 — weeks.

Played then Comic Irishman in music-hall sketch called The Just Punishment, at the 'Hoxton Varieties' and another East End Hall, called, I think, the 'Cambridge'. This for a fortnight.

Then in The Silent Vengeance, a melodrama written by Harry Grattan of the Gaiety, run by Charles Terry, a brother of Ellen. This for 6 weeks, on tour.

Then in The Varsity Belle, a farcical comedy run by a Mr Parrington. This for 6 — weeks, on tour.

Then in an old comedy tour in the West, run by Garnet Holme and a Mr Frost, a business manager for Forbes Robertson and others. This for a fortnight: at the end of which I began rehearsing Paolo & Francesca at the St James's Theatre.

Such was my first year on the stage. An outline of later years may follow in a short while.

All my books have appeared in book-form.

Salutations to Mynydd Maen & Twyn Barlwm.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Oct. 13.’39

Dear Mr Michael,

I hope, anyhow, that you and your wife enjoyed your holiday, in spite of the shadows on it, and the troublesome ending. We are in dark days; but the odd thing is that everybody says it is a fine season for books. The theory is that, it being disagreeable and dangerous to go abroad, people are sitting at home and reading hard.

You addressed Armstrong quite correctly. I am sending on one of your Lists to him, by way of reminder, with your address in case he has mislaid it. He really is a busy and distracted man. He edits some ‘Digest’ or other, and has to glance through One Thousand Books and Papers in One Thousand Minutes every month.

Now to our queries.

A Few Letters were privately printed in Cleveland, Ohio, U.S.A. — I think for some club there.

The Glorious Mystery — a collection of odds and ends of articles and stories, made in America.

Tom O’Bedlam — an essay on the old song, printed in America. I have never seen a copy. The slump of’30,’31 came down on the U.S.A. and the man who commissioned the essay. It was printed, I believe, but nobody sent me a copy.

La Grande Trouvaille was issued by the Ingenious Mr Searle — somewhere about the same date as Collector’s Craft. I am inclined to think there was a third leaflet from the same source; but my memory of these transitory things is at its vaguest.

Stage Calendar Spring — Summer, 1902: Paolo & Francesca at the St James’s.

Autumn 1902 - Spring 1903: If! Were King at the St James’s.

Spring 1903: Not in production of Old Heidelberg at St J’s:

Went on Tour with Alexander in that piece & in If! Were King in autumn, 1903, and played in Old Heidelberg at the St James's till spring of 1904.

April - June 1904. With F. R. Benson at Stratford-on-Avon, and in Public School Tour of an English version of Agamemnon, Libation Bearers, and Furies.

Autumn, 1904. With Tree Company on Shakespearian Tour.

Autumn, 1905. Mice and Men Tour: Smalls & Fit-ups.

Autumn, 1907. His House in Order Tour: Smalls & Fit-ups.

Spring, 1909. Farewell — to all intents and purposes — to Stage with the part of the Enchanter in Henry VI, Part II. With Benson, at The Coronet, Notting Hill Gate, and at Stratford-on-Avon. Remarkable only for this: — that Shakespeare gives the magician's part simply as: Conjuro te etc,. I wrote up 'etc', to two or three pages of res. So far as I know, I am the only actor who ever wrote his own part in Shakespeare.

It was exactly the farewell to the beloved stage that I should have chosen; especially since, as the theatrical heaven darkened & the stage thunder began to mutter and my cue got near, Lady Benson came behind me and murmured in my ear — after her wholly charming and delightful fashion — a story very remote from the business of the approaching scene.

To conclude all fitly, I sent in my bill for this final performance at Stratford thus:

To summoning Foul Fiend, Aschmoddai (Hebrew Characters); jjs.

To discharging same: jjs.

The business manager told me later that the Auditor of Accounts was a good deal puzzled.

I have told you a long tale.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

LETTERS TO COLIN SUMMERFORD. 1924-1947

12 Melina Place, London, N.W.8 Feb.

12th 1924

My dear Sir,

I am much obliged by your letter. The ‘Celtic Church and Grail’ motive in ‘The Secret Glory’ is founded on six months’ research in the British Museum. Not, I hasten to add, that I ‘read up’ the subject in order to make a book, but having read to satisfy my curiosity, the topic occurred to me a year afterwards, when I was planning ‘The Secret Glory’.

I find it difficult to give you any leading authorities; as the result was obtained from a very large number of books. I look into my old notebooks at haphazard, and see a title: ‘Early Xtian Monuments of Scotland’ (Allen and Anderson authors) and find a passage underlined about the Cathach (I think a Book of the Gospels that had belonged to St Columba). The passage underlined is: ‘it is not lawful to open it’. This was important to me as illustrating one of the distinctions between the Roman and the Celtic Churches: the Romans exhibit their relics as much as possible to excite the devotion of the faithful: the Celts kept their relics in secrecy; it was dangerous for the unqualified to look on them. You see how this bears on the Grail legend; how it is one of the many small points which tend to establish the general conclusion: the Legend of the Grail is, in one of its aspects, the Legend of the Celtic Church.

Now here is a case of a book read through for the sake of one passage; and there are many dozen cases like it.

I wish you would call on me when you are next in town. I could then shew you these old notebooks of mine. We are always in on Saturdays at nine p m.

Believe me,

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

March 13.’24

Dear Summerford,

Many thanks: I should like to see the Abbé’s book very much. I will return it to you with my notebooks and with Miss Jessie Weston’s fallacious ‘From Ritual to Romance’, when you write from your home.

I said ‘fallacious’; but we are all fallacious, more or less, in this quest: chiefly because we never know whence information may come. A certain Venerable Head appears in one of the Grail visions. That Head is no doubt from the Mabinogion story of Bran Bendigeid. But how astonishing to find in a Red Indian myth, cited by Mark Twain in his ‘Life on the Mississippi’, a Head of very similar character! So it is impossible to exclude any source; and that means that the search is hopeless. The word of the enigma may be lurking in a bound volume of ‘The Pink’Un’!

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

For the Mozarabic Rite: try Messrs Cope and Fenwick, Liturgical Publishers, London. I am afraid I have no more exact address.

Dear Summerford,

I hope 'this finds you' completely recovered. Will you let me know the dates of your stay within reach of London. I should like you to come and lunch with me at Stones in Panton Street. I will bring along the notebooks and 'From Ritual to Romance' and you might bring the Chrétientés Celtiques. Stones is far from being a good place, I am sorry to say; but it was founded in 1770, and there is a little old mahogany left.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Summerford,

Can you meet me outside Stone’s in Panton Street, next Thursday, April 3rd at noon?

Herewith is a little book which may interest you. The Welsh in it is, I am afraid, dubious. I got my friend, Caradoc Evans, to read the proofs, but I believe he knows Welsh by ear, not by letter.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Summerford,

Pray keep the notebooks and the Weston book as long as you like. I can’t see that the lady makes out any real case for the existence of a Gnostic Sect in Britain in the Xlth century. Though, oddly enough, there is a passage in the Introduction to the Grand St Graal that might be patient of such an interpretation.

I am glad you liked St Mark’s Mass. That unhappy choir! They have suffered for the last iii years from a succession of bad organists. Now they have an organist who is an artist — too much of an artist for them.

With all good wishes

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

May 12.1924

My dear Summerford,

In the first place; keep the book and the notebooks as long as you like. You will probably be having an exeat in the course of the term? If so you might bring up the books and I will lend you in exchange A. E. Waite's 'Hidden Church of the Holy Grail'.

Now, of course, your request for advice is impossible. No man can advise another; fortunately or unfortunately. But, putting this objection on one side for the moment, you do not tell me of your immediate dispositions. That is: how long are you staying at Winchester? Does your father desire that you should go to Oxford and take a degree? I need not tell you that you owe him absolute obedience up to the age of 21, and after that a very reverent consideration of his desires.

I doubt whether there is much to be said for the publishing proposition. I have seen a little of it (getting on for forty years ago) and I don't see that you could expect to get much out of it. A great deal depends, of course, on the question of means. Will you have enough to keep alive on? That is, I suppose, £200 a year. If so, you might go to a publisher and ask to be allowed to loaf about his office and do what you are told for nothing. You would soon find out whether the business appealed to you; and if your services appealed to the publisher, he would put you on the salary list. As for journalism: keep out of it. In my opinion, it is not the profession of a gentleman, and I had eleven years of it. You will see what I think of it, if you read my autobiographical book 'Things Near and Far'.

Have you any feeling for the stage? If so, I can tell you where to get a training for a moderate fee. That has been one of my many crafts and I look back on it with the fondest affection.

But at last the fatal difficulty recurs. I cannot advise you because I do not know you, and you cannot tell me for you do not know yourself!

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen
Evelyn Underhill’s book is called ‘A Column of Dust’ — not very good.

May 20. 1924

My dear Summerford,

I was very glad to get your letter of May 16: and pray write to me whenever you feel inclined.

I note what you say about your stay at Winchester. Then you need not worry for the next two years, or perhaps three. You may have to settle things then, or possibly four years after that, on leaving the University. So get all the learning you can and do not trouble about what will happen in 3 or 7 years time. A man wrote to me last year of his approaching financial troubles: ‘I do not know what will happen at the beginning of next year.’ I wrote back sending him to ‘the Book’: ‘let the beginning of next year take thought for the things of itself. And nothing in particular did happen!

I am glad you liked ‘Dog and Duck’. Did you note that the destruction of Geometry was really a strong argument for the Faith?

Yours sincerely,

July 11th 1924

Dear Summerford,

If necessary and when the time comes I will tell you how to live on £2 a week.

I am very glad to hear you are all right. You are wise to leave the future to take care of the future; let it take thought for the things of itself.

Many thanks for Miss Weston’s book, and pray do not distress yourself for one moment about the trifling patch on the binding. It doesn’t matter in the least. I don’t believe in her thesis for one moment: she has entirely failed to prove that a Gnostic sect persisted in Britain up to the Xlth century. She is beset by two opposing absurdities: the folly of the ‘fertility’ people, and the of the occultists. She talks in her book of secrets having been communicated to her, and when people talk like that, sense is over.

Pray keep the notebooks as long as you wish.

Could you come round here on August 9th (Saturday) at 9 p m.? We are always at home on Saturdays at that hour.

You speak of Glastonbury. It is a sad thing; but that holy place is possessed or obsessed by occultists of the worst type, who get messages from the ghosts of medieval monks in sham-antique English.

You will find ‘Things Near and Far’ inferior to the earlier book.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

July 25. 1924

Dear Summerford,

You need not bother to write: we are always here on Saturday evenings at 9 p m. But if some other evening be more convenient: then let me have a line two or three days beforehand.

I have just been engaged in the agreeable task of ‘going for’ Miss Weston. A series of Graal articles that I wrote in 1907 are to be reprinted, with other matter, some time early next year; and I have written an introduction to them. (Did you order a copy of ‘Precious Balms’? I believe the whole edition was subscribed before publication. Only very few copies were sent out for review.)

There was once a habit of making an antithesis between St Paul and St John, as if between intellect and intuition. This is mostly false.

I forget whether I ever drew your attention to Coventry Patmore’s Religio Poetae and ‘Rod, Root and Flower’. I am sure you would be deeply interested in both.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

You are going to Brittany? Polish up your Welsh!

1924

Dear Summerford,

I only hope you are having better weather than we are!

Of course the connection of the Dove with the Mass — or Offeren as we said in Wales — is not peculiar to Celtdom. The medieval tabernacle in England was usually in the form of a Dove suspended by chains. It is highly curious that the Roman Missal ignores the work of the Holy Spirit in the Mass. It would be interesting to enquire — if enquiry were possible — whether the Dove and Host and Stone motive in the Parzival of von Eschenbach is not a Legend or Mythos constructed on a pictorial symbol; such as is the Nigg stone.

I am happy to hear of the good results produced on a Unitarian by 'The Secret Glory'. I think I had rather be an Atheist than a Unitarian.

My new book 'The London Adventure' will be published on the 28th. It is very bad; and very sad for me. You in your day will find out the misery of failing or failed powers.

With all good wishes

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Nov. 22nd'24

Dear Summerford,

A bankrupt never feels his beggary so keenly as when he is called on for aid!

The first measure I would commend to you is to write to:

The Revd J.N. Newland Smith The Vicarage Kingskerswell Devon.

You saw him, you remember, at the door of his church, and had a word or two with him. I know that he is capable of helping you, and I am sure that he will be willing to do so. He left St Mark's last July much to our regret.

Do not believe for a moment that one must be a Celt to see God! Every race has its own way of approach, its own manner of excellence. The Celts have their peculiar advantages — and also their deep defects. You will note, in the imaginative world, how little they have actually done, achieved. The Romance Literature of Europe was, doubtless, inspired by the Celt; but written by the Anglo-Norman.

I am delighted to hear about the Unitarian: may he prosper within and without.

There is one thing I would like to impress upon you. Among those who follow the interior life, there is a tendency, latent though often undefined and unexpressed, to belittle the moral law, the chiefly negative precepts of the Decalogue. And it is true that these are to the End as the rules of Grammar are to the achievement of Shakespeare. And it is true that those who have attained rarely or never think of them. It is moreover undoubtedly true that no man can get to heaven by not stealing, by not committing adultery. But, on the other hand, none of these is to be disobeyed with impunity, for one moment.

I think the case is this. The Decalogue is intus et foris scriptus. For the majority it preserves the decencies and moralities of the social order. For those of a more interior order; it is the condition, though not the cause, of their light. Covet your neighbour's ox; and that light will begin to grow dim.

You have all my prayers and good wishes

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

You may mention my name of course to Newland Smith.

March 24th 1925

Dear Summerford,

Could you look in here on Monday, April 6th at 9 p m.? Or, if not, mention some time and place more convenient. I shall have Notebook No. II at your disposal; though I think I embodied all the results of my research in the Graal Essay. It is amusing in its way: but owing to the fact that very few of the Reviewers know anything whatever about the subject, they slide nervously past the Essay, murmuring ‘Stimulating’ or ‘somewhat tedious’ as the case may be. So I am deprived of the pleasure of being attacked.

I was very much obliged to you for giving me the information as to ‘The Shining Pyramid’. I came to the conclusion that no fraud was involved; only the grossest carelessness and mismanagement. A large ‘only’ for me, who have to live on what my books bring me.

Dr Frere’s book is very fine indeed. The Responses and verses have somewhat in them which is extraordinarily noble and compelling: thank you.

Urquhart’s translation of Rabelais is the translation; and perhaps there can be none better. My impression on reading and comparing the original with the English version was that the book had been, somehow, thickened — rather than coarsened. It is as if one had translated Burgundy into whiskey — into a very fine whiskey, indeed.

The aim of the ‘Secret Glory’ was higher than the aim of the ‘Hill of Dreams’; but alas! the former book broke in my hands. I got on a wrong track, cancelled about 20,000 words; and published a fragment.

You say you will never do anything at writing. You don’t know; the only receipt is: try hard for a dozen years or more, break your heart half-a-dozen times, go down into desolation and come up again, and then begin all anew. A nice life, isn’t it?

Sebastian Evans’s ‘High History’ is a fine piece of work. It is a pity that he let himself be ensnared into a very foolish theory of the matter.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

April 15th 1925

Dear Summerford,

have known my very dear friend A. E. Waite for 38 years; and I have not the faintest notion as to his real beliefs. In hopeful moods I am inclined to think that he is a Deist; but in stem fact I should think that Pantheism is his veritable label. He was brought up strictly in the Roman Faith, and has always had the warmest enthusiasm for the Roman Church— ‘as a great system of symbolism’, as he once explained to me. I have often told him that his case is exactly like that of the late President Thiers, who once said: ‘Je ne suis pas Chrétien: mais je suis toujours Catholique Romain.’ It is a strange case.

I will certainly write my name in ‘Stiggins’ whenever you like to bring it along. And I hope that will be soon. Remember, if you find yourself by chance in London over Saturday, we are always in that night at 9.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Sept. 30th'25

Dear Summerford,

By all means keep the Grail book and the notebook as long as you please.

I hope you enjoyed your holiday. For once, I believe the West had better weather than the East. We had a great deal of noble sunshine and a very good and leisurely time. It was a little spoilt for me by the necessity of writing a weekly article for the Graphic and also writing Introductions: to a portfolio of symbolic drawings which I did not understand, to Brillat-Savarin's Physiologie du Goût, to 'The Canning Wonder' (my own book) and to Lady Benson's 'Overture and Beginners, Please' — stage annals and reminiscences. I brought into this the last chapter of 'The Secret Glory' about 'The Hathaway Company'; the Benson Company being intended when I wrote it.

I have some notion of trying to find a French book on the Compagnonnage, the ancient Freemasonry of French workmen, very curious in its way. If the material seemed likely I would translate it — and vex old Waite horribly; he having a theory of Freemasonry which makes the existence of the Compagnonnage highly inconvenient.

Pray let me know when you are to be in town: I want you to lunch with me.

With our best wishes

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Oct. 21st, 1925

Dear Summerford,

Many thanks for your letter of Oct. 2nd.

What a very odd circumstance; this offering of earth, carrots and twigs! I can make nothing of it; but I should have made a good deal of it about thirty years ago! Indeed, I invented something of the kind in one of my short stories.

Alas! It is sad to grow old. A couple of years ago, a man was telling me a very striking notion for a story which he wanted me to use. I said: ‘Talk to me about that in 1890’!

I hope the Canning book will be out directly, but, likely enough, the publishers will put it off to February next. Publishers often do the displeasing thing.

Translate the Grail Books! They are a Library: they would fill a large room: it would be the task of a lifetime. You might think of it.

I shall be most happy to sign ‘The Secret Glory’ whenever you will.

We have begun to use the new Sacring Bell at St Mark’s; it has a reverend sound.

With all our good wishes

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Mind you let me know when you have a day in town: you must lunch with me.

Dear Summerford,

Thinking it over, I feel that it would not be very good manners to send a savage assault on the schoolmaster's craft — to a schoolmaster. I have a reverence for the College motto. Your venerated founder had certainly 'a message for this age'.

I once went to the Rite of Irving at their 'Cathedral' in Gordon Square. You know the subtitle of the sect; what they call themselves? It is 'The Catholic and Apostolic Church'! Their 'Mass' is quite dignified. All present (of the sect) communicate, being marshalled from their seats in due order by two deacons. In the midst of the service a silence; then a voice suddenly uplifted, wailing on vowels, or so it seemed to me, in a somewhat terrifying manner. As you may be aware, I know something of the matter of sorcery; and it is curious that the Tongues (as it is called) is very like an Incantation. It is supposed to be a heavenly language, as a courteous deacon informed me.

I trust you have succeeded with the Scholarship.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Jan. 30th 1926

Dear Summerford,

The heartiest congratulations of us both on your success. You are one of the very few people who are elected to be round pegs in round holes. You are deeply interested in Theology, Liturgiology, and the history of the early British Church — and you are bidden to study all these subjects! It is wonderful.

One note of the connection between the Grail Romances and the Celtic Church has occurred to me lately. In the Romances and the C. Church, it is only the elect who may see the Holy Things — Lancelot, you remember, is blasted, not healed, by the theoria of the Grail. Amongst the Latins this is not so: the more of a sinner you are, the more need of seeing and revering the mysteries.

As to the Irvingites: the ‘Angel’ (Bishop) celebrates in a Gothic Chasuble. But what is the story of the transformation of a Presbyterian Congregation that went crazy into what we must call a Catholic sect? I do not know.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Summerford,

‘First there comes David, Then there comes Chad, Then comes Wenwoloc
As though he were mad.’

I was born on his day in the year 1863. He has variant names: Gwynllyw and (oddly) Woolos.

I am ordering a copy of ‘The Secret Glory’ to be sent to you. Will you pass it on to Mr Robinson? I shall be obliged.

I never met Dr Warren. I think I told you that I wrote to him for information —— and in a short time found myself giving it. There is the necessary defect of specialism; you have no time to go outside your subject, and indeed, being a specialist, you do not know where to go. I, being a smatterer, could bear the Celtic Church in mind while I was investigating the Grail Romances.

I expect the stacks of ‘The Great Return’ have gone down a bit, but I don’t know. Somebody told me the other day that the book now fetched 5/-.

I will remember the good Canon of whom you speak.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

12 Melina Place, N.W.8 March 5.’26

Dear Summerford,

Forty years ago I read in The Tablet a sonorous and satisfying phrase which has always remained in my memory. Some position was being condemned, and of it the writer said that it was:

‘itijuriosa, perniciosa, male sonans, et plurium errorum productrix’.

These words apply admirably to the Ch. Times position as to the iconostasis, or Rood screen. It is absolutely false. The screen is an image of the Veil through which we pass (see Epistle to the Hebrews) into the Holy Place. It also signifies that the Holy Sacrifice is a Holy Mystery, a thing discerned in part, per speculum in aenigmate. It was in use in the East where there was no sudden irruption of half-taught barbarians. It was pierced in the West and became the Rood screen, as the sense of the Mysteries — not to be viewed too clearly — grew dim: this was the period when the ‘squints’ were made, to enable people in the aisles to see the altar. The end of the process is manifest in the Modem Roman Church, where the altar is to stand high and dry, the most visible object in the church.

The Romans of Southwark pulled down the Screen that Pugin had made in their Cathedral some years ago.

As for the rest of the article; it is a mass of falsities and hypocrises: full of suppressio veri et suggestio falsi.

‘The shabby leavings of the Middle Ages’.

I like that. Are the Gothic Cathedrals shabby? And if, on the surface they became so, who made them so?

I never see the Church Times. It became the organ of Satan many years ago.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Summerford,

Did you get ‘The Secret Glory’ all right? Denny the bookseller says he has sent it.

If Mr Robinson talks to you about the book, point out to him that whereas most writers dwell on the vices of public schools, it is their virtues, all that they are most proud of, which stink in my nostrils. Individual vices are, comparatively, of little consequence. My friend Waite said once, very truly, that the crimes of the Borgias are of no account when compared with the Nonconformist Conscience.

Is there a chance of seeing you about Eastertide?

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Summerford,

Tell me when you can have lunch with me. We are in town up to and including August 14th; then for Penvro. Why don’t you arrange to take a short holiday of your own at Tenby or Penally? I want to show you the place where the heroes heard the singing of the Three Fairy Birds of Rhiannon at the Entertainment of the Venerable Head, and, unhappily, opened the door which looked on Cornwall.

I had a letter from Dom Robinson. He said that ‘The Secret Glory’ was a travesty of the system of the Great Public Schools. I replied that we did not seem in perfect agreement on the matter.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Nov. 15.'26

Dear Summerford, I hope you are having a very good time. Remember it is your duty to enjoy yourself enormously at Oxford.

One of your Winchester masters, Leeson, has been appointed Head of the Merchant Taylors'. What character do you give him?

Have you looked up David Kimpton, whom you met here just before going up? I wish you would, if you could manage it. I think he is a very good fellow. I believe he proposes to take Orders. Worcester is his college.

If, after your Degree, you still think of going into a Publisher's House; I believe I know of one that you would like. This is Peter Davies, who, if I recollect, was about the night you were here. A long, thin, somewhat sombre looking man. He is, in fact, the original of Barrie's 'Peter Pan'. But he has grown up, and issues, so far, only books of real interest.

How do you get on with Waite's book on the Grail?

With the best wishes of us both

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

12 Melina Place, N.W.8 Nov. 24.'26

Dear Summerford,

Many thanks for your letter. I am glad you give Leeson such a good character.

suppose it is the corruption of our nature which makes us in practice equate 'duty' with the disagreeable. But it is no doubt a high duty to enjoy the delightful. See the awful fate of the people who didn't enjoy life — the accidious — in Dante. This grievous sin is laid, justly or unjustly, against the University to which you belong. It is externally manifest in that affected weariness and languor which is called 'the Oxford manner'. I have known sufferers who cannot say: 'That is very beautiful', but will drawl out, as if half-asleep, 'it seems raaaather interesting'. The Publicans and Sinners, you will remember, did their very best to enjoy life. Their methods were doubtless mistaken in some particulars; but they were preferred before the Scribes and Pharisees — the Dons of their day!

I don't know where you can find the Grail Texts. Write to A. E. Waite, 156 High Street, Ramsgate, and say that I told you to do so.

Tell the new Cope and Fenwick to let us have — if not the whole liturgy — a sample chunk of the Mozarabic Rite, displaying the Epiclesis, in Latin and English.

If you will let me know a day when you will be in town in the vacation, I will let you know where you shall lunch with me. I am glad you take to Kimpton. It will, perhaps, be your business to lead him to the Catholic Faith.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dec. 13 1926

Dear Summerford,

I am much pleased that Waite gave you the information that you wanted. I have written him a line; reminding him that next month it will be forty years since we met. Alas, Postumus!

Pray bring Mr Lane — poor man! — with you next Saturday: and bring Mr Fairtlough too, if he will come. But what day can you appoint to meet me at Stone's, at 1 p in for a beefy lunch? Saturdays, in the afternoon, is a dies non for me: any other weekday save Friday, when Stone's is no place for a Catholic.

I note the Cope and Fenwick policy: a judicious one, I am sure. 'Ornaments injade' is more or less Knopf's property. And as for 'the new book': I fear there is little prospect of any such thing.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

March 3rd 1927

Dear Summerford,

It is lucky for the Firm that it is not employing me as a translator of the Mozarabic Liturgy. I finished my serious study of the Latin tongue just 47 years ago!

Thank you very much for writing to Lane. I will await his letter with due serenity. Of course you and Fairtlough will not expect to make ‘real money’ out of Liturgies. From the nature of the case, the public for such matter is and will be a very small one. I suppose the average liturgical book, published at 10/6 — 16/- is lucky if it sells 1000 copies; and this is probably an optimistic estimate. Such books are bought by the inner circle of experts: if you could tap the Church Times public with 2/6 translations, you might get a circle of 3000 readers: again an optimistic forecast. I think it would be idle to expect anything better.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Holy Wednesday, 1927

Dear Summerford,

‘London Calendar’? That is the subtitle of ‘Dog and Duck’, a volume of essays. I think they are very decent essays. As for ‘The Dragon of the Alchemists’; I wrote the Introduction to it, but I really have not the remotest notion of what it is about! I met the author once or twice and found him a singularly pleasant man, but I didn’t like to ask him what he meant by his book.

St Mark’s uses black apparel in Holy Week; I don’t know how the Sarum order is.

We saw John Davenport the other day. He was just going to meet his father: a subject for an historical painter.

May your Easter be blessed.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

You know how St Philip Neri, meeting the students of the English College at Rome (temp. Eliz. R.) used to hail them — Salvete flores Martyrum?. Well, the young man next to Fairtlough — Saturday night — has just resigned his desk in the family building business for the career of letters. May he intercede for us in the time of his glory.

28 Loudoun Road, N.W.8

Dear Summerford,

Many thanks for your letter. I did not know that I had attracted the favourable notice of that ruffian and his friends. He was abominable, no doubt; and he was also an ass and a quack. The combination is not a very usual one. One cannot be very serious in one’s condemnation of a man who says he is Therion, the Apocalyptic Beast.

I hope all goes well and happily with you; and I hope that you and Mr Fairtlough will not fail to appear on a Saturday night, when you are next in town.

Hilary has begun studying Hebrew, and seems to like it. He began the other night to tell me about Tetragrammaton!

As to Loudoun Road: it is only the smallest portion of the terrors, afflictions, and dismays with which it has pleased Tetragrammaton (blessed be his Name!) to lay upon these my later years.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

St Denis,'28

Dear Summerford,

Many thanks for your letter with its most entertaining account of your doings at Molesey. I would think that our V.H. Frater, Sacramentum Regis, otherwise, A. E. Waite, would declare that the Rite of Molesey was voided, the sanctuary stripped and bare, the lamps extinguished, and the Relics taken away into a deep concealment.

Indeed there is a certain sacred story, as to which there were profane (uninitiated) references in verses by Sybil Waite, quoted to you when you were here last.

'When London's mighty city With orgies seemed to scorch.'

But it is related, with due veils and concealments, that on the morning of the Coronation of our Sovereign Lord, King Edward of happy memory, seventh of that name since the Conquest, Mrs Menteith came out of Gray's Inn at about eight of the morning, and was seen to get into a four wheeler. And, indeed (και δη και) it is declared by Waite that she never got out of it, that a mere simulacrum and appearance arrived at Molesey; that the word was lost; and that a mere substituted word took its place. But these are sacred matters.

Your Mass of the Rocks reminds me somewhat of the Mass of Lavenham, Suffolk. But the Priest of Lavenham lights XVIII candles for Low Mass!

With all good wishes from Mrs and myself.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Pray excuse pencil.

Dec. 27.’28

My dear Summerford,

All our thanks for your good wishes; and the same to you for the coming year. I suppose you will go down finally in a year’s time, and begin what is called life. I have seen John Davenport twice, and was very glad to see him well, and pleased with Cambridge and his college. If the oddly named ‘intelligentzia’ has no worse effect on him than that of causing him to utter rhyming jingles; then it is very well indeed. For the hatred of rhyme is, often, a very marked and malignant symptom of the disease in question, causing that monstrosity called vers libre.

We hope to see you and Mr Fairtlough on the first Saturday night that you can manage. Old Waite was in town about three weeks ago. I thought him in excellent health and spirits. I again urged him to write that book which is to let us know what he really believes. I am inclined to think that he may find the task a difficult one.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

I agree with you about Christmas cards. I don’t like them nearly so much as I did about 1868-74.

28 Loudoun Road, London, N.W.8

Jan. 12.’29

My dear Summerford,

Could you put in a word for me with that young Lane of whom we were talking the other day? Not to influence him favourably on behalf of a literary masterpiece; but to ask him if the Firm can give me any ‘reading’. I have some experience in that art. I should be much obliged if you could manage this.

I hope your party went off to rights. (My spouse once rebuked me for using this phrase; but I showed it to her in ‘Gulliver’s Travels’.)

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

My dear Summerford,

Your course is obvious. Tell the young woman to buy ‘The Shining Pyramid’ (Seeker) and read the Note on the Graal there contained. I do not know that any valid new light has been thrown on the question in later years. I am sure that the late Miss Jessie Weston was quite misguided. As for telling all about the Graal in a letter: that is nonsense. I speak with authority, since I once, in accordance with orders, put the Graal in a box, to use a technical phrase, which I hope you do not understand.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

My dear Summerford,

You are most kind in all you say, and I hope I shall be able to fall in with your benevolent schemes. I will let you know when I hear what plans the Club Secretary has made for me. I do not quite know, by the way, why I am lecturing at Oxford. I know, very well indeed, that I do not want to lecture at Oxford, or at any other place. I suppose the truth is that with a man of the constitution called ‘easy-going’, it is more unpleasant to refuse a request rather than to grant it — provided the discomfort attached is not very great. I flung down an invitation to lecture in the Bishoprick of Durham for a week, with a small fee, without hesitation; the misery involved being very great.

If that girl delays to get ‘The Shining Pyramid’ the consequences are on her own head.

I remain Yours very sincerely,

June 22nd 1929

Dear Summerford,

Uncertain as to your present address, I am writing to Exeter, where there is, no doubt, a manciple or Protonotary, or something of the kind who will forward letters.

On Monday next, June 24, we move to Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

Kindly peruse the enclosed character. Would it be any good to show it to young Lane? If you think it would, you would oblige me very much by doing so, if the opportunity should arise: if not, throw it away.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Aug. 14.’29

Dear Summerford,

Thank you so much for your very kindly thought. But I am not going to the Benson Dinner; the last Benson Dinner; for what is to come hereafter, with women at the board, will be nothing.

Hilary’s schooling will end next Christmas. I believe his present notion is to go and build organs, but nothing is settled. It is a pity that Leeson, a most amiable man, is a Liberal — in the broad sense of the word. How is it, said the Doctor, that we hear the loudest yelps for liberty from the drivers of slaves? So it was, and so it is, however; and so Liberal Leeson makes my boy learn history out of a book warmly commending Henry VIII, one of the filthiest tyrants that the world has seen.

When you do come to Amersham you will be welcome.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Feb. 21.1930

Dear Summerford,

It is extremely good of you to forgive my silence and total neglect of your kind Christmas wishes. My negligence is partly due to an obstinate accidia, and partly to the fact that just before Christmas I fell down stairs and gave myself a very nasty shock, and a few days later had a severe and lasting fit of gout. Like the clergyman in Hamlet I lay howling. Now, I am glad to say, we are all as well as we are likely to be.

Will you and Fairtlough come along Saturday sennight about nine, to drink Punch? It is St David's day — Dydd Dewi Sant — and should be a good day. And would Fairtlough do us the great favour of conveying a passenger — Mrs Lynch whom I think you have met? If you can come, we will write to Mrs Lynch and fix it up.

I am afraid I can think of nothing for Peter Davies. I am glad he is doing well.

I suppose Waite is still talking of that 'Secret Church' of the H.G. — which has no existence, and in which he doesn't believe himself. I sent him some time ago 'From Ritual to Romance'. And that is about another Secret Church which has no existence. But Miss Weston's Church is quite different; being a Gnostic Sect, which survived in Wales up to the Xlth century!

Do I look as if I knew a Mercer?

Hilary has taken the Apron, and so far likes his job very well, and, I gather, promises well at it. He lodges during the week with the Clerk of St Mark's, our cousin.

Thanks very much for your kind offer of Bed and Brandy. You do not express the latter easement; but I have gathered that it is annexed.

Let me know as soon as may be, whether you can both come on March 1st.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

March 4th 1930

Dear Summerford,

To begin at the beginning: we were very sorry indeed that you and Fairtlough could not come on Saturday; more especially as your letter seemed to say that there was not much prospect of your being able to come on any discernible Saturday. I hope you will both reconsider this?

Thank you so much for your good wishes. It seems a long time since March 3rd, 1863. I cannot think the date was a well chosen one. March 3rd 1820 would, I think, have been more suitable, with a run up to, say, 1890. In that event, I should not have had the pain of living into an age which I regard with ever increasing horror, hatred and contempt. For example: I hear rumours that the squire here, Tyrwhitt Drake, is thinking of selling his estate. You will find somewhere in Coventry Patmore the most wise sentence: that the ploughboy, though he does not know it, is the happier because of the existence of the duke.

‘The Rod, the Root and the Flower’ is, indeed, a most profound book: more difficult than the Religio Poetae, also a treasure of wisdom. You know that some of the articles in Religio were contributed to the St James Gazette? There is a measure of the change that has come upon us. It strikes me that the difference between the end of the Roman world and our own will be this: that our barbarians are from within, not without.

The method of Wason’s promotion — I hope it will be so — pleases me very well. It has a certain ancient, homely touch about it which is very comfortable.

I have just been reading for the first time, ‘Antic Hay’. ‘Pooh’: that is my criticism. The fellow is quite aware that he is being very shocking; he means to be very shocking. Compare him with Casanova: the Italian knows that his method of living is completely right, the only method for a man of sense, education and sensibility.

May Fairtlough’s cold be a decent old-fashioned cold, such as one used to get; not the six weeks venom of these days.

Yours,

Arthur Marchen

July 26.'30

My dear Summerford,

For some time past, I have been thinking of searching The Book with respect to you. I am sure there is some text, 'Forsake not the counsel of the aged' — or words to that effect, as the stage manager used to say to beginners who had to take their cues from Benson.

You know you are always welcome here; and the question of time is for you. If you have a car, come along at 8.30 and drink punch. If not, take the 3.25 from Marylebone, and have tea, with a drink in the xvjth century King's Arms to follow. Aug. 2 will suit us perfectly. Will Fairtlough come also? And John Davenport?

What a book is Belle and the Dragon!' But I would not revisit the scene. The souls have gone thence: they that seem to be there are but Klippoth, shells. But on this see Kabala Denudata of Knorr von Rosenroth.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

July 31st'30

My dear Summerford,

The 3.25 from Marylebone is a handy train; and if your friend can come, pray bring him along. I am sorry we do not grow urtica pilulifera here. But we have curious herbs: tansy, hyssop, marjoram, savory and rue. One or all of these might do good. But there is not any right Anticyran Hellebore.

Remind me to show you a Thesis for the Degree of Master of Arts, submitted to the Faculty of Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn. U.S.A. If it is received with boisterous mirth, I shall be very much hurt!

I told you long ago that the true doctrine is that Mrs Menteith never got home on the morrow of the sacring of King Edward VII of happy memory.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

March 3rd 1931

My dear Summerford,

Thank you very much. I think Wenwoloc means all right, but…

Well, for one thing, he hardly seems to have made up his mind about the spelling of his name. There is your version, and the one I have just used; and I think that in the Gentility of the Saints of the Isle of Britain it is Gwynllyw; and as the Patron Saint of Newport, Mon., he is Woolos. So, perhaps, on the whole…

Moreover…

(You know the Great Legend of that last word? In the days when things were, perhaps, better managed at The Times office — and in other places — than they are now; the rule was that when a gentleman was to write a leading article, a bottle of port was taken to his room. Dr Wace, afterwards Dean of Canterbury, was on one occasion asked to write two leaders, and two bottles of port were taken to his room. The hours passed on, no bell was rung for the copy messengers. Finally, Dr Wace was found fast asleep, his head on the table. On the pile of 'blue slips' beside him was the one word 'Moreover'. The two bottles of port were empty.)

Did you see that, on analysis, the soil of Cornwall proved to reek with arsenic? There is more poison in a handful of Cornish soil than in the dead, poisoned body buried in it. I always thought so. I always put the letters 'G.H.' after Cornwall, in addressing anybody there. They signify, 'God help'.

Well, you have got a queer job in Talbot Square; but there is an element of waggery — to quote Waite on the constitution of the universe — in it. It would suit me better than the other job at the Stock Exchange.

Have you heard anything of John Davenport? I am afraid he is distressing those excellent people of his. He won't even take the trouble to write to his mother: a sad fellow.

Do come down for tea and a drink any Saturday — March 14 excepted. Name your day and take a Day Return ticket, Marylebone, 3.25.

What was the notion of making the Café Royal like the waiting room of a gaol?

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Thursday 9 July 1931

Dear Summerford,

Thank you, indeed. A gorgeous book, one of the finest I have seen. That is, foris; as to intus, I will write you later; since, as it happens, I have a big bundle of Benn books this week, and nearly all of them have to be read. That is, they are not good, but their badness does not appear in the first chapter.

I am delighted to have such a good report of A.E. W. and Sybil. The old man is evidently in the height of health, in body and mind. I should love to hear him expounding his latest doctrine of the Hidden Church: as false as hell, I am sure, but what does that matter? In my latest letter to him, I suggested that to many of the Graal problems there is no answer; no vital answer that is: I cited Hamlet: people are still enquiring what is deeply hidden in that matter of the ghost: Hamlet talks to his father's ghost, and then speaks of that bourne from which no traveller returns. The answer is, simply, that Shakespeare was a careless fellow, who wrote in a hurry.

When you write to Brightman again, do ask him if he considers this a valid formula:

Car chou est li sanc di ma nouviele loy, li miens meismes?

I should be most interested to hear his judgement on this, and on the mysterium fidei. I did not know that there was an answer to the latter question. Has Brightman ever considered the possibility of fervent improvisation as a liturgical source?

How are we to account for the fact that the hwyl, the singing eloquence of the Welsh Methodists, is, pretty nearly, the Preface Tone?

On July 27 we visit niece Sylvia Warner for 10 days. Do fix a day before that: a wire in the morning ample notice.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

July 24,’31

Dear Summerford,

He works in a mysterious way: in a sense I am sorry not to see you tomorrow; but on the whole it is well, for tomorrow my chief admirer, Fytton Armstrong, aged 19, comes, and he would not amuse you. It was only by threats that I dissuaded him from reprinting Eleusinia: pitiable doggerel that I wrote when I was 17, that would have disgraced 7.

The formulae of the Grand Saint Graal (? c. 1200) runs as follows:

‘Come and eat, and this is my body which shall be delivered to martyrdom and torment for you and for many other people.’

‘Take and drink, for this is the blood of my new law, my very same, which shall be shed for you in remission of sins.’

suppose ‘my very same’, li miens meismes, means, ‘my very own (blood)’. Of course, I did not suppose that Brightman would know or care anything about the Grail Legend, but it struck me that he might be interested in the extraordinary formula: of questionable validity, though, I suppose, li miens meismes might be held to supply the defect of li sane di ma nouviele loy. In the formula of the break; I know of no parallel to the phrase ‘delivered to martyrdom and torment’, not even in the wild Liturgies of Arabia and Ethiopia.

Of course, to the Grail student this account of ‘the first Mass that was ever said’ by the — wholly imaginary — Josephus, son of Joseph of Aramathea, opens difficult questions:

1. — How did the Romance Writer, almost certainly a cleric, dare to distort the sacred history in this manner?

2. — Why didn’t he use the Roman formulae — or go to the Gospels?

3. — Where did he get his formulae?

4. — Why didn’t the ecclesiastical authorities come down on him?

We shall return on Aug. 6. How about that weekend for you? I am glad you are to be released from the tents of Kedar.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

How I envy A.E.W. that struggle to write 300,000 words! May he prosper.

Sept. 3rd 1931

Dear Summerford,

I have left your letter unanswered for a month; since you intimated that throughout August you would be here and there. Now, let me try to fix you up for Saturday Sept. 19th. It is Fair Day here, and the sight of the booths all along the old street, flaming and gay, is good for the eyes. I hope you will come. I have fixed Armstrong up for Sept. 12th.

I should like very much to have the views of the Egg-headed Divine on that Formula. I think I had better translate the whole passage; since, apart from the wording of the Formula, the question arises: is a mass which consists solely of the words of Institution, a mass at all? And that, according to the text, was the Mass of 'Josephe'. 'It was very soon done, for he only said these words which Jesus Christ said to His disciples at the Supper.'

To me, there is an evil Protestant stench about this— 'It's so simple', as Drage used to say — and the puzzle is, where does it come from? — the date being c. 1200 and the general trend of the Grail Romances being highly to exalt the Sacrament of the Altar.

I heard from Waite the other day: he has compelled Walter Hutchinson to consent to the Grail book running to 350,000 words! There are powers for you.

As you have despised the Venusian Bard and (I am sure) no end of General Councils and Provincial Synods, and have consulted Babylonian Numbers: well, I hope it may all come true and soon. But I wish you could make it Duckworth. Putnam's head man once treated me to lunch at Gatti's.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Oct. 12.’31

Dear Summerford,

We will despatch the Bergamots this day. They are snail-bitten, I regret to say, but the fact does not impair their vitality.

By removing ‘The Circle’ from the range of the little typist, you diminish the miracle, but you increase your chance of success. Do not think of ‘The Witch Review’ as a title. It sounds funny, and people would hate to ask for it. Years ago, Harry Furniss tried to found a comic paper. He called it ‘Lika Joko’ after his signature in Punch, but, though a good paper, it did not do. People don’t like going into a shop with an apologetic grin on their faces. That objection applies also to ‘The Ghost’.

Waite’s title for a magazine he ran 40 years ago was good:

The Unknown World or

The Unseen World or

The Wizard World (rather cheap)

or

Magic (apt to suggest Maskelyne and Devant)

or The Veil (melodramatic)

My favourite is The Unseen World.

In my opinion, the two dangers chiefly to be guarded against are credulity and insincerity. A.E. W. put no end of stuff into ‘The Unknown World’ that he knew to be balderdash: ‘The Occult Review’ — is it going still? — put in lots of stuff that it ought to have known to be balderdash: my friend Gow, when editor of ‘Light’, wallowed in balderdash.

Two guineas is exactly the sum I thought of. As to length:? 1200 words.

You know, of course, how important the make-up, setting and cover are? Here my unsolicited advice is to avoid all funny stunts, such as using I.c where custom prescribes caps: as the unseen world And, pray, nothing of Euclid's geometry on the cover! I mean, in the depiction of the human form; for it occurs to me that a Red Pentacle on a Green Ground would be in every way appropriate, effective, and cheap.

Here is a suggestion for a No. 1 article. 'Old Moore's' almanac for the current year, greatly to my surprise, contrived to predict, exactly not generally, the present political to-do. Let someone get all the astrological almanacs for 1931 and go through the predictions, comparing prophecy with fact.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Dec. 12.’31

Dear Summerford,

Then I will find out what Saturday after Xmas young Mr Armstrong is likely to turn up — he is impending — and we can fix up a day for you.

Are you settled at Dryden Chambers? I took over the site nearly 40 years ago and built an extremely agreeable French Café. On fine, warm days, one drank red wine of Touraine there, sitting at little tables in the courtyard. See, The Three Impostors. A friend of mine once kept a gay lady freely in his chambers there, and afterwards, by ill advice, married her. He was much amazed when he was instantly turned out. The strange thing is that he was the son of Tommy Case, Waynflete Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Oxford: since his conduct was neither moral nor philosophic. The poor fellow is said to have ended, sadly enough, as a schoolmaster; so we see what Waynfleterie leads to.

am not astonished at the delay in producing The Riddle; I am afraid that my getting two quid out of you was rather on the Waynflete side of morals. Still; miracles do happen.

Per speculum in aenigmate: our translators rendered the phrase, ‘in a glass darkly’. But there is a shade in the Latin which they did not get. I do not know what the original Greek phrase is. I hope you will get into Methuens: a good firm, I should think. We saw about Peter Davies. The Great Oes will soon be upon us.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Feb. 12.’32

Dear Summerford,

have a proposition of a publishing kind: it is to make a selection of the best things in the works of Charles Dickens. Of course the true Dickensian has these works complete on his shelves; but they would make a bulky addition to his baggage on a journey to Baile-Atha-Cliath or Samarkand. The notion is, to give him the quintessence of his author in a handy book, the size of which would be a matter for the publisher’s judgement. One can conjure a great deal into a small compass, using India paper. If you think there is anything in it: would you put it to the House? Or would it be better for me to write, direct? There is nobody ill here at present; and I hope Dryden Chambers can speak as fairly.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My selections would, generally, be made with the view of getting rid of the ‘Little Nell’ element in Dickens.

Amersham, Bucks.

July 8.’32

Dear Summerford,

I am very sorry. Not hearing from you, I thought that the typing job was, for one reason or another, unacceptable to your man. Time pressed, and a week ago, I sent all the stuff I had done to an agency. I wish I had written to you again.

Poor Uncle Ernest! What he will say to ‘The Green Round’ I do not know. Gollancz told me that Sir Ernest was a man absolutely without religion; but I trust that this is not the case. He will want consolation.

I am afraid that the task of rendering the Conte del Graal is quite definitely beyond my powers. But why do you approach me? Is there not one who probably knows the Conte backwards; who would grumble, indeed, at the offer —— on the ground that the poem has only 32,000 lines instead of 64,000 or, better still, 164,000? Surely you cannot hesitate.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

July 20,’32

Dear Summerford,

Many thanks for your felicitations. Who am I to bandy compliments with my sovereign? I am pleased to see that the other winner of the £100 prize is Aylmer Maude; the Tolstoy man. He once wrote to me, very civilly, asking me to write an introduction to one of the volumes in his new edition of Tolstoy.

I replied, civilly also, I trust, but mentioning my profound conviction that no Russian should be taught to read or write.

Do not let me mislead you as to the Grail book and A.E. W. One man cannot guarantee another man’s work. I can only say that he strikes me as the obvious man for the job. He has an enthusiasm for the subject; though that enthusiasm may not always be according to reason. Still; for all I know, your ends may be served better by hunting in the Schools for a Scholar well taught in Middle French, who will undertake to render the poem exactly into Grammatical English.

Miss Mary Butts and Rodker Long ago, I lunched with Rodker. There was a lady, lean, dark, haggard. She had cooked plovers for lunch. They were a dull blue within. I had a whole one, and I ate it, and declared that it was altogether excellent upon my word of honour. That was what the French Marquis said in Peregrine Pickle about the soup flavoured with assafetida, a substitute for the nitron of the ancients. Unlike him, I was not carried away in a chair directly afterwards. I wonder whether this amiable woman, if indifferent cook, was the Mrs Butts of today.

Do not dream that I shall ever write an authoritative article on Geomancy — or anything else. I am a smatterer; not an authority. (See pp. 21, 22 ‘Things Near and Far’.) But I am sorry for your contributors. For your Encyclopaedia will have to make all the others look silly. ‘Geomancy, a form of Divination known from very ancient times’ — but that won’t do for you. You want to know: exactly how ancient? Egypt, Babylonia, Jews, China? Savage races? earliest and simplest form to be found where and when? Western form derived from Eastern? Distinctions between the two? Tampered with by Renaissance, or modem, occultists? I am content to know that the magician’s brother in Aladdin used Geomancy. He practised the art with sand, kept in a box.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

Oct. 28’32

Dear Summerford,

hope you have got over that gastric influenza by this time? I believe it is a hideous malady.

When are we to look for you down here? A post card a day or two in advance; and we will await you.

Do you remember my notion of a Dickens selection: not a substitute for complete works, but a viaticum to take away in your pocket? Well, without any communication from me, Sylvia Warner has done just the book that was in my mind, and done it admirably. It is called ‘The Week End Dickens’.

If you do go on with that Grail notion, and don’t find the obvious man; give Oliver Stonor a chance, if it may be. He would find it child’s play after Le Moyen de Parvenir.

When is Aleister Crowley going to bring his action against Nina Hamnett? When muck meets mud…

Conte de Graal: poem by Chrétien de Troyes and others, who continued it.
Percival le Gallois: prose, translated by Sebastian Evans under the title, ‘The High History of the Holy Graal’.

Amersham, Bucks.

Nov. 29.'32

My dear Summerford,

We were delighted to see you. The notice business is merely to ensure that you shall find somebody at home at the end of a tiresome journey: though it is rarely indeed that we are out of an evening.

had been reflecting — and I never explained that Grail business. Here enclosed is the distinction between the two Romances. I do not think that the Conte has ever been translated; but I am not sure. Both books are concerned with Percival, but they differ widely, both in matter and in spirit. The prose Romance (The 'High History') has the singular episode of an ecclesiastical regulation ascribed to King Arthur, which, in fact, was made by St Columba. The regulation, providing that every church must have a chalice, is in itself highly significant; and its provenance and ascription are significant also as shewing how a Grail romancer went to work: he took his goods wherever he found them; in this case in an Irish Book of the XI or Xllth century; the Leabhar Breac — Freckled Book.

Mrs and Miss are looking forward to Friday night: 6.30 as arranged.

I have been consulting the Old Man's book for those data as to the Conte and the Percival: it is a confusion, but what a golden and glorious confusion: a noble book, indeed.

When you wish to give us a good evening: repeat your visit.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

April 8.’33

Dear Summerford,

Very many thanks: I shall be there. I know the Ivy: I once dined there with Caradoc Evans and a strange meinie. I shall not recall myself to Constance Collier; but, long ago, when she was a Merry Wife of Windsor, I was Mr Justice Shallow.

I don’t think I have seen the Old One since’27; and I believe that it was in your flat that we met. It will be a very great pleasure to me to see him again.

You should have a great time at Dublin. The word must be: Usquebaugh yn aur: whiskey in a crock of gold. I once spent three or four days in Belfast with drunken Protestants who believed in — and dreaded — the daoine sidhe. They nearly killed me. I will get Norah Hoult’s Dublin address: you might — or might not — look her up.

Benn are dispensing with my services in three months’ time. There is something solemn in being sacked at seventy.

You will let me know the hour and place of meeting on April 20?

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Should we, then, go to Barbary also? Is there balm in Barbary that will minister to a purse diseased?

Amersham, Bucks.

April 21.’33

Dear Summerford,

I hoped to hear from Stonor this morning, and so to send you Norah Hoult’s address. But I have not; and no doubt he is away on holiday. As soon as I get that address, I will forward it.

Let me thank you most heartily for one of the pleasantest days I have had for a very long time. I don’t know when I have enjoyed myself so much. Good company, good meat, and good drink: a rare combination. I confess I had at the time and afterwards certain qualms on your behalf. I greatly fear that you heard too much about St David’s Altar, and other matters congruous therewith. If so; set it down to your account of charity!

I thought the Old One in famous condition of body and mind. I confess I was a little put out when he said he was quite well: the first time I had heard that ab initio symboli; otherwise, all the years I have known him.

Enjoy yourself well in Dublin: I crave pardon: in Baile-Atha-Cliath. I wonder how it is that in the Welsh branch of the Celtic tongues, every letter is pronounced: in the Scoto-Irish, very few. In Welsh that name would be called ‘Byley Atha Clee-ath’.

Pray give Mr Stephens my respectful admiration.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

April 27.'33

Dear Summerford,

Very many thanks for your kind offices with the Observer. I shall look out for the Grail review with interest. So far, I have seen nothing at all adequate about the Old One's book. Whatever one may think of his theories: it is the only book in existence which gives a full account of all attempted solutions of the puzzle.

I have heard Stonor talk of A.E. with much reverence. I know nothing or next to nothing about him; but I think the spectacle of A.E. leading George Moore into caverns and clefts of the rock, if haply he might find the gods of pagan Ireland, belongs distinctly to the Comic Muse. It seems to me in the vein of Aristophanes. I once saw George Moore when they were 'putting him through it'— 'it' being the world of hidden things. Yeats arrived one evening, with George Moore in tow, at the Society of the Three Kings. They gave, as it were, a stool to George to sit on; and he was to be a good boy and listen heedfully.

You are having an admirable time in Dublin, it is clear. I once stayed a brief while in Belfast of the Black North. I perceive that there are links between the two capitals, however great their severances.

In the main, this matter of the Celtic Spirit seems to me to be comparable to the matter of making bread. You put a little, a very little barm (the froth of fermenting beer) into the great mass of dough; and it rose, it was leavened. But, you couldn't have done much with the barm by itself. But do not speak of this till you are away from Baile-Atha-Cliath.

All our best,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

May 31.’33

Dear Summerford,

You must now be quite all right again after Dublin. Do you feel once more a Saxon; or, should I say, perhaps, a Brython, not a Gael?

I heard from Stonor the other day. He seemed a little anxious about Norah. It would relieve him, I think, if I could pass on a report from you that she was well and flourishing. I am cadging and mumping around and about; but I have not yet found my fortune.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

June 20’33

Dear Summerford,

It is strange; but not long ago I heard from a Lisbon friend, who has been suffering horribly from sinuses, even to the extent of the surgeon’s knife; and now you write from Jethou of antrums. I hope they are quite right by this. I remember Jethou as a great green hill, in line with Herm, rising out of the sea, and I hope it has not altered since I saw it — in the year 1877. Then, St Peter Port was a pleasant old town: that, probably, is not quite so pleasant now.

was afraid you would not be able to do much with the Observer. I did a weekly article for them in 1926,’27, called ‘Queer Things’; and suddenly I was thrown out. I never heard what my sin had been.

With this letter, or, perhaps, shortly after it, you will be getting a book called ‘The Green Round’. Let us annotate this book in the proper scholastic manner; let us cf it. And in the first place; Cf. The Apothecary (Romeo and Juliet).

Cf also, the story of the Chelsea Pensioners. Evans, the editor of the Evening News, loved to pull the leg of J. M. Dick, the Sporting Editor, so one ugly Saturday in winter, he began:

‘Well, Dick, got any big football story today?’

‘Villa versus Pensioners, of course,’ said Dick.

‘Pensioners! Do you mean to tell me you dig out those poor old… gentlemen and make them play football on an afternoon like this. It’s a bloody shame!’

Dick just escapes apoplexy.

I am glad to hear that Norah Hoult is flourishing so famously.

Is it your first reading of Don Quixote? If so you are to be highly envied. Note amongst the wealth of proverbs: The laws follow the Prince’s will. This refers to the trial by Ordeal of Fire between the Roman and Mozarabic

Rites. The Roman Missal went up in blazes: the Spanish Ritual remained unscorched; and the King said: ‘We will use the Roman Missal.’

With all our best Yours,

Dear Summerford,

This, in the hope that you are back again and utterly restored to health and strength. Gogarty; and he to be a poet, too: I should not have anticipated felicity from his knife. But, I confess, I am extremely anti-Irish.

We hope to see you and Mrs Mackenzie down here before long: do make the journey. And I want to hear your first impressions of’Don Quixote’, which I read first just about 60 years ago. It has been one of my great companions through life.

I hope Guernsey has kept its old constitution. I described it to the American Wister — author of ‘The Virginian’ — and he expressed the most fervent wish that his country could have so happy and just a form of government.

Well; let us hear your news and see your face.

Yours,

Dear Summerford,

Your letter was a great relief. We were afraid that you were making a slow recovery; this especially, after a too brief visit from Sibyll Ray, who gave us the notion that you had been very ill indeed. Hence our joy at hearing that, at length, all is well.

I won't say 'it's very good of you to praise "The Green Round"', because I am sure that you would not speak well of it unless you thought well of it. But I may meditate — sending a copy of my book to this poor man, and practically compelling him not only to read it, but to write a brief favourable review of it! But I am resolved to believe that you and Mrs Mackenzie are right, and that I am wrong. As for press notices; I have never been much in the way of getting a pretty press. Haven't I shewn you my little compilation, entitled — pleasantly, I think— 'Precious Balms'?

I should like very much to get a commission to write another 40,000 word story; but my agent has not succeeded in getting anything of the kind; though Cape very handsomely promised to read such a story, if I liked to send it along. But this offer, though immensely gratifying, won't do. It was the fact that I had received £50 on account that carried me through over 'The Green Round'. I knew I had to finish it, to send in something by a certain date.

Now here is a difficult business, this Stonor-Hoult affair.., Do not, please, imagine that we claim any jurisdiction over other people's morals: I hope we heed the Apostle's: 'study to be quiet and mind your own business'…

Try and come down before long. We are well — save that Mrs finds the heat very trying.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Sept. 22nd'33

Dear Summerford,

In the first place; I am charged by Mrs with love, and many thanks for your letter.

As to Besterman; I recommended him for the Besant life, because he is both a Theosophist and a critical man. This seems a contradiction; but B. has I am sincerely sorry to have bothered you about nothing. If (I am afraid) it This is what has happened. Two years ago, or so, I transcribed Eleusinia for somehow managed to reconcile the one attitude with the other. If you see him, get him to show you how Spiritualists produce their raps: very impressive.

As to the other Life which is contemplated: the unhappy Armstrong. Gawsworth turned up here the next morning. It seems — according to him — that the publishers, Rich and Cowan, proposed the book to him, commissioned him to write it, and paid him money in advance. I told him, therefore, that I would not forbid, denounce, or commit any other malignant act against it; on condition that I became censor, and struck out anything that I held to be actively objectionable: Rich and Cowan to take the resultant copy or leave it, as they pleased. So, refrain, if you will, from speaking to Seeker (G.H.) on the matter.

I have instructed Armstrong (G. H.) to be very little biographical and as fiercely critical as he pleases. It is a bad business:

Excuse the lack of accents.

It was a jolly evening — thanks to you, Norah Hoult, and the green-fingered Absinthe, child of the sea.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Armstrong (£10). At his request, I wrote a brief Intro, showing how it was done. It is that, no doubt, which he has sent to the paper. Of course, it is his property.

(Sub sigillo) And, by the way, never have any dealings of any kind with M. P. Shiel; if you can help it. He took in Gollancz. You know what that means. That, I daresay, is no secret; but my speaking of M.P.S. and the matter is.

Our best Yours,

Arthur Machen

They are still talking of how Dowsett, the amiable Gasman, knocked down 30 coconuts at the Fair. In a generous spirit, he declares that his muscles were invigorated and his vision rectified by Dog and Duck Punch.

Nov. 25’33

Dear Summerford,

Can you lend me £10? We are absolutely down and out. My ‘Reading’, as I think I told you, came to an end in June. Shortly after, Sir Ernest Benn engaged me to write for his new weekly ‘The Independent’, at ‘the old salary’ = £5 a week. When November came, and payment for October, I got a cheque for £14.10.0. I remonstrated, and Sir Ernest assured me that my impressions of our interview were mistaken; and that he was paying by space — with a limitation, by the way, on the amount of space I am to occupy. So there you are. If you can lend me the money, I promise you, you shall be paid; but I should be dishonest if I named a date.

Here is the sort of thing I am doing for ‘The Independent’. Don’t reium.

Yours very sincerely,

Arthur Machen

June 21.’34

My dear Summerford,

It has given us great pleasure to hear from you. It will give us greater, if you and Mrs Mackenzie will be so kind as to come and see us. If you can manage it, let us know a couple of days ahead, so that we may have our party to ourselves.

am very sorry to hear that you have been suffering from depression: that most horrible of maladies, rightly called Balneum Diaboli by ancient authors. I suppose the jaundice bore its part in the offence? If a man’s liver is amiss, though all else be well, it makes him ready to hang himself.

As to our finances (G.H.) we just manage to hang on by a narrow margin, which trembles and wavers terribly at times, in sympathy with Uncle Ernest’s humours and careers. Perhaps I might enjoy it if I were a younger man. I remember some grim sports of my youth in which there was a certain relish. But at 71!

As to editors, you know: thank you very much. But will they bear it? I daresay my writing is old-fashioned; but if that review I did for the Observer be passable: I should very much like any reviewing that is going, anywhere.

Hilary ceased to be the Catholic Organ Builder’s Guild, and turned himself into a Small Holder. He was here a week ago and seemed well and happy: I hope he will be able to live by the job. It is a hard one; but a good deal better, he tells me, since the Government stuck a duty on foreign stuff.

By the way; if the opportunity offers, would you show the enclosed to Desmond MacCarthy, and ask him if he agrees? I don’t want it back. Now name an early date for a joint visit.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

March 19.’35

My dear Summerford,

don’t approve of your plans at all — since if they be carried out we shall hardly ever see you. But I think you will like Caldy very much: a beautiful island by a beautiful coast: a country very well called by the old bards, ‘the land of illusion and enchantment’. Note the old parish church at Caldy: compare it with Gumfreston church on the mainland, and decide whether they are pre-Norman or no. I think that they may well be of the 8th century.

It is a good thing that the island is purged of that dubious breed of Anglo-Roman monks. They were no credit to Angles or Romans. When I first encountered them there was one of them called Father Iltud. They had copied his name in its earliest spelling out of the books, to be correct, and pronounced it as if it were English. The saint is called, and usually spelt, ‘Iltyd’. Cf. ‘uffern dan, a military expression, used in drilling Welsh regiments. It is pronounced ‘iffairne dahn’. Literally, it means ‘hell fire’: technically, it may be equivalent to ‘shun!’ for all I know.

Alas, poor Benn! He says that he lost £10,000 on the first twelve months of ‘The Independent’, and I daresay he did. Anyhow, he shut it down three weeks ago, and I am left howling. Oddly enough, it was ‘given me’ a few days before the end that I had better look out, so the ‘Sunday Times’ is wondering whether it would like a column something in the manner of the ‘Radio Reflections’ that I contributed to ‘The Independent’; while Ellis Roberts is (I hope) doing his best with another bundle of samples.

By the way; you will have a competitor in the solitary way, and in the contempt of riches. Stonor was here a few weeks ago. His complaint was that he was working so hard at quantity surveying that he had no leisure for books or literature; and secondly that he was earning so much money that he was in danger of becoming a dipsomaniac. That was his gravamen, his reformandum was to take a cottage by Dunkery Beacon, Exmoor, at a rental of 4/- a week and there support himself by writing.

Let us hear from you again soon.

With our very best wishes Yours,

Arthur Machen

We hear from Muriel George that John has had a book accepted and is ‘better’.

Amersham, Bucks.

May 7.’35

My dear Summerford,

Many thanks for the card. I thought you would like Caldy: a place of old enchantment: island and mainland are a second home to me. You know the prehistoric export of the county? — a kind of bluish rock, essential to the Rite of Stonehenge, Avebury and such temples: whatever that rite may have been. Give our very best to Norah Hoult. I hope she got Purefoy’s letter.

To use the idiom of a friendly nation: the Jubilee was a wow. The roar of cheering coming over the wireless was tremendous. Amersham kept it up tremendously. Janet waited on six old men at the banquet for the aged and made it her pious care to fill and re-fill every glass with beer all through the proceedings. At night a torch light procession, a most famous sight, going through the street on the way to the Bonfire and Fireworks in the Park.

I have been soothed — the word is Boswell’s — by a very pleasant article, ‘Arthur Machen, Théoricien de L’Esthétisme’ by Madame M. L. Cazamian, Professeur à la Sorbonne, in the Revue Anglo-Americaine of Paris.

Let me hear from you again

Yours,

Arthur Machen

May 23.’35

My dear Summerford,

There is something moving (in my opinion) in the spectacle of a bad old man struggling with adversity.

I know that you and Mrs Mackenzie will do whatever you can, but I know also that formes are not elastic. If there is no room; well, there isn’t.

I am afraid research is out of the question. Do you think Gollancz would give me something on account of a ‘shocker’? If I were paid money in advance I should be forced to write the book — as in the case of’The Green Round’. You and other people have said kind things to me about it, but my own opinion of it, in the process of writing, was so bad, that nothing but the sheer compulsion of £50 received on a/c could have made me finish it.

I have a subject floating in my mind — a gang of children murderers (that is, of children who murder, not are murdered) with horrid suggestions and implications.

You know how welcome will be the visit of Mrs Mackenzie and yourself; but beware the 3rd of June. We have one of our rare engagements on that day.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Oct. 4.’35

My dear Summerford, Whenever more than two or three people come here, I awake next morning with the profound conviction that I have grossly neglected every one of them. I beg forgiveness.

How is the ‘Life’? Does it move, does it march, does it trot? If so, I hope that understanding of which you spoke has been reduced to fair black and white, and that it is a good understanding.

Janet is enjoying herself vastly, walking on in the Merchant. She finds the conversation of Property Men, Wardrobe Mistresses, and such like most entertaining. This is a good sign of a vocation.

once went into a pub with a young and solemn journalist. A quiet man at the bar: ‘Don’t you remember me, sir? I made the crossbows for the Scottish Archers.’ The young journalist’s notions of history became a heap of confusion.

Note for the ‘Life’. There is no better introduction to me than any connection with the stage, down to the Stage Doorkeeper. I shall never cease to regret that I once spent an evening with E. Nesbit, her husband, Bland, and a sandy young man from Balliol, when I might have spent it with Charley Pounds. It is a satisfaction to recall that I told the Balliol man that he ought to go to Salamanca or Valladolid: a counsel which he received in a very sullen manner.

Mrs enquires when Mrs Mackenzie is coming to see her again. She says she finds it necessary, like dram drinking; and I know that she means this well, though it may sound oddly. I second the invitation cordially, and include yourself.

Our Greenwood is going to Sofia, on film business.

March 3rd, 1936

My dear Summerford,

1863 is a while ago, isn’t it? Thank you so much.

Can’t you bring those Riches and Cowans to the point of yea or nay? I detest indecision. I believe they are obligated by a bond to bring out my collection called ‘The Cosy Room’. There are things in it, dating from 1890, that make me sick to look at. Nevertheless, since Armstrong went through the pains of digging them all out, typing them when dug, finding an agent, getting them published, and getting me some money: — I felt forced in mere decency to dedicate the book to him.

Spurred by this fine example of Armstrong’s, I have entered into a contract with Hutchinson to produce, by the end of July, a collection of short stories amounting to 50,000 words. I have already done 10,000 of them. I am sure that, in the words of Dryden (more or less) you will not, from the dregs of Art, think to receive what the first sprightly running could not give.

We do hope that in April we may see you and Mrs Mackenzie again. With all our best wishes

My dear Summerford,

What an excellent notion. I am writing to Norah Hoult about it.

It is some time since you have come from London to this place; so let me recommend the 3.25 from Marylebone: the train that is always there. Norah came by it with great success a couple of weeks ago. Once, she trusted to Baker Street, a station where doubt and treachery lurk hidden, and in consequence she got to Amersham rather late, as the result of travelling via Watford, the Circular Route, which I do not recommend.

I am mentioning this train to N.H. — still it is not compulsory; and if you both choose another way, only let us know what time you are to be expected.

Saturday next is not May 11. It is May 9.

have just finished another volume of short stories — long shorts: 50,000 words.

The Doctor, being asked his views as to the preaching of women, said: ‘Why, Sir, it is like a dog standing on his hind legs. He does not do it well; but the wonder is that he should do it at all.’

Methuen again? Good.

St Martin’s Morrow ‘36

My dear Summerford,

When will you learn that from the literary-business point of view I am quite hopeless?

A little over 40 years ago, it was proposed to me to write a history of French Gardening from the earliest times to that present day. The fee was to be £20, but that is not to the point. I declined — greatly to the wrath of the Old One, who said he would have taken the offer and knocked off the book in a brace of shakes: and I have no doubt that he would have done it, sufficiently well.

You know that Martinez Pasquale said to Louis Claude de St Martin: ‘We must be content with what we have.’ It is also necessary to be content with what we are. I often used to wish that I could write a novel.

Did you note the L.C.J. ‘s address on Horace? He suggested ‘artistic neatness’ for ‘curiosa félicitas’. I suggested ‘exquisite felicity’ to Peterborough, the ‘columnist’ of the Daily Telegraph. He wrote me a civil note, approving of the emendation, but doubting whether exquisite quite got curiosa. However, he added, ‘Horace at his best is always untranslatable.’

Was it Petronius Arbiter who used the phrase in question? Lord, Lord. It sounds as if it might be connected with John Jershom Jezreel, the New and Latter House of Israel, and that Tower at Chatham, built for the Hundred and Forty Four Thousand.

I do, now and then, receive jejune typewritten letters from the Old One, per Somebody. He writes of his getting on with a little work on Secret Rituals, amounting, up to the present, to some 600 pp in quarto. The people at Hutchinson’s wonder how it is that they often find Walter sobbing quietly when they bring in his afternoon tea. He is as helpless as a little child in the hands of the Mighty Old One.

As to the Life; would you like to do it? If so, by all means, so far as I am concerned, go ahead. My own opinion is that no life can properly be written — published, let us say, while the subject lives. Then, in this particular case, I am very sure that it would be a disastrous commercial failure.

We are both deeply grieved to hear that the car is going. Make an effort, before it is too late, and give us a couple of days' notice of the visit. There are lots of nuts, waiting to be salted, peppered and toasted.

Janet is engaged: to one Martin Pollock, of that respectable family which has given us many esteemed judges in the last hundred years. Aged 21, a B.A. of the University of Cambridge, proceeds next year to a London Hospital for the practical part of his medical instruction, spent a month of the long vacation at Moscow, sent Janet a picture postcard shewing Lenin's Tomb. The world is a wide place and I daresay that it holds still more horrible objects.

And the days darken round me, and the years, Among new men, strange faces, other minds.

All our loves to you and to Mrs Mackenzie,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

Monday. July’37

Dear Summerford,

Please receive my most grateful thanks; I am fortunate to have such a friend. Again and again: thank you.

What astonished in my latest little encounter with Fleet Street — the Street of Adventure, as it has been beautifully called — was not the fact; I have known publishers, editors, all the tribe too long for that to cause me any surprise; but rather the discovery so constantly renewed that it is worth while for well to do, even very wealthy men, to cheat a very poor man out of pitiful little sums, monies that these people can hardly see. But if one brings the instance under general principles, one ceases to be amazed: neither the Saint nor the man of letters ever neglects the little things.

It will be a very great pleasure if you and Mrs Mackenzie and your company will come and see us. Let me have a line a day or two ahead. We are very rarely away, but we are sometimes away: for instance, we are keeping Thanksgiving with an American gentleman next Saturday.

I am delighted to hear of your Oxford appointment; you could not do better.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

I note what you say about cheque date.

High Street, Old Amersham, Bucks.

July'37

My dear Summerford,

I am sure that you had a very splendid holiday in Provence. I had — 41 years ago.

'The Hill of Dreams' has had its best compliment. You say Provence reminded you of the book: I could wish for nothing better. And, as it oddly happens, there is a connection between the terrafabulosa and the tale. When I was writing the first chapter, in February, 1896, in Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn, in describing a hot summer, it came upon me to utter the sentence: 'and white walls of old farm houses blaze in the sunlight as if they stood in Arles or Avignon or famed Tarascon by Rhone'.

Whereupon I said to myself: (more or less) 'that sounds good to me; I'll go there' — and did so the following August.

We have just returned from a very delightful visit to Clomendy Wood, between Caerleon and Usk; guests of Mr and Mrs Laybourne. They took us all over the country in a big car for the highways and a little car for the narrow lanes; by all sorts of places, open and secret, that I had not seen since I tramped them in the 'seventies and 'eighties. We talked Llangibby Hunt, of what Efan the Huntsman said to Old Lawrence the Master on a proposition to feed the hounds in a new way, of Lord Raglan's nose bleeding over the Hunt Supper, of how a member of the congregation of Llanddewi Fach (my father's old church) wondered whether he would be strong enough to hold down the Rector A. Williams if he suddenly developed Homicidal Mania in the pulpit — which seemed more than likely. I was happy to give Mrs Williams, Llangibby, a bit of hot news: that Tom Parr, the man who spoilt Caerleon, was an illegitimate descendant of the family of Ambrose, Waun-y-pwll, extinct c. 1860. I am sorry to say that Purefoy, listening attentively to all the stories of the good old days, came to the conclusion that the Nobility and Gentry of Gwent were a race of madmen.

When are you and Mrs Mackenzie — to whom our loves — renewing your acquaintance with the kitchen of the King's Arms? Please name an early date — excepting July, 10, 13 and 16. I have been thinking how strangely holidays and changes differ: Provence, Paris with the Greenwoods, Clomendy Wood — all admirable, but immane quantum discrepant.

And by the way: Laybourne said to me: 'I can't imagine how you managed to give such an admirable description of Penhow Castle in "The Chronicle of Clemendy".'

'Well,' said I, 'I saw it for the first time yesterday, when you drove past the Castle.'

I could see he didn't believe me; not a word. I mention this, not for the sake of the personal compliment, but because the circumstance illustrates the true theory of Literature as distinct from Journalism. Prius in mente quam in corpore; and corpus doesn't matter much anyhow in Literature. Yet Mr Blank still goes to Dashe in search of Local Colour for his forthcoming book.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear Summerford,

I hope you are most thoroughly enjoying Paris, after your dip into Teutonism. Two things occur to me concerning Paris.

Do you know the stained glass of the Sacré Coeur, Montmartre? It struck me as very remarkable — and very beautiful.

And What a pity the Government added sugar to the official Pernod. I always like mine unsweetened.

We celebrate the Fair on Sept. 20. Be here about, or rather at, 7 p m. I do hope Mrs Mackenzie will be available: Purefoy is writing to her.

Dec. 23’37

My dear Summerford,

Not long after the war, I was accustomed every Saturday to take a glass of dubious and metallic absinthe in a Mooney pub in a turning off Fleet Street. The barman came from County Tipperary; and on one occasion, after serving me with my absinthe, he gave the next customer his dose of Irish from the same measure.

‘What’s this you’re giving me? It’s got a quare taste.’

The barman leant over the bar and said in a confidential, impressive, stage whisper:

‘There’s good in it. It’s absinthe. It’s very dear.’

The customer was satisfied, as one having the best of the bargain.

And so I am sure there is good in ‘The Crystal Cabinet’ for which I thank you very much. But what made the woman think that the verb may be omitted in an English sentence? Thus:

I walked under the trees. Green trees. Leafy trees. Old trees. Trees that Dr Johnson might have admired, if he had happened to care twopence about trees of any kind or sort.

This painful gibberish was introduced by one Bart Kennedy 30-40 years ago and was highly approved by Lord Northcliffe.

We must fix that January meeting. Till then may you make the merriest Xmas.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Mrs says that she has not read the book, that her taste was formed in extreme youth by ‘Comin’ Through the Rye’ and ‘Cometh up as a Flower’, and so she may love ‘The Crystal Cabinet’.

The following recipes were enclosed with the letter of 23 December 1937.

PUNCH

Dog and Duck No. 1.

Take Gin and Sauternes, the latter the sweeter the better, and mix according to the taste and capacity of yourself and your friends. N.B. the white Burgundies won’t do.

Dog and Duck No. 2.

As above: but with the addition of any small Burgundy or Bordeaux. The quantities have never been measured; they are ascertained in mixing and follow the taste of the mixer. Or, as one has said: ‘Dog and Duck Punch is an essentially fluid conception.’

Rum Punch (hot)

1 Bottle Rum*

1 Quart Green Tea — after 3 or 4 minutes decoction Juice of 4 Lemons.”

“3 Oranges Peel of Lemon and Orange Sugar to taste Grate 6 lumps of sugar on the lemons Keep hot and covered.

---

* Rum is weaker now than in 1905. Perhaps another 1/2 bottle?

My dear Summerford,

It is benevolent of you to tell me that you liked the Waite review. I hope the Old’Un liked it! I am sitting in the shade and keeping quiet. But we cannot let you away to the misty islands without a word. When are you going? If not immediately; then, will you and Mrs Faith come down between 5-6 Saturday, May 28? If immediately: will next Saturday May 21 serve? I insist on Saturday because that is the best chance of getting something eatable. I think the Henry VII Arms have found out that the rebuilt Crown is not a formidable competitor —— and so canis reversus…

Oct. 14.’41

My dear Summerford,

write to urge on you the performance of a Corporal Work of Mercy.

The case is thus. You know, I think, that A. E. Waite has been very ill for the last year or more. For some reason, I know not what, Mrs Waite is now resident in North Wales; so there is no one at hand to type letters; while Sybil suffers badly from a Neuritis in the arms, which makes writing very painful for her. I have kept up a sort of one-sided correspondence with Waite, with a very occasional note from Sybil. In the last of these she says:

‘What has happened to Colin? He came to see us before he went into the monastery, but we have not had a line since he left it.’

The address is:

Gordon House Bridge Nr Canterbury, Kent.

And there is another Corporal Work of Mercy which is also to be urged on you: that is, to show yourself here. We have been vaguely hoping for the last few weeks that you and Norah would manifest at the King’s Arms some Sunday; or turn up here, morning or evening, at about the time when ‘they’ open.

I hope all goes well with you. In case you do not see the horrible paper, I enclose a leaf of it. Who would have thought that modem Eire could furnish a new version— ‘The man who disliked MacNeice’ — of the ancient, ‘The man who struck O’Hara?’

July 9.'"

My dear Summerford,

We had a very cheerful and smiling time with you and Baker, and I am glad indeed to understand that the experience was common. Talk not of the 'feast'; it was not in any proper sense a meal; it might pass, monastically, as a collation. But it may be said, I think, that the Griffin's decent ordinaire mitigates, to some extent, the austerities of the board.

It was a great pleasure to write to you at the Friary; I like jawing, both by script and mouth; and in the region of script, I herewith enclose a very delightful tribute to my faculties in that department. The document — non-returnable — consists of extracts kindly made for me by a friend, from an article in The Manchester Guardian, by one Hogan. I found a great relish in being carried back to the old Verulam Buildings' age, and to the business that employed me there. I wrote to Hogan, thanking him, and telling him about the Bamsbury House with the Green Stain: how I used to urge it to Waite as a desirable residence for him; merely causing the First Mrs Waite to regard me with a greater and deeper loathing than before.

I have put your remarks before Purefoy; and she just says she is quite well. What is one to do?

There is really something extremely exhilarating in being told that there is 'lots more money where that came from'. I can't imagine how you do it, but I believe, with my grateful, amazed recollection of your achievement of March 3.'43. But I think there is no immediate need to meditate manoeuvres. At present, I have in bank just £1690, and I think I ought to worry along on this for some while yet.

Many thanks for the Tree of 'Gentility' (as the Welsh lists of the Saints call such a document) of the late Mrs John Davenport. I was once quite familiar with the aspect of her grandfather and grandmother. They were opposite to me in Great Russell Street, period'93-'95 — and I often saw Ian at the window, script in his hand, learning a part, and illustrating it with the other hand in gesture: a grim, lean man. More smiling, more gracious, the moving apparition of Mrs Ian, daughter of Joe, beloved of the Airs and Graces. She would, like rosy fingered dawn, leap from her dim couch and appear at her window, in what looked like scanty pink fleshings, smile at Great Russell Street and the world, and proceed to do her hair. She was like the isle of Zacynthus in Homer: ‘Very conspicuous’.

My dear Summerford,

Here is the odd gipsy story. What emerges, for me, is the tribal view that the tribe is quite competent to settle its own little troubles by its own law and custom and dislikes the intervention of the Gentile Magistrate. We used to have them about us in Llanddewi: my father used to compare phrases from Borrow with the local idiom in his progress through the lanes. He once baptized a gipsy baby by the odd name of Gentilee.

get up now after breakfast and lounge about. I believe the Dr thinks I go on as well as may be. She hints that I am rather old.

Sorry to hear the last news of Norah: that she has got a cold. Her colds are apt to be bad colds. And she will be vexed by the death of Heinemann Evans, who liked her work. She found him, I believe, a very pleasant fellow. I did not; partly, because he told me that a chapter of mine was a recollection of a former life; partly, because he wrote me a pretty curt letter when I applied for some 'reading' for his firm.

When you write to the Bakers pray put in our very cordial regards.

My dear Summerford,

Very many thanks for your good letter and your good wishes. I have been feeling a good deal brighter for the last 2 or 3 weeks; not so limp as I was when you last saw me. Conveyed by the family I was again at the King’s Arms yesterday and felt no worse for the trip.

Pray dismiss from your mind, utterly and entirely all anxieties about that money. Just don’t think of it at all. These are the small bothers that are solved by time.

I am never quite sure what year it was when we met, but I think it must have been in’24 or’25. I believe you were under 16 at the time. You can still relish ‘The Secret Glory’? I am surprised and pleased too, I do assure you. There are so few books, I find, that ‘keep’ well. I read a book, enjoy it very much: look at it again in 5 or 10 years time and find that it has all turned to dust.

Pray remember me very cordially to Fr Wason. Has he tried ‘Things Near and Far’? I incline to think the former book the better of the two, but I have heard the reverse opinion expressed.

hope that someone will be ‘raised up’ — see A.E. Waite — to take the place of the Swedenborgian; and that before long.

Our love and best wishes

Yours,

Arthur Machen

July 9.’45

My dear Summerford,

Now then! Will you do your best to collect at the Griffin, on Tuesday, July 17, at 12.30: —

Yourself, Norah, James Stephens, Barbara? And will you let me hear as soon as ever you can? Things are in such a state here that it is necessary to give notice. The King’s Arms is mostly shut, so the other places are apt to be crowded out. At the Griffin, the little ordinaire is finished. The cooking remains; but if you will look on the visit as the Visitation of the Sick, you will be all right. Of course I should very much like to meet Stephens. I praised ‘The Crock of Gold’ as well as I could in the Evening News about 30 years ago.

I do assure you that little matter of money does not cause me the slightest inconvenience. In the past I have dimly noted little yellow slips among cheques from the Bank, signifying payments from you. But you will attend to all that, since I am not capable of attending to anything much.

When you are in Barra, keep a sharp look out for Fairies, Peechts, and that sort of people. There was a correspondence in the Sunday Times a few weeks ago on odd numeral words and ‘Fairy Counting’ which recalled old interests of mine very vividly. It would have been very useful for a story I was writing in’95.

Now let me hear directly that you are all coming on Tuesday, July 17.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Sept. 25.’45

My dear Summerford,

It is very pleasant to hear that you relished the little party at the Griffin: but let the praise be given to Stephens; a very rare fellow and fine company. It must be 34 years since I did my best for ‘The Crock of Gold’ in the Evening News. About the same time there was another good companion discovered; a very different one, Caradoc Evans, very turbulent, highly entertaining. He united a strong dislike of Calvinist Preachers with extreme delight in and reverence for their ‘singing religious eloquence’ which you know as the Tonus Prefationis. On one occasion he had gone to a Welsh chapel in the London suburbs to hear a famous preacher, and told me: ‘Indeed, it was lucky I thought of it beforehand and had a couple of pints, or he would have got me.’

How did the gale go with you on Barra? I read of it, and murmured the lines of Bums in his Address to the Devil: ‘I’m wae to think upo’ yon den (Hell!) E’en for thy sake.’ But there is one thing: your Paying Guest’ got his value and more: he who goes to the Hebrides does not look for the weather of the Hesperides.

Of Sheep’s Head, the following moral story is told. All my days I had a peculiar distaste for all the odds and ends of animals: all the materials which went to Don Quixote’s Saturday dinner, which the author calls ‘pains and breakings’. I had never so much as looked on any of them, save only kidneys — till I came to inhabit theatrical rooms in Rupert St., Soho. On a certain day there, midday dinner was Sheep’s Heart. I found it sorry eating, tough and tasteless. Hoping, I think, to mend this, I went out at a venture to cadge a supper from Sandy Stewart, a journalist, in Gray’s Inn. The supper was Sheep’s Head. I call this, rubbing it in.

Much in the style of the recent gale at Galway: it just took off the roof of the Anglican Cathedral: very marked, it seems to me.

You would like to Journalize a bit? I suppose the recipe is to write to a friend in Fleet Street. Have you asked Norah about it? Reverting to the kitchen: I once knew an actor who felt bound to abstain from Blood and from things Strangled. He never told me what his attitude was as to Things Offered to Idols.

Purefoy sends her love, and sends two recent discoveries: Turbot in white sauce, with corncobs. Bream: white sauce and young artichokes; both excellent.

We light a candle to St Mary of Amersham for your safe return.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear Summerford,

If I were in communion with the See of Rome, I should ask you to procure for me everything of a plenary kind that the Holy Father has in stock, since infirm old age is in need of any number of indulgences, absolution, pardon and remission, that is to be had. I can see very little, I forget everything, and I never know where it is. ‘It’ = anything. Which reminds me somewhat of the last will and testament of Rabelais. I have nothing, I owe a great deal, and the rest I leave to the poor. Or, more concisely, I should have written to you long ago. I assure you that you have not been out of mind; but you have certainly been out of sight for a sadly long day. For our sake and your own I wish you could offer a clearer, nearer prospect of return. If you could have reported that the smuggling industry was in a flourishing condition, and that Schiedam and Rightnantz were nestling under every rock: there might be something to be said for Barra; but as it is — Juge crudelis terras, fuge litus avarum as soon as you can.

News. Janet and her husband are still in the purlieus of Bristol. He has some sort of a job there. But they can find no place to live in, and so are quartered on mother-in-law, not an ideal position for either party. Hilary has set up as Electrician at Northampton, and I hope he will do well. But I should have been better pleased if he could have got back to his old firm, who always treated him and his family very well indeed. But: not a house to be found in all Penvro within possible vicinity of his job. And, I gather, from an American correspondent of the B.B.C. that housing is in an ever more horrible condition in U. S. A., where, let it be noted, they have not a Labour government. A day or two ago, we lunched at the King’s Arms with Oliver Stonor and Sister Barbara. Stonor has had a novel accepted by Gollancz, on good terms, he says. I expect you have heard that Barbara is parted from Pickup. We both thought that Norah had made a great success out of difficult material in her latest book. Indeed, I wrote to her that the result was grubby but grand. And I do hope that she will do well out of it financially.

Ours is the guinea-fowl’s cry: ‘Come back.’

Many many thanks. You were always dear to her, in the early years and in the late. I hope we shall meet before very long. But you will see only half of me.

A sunny day in Sept. Postmark 25 September 1947

My dear Summerford,

Thank you yet again for your cheerful cheering letter. I was more particularly pleased, because I have been meditating for some time that the spectacle of the old one on his last legs could not be very exhilarating. You reassure me, and I hope you are right.

Janet and her husband departed to Bristol a few days ago, and Mrs Hilary does her very best, and gives me every possible care, early and late. Hilary, in view of the Basic Petrol Charge, gave up his job at High Amersham and has got a new one, which pleases him better, because purely electrical, at the Euston Road. He goes off at 7 and comes back at 7. He likes the people at the new place, as well as the work, particularly a workman who is an Austrian Jew, who is amusing.

He and I, I gather, both owe you our thanks for promoting the kind offices of Mrs Glock, who introduced him to the electric chief of Covent Garden. There was a good job for him there and he would have liked it very much, but he would have had to be about the theatre, or, at least, within call, from 10 to after the fall of the curtain. This, he felt, would shatter ‘the home’. He was sorry, and I was sorry.

I think Norah Hoult, Cook aiding her, managed to slip away to Italy, and I hope she is having a great time there. I shall be very glad to see her back, for I am badly in need of cheering, and she always cheers. Did you hear on the wireless the case of Henriquez, who met a Commando, was taken back to camp a bag of broken bones, was given up by the Army Surgeons, and then cured in three weeks by sitting on the banks of a river and doing a little mild fishing — this on the orders of a person described merely as ‘the great surgeon’? Henriquez said he left his hearers to judge how it was done: he didn’t know. But the bones, which had been obstinately apart, under all the Army surgeon’s efforts, including a sort of iron cage, joined up securely after the three weeks spent by the river. Curious?

Janet says the inside of her (prefabricated) house is rather like a ship’s cabin: everything folds back on the wall. It amuses her. The Fair is just over: to me a rather sad reminder of the old days.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

My dear Summerford,

Storm and rain in Barra, and here we wonder gratefully whether the summer will ever end. The finest since 1921.I almost think the finest I have ever known. Though'68 or'69 was amazing when the mountain caught fire.

Come when you will; we have no appointments. I hope we may be able to get a drink at the King's Arms. Coleridge said Swift was the anima Rabelaisii habitans in sicco. We all dwell in a dry place.

LETTERS TO A. E. WAITE. 1902-1942

A. E. Waite, on whose invitation Machen joined the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn

13 Rupert Street, W.

Monday

My Dear Waite, Be not forgetful of the summons for tomorrow (Tuesday). You must go into the Wine Bar at Stone's, & if you see no one there, ask for Mr Ayrton, and then you shall be taken into the appointed place. But be there by two, without fail, if you would see long days in the land of the living.

There is still silence over all the mystic territory. It is true I have received a letter, but rather, I believe, from the terrestrial & inferior Shepherdess than from the Supernal Lilith. However, I have made an appointment with her, which I shall keep alone, that I may more thoroughly discover whether she have any Rite to administer. Otherwise, as I have said, there is silence & dimness over all things. 'In the good time the torches shall be lighted, and there shall be the voice of singing in the Syon.'

Yours fraternally,

Arthur Machen

13 Rupert Street, W.

Sunday

My Dear Waite,

I think the Fairy Melusine gave you to understand in the course of your impressive conversation yesterday that I could not see you on Wednesday, on account of the matinée. Will Thursday do instead? And if so, could not Melusine also be present, that we might discuss the very grave affair of your reformation, which dates, I think, from tomorrow? It seems to me a 3 bottle problem, if any true light is to be cast on the matter.

I believe I am deeply pledged, sub conditione, to submit to the Latin church. Here also there is need of a conference; and indeed there seems to be to be enough matter between us to authorize a session without end. We have done amiss in the past, my dear brother, in neglecting one another, and it seems to me that we should repair our errors by a more constant association. For the day of the great battle Armageddon assuredly draws nigh, and the time is short.

Will Thursday at 4, Café de l'Europe, suit you? Let me know.

Yours fraternally,

Arthur Machen

13 Rupert Street, W.

Saturday

My Dear Waite,

In the first place let me ask you to visit me here on Wednesday next at 5.30 for tea and conversation. Let it be done punctually and without fail. Secondly, let me tell you of my interview with the Shepherdess on Friday last. It has filled me with alarm, after much the same fashion as I was filled with alarm to see that Christopher was unable to eat his luncheon some fortnight ago. What did I find? A pleasant, pretty woman who did not much interest me, whom I greeted without joy and left without a sense of loss. And I remembered the acute and exquisite delight that her mere presence had once afforded me; the romances, the wonders, the fascinations that she had once dispensed as from an inexhaustible house of treasure; and my anguish was great, not because I had desired and lost her, but because I knew that if she were to be given to me now, she would be but little to me. And my anguish was great because I desired desire. I remembered something I had written about one 'who, as it were, shivered in the eternal ice, and yet was insensible to the heat of fire, even if it were given him'.

It is clear that I ought to go to a spiritual Derby, call in a ghostly doctor, and live on spiritual milk and soda for many days — following the analogy of Christopher & the beefsteak.

But I do not know how this can be done, and shall be glad of your profound consideration and advice. I only know that Mrs Rosse, late Lilith, does not interest me at all: I confess and deplore it, because a great sacrament is taken away, and none other given to replace it.

We wonder and adore while we tremble; being assured that Life is to come, that Love is to be plenteously bestowed, that we shall see the good things of the Lord in terra viventium. Immo vere, frater Dilecta, even now the Mensa dulcissimi convivii is prepared. Write to us concerning these latter things.

Yours fraternally,

Arthur Machen

13 Rupert Street, W. Wednesday

My Dear Waite,

I saw Dorothy Purefoy yesterday, and asked her if she would meet you on Friday at the Cafe. She would have been overjoyed, bur she has folk coming to tea.

Do you, nevertheless, call here at 4 on that day, and we will proceed to the Cafe or delay here as you feel inclined. Let it be done without fail, since (to use a phrase altogether mundane), the times are ‘ticklish’ and require great consultations.

The Page’s Pageant seems to advance with rapid steps, and the Page appears inclined to preconise a Feast of Eight Torches with Ruling of the Choir. Her mother, with an asperity unworthy of a mother in Yisroal, has acquired a habit of raining blows on her head, charging her with whoredom the while; the which amenities have caused Berthelda to declare that she will have ‘peace’.

Yours fraternally,

A. M.

5 Cosway Street In Vigilie Nat. Dni 1905

Dilectissime Frater,

In return for your card, take from us both all good wishes to you & to yours, now & always. In the great Names, & by the great Names may you always be defended from persons who, in themselves harmless idiots, are yet symbols & omens of danger & distraction & perturbation within & without. Dissipentur inimici tui: ab homine iniquo et doloro Dni eruat te. I am sorry you did not join us the other day: there was a defection, from one cause or another, well nigh universal; & this much hinders our working. But I fear you have hardly penetrated the peculiar veils which we use in this special Order, & the said veils are certainly very remote from those which experience has led you to expect. May I hint to you that very curious circumstances in the way of grades & the fashion in which they are taken are latent in the society? I mean that it is possible that the grades as they are commonly known do not always coincide with certain other grades interior & more secret. Do not think that I am making pretensions of that kind which, (I am sure), must be to you most familiar & accursed in your dealings & parleyings with secret Orders. But — to say as much as it is convenient or possible to say — you know, do you not, that this world in all things, & above all in interior things, is a world of paradox. To take an example of what I mean: Florence Farr & Blackden are, I believe & suppose, learned in all the 'Wisdom of the Egyptians', in all 'occult' knowledge. But — for all essential purposes — they are about as complete a pair of 'rotters' as I have ever seen. This is a paradox; not without suggestive application. And: another point: the average secret society presupposes, as you yourself have said, that the initiator is, in a certain sense, superior to the initiated, superior, that is, because he possesses certain information which he imparts to the neophyte; who is, by this process, admitted into a circle of knowledge outside which, (by the hypothesis) he stood, before his initiation. Now, imagine if you will, a society which makes no pretence of knowing anything which the outsider, the neophyte, does not know; which has no temple or circle to which admittance is given; which bids its members look within, & uncover, & remove, & Behold, & Make the Great Interior Entrance —— from Within to Within, instead of from Without to Somebody Else’s notion of Within. I hasten to say that these are hints & suggestions & not by any means Scientific Information. And let me add: it is all secret from Miss B!

We have been most wonderfully fortunate in worldly things this Xmas. A fortnight ago we really & literally had not nearly enough to eat. And then came presents: two £5 notes; two pheasants, a dozen of wine, a fowl, two plum puddings, a great box of chocolates, & minor gifts. To cap all this Grant Richards writes to say that he will buy the copyright of those books of mine for the £50 which I demanded. I shall believe this, though, when I get his cheque. He also repeats, more or less, his proposals for a new book. I wish I thought I could do it; but I fear there is little hope. However; if he becomes definite I shall try what I can do.

I wish I could report to you as handsome things of the Supersubstantial Bread. Alas! there is still dryness, dryness, dryness; there is darkness within, the doors are closed, the ears are deaf & the sound of the incantation is not heard in the streets. I know of no help but in the homely maxim of ‘patience & perseverance’. After all; what have I deserved else? what do I deserve else?

Have you ever remarked the fact that a bodily benefit is put forward by the church as the result of a good Communion? Such benefit is noted, I find, in the ‘Imitation’, & is prayed for in the mass. Curiously enough, in the Anglican Rite the phrase ‘preserve thy body & soul to everlasting life’ is used. I have reason to believe that the claim is no vain one. I think, too, that there are facts which some have noted that make it most improbable that such corporeal effects are the results of ‘imagination’. If I give you a glass of plain water, & tell you, as soon as you have swallowed it, that it contains a powerful though tasteless cathartic drug, you will, likely enough, be violently ill on the spot; though the water is absolutely pure. But if I give you a glass of water in a ritual, saying: Drink this; it is the Communion of Death: & you go away expecting that nothing very much will happen to you — certainly nothing bodily — & yet fall dead in four or five hours time when you have forgotten all about the Ritual — then, I think, we may fairly conclude that ‘there is something in it’.

Did I show you that curious story of Jondar in the Arabian Nights? If I did, you will remember that Jondar, searching after an Enchanted Treasure, (symbolizing, from its description, Wisdom & Power), has to knock / // /// on a gate & then has to pass through Seven Trials. He is required to submit: to stretch forth his neck to the swordsman, to bare his breast to the Archers &c till at last his mother appears, & her he must curse & revile & make to take off her clothes! Is not all this very suggestive of a Ritual? Do you know of any mention of masonic knocking as early as this? (10th or 11th century isn't it?) Oddly enough Jondar is a widow's son, who is persecuted & finally killed by his two wicked Brothers. And oddly enough he is given an Enchanted Saddle Bag from which every kind of food can be produced — the Graal, is it not, in its earlier form? It seems to me we have here some odd points, which ought to lead to something.

I wish you could send me the collections you have made on the Graal. In the first place I should very much like to read them; & secondly, coming fresh to the subject points might strike me which might prove useful in the investigation. But, I think we ought to know more about the survival of the Gnostic Sects; & I am inclined to doubt whether the Manichaean sect is the only possible origin. There were other Gnostic heresies which might easily have lingered in the Syrian hills — which, perhaps, are there now.

Forgive all this discursion & discussion: but you know Mahomet must in certain circumstances go to the mountain.

I remain, very dear Brother,

Yours ever fraternally

A. M.

21 Feb. 1906

Dilectissime,

Very many thanks for your good epistle. Firstly: as to the practical matter. Nutt's epitomes are epitomes and nothing more: absolutely dry enumerations of the events: like this something: 'Percival, the son of a widow (1) brought up in ignorance of the world (2) sees three Knights (3) and asks his mother what they are (4) &c &c.' This is not what I mean: I suggest extracts, nicely translated, eked out by full summaries, where and if the text threatens to become of undue length. I do not think, though, you need be afraid of the length: one can get a lot of matter into an average-sized book, and if needful you could have two volumes without any difficulty from the publisher's point of view, or the selling point. Next, as to our working together, I hardly see how this can be, except indirectly. You know that all my notes are at your disposition in the fullest sense, for any purpose you may have: but if I understand you aright, they are not likely to be of much service to you; since they tend to support a hypothesis which it would not interest you to work out. When I began this investigation I had three main points before me: (1) The Celtic Church (2) The Templars (3) The Albigenses, or some other possibly existing society. It is by a process of exhaustion that (2) and (3) have vanished; as I have been convinced that the Graal has no more to do with either one or the other than it has with the Particular Baptists. But you must not think that I believe the 'Theory' I sent you exhausts the whole case: it merely posits the probable Celtic prima materies from which the Graal Legend as we have it, was shaped. This is not to say that the Romancers have not introduced much new matter into their recasting.

Now, I gather that your position with respect to the proposed work — say rather with respect to any work on the subject — is somewhat difficult. You have a theory, but you can get no convincing evidence in support of it. This is a position which you must consider with yourself: but I again repeat you must think of all my notes as absolutely your own — if they are of service to you.

I must tell you that I read Sebastian Evans's book yesterday, and found it most entertaining. Here are his solutions:

Percival = S. Dominic Galahad = S. Francis of Assisi Gawain = Archbp. Fulk Lancelot = Simon de Montfort senior The Rich Fisher = Innocent III Percival's Silence = The failure of Dominic to discuss the Universal Exemption of the Cistercians from Interdict with Pope Innocent. Gawain's Silence = The failure of Fulk in the same way.

The 'blasting' that befell Lloegrwys = The Interdict on England 1208 - 1214.

The Recovery of the Graal = The Removal of the Interdict.

The Graal = Celebration of the Eucharist.

All this is most ingeniously and elaborately supported. Two points strike me (1) How does this theory explain the final withdrawal of the Graal? (2) Can it not be absolutely shewn that the 'Silence of Percival' was known and written down before 1208-1214?

I think there are three ways of explaining the 'Withdrawal of the Graal'; which as you say is most important, since it signifies that True Masses have ceased from the world. Firstly, we may take this as a remanent from the Folk Lore, which is always ready to assume that 'once upon a time' there were great marvels and happenings, which have ceased to be. It is the 'long, long ago' feeling, which admits there are no marvels and miracles now, but believes there were such things of old time.

Secondly, it may be the expression of some Celts' opinion that the Mass, without the Epiclesis, is a maimed mass.

And again; it may be the union and commixture of these two feelings: and this is my personal explanation of the matter and also the disappearance of the actual relic. Was there not a tacit convention that we should avoid mere argument? If this still stands: good: if not: have at you for all your opinions as to the Church and the Heresies! From them all, so far as I understand them, I wholly and heartily dissent: in the hypothesis of the Holy Assembly I do not believe: in the Popish Church as the Sole Custodian of the Faith or Sacraments I utterly disbelieve! I am ready if necessary to maintain theses on all these points, when and where you will.

I expect you on Saturday at the Museum, somewhere on the A range of desks before 4:30.

Tuesday

Dilectissime,

Herewith I send you the titles of Werner: you will see that the plays you are interested in are included in the ‘Theater’.

Also find herewith a brief acknowledgement from Benson. I shall be curious to learn what use he proposes to make of our masterpiece. You see he calls it my play: of course I told him that it was our joint labour. In any case, I feel certain that he will not give an order to his wardrobe master for the making of seven dalmatics of red silk — to say nothing of a set of red episcopal vestments. It would be possible of course to dress the seven as Eastern Deacons — albs and red stoles — but I should prefer dalmatics.

With respect to the Dove in Holy Grail symbolism — you know that the Blessed Sacrament was reserved in England (and I think everywhere) in the Middle Ages in a vessel shaped like a Dove. ‘Dove-House’, Columbarium was synonymous with Tabernacle. The sculpture I told you of — a Dove holding a wafer over a vessel shaped thus —— alludes, perhaps, to this custom; or rather the custom and the sculpture both allude to the working of the Holy Spirit in the Eucharist; a matter which became and remains somewhat obscured in the west. I have written to the author of the Church Times article on the Healing Cup, asking if there is any kind of documentary evidence. In my opinion it is probable that the relic is much earlier than the crusades — wooden chalices date back to centuries IV and V. I propose also to take steps to find out the meaning of those curious statements about the chalice in the ‘High History’ and the ‘Panegyric’ of S. Columba.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

We shall meet on Saturday; and after the Rites you will come home with us. Purefoy will be at M.M.H. at 1.30 for examination.

Tuesday

Dilectissime,

I see that we shall meet on Saturday next: mind you set your house in order so that you can come home with us for the evening. I must again urge on you the weekly meeting at the Garrick Tavern, on Fridays, at 2 p m.

Proposition (after reading morsels of strange, outlandish, dubious Liturgies —— Coptic, Jacobite, Nestorian, Abyssinian &c).

The tom and soiled hem of the Raiment of Holy Church compared with the whole Sacristy of ‘Occultism’ is as Fair Rubies and Orient Pearls compared with Mud and Dung.

Proposition. The most holy and interior Truths or Mysteries, being uttered or formulated, ipso facto, become foolish and soul-poisoning Heresies. So ‘Protestantism’ itself was once a holy, everburning Lamp. The Doors were opened, and it was instantly made and remains a Black Smoke of Perdition, and a Pestiferous and Stinking Vapour.

You will be interested to hear that I have found an Albigensian Ritual, containing the Rites of Admission, Consolation, and Consolation of the Sick. Date about 1250-1260. ‘Dissenting’ in tone: no hint of Eucharist: ‘Consolation’ (administered by laying on of a Book and of Hands and by the Kiss) described as the Baptism of the Holy Ghost and of Fire. Ministers the ancien and the bons hommes. But, oddly enough, the chief, one might say the only, ornament of the MS is the Fish; which is repeated again and again! sometimes it is an initial letter, sometimes a Fish in the margin is caught by a line attached to a letter in the text.

I have found out some curious coincidences about an early British person I have been investigating lately. We will call him X, or rather St. X, as he was much reputed for holiness, and for the planting of Xty in Britain.

Firstly, then, his birth was prophesied by the catching of a Fish.

2. — He was famous under a Welsh nickname which is said to mean Vir Aquaticus.

3. — He was of the Lineage of King David.

4. — He had ancestors of the name of ‘Avallach’.

5. — He is described as providing the Xtians with the Sacred Vessels for the Eucharist.

6. — The first church he built was at Glastonbury.

7. — He obtained his Order from Jerusalem where he was given a mysterious Altar in which the Lord’s Body had lain. This altar, the matter of which no man could comprehend, was transported to him through the air from Jerusalem, and vanished after his death. William of Malmesbury says it was ‘lost’ for a long time, and identifies it with the Glastonbury Altar stone, called Sapphirus. It is called altare anceps by an earlier writer (c. 1090 A.D.), anceps meaning both ‘uncertain’ and ‘perilous’.

8. — Cadwaladr the Blessed after whose death in 664 the whole British Church for some unknown reason drooped and pined away, was of Saint X’s Lineage, and was called the Last King of Britain. Cadwaladr is said to have gone on some kind of holy errand to some far land; and it was believed that with the return of his bones (or of himself, reincarnate), with the return also of certain lost relics all things would be restored and the Golden Age be renewed.

It makes the foundation of a pretty hypothesis, which may or may not be strengthened. Let us always remember Prof. Saintsbury’s caution, and decline to say nous savons unless we do know.

I have looked up the Bollandists on S. Joseph of Arimathea. They scoff at the ‘Apostle of Britain’ Story, and say, more or less rudely, that it was invented by the Liar who wrote about King Arthur.

By the way, I see that Nutt, in his little book, is of the opinion that the G. Romances ‘reveal attempts to claim for the Knightly priesthood a position and sanction equal if not superior to those of the regular priesthood’. He is speaking, of course, of the Templars, and he thinks that Henry II ‘backed up’ this movement.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Thursday

Dilectissime,

We hope to turn up to Tea & Equinox next Saturday: you will come back with us, I hope.

know the possibility of keeping anything secret interests you; & I think that the case of ‘Shelta’ is probably unique. About 30 years ago, I suppose, Leland heard two men jabbering a strange lingo in the Euston Road. This lingo turned out to be a secret Gaelic language: a mixture of primitive Gaelic, rhyming slang, back slang, Latin, Greek, & Hebrew invented by Irish monks c. 900 A.D., & transmitted by them, through the ecclesiastical metal workers of Ireland to the tinkers of today. The secret was kept, say, from 900 to 1875!

Tuesday

Dilectissime,

What has befallen you? You go out into the confusion of the night, and are seen no more. I have been expecting more proofs of the Graal.

We went down for ten days into the country in August and had a very pleasant time. I trust you are keeping well and that 'things' — meaning worldly matters — are tolerable, or more than tolerable.

I am dwelling in the midst of alarms. On receiving my last Academy cheque I was startled by its appalling minuteness, and on reckoning up my contributions found that, without any intimation to me, they had reduced my rate by 10% per thousand! Alas for the word of an English noble! I regard the scutcheon of the proud Douglases as stained. I have written a very civil letter to Douglas, pointing out the demerits of the case, and suggesting that it must be a clerical error in the office. But I fear me that my Academy days are done. In the meanwhile I have got an apology for a job on a lousy sheet called 'T.P.s Weekly'. Of course it is all the doing of the extraordinary Crosland, who acts, I think, from some obscure and mysterious centre of purposeless malignity, without any true Act of the Will, properly so called. I do not know to what he would be 'referred' cabalistically but he seems to me to approximate to those Ghosts who are always breaking crockery, and throwing saucepans about, without any very clear idea of why they do it, or what they want. As a student of things deep, obscure, and hidden beneath the earth, I am sure you will be interested in a remark that I heard Crosland make. After proclaiming (with oaths) his entire devotion to the Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church; he declared (also with oaths) that there was more holiness to the square yard in the Primitive Methodist denomination than in any other sect or assembly of Christians. On the whole I am inclined to think that a Paper should be read on him at Oliver's.

I received a brief note from England this morning informing me that he has just been received into the Roman Fold. I trust it will be to his soul's health.

Woolley, the curate, has got a 'job' on the phrase 'a Watcher and a Holy One' from the Prophet Daniel. He intends to prove that 'a Watcher' is an emissary of Satan; and I believe he will devote his life to this great task. Is purposeless mania to be the chief feature of the days before the last great battle called Armageddon?

When shall we see you?

Dilectissime,

We were sorry not to see you on Saturday night. I think Purefoy had said something to our vicar about the possibility of your coming round, as the said priest called and hoped you would come, since he wanted you to give him some tips about the angels!

I gather that the Dr Cobb of whom you have spoken is not exactly a persona grata in Catholic Anglican circles. He is regarded as a renegade, a Hensley Henson (= a rationalist) under a feeble disguise of mysticism, and finally as a ‘blasphemous madman!’

Is what I call the ‘Bristol Graal’ stirring at all?

When are you coming round?

Dilectissime,

I should have written to you before to say that I cannot be with you on Wednesday, since Hudleston has a fortnight's engagement to dine with me on that night. I am sorry. When can you come here? I ask particularly because I have a drink that might 'do you some good'. One of the Stingo people mixed absinthe and Italian vermouth in one bottle by mistake. They were going to throw it down the sink, but Mr Brown said 'Mr Machen may like it!' I tasted it, and called on the rocks to cover me.

I wish I had your power of recuperating by the way of Rites. Yesterday I heard Mass, went to evensong, and then sang the Vespers of the Dead. This morning I 'assisted' at High Mass at 7 a m.! We are both tired to death; in spite of the fact that these high rites were performed with great liturgical exactness.

Perhaps it would be as well — in the event of the remaining proofs not being forthcoming in a day or two — if you would send me your great and marvellous conclusions in the whole matter of the Graal in numbered and summarized form, so that I could present your case in your own words to my intelligent readers of T.P.'s Weekly, And since they are so intelligent: You had better not go beyond words of two syllables! I have not heard yet from Rebman about my book; and I scarcely know what I want to hear. Great is my need of money indeed; but strong is my conviction that, in my case, they would do no good.

Dilectissime Frater,

Very many thanks for your kind reply to Summerford (Exeter College) who wanted to know about the Grail Romances. He is a very promising lad. I believe that he is going into a publishing business with a friend older than himself. It is a small liturgical publishing firm that they have acquired; & I gather that they want to make it more general. I know not what they will make of it.

Herewith a brief note on an old topic. There is something very pleasing in the operations of a Magic Stone being ended by the Board of Agriculture. The enclosure has not survived.

With every good wish

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

It is very nearly 40 years since we first met!

And, by the way, Gow told me that you had come to regard the Universe as a joke of the Eternal; & from what I could infer, not a very good joke at that. I perceive you will end by symbolizing with ‘Rosicrucian’ Jennings. Send for Father Murphy: quick!

Frater Dilectissime,

I am so glad you found some minor treasures in the ashes. Dustmen, they say, are sometimes gladdened by the rare discovery of a silver spoon! By the way, I believe my Arthurian story is the only version that makes Lancelot 'Bishop of Canterbury'!

I am sorry; but I have only single copies of 'Precious Balms', & 'Strange Roads'. 'P.B.' is simply a collection of all the bad reviews of my books from 1895-1924. 'S.R.' is a small thing: two articles of mine made into a little book. They are not bad articles; but nothing to write home about. It never struck me that either book would signify anything to you.

I think you will be glad to hear that Hilary (aged 15) is clamouring to learn Hebrew in place of Physics (what is that nonsense?) &, he hopes, Mathematics. Of course he shall learn Hebrew, & read the Greater Holy Assembly in the original, and Hebrew always comes in useful for incantations.

Are you still thinking of that book I told you to write: your Confession of Faith & Doctrine without the veil of symbolism? Why don't you combine it with a loose autobiography? I can answer for it that it would be of vital interest & high value.

With all good wishes, vows, & prayers

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

(Have you read anything about the Revised Common Prayer? I regard it as a miracle; it is so much better than I had expected.)

Frater Dilectissime,

All my thanks: just what I wanted.

As for the end of a literary life; there is a picturesque way, & a plain way of putting it. You may say that it is a very sad thing that a life of strenuous work, conscientiously performed, should be rewarded with penury & all the miseries and terrors that come in its train. Or, again, you may say that if a man brings goods to the market, whether they be books or cheeses, they must, above all, be marketable. The man may urge that his cheeses were the best he could make, & that it is not his fault if they failed to please. It will be answered — in the words of the judge in 'Erewhon'— 'It may not be your fault, but it is a fault in you.' Do you remember the case? The prisoner was charged with Pulmonary Consumption, a felony. His defence was that he had counterfeited the disease for purposes of fraud; a perfect defence, if he could have sustained it.

I don't remember the title I suggested for your book. Has 'Behind the Veil' (of symbolism) been used? I was very much struck by a sentence I saw somewhere in Hugh Benson: to the effect that he held the Catholic Faith 'by analogy'. He meant, I suppose, that while he believed in 'the foot of the mountain', he did not expect to find mountains based on gigantic human feet, with toes and toenails. I thought the point a remarkable one.

April 28.’30

Dilectissime Frater,

It was a very great pleasure to receive your letter: you did a good action in writing it.

First as to Williams & his War in Heaven: I am afraid the book is of little value. It is largely spoilt by its corrupt following of Chesterton: the Archdeacon, full of craft & piety, with his refrain of ‘For His mercy endureth for ever’, is pure Chesterton. The Latin, of course, is just wild, & your postcard satisfied me that Williams was wrong in thinking that Black Magicians’ Latin has rules peculiar to itself. Gollancz, the publisher, is a most amiable Jew, but I am afraid he lacks discretion. More than a year ago he announced that he was reprinting the complete works of M. P. Shiel. Three or four were issued; & then silence. I often wondered what happened, but I fear I shall never know. A prospectus was issued, giving a short life of Shiel, written by himself: a mass of the most infernal & extraordinary lies. I don’t know whether you remember, but in Gray’s Inn, I used to have a sort of parlour game of asking people to what race they supposed Shiel belonged, & each one guessed a different nation. And Jew Gollancz told me that he was quite sure that S. was a Jew, till he read a bit of Hebrew in one of his own books, & pronounced Tetragrammaton ‘Jehovah’.

As to the Grail: I know of no other example of the incident of the omitted question — which is made odder, if I remember, by the fact that Percival had been strictly instructed that it is bad manners to ask questions. (A curious survival, by the way, of this ancient rule of politeness is found in court circles: you must not ask royalty even whether it has enjoyed the shooting, or whether it admires the scenery.) But I am inclined to think that the question is a matter for the folklorists, that it belongs to the pre-Christian element, & that it has no real concern with the root matter of the Grail. I place it, in fact, in the same class as the Wounded Keeper, who belongs, as I hold, to a remote antiquity. But is there no Folk Lore Journal, or some such paper, in which you could appeal for skilled information on this point?

I have no belief in ‘heretical sects’ as a source of any Grail doctrine. Whatever the Grail may be, it is written in exaltation of the Sacrament at the Altar; & whatever heretical sect you choose, you will find, I believe, that its doctrine of the Sacrament is null, dull, and Protestant. You remember that Albigensian Ritual I found? I could hear something very like it any Sunday; in any meeting house.

Hutchinsons are scoundrels, & always have been. Their conduct to you is entirely blackguardly, & just what I should expect from them. I hope you will recover.

You say nothing of your health or Sybil’s? I hope you are both well. I forget whether I told you that Hilary has been building organs for the last four months. He seems to like it.

Now, remember: when you write to me, you do a good work.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Dilectissime Frater,

Now you, of all people are the last to ask, ‘Why’. The ratio essendi (scholastic Gerund) of the enclosed the enclosure is missing may be dark to you, but you know well that we are surrounded by mysteries; that it is of the definition of man that he can ask many questions which he can never answer.

How are you, & how is Sybil? I hope that you are making grand progress in your terrific task.

Paul England is dead. I have not yet heard fully how & of what; but I gather that he had fallen into a sad condition of mind & body: neurasthenia, I think they call it.

Frater Dilectissime,

What a present! I cannot thank you enough for it, & for the inscription to old friendship, to many adventures of body and spirit undertaken together in the gardens & the halls of Camelot in the days that were. And, by a happy chance, the book came on the day after my seventieth birthday: a good omen for such days as are to come.

Do you know what was the first thing I looked up, as soon as string & brown paper were abolished from the book? Why, that matter of the Albigenses & Simon de Montfort, which has been a weight on my mind for months. Now, I understand why St Louis loved the story; & am much relieved. You cannot extract the odours of the sanctuary from the matter of the muckheap. It was, certainly, horrible to slaughter & massacre & burn those poor wretches: but I like them none the better for the violence & cruelty of their punishment — though I like the authority, civil & ecclesiastical, worse.

It is a grand book; & I find it well produced; the page is admirably clear, a comfort to dim eyes.

Shortly, I shall begin to write to you about it.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

I am drinking Noble Square Face this very day to the prosperity of the magnum. I was too late with John O'London; I feared it would be so.

Dec. 19.’35

Frater Dilectissime,

The hour draws on; the Clerks are singing the Great Oes; I give you the greeting of Christmas: induamus arma Lucis.

Did I ever tell you, how, going to Mass on a Christmas morning, when we lived in Melina Place, I saw, down in Lisson Grove, the milkman going his rounds. He knew nothing of me, but I knew, somehow, that he was a Welshman. So I shouted across the street: Nadôlig Llawen (pronounce: Ithlowen: the th to be insinuated between the two lls, as if a man said Elthl for Ethel) — Merry Christmas. He leapt into the air, & answered with a torrent of his native tongue, with tremendous joy.

I have just been glancing over the current Light: they still send it to me, as I suppose they do to you. I find there the true significance of Xmas, that Myers has gone a bit reincarnationist, & all about St Paul, as delivered by the Cummins —— who, I think, was Bligh Bond’s typist till she discovered that she could do it on her own, without the bother of Bligh Bond. It is all rather Melancholy.

I remember speaking of Bligh Bond & his Glastonbury nonsense to the learned Oswald Barron, the antiquary. ‘No doubt.’ said he, ‘they think that the early mediaeval Latin for William was Gulielmus. They’re wrong: it was Willelmus. ‘

And your news? What work finished: what on hand? Let us hear of it. You are like Sylvanus Urban in Johnson’s Latin Ode: Urbane, nullis fesse laboribus. What would an editor of today say, if a contributor addressed him in smooth Alcaics? Anyhow, I am sure he would not print them in the next issue of the magazine. I enclose a cutting that may or may not have an interest for you.

Our news begins with Janet, who has made a promising enough beginning to the precarious career of the stage. We have seen her as the Apparition of the Crown’d Child in Macbeth, also as the Parlour maid (with dreadful screams) in Jekyll and Hyde. She has been re-engaged for Faust after Xmas. What little she has to do, she does well. Hilary, in a small farm near Northampton, has begun to write to some purpose. He has a beautiful little Xmas story, ‘Caspar on the Dole’ in a recent no of ‘G.K.’s Weekly’. For myself: Armstrong (he wrote to you once) went grubbing in my dustbins for 45 years, & got together a collection of short stories, which will be published in the coming spring. It is a strange and — to me, at all events — an appalling thing to be confronted with the casual, temporary stuff of 1890. But there is a little money in this shady transaction. What about the old French saying: dégoûté defame, et affamé d’argent? And, another small matter: Hutchinson has asked me to write a Preface to a book Philip Sergeant is getting together: ‘Witches and Warlocks’, I think it is to be called.

To you and your family, & your wife and Sybil, all our love and Christmas wishes.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Faust. Do you remember how we had beer at the old, vanished Bell in Holborn, and went to see Faust at the Lyceum — nearly 49 years ago?

Lynwood, High St., Amersham, Bucks.

April 11.’36

Dilectissime Frater,

In the first place: I would say that the Autobiography, so happily commissioned, is, in effect, the book which I urged you to write some time ago —— your unofficial, ‘unvestimented’ views of life as you have led it and seen it. You will put down everything which strikes you as significant, & leave out everything which seems void of consequence or meaning — and the result will be rich reading. Selwyn & Blount are reputable publishers, a firm of good name.

Fytton Armstrong earned that dedication. If it had not been for him, there would have been no such book. He dug and scraped in old literary dustbins, got the stuff typed, discovered the agent, who found the publisher. I believe the ‘Life’ at which, as you know, he made an attempt is now abandoned. And very well too, since, externally, there is nothing to write about, and internally, I have done it all already in 2 books called, ‘Far Off Things’ & ‘Things Near & Far’.

‘All so good together’: I remember your comment on that text— ‘Does she mean that time when we sat up all night drinking port, with Menteith locked in his bedroom, till at 8 o’clock in the morning, the housemaid came into the room, just as she fell on my neck, & I said, “You drunken little cat!”’I hope she fares well, or tolerably well. I think you said she had made money by speculating — which seems strange — Medio de fonte jocorum Surgit amandi aliquid.

They are pleasant & diverting memories. You remember your interior doctrine that, on a somewhat scandalous morning of Coronation, Dora, though she visibly and phenomenally got into a cab in Holborn, never got home. There is something of what the blasted Reformers called ‘most comfortable’ in this teaching.

And since we are discoursing of interior things: tell me if I am right in declaring that the Serpent did not ascend beyond Daath (the logical understanding) in the Tree of Life? And furthermore; that being so, we may speak of the world of Kether, & the works of it as un corrupted? Or, in terms of literature, may it justly be said that Pope’s Character of Addison is of Daath, while Coleridge’s Kubla Khan is of Kether?

All this, let me tell you, relates to a mystical painter of mine in a 50,000 word collection of stories, commissioned by your old pal Hutchinson. Which reminds me. The original editor of The Evening News liked pulling the leg of Dick, the sporting editor. So he would go to him and ask what was to be the football news of the day. ‘Well’, Dick might reply, ‘the Pensioners & Bromley United ought to show good sport.’ (You know football people called the Chelsea team ‘the Pensioners’?) Whereupon Evans, in simulated horror: ‘What! do you mean to tell me that you make those poor old b — s, with half their arms & legs missing, turn out & play football on a day like this?’ Whereupon Dick turns purple with rage.

But; de me fabula.

And finally; most hearty congratulations on your report of yourself, that in spite of hard & weary & all night toiling in the masonic boat with 12 hours sleep, you would be as good a man as ever.

Who could say better of himself?

With all our good wishes to Sybil, your wife & yourself

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

P.S. It has suddenly struck me that you used to suffer badly from your feet. Do you still? If so, & if the trouble is on the soles, write to Mr J. W. Simpson, Aldwych House, The Strand, London W.C. 2 — and say Please send me a pair of Iodine Socks Mans size? — enclosing 1/3.

Purefoy and I have worn them for the last eight months. They have entirely cured most damnably painful callouses. The pain ceases in about 6 weeks.

A.M.

High St., Amersham, Bucks.

May 18.'36

Dilectissime Frater,

In the first place: I think it is the general rule that in imaginative literature, as distinct from mechanical, though often highly valuable, bookmaking, no man can help another.

But, in exception to this rule, I remember that you gave me very important help in the matter of 'The Garden of Avallaumus', described as rather a disease than a book. You did this by urging me to 'cut the cackle and come to the 'osses' — though you did not use the Circus Master's idiom.

By the way: Jekyll was the mixed, natural man, good predominating. Hyde was pure Evil.

Now for your Memoirs. What you are looking for, I suspect, is the point of view, the key, from which & in which they are to be written. Since a man can only illustrate usefully from his own experience: I may say that I experienced your difficulty, in writing my memoirs (called, 'Far Off Things' & 'Things Near & Far'). Referring to them now, I seem to have solved the problem by writing a book which might have been called 'Pictures, Memories, Impressions, & Digressions'. Nothing in the least systematic, no tinge of: 'I was born on March 3rd 1863, at Caerleon-on-Usk, in Monmouthshire. My father, & etc.'

Now, of course, since you are A.E.W. & not A.M. your problem is, no doubt, entirely different from mine; & my vein of solution cannot be yours. But I gather that you also are not going to have any truck with systematic autobiography. Think then of topics & not dates, & of topics in which you have a vivid interest. For example: in the course of many years study & investigation, you had found no evidence that such an art as Magic had any existence. Moreover, you went on to say that you had found no evidence of that lower form of Magic which is said to induce delusion. In other words: 'Not only have I no proof that spirits can be evoked: I have no proof that the magician can make the other man (the spectator) think spirits have been evoked.'

Well; ‘I come from my vineyard, I know nothing’ (Sancho Panza); but here is a topic which should make interesting discussion?

Another possible point. You wrote to the effect that you had seen certain rituals, the mere existence of which was known to very few people. Good: now ask yourself whether the matter of these rituals contains any truth or doctrine, of high consequence to the soul of man, not already known & acknowledged by the masters of the interior life.

To give an example of what I mean; I would cite masonry, & its doctrine of a Loss. I admit the picturesque & novel manner in which the doctrine is presented: but the matter of it is all in Genesis. — or: what do you say?

Many thanks for your Daath information. Now; shall we call this doctrine — whatever its origin — new? I am not sure.

I hope your spouse is better by now.

With our best wishes to you both

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

High St., Amersham, Bucks.

Nov. 16.’36

Frater Dilectissime,

So many thanks for your letter of Oct. 18, which I have left unanswered for all these shameful weeks. I believe you are right in thinking that there are hints or indications of new paths in ‘The Children of the Pool’: — but it is getting very late & dark for treading of strange ways.

Now, here is a proposition. Fortify yourself.

The next time you are in town: will you come down here, dine, & spend the night (in a pub hardby)? I will meet you at the station, & take you down the hill in a ‘bus. Your train would be from Marylebone Station at 3.25.

Don’t say no: I repeat: vesperascit.

Is the magnum finished & passed for press? Writing the other day to Summerford who was enquiring after you, I said: ‘When they take in Walter Hutchinson’s tea of an afternoon, they find him sobbing quietly to himself. They think they hear the words “600 pages in quarto” amidst his tears. He is impotent in the grasp of the mighty Old One.’

In case you do not see the Observer, mark the enclosed now missing. It looks to me a most interesting attack on this bewildered question. The Reviewer does not seem fully aware that the latest science justifies the main proposition of the alchemists: the transmutability of matter, or elements, so-called.

Never bother about the S. Wales Argus cuttings. The minor prophet who is unknown in his own country is generally lucky, if he knew it.

I have had an interesting newspaper controversy with one Lord Raglan as to tradition & Mithraism, & a very old man in Hampshire, who said his father had told him there was a Golden Calf somewhere in the ‘buried church’ of the parish. Lord Raglan says he has come across 3 or 4 similar traditions, ‘but’, he adds, ‘of course no Golden Calf has ever been found in any of these places; so that shows what tradition is worth.’ I don’t think he fully appreciates the bearings of the case.

Do you know that one of these tales has contrived to get into the Roman Breviary under the Feast of the Apparition of St Michael?

I should think Mead was quite wrong in his attribution of that Ritual. I don't think he was a solid man.

Now: let me have a favourable answer to my question and invitation.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

You note, in the Review, the allusion to Flamel. I was rapt and fascinated by Flamel's story as given in a vol of Dickens's Household Words: I read it more than 60 years ago!

Dilectissime Frater,

This is sad news & bad news, too. We are extremely sorry to hear of your wife’s illness. Pray express to her our sympathy & wishes for a speedy and thorough recovery.

We will try again towards the end of May.

Was it at the King’s Arms you spent your day with Bailey Weaver? I thought he stayed at the Griffin.’ What a splendid liar he was when he was in the bonds of sin & brandy & morphia and good dinners. When he purged and lived theosophically I found him mouldy & deplorable. Years afterwards I came upon a storied inventor of fables, a sometime Roman Priest, named Moritz Weston. Did he ever come your way? I found, to my sorrow, that I had lost my relish of mighty lies; & when Weston told me how he had disguised himself as a woman in order to steal a document from the French Foreign Office; I was simply bored.

He ought to have been good enough for anybody. He had been a Rosicrucian, a silver miner in Nevada, a whaler in the arctic; he was a graduate of Heidelberg & Oxford; he was a Licentiate of Valladolid. He held the Xtian Gospels to be an Adonis Ritual. And I was merely bored!

April 28.’38

Frater Dilectissime,

I got the book all right; & I have heard something of the afterthoughts as to price & wrapper, & all that nonsense.

The drivelling imbecilities of the people who call themselves men of business cannot amaze me. Did I tell you what happened to me over my last book? I had sent the MS. to my agent, & I was hungrily awaiting the small sum due to me on delivery. I waited for 3 weeks, & then asked the agent to hurry Hutch up. She replied that she didn’t quite know what to do, as the MS. was 20,000 words short. A couple of days later she wrote that she had made a little mistake; it wasn’t 20,000 words short, or any words short.

Yours is a wonderful book; of the deepest interest to me from beginning to end. Those early chapters are most affecting; in some ways reminding me a good deal of my early days in London, when I lived in my cell in Clarendon Road & wandered out westward, & knew Acton as a little old town, & the ways of Perivale, & the worries of Brentford.

Though I was solitary, & you found friends by degrees, there again, is sad reading, some of it. I am reminded of Johnson in his old age. As he sat, musing, people would sometimes catch a low murmur: ‘Poor man! And then he died’. He was thinking of old friends of the black, starving, Grub Street days.

You have really written the book that I have urged you to write, more than once. You have cast off symbols, & have opened your mind plainly.

I can’t review it competently: for one thing the Editor has limited me to 800 words. But you have my mind on it.

Our best to Sybil. You will feel better as I shall, when it gets warmer.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

High St., Old Amersham, Bucks.

May 29.'38

Dilectissime Frater,

You have always suffered my reviews gladly: so doing you have doubtless acquired merit.

In fact — & more particularly on this occasion— 'you remind me of a man':

 —— I hope you have not forgotten your old formula, the formal preface to great threatenings of judgement and ruin.

But this man that you remind me of was a Hindoo, & an ascetic, a man of blameless life & innocency. Unfortunately for him, we were suppressing the Indian Mutiny, & the English soldier, coming upon the holy man in his meditation, bayoneted him on general principles. As he died, the saint, looking with great composure on the soldier, observed: 'Thou also art that'.

You speak of heaviness and inhibitions, & I feel that too. On purely physical grounds, I put such maladies down to north east winds & the human liver. I hope we shall feel better, the pair of us, when the winds die down, & a little warmth comes to the sun. We are at least recovered here from one of the worst chills that I have ever experienced: in my case complicated by that liver I have just spoken of. A cold in the head, a violent cough, an ache in every joint, a band of iron outside the head, a puddle of confusion inside it, fever, deliriums of nights, collapse of all appetite, & a profound conviction that a little drop of drink would do me a great deal of harm. What a way to live!

I never tried Vodka, since I have never been drawn to anything Russian. Now I like the Dutch, & respect them, & all the varieties of Hollands I find admirable. And I think I told you, that an acquaintance who knows the Netherlands, informed me that the Dutch regard the watering of Schiedam as quite absurd and unthinkable.

I read the Times Lit. Sup review; and it gave me the impression that the writer of it was strongly & strangely attracted by your book & would have liked to praise it. But the subject matter was so much outside his range, that he didn’t know how to begin.

An odd party came down to see us the other day.

Item, a former theatrical manager who ran our last tour.

Item, a ‘leading man’, one De Mamey Item, a Superintendent, from ‘the Yard’

Item, Jimmy Wilde, ex-fly-weight champion of the world.

There entered, I think, into this composition something of that strangeness in the proportion, which Bacon praises so highly & so justly.

And, by the way, I have always thought that this Bacon dictum is one of the profoundest & most significant things uttered.

Remember us most cordially to your wife and Sybil.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Frater Dilectissime,

A day or two ago, I was reading, as I often am, in 'Shadows of Life', & came upon a very minor mystery. It is contained in your notes on William Sharp, & refers to Mrs Sharp: 'She also wrote verse in her earlier days, under the name of Graham R. Tomson'.

Now, in the late 'eighties there was a lady — whose name originally I don't remember — married to a barrister. She left him for an artist, named Graham Tomson, & I think wrote verse under that name. She then abandoned Graham Tomson for one Marriott Watson, who was one of Henley's young men on the National Observer, wrote in the very bright Pall Mall Gazette of the day, wrote books, including a 'Keynote'. Thus I met 'Mr & Mrs Marriott Watson' at a 'Keynotes Dinner' given by John Lane, c. 1895. In Lane's List of this period you find: —

Watson (Rosamund Marriott)

Vespertilia and other Poems.

A Summer Night and other Poems.

I have a quite vague recollection of a handsome woman: — and that is all. I think that she & he are both dead years ago. But, surely, this Rosamund couldn't have been also, Mrs. Sharp, of a somewhat later period?

I disagree, profoundly, with La Rochefoucauld's dictum: that there is something not wholly displeasing to us in the misfortune of our best friends. La Rochefoucauld was doubtless armiger auratus & generosus — even generosissimus —— but his saying is cheap, & cheapness does not become a gentleman. It is also a He — a matter of less consequence, perhaps; since lying is sometimes a painful duty. But though the axiom as it stands is false; it is yet true that there is some small comfort in the thought— 'we are in the same boat'; in misfortune, if you like, but still companions.

On two 'Royalty Dates', then, I sent my Royalties on to a friend. On each occasion, they were contained in a Postal Order for 1/4; &, before the War, 1/4 just bought a ‘Double’. My Christmas Royalties, through some chance which I forget, ran to 17/6. This sum I kept, for this sum I thanked Heaven. We have nothing to complain of. If, for one reason or another, our work fails to interest large numbers of people; the result, our Royalties in shillings and pence, are inevitable.

As to your health; you will go slow and lie quiet, & I am sure you will soon be all right. And you have the advantage, that the weather is growing gentler, & the change will be good for all of us. Here, the winter has been quite hideous: 2 months of the hardest frost, with a couple of slight short thaws, so that when the frost returned, the wet ground turned to glass, & we went abroad with socks over our shoes.

I heard from Brother Vivian Summerford at Christmas, & am looking for another letter soon. Novices may receive as many letters as their friends like to write them; but they are only allowed to write letters themselves at Christmas & Easter. I think his chief impression of the cloister in his first week’s experience was that it was a very cold place. But they did bravely on Twelfth Night: they had Cakes & Ale — & good ale, too — and the whole Convent, from the Prior to the Lay brothers, danced Sir Roger de Coverley, & kept it up till past eleven. P Don’t pass this on. Just before he went in he was discussing his brand of politics — some noisome saloperie of Communism-cum-Pacifism, it happened to be just then — to one of the Fathers, who responded: ‘He who is not loyal to his King will never be loyal to his God.’

The Father evidently has the root of the matter in him. Look in the Book: ‘He that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen,’ &.t c.

But poor Summerford had been seeing a good deal of Compton Mackenzie in the last few years. And when that English Officer, who spied for Germany, & was known for a time to the Press as, ‘the Prisoner in the Tower,’ came out of gaol, he was cordially entertained by Compton.

And, by the way, it gave me the greatest pleasure, at our last meeting with Summerford, to hear from him that Compton was beginning to think that there might be a good deal to be said for the theory that we, the English, are the Lost Ten Tribes. I thought to myself: ‘Lucky for you, my young friend, that the cloister gates are closing on you. Else, we should have seen you going over the Egyptian Pyramid with a graduated rule & the Table of Pyramid-Feet & Pyramid-Inches, calling out the measurements to Compton Mackenzie in sabulo.'

Which, oddly, reminds me. Lee is coming down here, with Lester, next week; & he will try to convert me to the Cummins (?) Scripts; & I shall try to keep my temper.

Do give our warmest regards to your wife & Sybil; & though, perhaps, you are all off 'the Drink' for the present, let me give to you all the friendly greeting of the Bar Parlour: 'Cheerio.' Which, being interpreted, is Leebari.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Frater Dilectissime,

What cheer? Don't answer, with Captain Bunsby in Dickens, 'Damned bad'.

do hope you are feeling much better than when you wrote last; that you, your wife, and Sybil are all relishing the sun. Are you facing out the storm at Broadstairs? I confess that I would rather be somewhere in Central Wales — Builth or Brecon — than a mere 26 miles from town. It is possible, no doubt, to find faults of many kinds in Hitler — but one cannot deny that he is a thorough man. He does not scamp his work.

When you find a scriba velociter scribens — in point of fact, a typist — to your hand, don't forget the minor mystery of 'Graham Tomson.' Was the 'Mrs Sharp' you knew a beautiful dark creature?

You knew Ernest Rhys, I think? Or did you only encounter him in business? His autobiography is reviewed in The Times 'Lit. Sup.' today. I should call him fortunate in his life. He was clearly born to edit series, & he edited series: — and a very useful work, too. I once met him, & was not greatly drawn to him. But our meeting was, I believe, one of the three Unfortunate Encounters of the Isle of Britain. A most amiable man of my acquaintance asked me to meet Rhys at Stone's. And the kind host brought a friend of his with him. Inevitably, as it seemed, a certain community of race, age, interests, & employment led Rhys & myself to talk together a good deal. Thereupon, our host in a very bitter manner, bid his friend notice that such nobodies as themselves could not expect to share in any conversation with such magnates as ourselves — Rhys & I. The evening was chilled.

Another Unfortunate Encounter of the Isle of Britain was my meeting with Masefield, now Laureate Poet. That was even more unfortunate.

I had an Easter letter from Colin Summerford. The habit seems to be fitting more easily than it did at first.

You are one of the few people who knew me when I looked a little like the enclosed the enclosure is missing; shall we say, like a somnolent Daudet. Nimes, where he came from, is very much a Roman town; so is Caerleon-on- Usk; but Nimes is a fiercer, more fiery place. In all respects — the amiable landlady, whose hotel gave on the perfectly preserved Temple of Diana, was speaking of the Bull Fights in the Arena, and said, in a hissing manner: ‘the people down here love Blood.’ In old Caerleon we preferred Beer.

Did you ever read Daudet’s Les Trois Messes Basses? They were the masses of Christmas. The Priest had seen the magnificent Réveillon Feast spread by Monseigneur, whose chaplain he was. He longed for that feast, he could only see the Truffled Turkey over the Altar. His masses went faster & faster; his Server became the Devil: & when the Priest said: — Dom scum the Server answered Sputuo.

I need not tell you that this affair had a bad end.

Again: all our good wishes to you and yours. Let us try hard to live into a better age.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Dilectissime Frater,

We were very much distressed to hear of those 'attacks' of which you speak. I see a month has passed since your letter: I do hope you are all the better for its passage.

I suppose the truth is that the good & strong air of the Isle of Thanet is too good, & too strong for you. I confess I should like to hear that you have moved, for the time, into some moist & warm valley of the west & south, where the wind is too tired to blow. You remember our old Marylebone Vicar, Newland Smith? He helped you over some Greek; in Lumen de Lumine I think it was. Well, his heart was threatening, or more than threatening, & he lived for 12 years near Torquay. A Cockney in vain; he cursed his parishes & parishioners steadfastly for all those years, & would have thrown Dartmoor on the dust-heap, if it could have been done. But the climate cured all that heart trouble in less than no time, & it has stayed cured.

As for bombs & planes & roarings on sea & land; I was talking to a man here about flying from all such things, & telling him that I had a friend older than I, a little troubled about his heart, who lived at Broadstairs & found explosives soothing. He burst into eldritch screams, & ran down an alley.

I see the Case of the two Graham Tomsons must remain a mystery.

Janet is the fortunate member of our family. I think I told you that she went out, not quite a year ago, for a six weeks visit to friends in New York. As she was about to return, there came the war; and she has been entertained by her kind hosts ever since. They have shown her Connecticut, & what remains of the New England that your mother knew. They took her down south to Georgia, where she saw plantation negroes, Spanish moss, & the cardinal bird. Her last excursion has been to the Rocky Mountains, where she sat a Mexican saddle, & learnt the cowboy seat.

We were relieved, I can tell you, to hear from Hilary a week or ten days ago, back, safe and sound, from France. So far, we have had no details of his campaigning. An earlier letter, from France, expressed high appreciation of the country, the people, the omelettes, & the good little red wine at 2 /2 d a glass. He found the Church-Latin of the country a little puzzling at first.

All our very best wishes to you, to your wife, and to Sybil.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Dilectissime Frater,

Lee & Lester were down here about a month ago; and Lee said that he understood you have moved to the Canterbury neighbourhood.

But, since I am not sure that you have returned to the old Bishopsbourne address; I send this to Betsy, hoping that it will reach you. And I trust the report that you have gone inland is true; not chiefly on account of bombs and bangs, but rather because inland airs are milder than seafront breezes. Three years ago, when poor Greenwood took us to Paris, I thought the seabreezes of the Channel crossing would do me no end of good. I was all but dead when I was hauled into the train at Dieppe.

From an accursed print called the New Statesman, I have extracted the enclosed. I have a vague notion that I once met Ladbroke Black; & yet again, I cannot remember anything about him. I judge from his obituary notice that he was a very good fellow, but a very bad journalist. The notion that it is clever to describe something you haven’t seen is held, or was held, I believe, outside the Reporters’ Room; but not inside. That path is plainly marked: This Way to the Sack and Boot — an ill tavern, where all the drinks are sour.

I wish I were a Folklorist. For this reason: the other day when I was meditating, as I often do, on our old Grail studies, it struck me that Merlin, National Enchanter, is a unique figure in early legend & romance. I emphasize ‘national’: what may be called private enchanters and wizards are, of course, plentiful enough; but I cannot recall another instance of a magician who stage-managed a whole people.

Can you put me right on this point?

I need not say that I hope & Purefoy hopes that you are feeling much better. Pray commend us to your wife and Sybil; & if I say that the aromas and the savours of certain noble meats & of certain bottles of opimian Burgundy are still grateful; let me remind you that it was a great and good man who said: ‘I mind my belly very carefully and very studiously; and I take it that he who does not mind his belly will mind nothing else.’

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

Do you remember how, long ago, we explored Bermondsey, & how the Bermondsey Barmaids, on our calling for Gin, would offer us: ‘Two Two’s’. Those twopenny drinks would be about 15s 2d each now.

Dilectissime Frater,

Fourteen years ago or thereabouts, I met ‘Egyptian’ Budge. I told you of the encounter, & I remember your asking me, if I met him again, to enquire of him whether the Book of the Dead was dramatically enacted in Egypt. I never saw Budge again, I am sorry to say — he was famous company — and the question was not put; but here, from an unexpected quarter, comes the answer to it. If you would like to verify; you might write to Ivor Brown, c/o The Observer, & ask for his sources.

Did you ever hear of Budge’s Vision of Examination, when he was an undergraduate? He told me how he dreamed the same dream, three times, on the night before his examination in Cuneiform; seeing the Paper, with one question for which he was not prepared. On the third repetition, he got up, made tea, & went thoroughly into the matter of the question. The next morning, fact justified the dream in every particular, including some quite trivial and insignificant circumstances.

I hope that the change inland has done you good. Do give our most cordial remembrances to your wife & to Sybil.

I don’t think we have any news. Hilary, under arms, prepares to defend us from invasion. Janet roams about the U.S. & sees the Red Man in his flaming blankets.

But; by the way, there is some news — unless you have already heard it. Colin Summerford found that he was not called to be one of the Lord’s Watchdogs; and left the Priory, about a month ago, with the blessing of the fathers. I know not what he will do next; nor, I think, does he.

Excuse ‘Copy Paper’ and being without a Breviary, I know not which of the Great Oes is now sounding in Choirs and Places where they sing —

Dilectissime Frater,

Every good and happy wish to you, to your wife, and to Sybil from Purefoy and myself.

I hope you are much better since the summer: that the bombs do not vex any of you over much. Here, we often fall asleep to the drone of Geman planes; but so far, the old town remains undamaged and untouched. Mass in the morning is said in darkness, save for the two altar candles & the lamp before the Sacrament: there is a solemnity about the scene.

The other night: ‘listening in’ I heard a Welsh country postman tell of his experiences now, in the dark of the morning. There were perils in roads & lanes from lorries, cars, bicycles; but what took me & made me think forthwith of you was his tale of a lonely cottage, far from the common tracks of men. Here there lives an old woman, who has a letter once a week. There are three ways of getting to this cottage, & the Postman has tried them all. One by the marsh: (it was here that I thought of you & certain lines in ‘The Soul’s Comedy’) but in the dark, he lost his footing, & found himself sinking in black ooze & mire. One by the dense thicket of trees & undergrowth: but the boughs caught him, & he was swung into the air, saying to himself, ‘if I hang & die here, nobody will ever find my body’. The third way is by fording the river, (a shallow one I suppose); and beyond the wet & the run of the waters, that, by comparison, he found easy.

I almost think that a very Secret Doctrine must be latent in this fable.

I wrote to you before the Xmas of 1886: now I write again, 54 years after.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

In the Great Oes, 1941 i e. 17-23 December; in fact 1940

Dilectissime Frater,

It must be just about 55 years ago since you & I corresponded; since you got letters dated ‘Llanthewi Rectory’. We have lived into another world. Like the Bishop of Hippo, we heard the Barbarians thundering at the gates. May our day show a better issue than his. It is curious to read the letters of Sidonius — born at Lyons, 431; died at Clermont, 489 — He is living through it all, still a perfect Roman country gentleman, & doesn’t quite understand what is happening. ‘No good talking Latin in Belgium or on the Rhine, now; a censorship on letters; very odd to see a Frankish wedding the other day, everybody armed to the teeth, more Mars than Venus about it, I thought. However, I daresay we shall live long enough to laugh at our fears’ — and so on. When I first read this, four or five years ago, I thought how very odd it would be to see the bridegroom & his friends at an Amersham wedding carrying their guns to the church door. But I don’t know: they might well be in ‘battle kit’. I suppose Franks were also in battle-kit.

As to Casanova: I have letters from America, asking me when it will be issued; & I can only answer, I don’t know. I believe there was some trouble caused about 18 months ago, by the man who issued an edition here in the earlier twenties. He fancies the copyright belongs to him: I don’t think it belongs to anybody. However that may be as regards England, it certainly doesn’t apply to the U.S. But I don’t worry; as I told you, I have had the money & I don’t want the book. The first edition, I remember, I gave you; second, I gave to another friend; I can get on well without the third. The Penguin business does really concern me, since the publication of the book would bring me £50 down. I had a letter from the Penguin firm the other day, from which I gather that they are still struggling bravely against Adversity and Hutchinson, and Seeker and Warburg & the rest. I wish them well in their endeavours. As to The Handy Dickens; I infer that Constables will be publishing it in the Spring; & whenever it comes my way, it shall certainly come yours, & quickly, you know, I daresay, that there are often discussions to be heard on the BBC, discussions about everything from Mangold to Magic. The other night I was a good deal disgusted to hear one of these discussion gangs uttering what were pretty well my sentiments about ‘characters’ in fiction, laying down the principle — for example — that if a character in a story were really lifelike, then the book must be rotten! Pereant illi qui ante nos nostra dixerunt; but what about those who say things after us? I laid down my doctrine in the matter 40 years ago in Hieroglyphics’, & hence my difficulty, & I fear, lack of unction in writing the Dickens Introduction. I can’t say the same thing all over again with ease & relish. I was glad to hear one, but only one, of the discussion people keeping to the good old stupid way. He said that the character of Micawber was not primarily intended to be amusing; but rather to enforce the Mid-Victorian moral of careful economy.

There is one of these B.B.C. discussions which often entertains us: that is the thing horribly called ‘The Brains Trust’. At it I have heard Professor Joad, reckoned, I believe, a man of science, profess his belief in the theory, at least, of Black Magic. The ‘Question’ had been sent in: ‘What about Black Magic?’ & the Professor, replying, said that he was convinced that there were evil powers as well as good in the make up of the universe, & that it might be possible to approach those powers, and — well, there you were; there was your Black Magic for you. He added that, if you could brush aside the great mass of imposture, & penetrate to the core of the Spiritualist séance, there you would find a manifestation of the powers of evil. He weakened his case, in my opinion, by advancing the Poltergeist — which he investigated at Borley Rectory — as another emissary of Satan. Can evil manifest itself through Bad Boy Monkey Tricks? It seems to me highly improbable, at the least.

Another surprise from the B.B.C. Aldous Huxley, once perhaps the brightest, smartest, most contemptuous of the Bright Young Literary Scoffers of the nineteen twenties, has given his judgement of the art of acting in terms more vehement & more damnatory than those of the late Cardinal Manning. Huxley experienced a change of heart some years ago. He was at first inclined to think that salvation was to be found in Mexican Serpent Worship, as expounded by the late D. H. Lawrence, & went to New Mexico, to see how the cultus worked among the Indians there. But this, it seemed, would not do; & he is now, I gather, a High Mystic, chiefly on the Christian basis, but with support from the Bhagavat Gita.

Let me finish on an Annoying Note. To delay on the Paston matter for a moment: the phrase struck me as highly curious & enigmatic; but I don’t think it could possibly have any reference to fifteenth century freemasonry. But what I — want to say is, that in my belief the fundamental matter of the 3rd Degree was a traditional ceremony of the journeymen, the paid labourers, on a man having finished his apprenticeship, & becoming a master mason, entitled to a higher rate of pay: that the men who worked it had no notion of any high or spiritual significance in what they did or said, that the main notion of the whole thing was a mixture of jocularity & the giving of a bit of a jolt to the candidate. The notion that a young fellow should have a bit of a jolt when he ceases to be a boy & is to be accounted a man, is most ancient & most diffused. The definition of ‘jolt’ varies: amongst the Red Indians, the young fellow had iron hooks run through his arms & was swung round & round in the air before he could be reckoned a warrior. Among the Coopers of England, the young fellow was (quite recently) put into a cask & trundled round & round the yard. When they let him out, he stood a bottle of whiskey.

Finally: it is highly improbable that the Rite — the words accompanying the Ceremony — were ever written down.

There: put that in your pipe and smoke it.

And with all our love to you & Sybil.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur machen

Nota bene, that I do not attempt to trace the admittance ceremony of the medieval journeymen masons to its ultimate origins. Possibly, these were most ancient & august, & the rites had become rude in a long transmission through the hands of illiterate labourers: I know not.

High St., Old Amersham, Bucks.

Sept. 17’41

Dilectissime frater,

Many long years ago, as you sat at your board in Ealing I remember your filling a small glass — a ‘pony’ glass I think they called it — with whiskey in its purity, which you thereupon drank. You considered the matter judicially for a short while, & then gave sentence: ‘This does me no good, Machen.’ And I am hoping that this summer, such as it has been, has done better for you than that glass of whiskey, drunk forty years ago or more.

Not long since, Purefoy & I, relishing a rare cup at the King’s Arms, fell to talking of those old days & of you, & we wondered whether we had ever related to you the sad story of the Marquis d’Autische. On the chance that this was formerly omitted; let it now be related.

The Marquis d’Autische, then, was a French Nobleman, of ancient & distinguished race. An ancestor of his, it is said, crusaded with St. Louis, & thus derived his title. The Marquis of, say, 40 years ago, was all that he should have been, loyal to the House of the lilies, bien pensant, profoundly Catholic. But there were moments, rare moments, when doubts assailed him; & in one of these painful seizures he was heard to exclaim: Je ne croisai jamais que le bon Dieu auraitfondé son eglise sur un calembour!’

He was thinking, of course, of Ev ei ó ττετρος και -ιτετρα ταντη όικοδομηοαι την εκκλησίαν μον

And that reminds me: do you recall what the Norman Prior called Friar Tuck in Ivanhoe? Tu es petra scandali et lapis offensionis. I suppose that the Prior in the book is not a bit like the Prior in the 12th century, nor the irregular clerk of that age: but how jolly it all is! And it has been said that jollity is joy talking in the vulgar tongue.

Let me defend Sir Walter against an accusation that some might find latent in one of the above sentences: Ivanhoe is quite as true a picture of England in the Xllth century as Hamlet is of Denmark in the tenth.

Did you ever know anything of the thinking of Bergson, brother-in-law of our old friend, S. Liddell MacGregor Mathers? I never read him, being put off, I think, by his discovery that Life was to be explained by the elan vital. This reminded me too much of the country doctor. I had remarked to him that I understood that asparagus was only beneficial to the action of the kidneys. ‘If that is so,’ said he, ‘the effect must be due to the presence of asparagin.’ But I saw somewhere the other day that Bergson held that the faculty by which man apprehends reality is akin to the faculty of instinct in animals. This struck me as impressive.

Brief News. Hilary, who has now been in the army for more than two years, thinks that he will be ordered abroad again before long. Janet, who has been in the USA for two years, got back to Amersham last Sunday, via Halifax, Greenland, Iceland, Northern Ireland, Liverpool. She sailed on a small Dutch ship, & that, perhaps, may explain the happy circumstances that she brought with her 2 bottles, not of ‘Noble Square Face’, but of the nobler Bols. Mark the felicity of the mere name: it seems to figure the utterance of one, who having enjoyed this rare spirit, perhaps too fully, should endeavour to say ‘bottles’.

I hope Sybil is well & that your wife is well. You hate letter writing I know; but tell Sybil that a brief line from her would be gratefully received.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

April 8.'42

Dilectissime frater,

Please give my hearty thanks to Sybil for her letter. I know that with that obstinate & most distressing neuritis the business of pen and ink must be a painful one; & I almost feel a sinner when I put her to it. I hope that both you & she are feeling some degree of aid from these milder airs. What a winter it has been! Do you remember a formula in frequent use with you some 42 years ago or thereabouts, a formula prefacing remarks to my address of a highly minatory and terrific nature? The formula was: 'You remind me of a man.' Well, this last winter reminds me of the winter of 1895 — six weeks of frost, a jolly dinner at the Greyhound with you, your wife, & Mrs Menteith: Bucellas; & the story of the Black Seal which I was writing just then. It is hard to realize that in this interval of 47 years a whole world has passed away & that you and I have survived into a new age. But so it is.

Let me give you an instance, trivial & jocose.

Three or four weeks ago, the retiring Archbp of Canterbury, Dr Lang, was addressing a meeting of the S.P.C.K. He said in the course of his remarks: 'And, now, will you excuse me for a few minutes. I have to see these… photographers. I won't mention the adjective.' (Howls of laughter from the S.P.C.K.)

Can you conceive an Archbp practically blessing the expletive 'bloody' in 1895? And, by the way, Lang is probably ignorant of the fact that 'the adjective' is derived from the terrific medieval oath: 'By God's Blood'. It is curious that the corresponding 'woundy' has utterly failed to survive. I wish the new Archbp., Temple, were as innocent as Lang. He was delivering serious addresses in this Holy Week. He suggested that the darkness of the Crucifixion might have been occasioned by 'a coincidental eclipse of the sun'. There is a feebleness of mind here, which seems parallel to me with the mental state of those who derived the inn sign of The Goat and Compasses from 'God Encompasseth Us'.

Another sign of the new age: serious & dolorous, this omen. The other night, feeling somewhat low & downcast, I said at the King's Arms that I would have a Double Gin. What do you think it cost Me? Two shillings and fourpence; & I suppose that, allowing for the watery adulteration of the distiller, I got just about the amount of spirit that you and I received in those 'twos' that we drank at Bermondsey, in the former age. This drink of the New World did me no good. I don't think it would have done me any good if there had been 2/4 to spare in my pocket. Perhaps it would be not only harsh but hasty to say of our rulers miseriam potius quam victoriam apti evocare. It is, doubtless, a great process that is going on. To this day, nobody knows why the Roman Empire collapsed.

I am glad you were entertained by the Dickens Preface. How odd that such a man as Plato, set up by the judgement of more than two thousand years amongst the very highest of men, should have been not merely mistaken in his opinions of art, but entirely ignorant of what art was, what it was for, what it was about. Who would believe that this supreme philosopher had attained on this matter to the critical eminence of our George II, who 'hated Boetry and Bainting'. So it is; & it is quite incredible.

I hope you noted the passage relating to the spiritual things concealed under the correspondence of a 'comfortable cup o'tea'. High doctrine here, if you will believe me.

With all our good wishes to you & to Sybil, & better health to you both.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

High St., Old Amersham, Bucks.

April 12.'42

Dilectissime frater,

Here, then, is the Sweeney Todd. I am interested to see that, apparently, there is a genuine 18th century English tradition behind the fable. I had read somewhere that it was founded on a French feuilleton.

Do you know anything about Montague Summers? He is, I believe, presbyter Romanus, & dresses as a cleric. He has written about Restoration Drama, & also on occult matters — very credulously on these latter. For some reason or another, if you mention his name, you are apt to encounter an uplifted eyebrow or a latent grin. As Sancho Panza says: 'I come from my vineyard; I know nothing.'

By the way, reading a day or two ago in your 'Shadows' — a book I love to read in — I see you make some question as to how I met the Young Man in Spectacles. It was at the G.D. I have no notion of whether he be alive or dead; I have forgotten his very name. But why should one trouble? The play is over, the actors have put off their costumes, dressed in their 'street dress', & gone home. There is no sense in desiring to follow them there.

I am all the more sure of that, from the very occasional appearance of the lady who once depicted so brilliantly the role of 'the Fair Wanton'. I assure you these are sad and rather ghastly occasions.

But 'street dress' awakes a cheerful ocasion of the stage. I was touring with a Tree Company from His Majesty's. We were depicting 'Julius Caesar', & Brutus & another principal, alone on the stage, were commenting on the shouts of 'Ave Caesar', proceeding from the mob 'off'. One night, no shouts were heard; consequently, the remarks of Brutus & the other conspirator must have been puzzling to the house. Just before the curtain went up on the next set, the Forum Scene,— 'Friends, Romans, Countrymen' &c — the Stage Manager, in a dark Disguise Cloak, appeared in the assembled mob, & said, addressing the Super Master, who was one of them, 'Look here! What the… do you mean by not giving those "Ave Caesars"? If that happens again you can put on your street dress & go back to Hell, or Jerusalem, or His Majesty's Theatre! I don't want you here. Now then (turning to the Roman mob at large) "We will be satisfied! We will be satisfied!"' Thus indicating the shouts that took up the curtain, the Stage Manager melted into the wings.

The skies & the airs seem to mend. Do you & Sybil follow this example.

Yours ever fraternally,

Arthur Machen

LETTERS TO JOHN GAWSWORTH. 1929-1947

28 Loudoun Road, NW8

Jan. 22nd'29

Dear Mr Armstrong,

I will sign the book with great pleasure, and write something about Caerleon-on-Usk on the first page. Caerleon — castra legionum. It was the headquarters of the second Augustan Legion for about 300 years. In Welsh, the word is pronounced 'Kirelayon'. The people who live there call it 'Care-lee-on', and I have heard a porter on the platform name it 'Ca'leen'.

If you are interested in my Clarendon Road days; you will find a full account of them in Chapter V of my book Far Off Things — whence I suppose, S. P. B. Mais got his materials. I have never seen his article. My number was 23 and I lived behind the little window on the top floor, next to the bow window. The period was 1883-84-85.

With all good wishes,

I remain Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks, March 31 1930

Dear Mr Armstrong,

Many thanks for your letter. I will begin with two counsels, one particular, the other general.

1. — If I were you, I would not do any business with the ingenious Mr Searle, of Wardour Street.

2. — I should think that the collecting of 'Machen Items', save at prices under 10/-, is a pursuit of doubtful — or not at all doubtful — wisdom. There may be a recovery, of course; but I should think probably not. This week I am 'reading' for the House of Benn, a MS dealing with collecting modem authors. My name is not even mentioned…

I have no duplicate copies of my books. I know nothing of the Book Market, so I don't know whether £6 is high for Anatomy.

I have the most pleasant memories of my interview with Stephen Graham. He was everything that was kind and courteous. I congratulate you on the 2 strings to your bow. I have found the House of Benn most pleasant to serve. And, by the way, I do not believe for one moment, that Quiller Couch said anything about 'slime'. He probably said that he had spent a whole day in being interviewed, and that he was bored to tears; and I don't wonder. But Swete, I am sorry to say, a man of many qualities and accomplishments, liked hurting people's feelings — or trying to hurt them.

Thank you very much for Strange Roads. It was found t'other day among Hilary's props. He had never given it to me…

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

St George 1930

Dear Mr Armstrong,

I am afraid I have got to be disappointing. Thinking over your Residences proposal, I have come to the conclusion that I must not be concerned in it, either in signing or preface-writing. If I were thus concerned, people would say: ‘Whom does he think himself: Shakespeare, Milton, or only Charles Dickens?’ I should look a terrible ass.

If you go on with the scheme, minus signatures and preface, you would be prudent if you took samples around the trade, and found out how many orders you could secure.

I don’t know the Hereford street numbers. The Castle St house — red brick —— was on the left hand side of the street, as you pass out of the Cathedral Close, towards the upper end — nearer to the Close gate, that is. The St Ethelbert st house — St E. st continues Castle st at an angle — is the last of a stucco row, a corner house: it being understood that you are still going away from the Close. But of course both houses may have been pulled down long ago. I should think you could get a trip to Newport on as good terms as the Hereford ticket and Newport commands Caerleon, Llanthewy Rectory, and what I somewhat egoistically call ‘my country’.

I am sorry for the matter of the Residences: but it would not do.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Mr Armstrong,

Any Saturday or Sunday (July 5 excepted) that suits your uncle will suit us; and pray give him our best thanks.

One of the best of the photos is my cloaked figure in the wet street; I think that both the street and I are most picturesque.

You mistake the force of the phrase I used about Parsons. I am sure he is the last person to borrow money. The phrase: ‘I don’t think I’ll borrow half a crown to get drunk with Chose’, means: ‘I don’t care much for Chose’s company’. I found Parsons a gloomy man. Of course I will sign your typescript of Eleusinia. An American named Evans has asked me to reserve the Fleet Street MS. I have told him that £20 is a preposterous price, but that I do not care to sell it for less. No; I am not selling the Note Book.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

By the way: I don’t think I impressed on you strongly enough the utter — and malignant — falsity of that gossip you heard about Savage sponging on Middleton. I speak with authority and know the tale to be an infernal lie.
A.M.

July 10. 1930

Dear Mr Armstrong,

Thank you very much for the prints: they are excellent. And so were the Maids of Honour, for which all thanks.

Fleet Street is not really a nice street; I don't wonder you find it distasteful. But you have the resisting power of youth. You are 18, and there are some diseases which comparatively trifling to the young, are serious matters when they make their attack on the middle-aged and elderly. I was 48 when I caught Fleet Street, and 55 when I caught chickenpox. They were both severe attacks; but you can laugh at 'the Street'.

Can you come here on Aug. 10? I shall be very glad to sign anything going. Thank your uncle for myself and Mrs. He gave us both a delightful afternoon. And remember us to your cousin; who is being held up to Janet as an example.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

July 16. 1930

Dear Mr Armstrong,

The photographs are superb; thank you very much. We shall expect you on Aug. 10 at 4.30.

A wonderful feat to get a letter from Waite. I didn't know there was any method of getting Horlicks — beyond advertising for it. There are some admirable and curious articles by Waite in it; and the marvel is that he persuaded old Horlick to run such a magazine; which would do the milk more harm than good.

As to Fleet Street: again I would say that it is good to get the drudgery over young. I tried to learn Welsh at fifty — I should like to know Welsh — but I found I couldn't stand grinding the elements.

I hope your uncle and Elizabeth and all the family will have a great time at Dawlish. It is a delicious country.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Armstrong,

… Now as to your tour in Monmouthshire. The best train for Newport leaves Paddington about ten to nine a m., arriving at 11.30 or thereabouts. Three miles away (train or bus) is Caerleon. Four miles from Caerleon is Llanthewy Vach Rectory: no bus. But unless I know how long you propose to stay, and whether you intend to hire a car; it is difficult to guide you about the country. However, we will suppose that you put up at the Hanbury Arms, Caerleon, and have no car.

You first of all go to the Vicarage, and inspect the Register for March 1863: name Arthur Llewelyn Jones. I do not know anything about registers: the particulars may include the name of the house where I was born: if so you will be able to find it — unless pulled down. This done; set out to walk to Llanthewy; passing through Ponthir (Pont-heor) and keeping to the right. You will climb up and up, and the top of the hill is Common Cefn Llwyn. There is no common: somewhere to the left is imagined to be the Roman Fort in The Hill of Dreams. Down the hill to the level where I used to await the postman with my Heptameron copy: up again: Llanthewy Church to the right, grave of my father and mother in churchyard — approach by lane. Back to main road, up hill: Llanthewy Rectory on right. You return to Caerleon. The head of the Faun was in the hall of what is now the doctor’s house. Hardby is the Roman amphitheatre but this is now excavated; in my time it was all green.

Next day: go over Caerleon bridge, and passing through Caerleon-ultra-Pontem, take the old Usk road. Kemeys {A Fragment of Life) on right. Newbridge (5 miles from Caerleon). Turn up to right, and pass Bertholly (1st Chapter Great God Pan: summer residence of Professor Gregg), and if you will get into Wentwood, and if you go to the top, I think you will see the Grey Hills where the Professor was taken by the fairies. But these you should look out for in the train, after you have come out of Severn Tunnel on the right…

N.B. Returning from Llanthewy (1st day), ask at Common Cefn Llwyn for the lane to Llanfrechfa (f sounds v*),* the ruin was on the left; and if you like to go on, you will come out of the 'turnpike' road, and can get to Caerleon that way.

3rd day. Take train from Caerleon to Llantarnam, and there ask the way to Twyn Barlwm: 3 or 4 miles, but a steep climb at the end. Mynydd Maen (pronounced Munnith Mayne) is of the same range, to the north. When you get back to Caerleon, ask for Pont Sadwrn (Pons Saturni) and you will see the Soar Brook fall into the Usk.

4th day. Take train from Caerleon to Abergavenny (see Chronicle of Clemendy) and returning, get out, if you will, at Pontypool Road Station. You can wait for the next train, or walk back to Caerleon…

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Armstrong,

You will be glad to hear that I have written the Introductory Note to Eleusinia, and am preserving the draught in accordance with your desire.

As to Pembrokeshire: thejourney takes from about 9 a in to about 3.30 p m. A return ticket costs about £3. The scene, of wonderful beauty, is the background of The Great Return, The Terror, one of the ‘Strange Roads’ and the short story, called, I think, ‘Out of the Earth’. It deserves more than two days. I finished Things Near and Far on the sand dunes at Penally. All the places are close to each other, and a pub at Tenby or Penally would be a convenient head quarters.

I will keep the pen for you. Earache gone but deafness tiresome.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Jan. 23.’31

Dear Armstrong,

Answering two letters. Do send your list of residences and firms when ready:

will look them over.

The Hesperides Press is mistaken. The Preface to their Way to Succeed is a revised version of the Boni and Liveright Preface.

The Red Priest of Castletown (or Castleton; I am not certain which. Consult Glamorgan Gazetteer). fferiad coch: he had red hair. He was the Revd Hezekiah Jones. One of his brothers was the Revd Daniel Jones, who died c. 1820 Curate of St Fagan’s, near Cardiff. His son was the Revd Daniel Jones, sometime Vicar of Caerleon-on- Usk — my grandfather. I believe this race of Joneses came (c. 1750) from Carmarthenshire. There were branches (cousins of mine) in Anglesea and London, 50 years ago. About that time I met 15 Jones cousins one Sunday afternoon — disliked them all, and never saw them more. A distant cousin is Mrs Priestley (Mrs Priestley the novelist, as we should say in Wales) who is descended from Daniel of St Fagan’s.

Richard Middleton. I was never a Reader for Unwin. The only proof I could have read for them was the proof of my Introduction. The truth of the Middleton Savage friendship is very simple. The two men were great friends, and if there were any question of money between them, it would be Savage’s, since Middleton had no money, and, at that time, Savage had. A further reason is, that Savage is one of the most generous men I have ever met. Not for one moment would I say that Middleton ‘sponged’ on Savage: between friends, real friends, there can be no question of any such thing. I never got on with Middleton; an ungenial, gloomy fellow, with a grievance against life.

I never fix myself down to appointments in prospect. Come, by the usual train, Saturday, Feb. 7. I am not well: deaf, with an evil chill hanging about me.

I would like to see a Jordan-Smith photograph.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

Aug: 8:’32

Dear Armstrong, Pray quote me on ‘Gold Like Glass’, if it will do you any service.

I should like to see the ‘Anthology’ proofs if convenient. We are not going away until the end of the month.

My price for the MS of The Green Round is £25. I have quoted it to Spurr, in answer to his question. I was pleased to find that he and I had arrived at the same estimate.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Feb. 8.’33

Dear Armstrong,

In the first place; it is my bounden duty to warn you against undertaking the work you propose to undertake. There are minor reasons against it; but chief of all, is the major premise (see Whately, not Whateley)-}

Major Books about Machen are interesting to very few people.

Minor This is a book about Machen.

Conclusion: Therefore, this book is interesting to very few people.

There you are: irresistible in Barbara and I hope you see the next syllogism in Celarent: books interesting to very few people don’t sell etc etc.

I remember three years ago or so having a very glowing letter from America; I think the writer was Van Patten, but I am not sure. But, anyhow, it was glowing, and ended up with something about holding a Machen Dinner: I wrote back that I was delighted; and scarcely liked mentioning the fact that my total American Royalties for the past year amounted to a little under £5.

So there you are; and if you resolve to go on I can only say, ‘And God give you a good deliverance’ — as the Clerk of the Court used to remark to the Prisoner of the Bar, when they had quite made up their minds that he must hang.

I said there were minor objections. One is that it is a ticklish thing to write a man’s life during his lifetime. For example; I might not care to have any letters to Lane printed; and what a nuisance that would be for you…

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

June 13.’33

Dear Armstrong,

It is extremely good of you to take all this trouble: a thankless job — and I shall be a good deal astonished if it is a successful one, I have long parted with illusions; not that I ever harboured many.

Pray look around on Saturday next. Your plan of sending a list of questions is a good one: consideration makes for accuracy. Nothing like black and white.

My copies of ‘The Green Round’ have come. At the request of the firm, I wrote the ‘blurb’ for the jacket. To this they have prefixed an imbecile paragraph of their own, telling the world what a splendid fellow I am. It is the sort of thing that moves the sensible reviewer to just a contemptuous comment.

Pray give our best regards to Mrs. And, by the way, I hope the uncertain prospects of Everyman of which she spoke to me some time ago, are now both certain and good.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

Aug. 11.’33

Dear Armstrong, I think you have done nobly: thank you very much. It must have been a vile task.

As to Clemendy, £20 to 14/-; what does the Psalmist say: put not your trust in prices. This book business is just a small chapter in a big volume of depreciation, following naturally on a monstrous appreciation. Before long there will be a readjustment, but not to the high watermark of the early twenties.

We shall see you, then, next Saturday, and I trust Mrs with you. I have not yet received your questions.

I have been wanting to say: present my compliments to Miss Dorothy Sayers, and beg her from me to make a study, biographical and critical, of Wilkie Collins. From a few things she has written about him, I am sure she would make a very choice book. I believe he was a queer customer: all the better for her purpose.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

Aug. 14.'33

Dear Armstrong,

I am writing this day to The New Statesman re The Pantomime Man. I am doubtful of success since Ellis Roberts, the former Literary Editor, who sent me an occasional book for review, has left the paper some time ago.

Have you got a copy of 'The Cosy Room'? I should be much obliged. I am putting up a notion for a series in this vein to some agents, and they want to see The Cosy Room before they start.

Your number up with Rich & Cowan, if Pantomime Man doesn't do well? Don't bother about that: your number there will be up all right a very few weeks after the issue of your book about me. However, I did my best to dissuade you in Barbara and, I think, in Celarent.

We hope to see you both next Satdy.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

High St., Amersham, Bucks.

23 Aug.’33

Dear Armstrong,

The Sunday Times sent its proofs in duplicate, so I send you the enclosed, knowing your fondness for these curiosities. The sentence in the margin is not in the article.

‘The Machens’ Little French Maid’

Let me beg you not to make Shiel the authority for any statement about me or my life. The man is an inveterate liar.

Our best regards to you and Mrs.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Sept. 4.’33

Dear Armstrong,

In the first place, I hope that you and your wife are having a very pleasant time in Devon, and secondly that she may very soon find a betterjob. Not that I have ever thought much of the process of earning an honest livelihood. I remember writing in 1900 to my confrère, P. J. Toulet, (translator of Pan): ‘I shall soon be reduced to the sad and disgusting necessity of earning my own living.’ He approved in the strongest terms of my choice of adjectives: I approve them still.

Thank you very much for your kind review and for the Terror cutting. I think it must have been in 1922 that I wrote the Benson article. F.R.B. was going to South Africa. I don’t remember anything about giving the staff to Foster; but it may be so, and anyhow it’s of no consequence. I gave it to Benson, anyhow.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks.

Thursday 7 September 1933

Dear Armstrong,

Herewith the questions answered to the best of my abilities. But many of the matters you ask about are trifling, and I don't think I ever remembered them! As Edward Walford's 'devil', I wrote the Ballantyne obituary for him in the law paper and met A. E. Waite for the first time while I was doing it, under the big Dome.

The photograph in the Play Pictorial is not of me. I suppose the groups of the subsidiary villains were unsatisfactory: none appeared.

Best regards to you both.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

Sept. 19.’33

Dear Armstrong,

I accept your £5 proposition. I will not attempt to rewrite, but will correct any errors of fact, to the best of my ability…

Now look here. I must bring you a sense of your great blessing. You talk of your ‘swan song’. And you 21! I must confess that I remember feeling in the year 1892 that I was finished. That was imbecile enough; though I was 8 or 9 years older. Swan song, indeed. Why you have hardly begun to say ‘cheep, cheep’, and you have your life before you. I am 70. I think it extremely unlikely that I shall ever write another line worth reading; but it is not impossible.

More advice. When you told me you were going to write this Life, I shewed you in Barbara and Celarent that it would do no good; that it wouldn’t do. After glancing through the chapters you sent me, I am still sure that it won’t do. On general principles, it is always undesirable to write the lives of the living. It is done sometimes, I believe, in the case of politicians; but such ‘Lives’ are mere election puffs. And when, as in my case, the subject of the life is practically unknown, commercial disaster is certain to attend literary impropriety.

Keep your five pounds: put your notes away — and wait a little.

You say, I see, that you are not attempting any critical estimate of my work. Now this is the kind of book that can be written in the subject’s lifetime with propriety; though, in my case, it would be commercially worthless.

With best wishes to you both, and good counsel (believe me) to you.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Amersham, Bucks. Sept. 22.’33

Dear Armstrong,

Herewith your copy, duly clawed by me, according to the King’s Arms Treaty of the 20th inst. And now; criticize the Books as freely as ever you please, and leave Man as much alone as may be — and so spare me the use of the Censor’s pencil.

I am going to look up for you a bundle of letters to a dead friend, returned to me. I believe they are somewhat interesting.

With our best wishes to your wife and hopes for a speedy job.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Lynwood, Amersham, Bucks.

Sept. 27.’33

Dear Armstrong,

Can you send along that £5 for my revising services?

Here are the letters I spoke of: they are less interesting than I thought, but you may get a bit here and a bit there. I have enclosed a note on dates and residences to give some guide — vague enough — as to the date of the letters. They were written to Paul England (c. 1865-1932) concert singer, translator of songs and librettos (several for Beecham), author of a volume of poems, teacher of singing, man of books.

Best regards to your wife and yourself.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

High Street, Old Amersham, Bucks.

May 19.’37

Dear Armstrong,

Many thanks: I will send along the address to the French firm. Shall I suggest, ‘Abandon-nos ces lieux’ for ‘let us go hence’? I will think it over.

The first edition of Le Grand Dieu Pan appeared in 1901; I hadn’t heard of any other; it was in a green paper wrapper.

The Greenwoods were our hosts on the Paris visit. We started on April 23rd and returned on Tuesday April 27th.

I will return you the Yorick menu when I renew my stock of large envelopes. I was not at the dinner in question, though I have been Christopher Wilson’s guest at the club. What has become of the series of portraits of members, painted by Sime?

Colin Still, as a practical man, has told Rich & Cowan exactly what I told you four or five years ago, on conclusions obtained in modo et figura. The coincidence of the theoretic and practical reason is striking.

With our best to you both.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Saturday 1 July 1937

Dear Armstrong,

We are staying with friends: let that explain all that is amiss.

As a matter of fact, we are having a most gorgeous time with the Laybournes of the above address, on the western slopes of Llanhenoc, looking on the trees about Llanthewy Rectory, and the full sweep of the mountain beyond. We are driven all over the country; in the Rolls car for the roads, and in the Morris for the lanes.

No doubt the Jones of the catalogue is my cousin. His father was a physician of Finsbury Sq. I had thought his Xtian name was Jacob; but evidently not so. I remember trying to read Inez or 'Iquez' — a pamphlet in brown paper wrapper. I never heard of Hood's Magazine.

A pity about Eleusinia — as you want it.

Would you and your spouse come on Saturday after next at the usual hour; I have a trifle for you, a paged proof of 'The Shining Pyramid', to go into a publication of Faber's 'Welsh Stories'.

Our best remembrances to Rainey.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Would Rainey like to come with you, Saturday sen'night?

Forgot to put in catalogue; will keep it for you.

Dec. 5.’38

Dear Armstrong,

If you can get a Great Return, will you send it along with invoice?

On the whole, if poor old Saintsbury can keep going, some portion of my Irving article will survive into his collection. But no MSS; he sent me typescript.

I am booked to write a story for the Welsh Review, edited by Glyn Jones — a grave man, who spoke at the Newport Lunch. The first number appears in February next. I haven’t heard yet as to the date of the last number.

With our best to you both,

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Greenwood — you remember him at the pub? — is going filming shortly with Laughton and wife.

Dec. 7.’38

Dear Armstrong,

I am extremely obliged. I wish I could give you the required date for the Astrologer; but I have no notion of the time; therefore, I fear, we shall never know who was the Lord of the Ascendant, or who was afflicted in the Twelfth House!

No hurry about Waite’s book.

The other day I wanted three books: Mrs Earle’s Pot Pourri from a Surrey Garden, Clement Shorter’s Brontë Circle, and Willa Cather’s One of Ours. Each in its way is a real book; the Brontë book more especially. I have just heard that all are o p., and am trying Foyles. But they are books which should not be out of print.

You never met Clement Shorter? He would say: ‘Cub id, Bister Bachad, cub id’ — and then talk of ‘we Scandinavians’. He was very dark for a Scandinavian. The best to you both.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

P. S. There comes into my mind the notion of a bit of honest work I think I could do, if anyone would pay me for it: The Week End Dickens — a series of selections with an introduction. The notion is, not to provide for the man who has little of Dickens, and will only read him in scraps; but rather, for the man who knows and likes him so well that he is unwilling to be wholly destitute of Dickens in trains and by strange bedsides. Sylvia Townsend Warner did something like this five years ago; but she, or more likely her publishers, made the mistake of turning it into a sort of puzzle, by leaving some of the characters’ names blank in the text, and filled in at the end of the book: a silly plan.

Nov. 9.’39

Dear Armstrong,

What strikes me is that the Digest, so far from dying of the Wars should fatten on them. It is a collection of chunks and very well selected chunks; and what can be more suitable for the trenches? And no mistake could be greater to suppose that the army as it is, here and abroad, is on the ‘Comic Cuts’ level.

The only thing against it is the title, which is Johnsonian, learned and obsolete —— that is for the average mass of man. Still, I suppose the title must stand. It is extremely good of you to fish the publishing waters for the Dickens book. I have got the whole scheme of selections ready, and will sent it on to you in a day or two, with the information desired.

I didn’t know there had been two shots at the notion. Sylvia Townsend Warner wrote a noble Intro to her Week End Dickens: but the mere format of the book, within and without damned it from the beginning. It looked, in binding and on page, exactly like an Educational Textbook. Moreover, it was done on the Snip Principle, instead of on the Chunk Principle.

Well; do let us have that date, as soon as you can manage it.

With our love to you both,

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Feb. 12.’40

Dear Armstrong,

Upon my word: you would have done better if my prophecy had been fulfilled in the letter. A few kicks, a goblet of liquid fire, and a few moral tableaux; not pleasant, perhaps, but better than your actual portion of — Itis, and Pneumonia and Gruel.

I hope you begin to mend seriously. Can’t you get ‘seconded’ for editorial service in grand Cairo, under the sun?

We have had waterbursts, but only on the ground-floor — and that was untenanted at the time.

I note what you say about the Dickens book. If Routledge should want to take it on, it will be necessary to look closely into the agreement. They had a director who called himself Stallibras — un qui estate les bras — his real name being Sonnenschein; and the firm may keep up the tradition. Somewhere in 1887, I copied out a Sonnenschein agreement at Redway’s request. ‘Even we may learn something from that’, he said humbly, and yet with a touch of dishonest pride about him.

As to Casanova. The article consists of the 12 vols of the Casanova’s Society edition (as disrupted by the printer), the MS of the translated note, and the MS of my ‘Translator’s Preface’ which runs to 8,500 words, with the first proof of this preface. For this, I should like £20.

Very many thanks; but we have The New England Nun; a present, I think, from Goldsmith.

Kidnapped Poets of Great James St. I told you, I think, that I had once visited The Pines — in the post-Swinburnian age. I found Watts-Dunton a feeble, amiable old man. You remember Wilfred Blunt’s phrase as to Swinburne’s condition, when found: ‘He was dying of drunkard’s diarrhoea’.

You don’t say what your spouse got for keeping Xmas in a Fire Escape. I hope they let her off lightly.

Well, as I say, with others, in the Chorus of the Agamemnon… rendered in our version Yet, let the house's tale How dark so e'er Show yet an issue fair.

I am sorry to state that it didn't do anything of the kind; but let's hope that you and Mrs Armstrong and all of us may have better luck.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

High St., Old Amersham, Bucks.

Feb. 17.'40

Dear Armstrong,

Pistols pointed at your head? How would you like machine-gun nests?

can only say: Uffern Dan — which means 'Hell Fire', and is understood to be a word of command in the Welch Regiment. Pronounce: 'Iffairn Dahn'.

I'll see what can be done with Casanova-, but I am afraid the times are not very hopeful. I am beginning with Rota: could you oblige with 2 or 3 other 'likelies'?

You do that Digest extraordinarily well. Big type and little: all very good. Rothenstein commits one curious error: he speaks of Burne Jones as a Socialist. He was, in fact, a Gladstone Liberal, and, as it appears in his Life by Lady B-J, he was most distressed when Morris turned Socialist — anarchist, rather.

There won't be any Maginot Line or any other line — except the writing and editing line — for you.

With our love to you both Yours,

Arthur Machen

High St., Old Amersham, Bucks.

Feb. 25.'40

Dear Summerford Armstrong,

hope you are much better by this time; since I am going to bother you. But remember: 'The merciful man is mindful to his bothered, as well as to his beast.' In the first place: will you address and post the enclosed — if there is a Peter Davies firm still going? If not — put it in the fire or the W.P.B. No don't. There is a cutting enclosed which I should like back.

Secondly: as to the Dickens book. If Routledge doesn't want it, do you think that the other man you mentioned, who does want it, would make an advance now; I to furnish a Preface forthwith?

Tertio: I am in correspondence with Rota as to Casanova, and expect to settle one way or another before long.

Again, I hope you are better and that your spouse is well.

Our love to you both,

Yours sincerely,

Dear Armstrong,

We are very much relieved to hear that you are all right again. It is true that you are, evidently, very hard at work; a condition that I have always cordially disliked. Still, it is better than pneumonia — I suppose. Do give Shiel my cordial congratulations; I am delighted to hear the news. I suppose that his expedition to Palestine will be delayed by the war. I remember the J.H.V.S. Syndicate, which was looking for the Ark of the Covenant, was held up by the Italo-Turkish War. They knew exactly where to go, being guided by the researches of Javelius, who discovered the cipher of Ezekiel.

look forward to the promised booklet of verse. (Mind of Man) I should think it would be some time before I hear from Peter Davies! I had no notion he was gone to the Wars — or, most certainly, I would have refrained from troubling him.

Rota is not inclined to be optimistic. Still, as I reminded him, Casanova is a constant.

Send you back the Irishman with the thumb of the ready typist.

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Dear Armstrong,

Somewhere about 60 years ago, or, perhaps, a little more, at this season of the year, I remember hearing my father (who knew such scraps of Welsh as I possess) trying to persuade an old lady (who knew more Welsh than English) that the popular Welsh festival of Oct. 31st, known as Noscyn à gaia, should really be pronounced Nos galan gaeaf, which means 'the Eve of the Calends of Winter', otherwise, the Night before Winter. The old Welshwoman laughed consumedly, and held his doctrine in profound derision; but I saw a few nights ago a 'Welsh Talk' under the latter heading. It was a noisy discussion, as it appeared, on the celebration, and there were one or two references, derisory, from the eloquent tones of the speakers, to what they did at the feast as kept in 'Scotlahnd'. Nevertheless, and in spite of all, I hope you may keep Hallowe'en cheerfully.

We are both more sorry than I can say to hear your Marlow news. I was grieved at the story you had to tell when you were here; and I am more greatly grieved now. In such a case third parties can do nothing better than be sorry. But it is a good thing that your interests are in capable hands.

But I think the great topic of consolation and hope is: that the game is a long one, and you have only just sat down at the table. I was born in 1863, you in 1912; so I can talk like that. Mark you; I don't say that it is a splendid game; but it has its great moments.

And now for nonsense. Constable is doing wonderful things with The Handy Dickens. Sadleir wrote triumphantly some time ago, that in spite of all difficulties, he has secured Ardizzone to do a Title - Frontispiece. I got the proof of this lately. Ardizzone has excelled himself. He has changed the title to A Handy Dickens. The design consists of 7 or 8 vignettes, illustrating scenes from the works of Dickens. The designs are not original; they are what I should call rough recollections of Phiz, covered with a pale pink wash. But the point about them is; that not one of them illustrated any passage or scene that occurs in the selection!

I must quote a line from a favourite classic of mine:
‘Can Limburger smell worse?’

Dear Armstrong,

… a piece of news. In February, Colin Summerford raised the cry that my eightieth birthday was coming, and sent round the hat. The result was a fund (to which your mother most kindly contributed in your name); a very comfortable cheque, and a Lunch.

Picture: 80 candles on the board, 40 people about it: myself sitting between Lady Benson and Sir Max Beerbohm: Miss Lally chatting to Augustus John: W. W. Jacobs and Stella Gibbons to Mrs Machen. The typescript of my brief oration will be at your disposition.

Hilary has been in Italian hands since last June. One gathers that his state is tedious, but tolerable.

Now, when you write, do make the address most clear, beyond the possibility of error.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Armstrong,

There is a letter looking for you somewhere in the world. It excuses a long silence; and it may never find you, so I will recapitulate. I never got really well after my pneumonia experience of a year ago. Late in last autumn, the Dr had to be summoned in a hurry. He said 'tired heart', rest, etc; and so I lounge about in a dressing gown, in a hopeless sort of way. I remember very well that cheerful meeting at the King's Arms; and I hope that we shall all meet again there, and I hope that there will be something to drink. Of course, all wine has long ago been drunk: but one can often get threepenn'orth of gin or whiskey for three shillings, and a threepenny bottle of bass for 1/-.

I am sorry to hear of your loss of two old friends, Hudson I don't think I ever heard of: Sturge Moore's name I have long known. I think I saw it in Elkin Mathews' and John Lane Lists, before the days of the Bodley Head. I do not really know Max Beerbohm. I met him for a few minutes — at Theodore Wratislaw's — in 1899: he kindly supported my application for a Civil List Pension: and he was very pleasant at the'43 lunch. I was pleased to hear gentle applause from him, when I spoke of Little Women as 'that delightful book'. I forgot: I have another complaint/excuse. I see very badly. So last night I read Precious Balms — because the type is large, clear, with double leads; and I confess it did me some good to find that the Lady's Pictorial, in 1894, said The Great God Pan was an 'unmanly' book. Lately, I have been reading Maisie Ward's G. K. Chesterton — informing, even interesting here and there; but dullish as a whole. Norah Hoult has written a very good novel, There Were No Windows, a tragic book, on the last years of Violet Hunt.

Our love and best wishes,

Dear Armstrong,

Imprimis: let me tell you that my sight has become very uncertain, and so let me beg you to make your address splendidior vitro — clearer than glass. I am sorry to hear that Collins has proved an ingrate. Never mind: when I was about 9 years your senior, I had 4 neat MSS in a drawer, all turned down in various circumstances of disgrace. For example, Allen & Unwin (t. Fisher Unwin) told me that 'Hieroglyphics' seemed to be 'super journalism' — a phrase not intended as a compliment. I think I must have told you that 'Penguin Books' asked me to make a selection of short stories 4 or 5 years ago. The scheme was held up by Hutchinson demanding a fee of £20 for two stories. Now, I understand, Hutch has relented, and the book may go forward. Or it may not. You know the Doctor's couplet: 'Alas, what ills the scholar's life assail'. I often feel it is a great pity that 'publisher' won't scan as a substitute for 'patron' in the second verse.

I saw a very commendatory allusion to your paper on 'The Dowson Legend' in the Sunday Times or Observer yesterday. I used to hear of him now and again from Jepson — who thought drink had been his ruin.

T'otherday Cyril Clemens (Intern. Mark Twain Society) wrote asking if I had known Arthur Symons 'very well'. I told him that I was remarkable for hardly knowing any of the Nineties men at all.

I hope you will be back in October; I hope I shall be here to see; I hope there will be something to drink at the King's Arms.

Our best wishes,

Yours,

Arthur Machen

Dear Armstrong,

Not so much your 'illegible scrawl' as my bad eyesight — a dreadful drawback to life, in all sorts of ways.

am glad to say that all our long anxieties about Hilary are over. He is returned, somewhat oddly — and very happily — looking better than we have ever seen him, and as cheerful as you please. You would think that tough fighting, his walk through Italy, Italian and German prison camps made up into a famous holiday. He is not sure when he will be out of the army; but since he enlisted in the early summer of'39, I suppose he may hope for an early exit.

Can they give you some apparatus to contain and restrain that sad ankle of yours? The very knowledge that one must walk with great care is apt to lead to nervous and unsteady steps. Do remember us to your brother and his wife; I remember our very pleasant meeting at the King's Arms — how many years ago? Cyril Clemens! You put a note of exclamation. I fully assent. He seems to me to lead an absurd life; and I don't see that there can be much profit in it. And again the note of exclamation: Gerald Gould! I once read an article by him demonstrating that Keats was mistaken in supposing the nightingale to be immortal; and thence deducing that Keats had no imagination, but merely fancy.

There was a letter in the Sunday Times this week which almost made me snuff the battle from afar, and to remark 'Ha, ha' in the manner of Job's war horse. It was in a correspondence on the curious fact that, till quite lately, Cumberland shepherds counted their sheep by Welsh Numerals. This particular letter was from one Professor Gruffydd, M.P. (of whom I know nothing) relating that his grandmother, (ob. 1912) used to recite certain words — Hôn, Thôn, Fedar, Fen —— which she called 'Fairy Counting'. The Prof said absurdly, as I think, that they were of Germanic origin: I reflected that they might have fitted very well into the 'Novel of the Black Seal'. But that was finished 50 years ago.

I have heard no more from ‘Penguin Books’ about their proposed selection from my tales; but I can wait without much impatience.

I don’t think I told you that poor Ben, who used to bring our drinks at the King’s Arms, was lost on a bomber in the Mediterranean. He was an excellent fellow.

With all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Dear Armstrong,

I don’t think I know the Goodens: I may have met them some time ago at the King’s Arms. I think Mrs G. is right about The Griffin; it is a very pleasant pub: but a long walk for me in these days. There is always something to drink there, and it is always open: whereas the King’s Arms is often shut, and when open, it is apt to say: ‘no whiskey’, ‘no bottled beer’, and so forth.

It is against such infamies and many others like them, that Britain has risen in its might, and swears it will Nationalize the Bank of England.

have always wanted to know where Shakespeare got his ‘Jack Cade’ stuff for Henry VI, Pt 2. From Chronicles? Or Tradition? There are some very moving appeals put into Jack Cade’s mouth:-

‘You shall all be free, and I will rule over you.’

‘The five-hooped pot shall have ten hoops, and I will make it felony to brew small beer.’

—— I quote from a long memory.

Journalists and friends have been working hard to portray Countess Margot. It is odd how all the stuff I have read is a failure. They say ‘scintillating’, ‘sparkling’, individual’, ‘wonderful hostess’, ‘what wit’, etc etc: but nothing comes over. It is an extremely difficult art, this of portrait painting. I often think of odd personalities that I have known — and know that I could not transfer them to the page.

I know a little of the man on whom you are lecturing, Jones, from occasional references in Boswell. He is styled in one piece of contemporary verse, ‘Harmonious Jones!’ He had what I consider the sensible habit of always propounding to himself a classic model, when he projected a new book. If, for instance, Jones thought of writing on the Governance of India, he would propose as a model, Aristotle on Politics.

Do give our cordial regards to your brother and his wife and may your release come soon. This is what the Lama said to the Cobra: but don’t say I called you one.

All the best,

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

May 3.'46

Dear Armstrong,

am very glad to hear you are back; and I suppose you are not sorry. And if you have not a roof you have a job, and the latter will provide the former in due time. Tell Aneurin to hurry up.

Will you lunch with us at the Kings Arms on Satdy, May 18 as soon after 12 as you can manage? Go into the little old room which we always frequented: you will find us there, or we will suddenly appear.

I have saved up for you a proof copy in wrapper of the little Penguin book, Holy Terrors. I will bring it along.

All the best,

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

Let me prepare you, for what the few years have done for me: imperfect copy, many leaves missing, poor condition, binding damaged!

Dear Armstrong,

I am extremely sorry to hear of that pleurisy. It is not dangerous, but I believe extremely painful and distressing, and tiresome in a very high degree. I do hope you will be soon rid of it.

Now for apology. Believe me I am profoundly grateful for all the trouble you have taken on my behalf for these many years past; but I am totally incapable of doing what you wish. I have ‘gone off’ badly since we met. That was my last visit to the Griffin. About a month ago, I went as far as the K. Arms —— and I am only just recovering. I cannot read or write, to any purpose: I am in fact a helpless invalid. But: when you are quite recovered and the airs are milder, if you and your wife will come to tea, you and I will sit in a corner and mutter for a while, and I will try to answer any questions you may put, your voice being directed to my practical ear.

Good luck to your projected edition of your poetry.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Machen

The Criticism

Arthur Machen: A Novelist of Ecstasy and Sin by Vincent Starrett

NOTE

With singular unanimity critics for thirty years have slighted the work of Arthur Machen. A line suffices for him in Holbrook Jackson's "The Eighteen Nineties," and Mr. Blaikie-Murdoch ignores him completely in "The Renaissance of the Nineties"; yet those are the standard works on the period to which, chronologically, at least, Machen belongs. Mr. Turquet-Milnes, with greater appreciation, gives him a half-chapter in his scholarly work, "The Influence of Baudelaire," but even that is made up largely of quotations from "The Hill of Dreams," to prove Machen a descendent of Baudelaire — an error to which I subscribed until Machen himself disillusioned me, although the assertion is still partially true.

Because, in my opinion, Arthur Machen is the outstanding artist of his time, and one of the great masters of all time, I wrote the following paper, which first appeared in Reedy's Mirror for October 5, 1917. That issue is not now obtainable, and, as calls for it continue to come to me and to the publisher, I find ground for a belief that Machen may, at length, be coming into his own, a tardy phenomenon which I am happy to hasten so far as it lies within my power. Mr. Walter M. Hill shares this feeling and this brochure is the result.

I am indebted to Mr. William Marion Reedy for permission to reprint those parts of the article which appeared in his journal.

V.S.

ARTHUR MACHEN

SOME THIRTY ODD years ago a young man of twenty-two, the son of a Welsh clergyman, fresh from school and with his head full of a curiously occult mediaevalism, privately acquired from yellowed palimpsests and dog-eared volumes of black letter, wrote a classic. More, he had it published. Only one review copy was sent out; that was to Le Livre, of Paris. It fell into the hands of Octave Uzanne, who instantly ordered Rabelais and Boccaccio to “shove over” on the immortal seats and make room by their side for the author. The book was “The Chronicle of Clemendy”; the author, Arthur Machen.

Three years ago, about, not long after the great war first shook the world, a London evening newspaper published inconspicuously a purely fictional account of a supposed incident of the British retreat from Mons. It described the miraculous intervention of the English archers of Agincourt at a time when the British were sore pressed by the German hordes. Immediately, churchmen, spiritualists, and a host of others, seized upon it as an authentic record and the miracle as an omen. In the hysteria that followed, Arthur Machen, its author, found himself a talked-of man, because he wrote to the papers denying that the narrative was factual. Later, when his little volume, “The Bowmen and Other Legends of the War,” appeared in print, it met with an extraordinary and rather impertinent success.

But what had Machen been doing all those long years between 1885 and 1914?

In a day of haphazard fiction and rodomontade criticism, the advent of a master workman is likely to be unheralded, if, indeed, he is fortunate enough to find a publisher to put him between covers. Mr. Machen is not a newcomer, however, as we have seen; no immediate success with a “best seller” furnishes an incentive for a complimentary notice. He is an unknown, in spite of “Clemendy,” in spite of “The Bowmen,” in spite of everything. For thirty years he has been writing English prose, a period ample for the making of a dozen reputations of the ordinary kind, and in that time he has produced just ten books. In thirty years Harold Bindloss and Rex Beach will have written one-hundred-and-ten books and sold the moving picture rights of them all.

Of course, it is exactly because he does not write books of the ordinary kind that Arthur Machen's reputation as a writer was not made long ago. His apotheosis will begin after his death. The insectial fame of the "popular" novelist is immediate; it is born at dawn and dies at sunset. The enduring fame of the artist too often is born at sunset, but it is immortal.

More than Hawthorne or Tolstoy, Machen is a novelist of the soul. He writes of a strange borderland, lying somewhere between Dreams and Death, peopled with shades, beings, spirits, ghosts, men, women, souls — what shall we call them? — the very notion of whom stops vaguely just short of thought. He writes of the life Satyr-ic. For him Pan is not dead; his votaries still whirl through woodland windings to the mad pipe that was Syrinx, and carouse fiercely in enchanted forest grottoes (hidden somewhere, perhaps, in the fourth dimension!). His meddling with the crucibles of science is appalling in its daring, its magnificence, and its horror. Even the greater works of fictional psychology— "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," if you like — shrink before his astounding inferences and suggestions.

It is his theory that the fearful and shocking rites of the Bacchic cultus survive in this disillusioned age; that Panic lechery and wickedness did not cease with the Agony, as Mrs. Browning and others would have us believe.

Of Hawthorne, Arthur Symons wrote: "He is haunted by what is obscure, dangerous, and on the confines of good and evil." Machen crosses those perilous frontiers. He all but lifts the veil; himself, indeed, passes beyond it. But the curtain drops behind him and we, hesitating to follow, see only dimly the phantasmagoria beyond; the ecstasies of vague shapes with a shining about them, on the one hand; on the other the writhings of animate gargoyles. And we experience, I think, a distinct sense of gratitude toward this terrible guide for that we are permitted no closer view of the mysteries that seem to him so clear.

We glimpse his secrets in transfiguring flashes from afar, as Launcelot viewed the San Graal, and, like that tarnished knight, we quest vainly a tangible solution, half in apprehension, always in glamour. But it is like Galahad we must seek the eternal mysteries that obsess Arthur Machen. There is no solution but in absolution, for it is the mysteries of life and death of which he writes, and of life-in-death and death-in-life. This with particular reference to Machen’s two most important books, “The House of Souls” and “The Hill of Dreams,” in which he reaches his greatest stature as a novelist of the soul.

There are those who will call him a novelist of Sin, quibbling about a definition. With these I have no quarrel; the characterizations are synonymous. His books exhale all evil and all corruption; yet they are as pure as the fabled waters of that crystal spring De Leon sought. They are pervaded by an ever-present, intoxicating sense of sin, ravishingly beautiful, furiously Pagan, frantically lovely; but Machen is a finer and truer mystic than the two-penny occultists who guide modern spiritualistic thought. If we are to subscribe to his curious philosophy, to be discussed later, we must believe that there is no paradox in this.

But something of what we are getting at is explained in his own pages, in this opening paragraph from his story, “The White People,” in “The House of Souls”: “‘Sorcery and sanctity,’ said Ambrose, ‘these are the only realities. Each is an ecstasy, a withdrawal from the common life.’” And, a little later, in this: “‘There is something profoundly unnatural about sin … the essence of which really is in the taking of heaven by storm.’”

One gathers from a general vagueness on the subject that sin is not popular in these times. There are, of course, new sins and advanced sins and higher sins, all of which are intensely interesting. The chief puzzle to the lay mind is why they should bear these names, since they are usually neither new, advanced and high, nor particularly sinful. I am speaking of sin as an offense against the nature of things, and of evil in the soul, which has very little to do with the sins of the statute book. Sin, according to the same Ambrose I have quoted, is conceivable in the talking of animals. If a chair should walk across a room, that would be sinful, or if a tree sat down with us to afternoon tea. The savage who worships a conjurer is a far finer moralist than the civilise who suspects him — and I use the name moralist for one who has an appreciation of sin.

This is not the sin of the legal code. Ambrose I conceive to be Arthur Machen. There are only two realities; sorcery and sanctity — sin and sainthood — and each is an ecstasy. Arthur Machen's is the former.

Perhaps his most remarkable story — certainly I think his most terrible story, is "The Great God Pan," at first published separately with "The Inmost Light"; now occurring in "The House of Souls." It is the story of an experiment upon a girl, as a result of which, for a moment, she is permitted a sight of the Great God, beyond the veil, with shocking consequences. Yet it is told with exquisite reticence and grace, and with a plausibility that is as extraordinary as it is immoral. Here is the conclusion of that story:

"What I said Mary would see, she saw, but I forgot that no human eyes could look on such a vision with impunity. And I forgot, as I have just said, that when the house of life is thus thrown open, there may enter in that for which we have no name, and human flesh may become the veil of a horror one dare not express…. The blackened face, the hideous form upon the bed, changing and melting before your eyes from woman to man, from man to beast, and from beast to worse than beast, all the strange horror that you witnessed, surprises me but little. What you say the doctor you sent for saw and shuddered at, I noticed long ago; I knew what I had done the moment the child was born, and when it was five years old I surprised it, not once or twice, but several times, with a playmate, you may guess of what kind…. And now Helen is with her companions."

There is the very quintessence of horror in the unutterable suggestion of such passages. As for "The Hill of Dreams," I have found its reading one of the most desolate and appalling experiences in literature. Reading it, himself, years after publication, its author decided that it was a "depressing book." That is undoubtedly true, but spiritually as well as technically it marks to date the topmost pinnacle of his tormented genius. It reaches heights so rarefied that breathing literally becomes painful. To the casual reader this sounds absurd; hyperbolical if not hypocritical rant; but in a day when a majority of critics find it difficult to restrain themselves in speaking of Harold Bell Wright, and place Jeffery Farnol beside Fielding and Thackeray, one cannot go far wrong in indulging a few enthusiasms for so genuine an artist as Arthur Machen.

Of the reviewers into whose hands fell this remarkable book, in the year of its publication, 1907, only one appears to have valued it at its real worth — the editor of The Academy, who, carried away by the tale and its telling, turned out a bit of critical prose which might have been lifted from the book, itself. “There is something sinister in the beauty of Mr. Machen’s book,” he wrote. “It is like some strangely shaped orchid, the colour of which is fierce and terrible, and its perfume is haunting to suffocation by reason of its intolerable sweetness. The cruelty of the book is more savage than any of the cruelty which the book describes. Lucian shuddered at the boys who were deliberately hanging an ungainly puppy; he had thrashed the little ruffian who kicked the sick cat, before he wrapped himself away from the contact of such infamy in the shelter of his own imaginings. For in ‘The Hill of Dreams’ you seem to be shown a lovely, sensitive boy who has fashioned himself a white palace of beauty in his own mind. He has had time only to realize its full beauty when disease lays its cold touch upon him, and gathers him into her grasp, until he lies decaying and horrible, seeing his own decay and seeing that his decay makes the white palace foul. The boys did not chant songs as they looped the string round the neck of the uncouth puppy. Mr. Machen fashions prose out of the writhings of Lucian, who is dear to him: and his prose has the rhythmic beat of some dreadful Oriental instrument, insistent, monotonous, haunting; and still the soft tone of one careful flute sounds on, and keeps the nerves alive to the slow and growing pain of the rhythmic beat. Lucian in ecstacy of worship for the young girl whose lips have given him a new life, pressed his body against sharp thorns until the white flesh of his body was red with drops of blood. That, too, is the spirit of the book. It is like some dreadful liturgy of self-inflicted pain, set to measured music: and the cadence of that music becomes intolerable by its suave phrasing and perfect modulation. The last long chapter with its recurring themes is a masterpiece of prose, and in its way unique.”

After that, there would seem to be no need for further comment on “The Hill of Dreams.” But there is — there is!

Quite as important as what Mr. Machen says is his manner of saying it. He possesses an English prose style which in its mystical suggestion and beauty is unlike any other I have encountered. There is ecstacy in his pages.

Joris-Karl Huysmans in a really good translation suggests Machen better, perhaps, than another; both are debtors to Baudelaire.

The “ecstasy” one finds in Machen’s work (of which more anon) is due in no small degree to his beautiful English “style” — an abominable word. But Machen is no mere word-juggler. His vocabulary, while astonishing and extensive, is not affectedly so. Yet his sentences move to sonorous, half-submerged rhythms, swooning with pagan color and redolent of sacerdotal incense. What is the secret of this graceful English method? It is this: he achieves his striking results and effects through his noteworthy gift of selection and arrangement. I had reached this conclusion, I think, before I encountered a passage from “The Hill of Dreams,” which clinched it:

“Language, he understood, was chiefly important for the beauty of its sounds, by its possession of words resonant, glorious to the ear, by its capacity, when exquisitely arranged, of suggesting wonderful and indefinable impressions, perhaps more ravishing and further removed from the domain of strict thought than the impressions excited by music itself. Here lay hidden the secret of suggestion, the art of causing sensation by the use of words.”

Was it ever better expressed? He defines his method and exhibits its results at the same time. And dipping almost at random into the same volume, here is a further example of the method:

“Slowly and timidly he began to untie his boots, fumbling with the laces, and glancing all the while on every side at the ugly, misshapen trees that hedged the lawn. Not a branch was straight, not one was free, but all were interlaced and grew one about another; and just above ground, where the cankered stems joined the protuberant roots, there were forms that imitated the human shape, and faces and twining limbs that amazed him. Green mosses were hair, and tresses were stark in grey lichen; a twisted root swelled into a limb; in the hollows of the rooted bark he saw the masks of men…. As he gazed across the turf and into the thicket, the sunshine seemed really to become green, and the contrast between the bright glow poured on the lawn and the black shadows of the brake made an odd flickering light in which all the grotesque postures of stem and root began to stir; the wood was alive. The turf beneath him heaved and sunk as with the deep swell of the sea….”

And:

“He could imagine a man who was able to live on one sense while he pleased; to whom, for example, every impression of touch, taste, hearing, or seeing should be translated into odor; who at the desired kiss should be ravished with the scent of dark violets, to whom music should be the perfume of a rose garden at dawn.”

This is not prose at all, but poetry, and poetry of a high order. And it is from such beautiful manipulation of words, phrases, and rhythms that Machen attains his most clairvoyant and arresting effects in the realms of horror, dread, and terror; from the strange gesturings of trees, the glow of furnace-like clouds, the somber beauty of brooding fields, and valleys all too still, the mystery of lovely women, and all the terror of life and nature seen with the understanding eye.

So much for Arthur Machen as a novelist. It is a fascinating subject, but it is also an extensive one, and the curious, tenuous quality of his work may lead one into indiscretions.

The peculiar philosophy of Arthur Machen is set down in “Hieroglyphics” and in “Dr. Stiggins: His Views and Principles.” The first chapter of the latter work is a scathing satire on certain foibles and idiosyncracies of the American people — such as lynching, vote-buying, and food-adulteration — but as it is, on the whole, a polemical volume which, by the nature of the subjects it treats, can have less permanent interest than the author’s other work, it may be put to one side; although as a specimen of Machen’s impeccable prose it must not be ignored.

In “Hieroglyphics” he returns to those ecstasies mentioned in “The White People” and gives us further definitions. The word ecstasy is merely a symbol; it has many synonyms. It means rapture, adoration, a withdrawal from common life, the other things. “Who can furnish a precise definition of the indefinable? They (the ‘other things’) are sometimes in the song of a bird, sometimes in the whirl of a London street, sometimes hidden under a great, lonely hill. Some of us seek them with most hope and the fullest assurance in the sacring of the mass, others receive tidings through the sound of music, in the color of a picture, in the shining form of a statue, in the meditation of eternal truth.”

“Hieroglyphics” is Arthur Machen’s theory of literature, brilliantly exposited by that “cyclical mode of discoursing” that was affected by Coleridge. In it he promulgates the admirable doctrine that fine literature must be, in effect, an allegory and not the careful history of particular persons. He seeks a mark of division which is to separate fine literature from mere literature, and finds the solution in the one word ecstasy (or, if you prefer, beauty, wonder, awe, mystery, sense of the unknown, desire for the unknown), with this conclusion: “If ecstasy be present, then I say there is fine literature, if it be absent, then, in spite of all the cleverness, all the talents, all the workmanship and observation and dexterity you may show me, then, I think, we have a product (possibly a very interesting one) which is not fine literature.”

Following this reasoning, by an astonishing sequence of arguments, he proceeds to the bold experiment of proving “Pickwick” possessed of ecstasy, and “Vanity Fair” lacking it. The case is an extreme one, he admits, deliberately chosen to expound his theory to the *n*th. degree. The analytical key to the test is found in the differentiation between art and artifice, a nice problem in such extreme instances as Poe’s “Dupin” stories and Stevenson’s “Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde,” as Mr. Machen points out. By this ingenious method the “Odyssey,” “Oedipus,” “Morte D’Arthur,” “Kubla Khan,” “Don Quixote,” and “Rabelais” immediately are proven fine literature; a host of other esteemed works merely, if you like, good literature.

“Pantagruel” by a more delicate application of the test becomes a finer work than “Don Quixote,” and in the exposition of this dictum we come upon one of the mountain peaks of Machen’s amazing philosophy.

He begins the discussion with a jest about the enormous capacity for strong drink exhibited by Mr. Pickwick and his friends, and reminds us that it was the god of wine in whose honor Sophocles wrote his dramas and choral songs, who was worshipped and invoked at the Dionysiaca; and that all the drama arose from the celebration of the Bacchic mysteries. He goes on to the “Gargantua” and “Pantagruel,” which reek of wine as Dickens does of brandy and water.

The Rabelaisian history begins: “Grandgousier estoit bon raillard en son temps, aimant à boire net,” and ends with the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, with the word "Trinch … un mot panomphée, celebré et entendu de toutes nations, et nous signifie, beuvez." "And I refer you," continues Machen, "to the allocution of Bacbuc, the priestess of the Bottle, at large. 'By wine,' she says, 'is man made divine,' and I may say that if you have not got the key to these Rabelaisian riddles, much of the value — the highest value — of the book is lost to you."

Seeking the meaning of this Bacchic cultus, this apparent glorification of drunkenness in all lands and in all times, from Ancient Greece through Renascent France to Victorian England, by peoples and persons not themselves given to excess, he finds it again in the word ecstasy.

"We are to conclude that both the ancient people and the modern writers recognized ecstasy as the supreme gift and state of man, and that they chose the Vine and the juice of the Vine, as the most beautiful and significant symbol of that Power which withdraws a man from the common life and the common consciousness, and taking him from the dust of earth, sets him in high places, in the eternal world of ideas … Let us never forget that the essence of the book ('Pantagruel') is in its splendid celebration of ecstasy, under the figure of the Vine."

At this point Mr. Machen places the "key" in our hands and declines further to reveal his secrets. In Mr. Pickwick's overdose of milk punch we are to find, ultimately, "a clue to the labyrinth of mystic theology."

By his own test we are enabled to place Arthur Machen's greatest works on the shelf with "Don Quixote" and "Pantagruel"; by his own test we find the ecstasy of which he speaks in his own pages, under the symbol of the Vine, and under figures even more beautiful and terrible. For minor consideration he finds in Rabelais another symbolism of ecstasy:

"The shape of gauloiserie, of gross, exuberant gaiety, expressing itself by outrageous tales, outrageous words, by a very cataract of obscenity, if you please, if only you will notice how the obscenity of Rabelais transcends the obscenity of common life; his grossness is poured out in a sort of mad torrent, in a frenzy, a very passion of the unspeakable."

In Cervantes he finds the greater deftness, the finer artifice, but he believes the conception of Rabelais the higher because it is the more remote. Pantagruel's "more than frankness, its ebullition of grossness … is either the merest lunacy, or else it is sublime.” And the paragraph that succeeds this one in the book, perhaps it is part of the same paragraph, sums up this astonishing philosophy with a conclusion calculated to shock the Puritanic. Thus:

“Don’t you perceive that when a certain depth has been passed you begin to ascend into the heights? The Persian poet expresses the most transcendental secrets of the Divine Love by the grossest phrases of the carnal love; so Rabelais soars above the common life, above the streets and the gutter, by going far lower than the streets and the gutter: he brings before you the highest by positing that which is lower than the lowest, and if you have the prepared, initiated mind, a Rabelaisian ‘list’ is the best preface to the angelic song. (!) All this may strike you as extreme paradox, but it has the disadvantage of being true, and perhaps you may assure yourself of its truth by recollecting the converse proposition — that it is when one is absorbed in the highest emotions that the most degrading images will intrude themselves.”

And so on…. The sense of the futility almost of attempting to explain Machen becomes more pronounced as I progress. You will have to read him. You will find his books (if you are fortunate) in a murky corner of some obscure second-hand bookshop.

Arthur Machen was born in Wales in 1863. He is married and has two children. That is an astonishing thought, after reading “The Inmost Light.” It is surprising indeed to learn that he was born. He is High Church, “with no particular respect for the Archbishop of Canterbury,” and necessarily subconsciously Catholic, as must be all those “lonely, awful souls” who write ecstasy across the world. He hates puritanism with a sturdier hatred than inspires Chesterton; for a brilliant exposition of this aversion I commend readers to his mocking introduction to “The House of Souls.” That work, “The Hill of Dreams,” and “Hieroglyphics” were written between 1890 and 1900, after which their author turned strolling player and alternated for a time between the smartest theatres in London and the shabbiest music halls in London’s East End. For the last six years or so he has been a descriptive writer on the London Evening News.

His works not before mentioned comprise a translation (the best) of the “Heptameron”; “Fantastic Tales,” a collection of mediaeval whimsies, partly translated and partly original and altogether Rabelaisian and delightful; “The Terror,” a “shilling shocker” (his own characterization), but a finer work withal than most of the “literature” of the day, and “The Great Return,” an extraordinary short tale which may find place some day in another such collection as “The House of Souls.”

I have mentioned “The Chronicle of Clemendy,” calling it a classic, and something further should be said about that astonishing book. It is the Welsh “Heptameron,” a chronicle of amorous intrigue, joyous drunkenness, and knightly endeavor second to none in the brief muster of the world’s greatest classics. In it there is the veritable flavour of mediaeval record. Somewhat less outspoken than Balzac in his “Droll Stories,” and less verbose than Boccaccio, Machen proves himself the peer of either in gay, irresponsible, diverting, unflagging invention, while his diction is lovelier than that of any of his forerunners, including the nameless authors of those rich Arabian tapestries which were the parent tales of all mediaeval and modern facetiae.

The day is coming when a number of serious charges will be laid against us who live in this generation, and some severe questions asked, and the fact that we will be dead, most of us, when the future fires its broadside, has nothing at all to do with the case.

We are going to be asked, post-mortem, why we allowed Ambrose Bierce to vanish from our midst, unnoticed and unsought, after ignoring him shamefully throughout his career; why Stephen Crane, after a few flamboyant reviews, was so quickly forgotten at death; why Richard Middleton was permitted to swallow his poison at Brussels; why W.C. Morrow and Walter Blackburn Harte were in our day known only to the initiated, discriminating few; their fine, golden books merely rare “items” for the collector. Among other things, posterity is going to demand of us why, when the opportunity was ours, we did not open our hearts to Arthur Machen and name him among the very great.

I have let this last assertion stand as part of the original article, although Mr. Machen writes me that I am in error. “I never read a line of Baudelaire,” he says, “but I have read deeply in Poe, who, I believe, derives largely from Baudelaire.” Of course, it is the other way ‘round, Baudelaire derives from Poe, but my own assumption is rendered clear. — V.S.

THE REMEMBRANCE OF THE BARD

In the darkness of old age let not my memory fail:
Let me not forget to celebrate the beloved land of Gwent.
If they imprison me in a deep place, in a house of pestilence,
Still shall I be free, remembering the sunshine
upon Mynydd Maen.
There have I listened to the song of the lark, my soul has ascended with the song of the little bird:
The great white clouds were the ships of my spirit, sailing to the haven of the Almighty.
Equally to be held in honour is the site of the Great Mountain.
Adorned with the gushing of many waters —
sweet is the shade of its hazel thickets.
There a treasure is preserved which I will not celebrate;
It is glorious and deeply concealed.
If Teils should return, if happiness were restored to the Cymri,
Dewi and Dyfrig should serve his Mass; then a great marvel would be made visible.
O blessed and miraculous work! then should my bliss be as the joy of angels.
I had rather behold this offering than kiss the twin lips of dark Gwenllian.
Dear my land of Gwent: O quam dilecta tabernacula.
Thy rivers are like precious golden streams of Paradise, thy hills are as the Mount Syon.
Better a grave on Twyn Barlwm than a throne in the palace of the Saxons at Caer-Ludd.

THE PRAISE OF MYFANWY

O gift of the everlasting:
O wonderful and hidden mystery.
Many secrets have been vouchsafed to me,
I have been long acquainted with the wisdom of the trees;
Ash and oak and elm have communicated to me
from my boyhood,
The birch and the hazel and all the trees of the greenwood have not been dumb.
There is a caldron rimmed with pearls of whose gifts I am not ignorant;
I will speak little of it; its treasures are known to the Bards.
Many went on the search of Caer-Pedryfan,
Seven alone returned with Arthur, but my spirit was present.
Seven are the apple-trees in a beautiful orchard;
I have eaten of their fruit which is not bestowed on Saxons.
I am not ignorant of a Head which is glorious and venerable;
It made perpetual entertainment for the warriors,
their joys would have been immortal;
If they had not opened the door of the south,
they would have feasted for ever,
Listening to the song of the fairy Birds of Rhiannon.
Let not anyone instruct me concerning the Glassy
Isle;
In the garments of the saints who returned from it were rich odours of Paradise.
All this I knew, and yet my knowledge was ignorance.
For one day, as I walked by Caer-rhiu in the principal forest of Gwent,

I saw golden Myfanwy as she bathed in the brook Tarogi,
Her hair flowed about her; Arthur’s crown had dissolved into a shining mist.
I gazed into her blue eyes as it were into twin heavens,
All the parts of her body were adornments and miracles.
O gift of the everlasting:
O wonderful and hidden mystery:
When I embraced Myfanwy a moment became immortality.

The Autobiography

Arthur Machen, c. 1905

Far Off Things

This is the first of three autobiographical volumes written by Machen. It was first published in 1922 and covers his early life, up to the mid-1880s. His childhood in Gwent, South Wales is evocatively conveyed, especially the lyrical passages detailing Machen's appreciation of the Welsh countryside.

The publication of his autobiography is testament to the new appetite for Machen's work that emerged in the 1920s. Indeed, after the war Machen found himself something of a literary celebrity, especially among American readers, who had rediscovered the decadent style in which he so excelled and who created a ready audience for his later work.

DEDICATION

TO ALFRED TURNER

THIS IS A book, my dear Turner, which I had in my heart to write for many years. The thought of it came to me with that other thought that I was growing — rather, grown — old; that the curtain had definitely been rung down on all the days of my youth. And so I got into the way of looking back, of recalling the far gone times and suns of the 'seventies and early 'eighties when the scene of my life was being set. I made up my mind that I would write about it all — some day.

Some day would undoubtedly have been Never; if it had not been for you. I had not spoken of the projected book to you or anyone else; but one fine morning in 1915 you ordered me to write it! You were then, you will remember, editing the London Evening News, and as a reporter on your staff I had nothing to do but to obey. The book was written, appeared in the paper as "The Confessions of a Literary Man," and now reappears as "Far Off Things."

So far, good. I enjoyed writing the book enormously; and, I frankly confess, I enjoy reading it. In a word, I am not grumbling. But there is one little point that I do not mean to neglect. My complacent views as to "Far Off Things" may not be shared by other and, possibly, more competent judges. And what I want to impress on you is this: that if there is to be trouble, "you are going to have your share of it." You ordered the book to be written, you printed it in your paper, you have urged me to reprint it, not once or twice, but again and again.

Now, you remember Johnson on advising an author to print his book. "This author," said the Doctor, "when mankind are hunting him with a canister at his tail can say, 'I would not have published, had not Johnson, or Reynolds, or Musgrave, or some other good judge commended the work!'"

Now you see the purpose of this Epistle Dedicatory. It is to make it quite clear that, if there is to be any talk of canisters and tails, the order will run:

“Canisters for two!”

Arthur Machen

Chapter I

ONE NIGHT A year or so ago I was the guest of a famous literary society. This society, or club, it is well known, believes in celebrating literature — and all sorts of other things — in a thoroughly agreeable and human fashion. It meets not in any gloomy hall or lecture room, it has no gritty apparatus of blackboard, chalk, and bleared water-bottle. It summons its members and its guests to a well-known restaurant of the West End, it gives them red and white roses for their button-holes, and sets them down to an excellent dinner and good red wine at a gaily decked table, flower garlanded, luminous with many starry lamps.

Well, as I say, I found myself on a certain night a partaker of all this cheerfulness. I was one guest among many; there were explorers and ambassadors and great scientific personages and judges, and the author who has given the world the best laughter that it has enjoyed since Dickens died: in a word, I was in much more distinguished company than that to which I am accustomed. And after dinner the Persians (as I will call them) have a kindly and courteous custom of praising their guests; and to my astonishment and delight the speaker brought me into his oration and said the kindest and most glowing things imaginable about a translation I once made of the “Heptameron” of Margaret of Navarre. I was heartily pleased; I hold with Foker in “Pendennis” that every fellow likes a hand. Praise is grateful, especially when there has not been too much of it; but it is not to record my self-complacence that I have told this incident of the Persian banquet. As I sat at the board and heard the speaker’s kindly compliments, I was visited for a twinkling part of a moment by a vision; by such a vision as they say comes to the spiritual eyes of drowning men as they sink through the green water. The scene about me was such as one will find nowhere else but in London. The multitude of lights, the decoration of the great room and the tables, above all the nature of the company and something in the very air of the place; all these were metropolitan in the sense in which the word is opposed to provincial. This is a subtlety which the provinces cannot understand, and it is natural enough that they are unable to do so. The big town in the Midlands or the North will tell you of its picture galleries, of its classical concerts, and of the serious books taken out in great numbers from its flourishing free libraries. It does not see, and, probably, will never see, that none of these things is to the point.

Well, from the heart of this London atmosphere I was suddenly transported in my vision to a darkling, solitary country lane as the dusk of a November evening closed upon it thirty long years before. And, as I think that the pure provincial can never understand the quiddity or essence of London, so I believe that for the born Londoner the country ever remains an incredible mystery. He knows that it is there — somewhere — but he has no true vision of it. In spite of himself he Londonises it, suburbanises it; he sticks a gas lamp or two in the lanes, dots some largish villas of red brick beside them, and extends the District or the Metropolitan to within easy distance of the dark wood. But here was I carried from luminous Oxford Street to the old deep lane in Gwent, which is on the borders of Wales. Nothing that a Londoner would call a town within eight miles, deep silence, deep stillness everywhere; hills and dark wintry woods growing dim in the twilight, the mountain to the west a vague, huge mass against a faint afterlight of the dead day, grey and heavy clouds massed over all the sky. I saw myself, a lad of twenty-one or thereabouts, strolling along this solitary lane on a daily errand, bound for a point about a mile from the rectory. Here a footpath over the fields crossed the road, and by the stile I would wait for the postman. I would hear him coming from far away, for he blew a horn as he walked, so that people in the scattered farms might come out with their letters if they had any. I lounged on the stile and waited, and when the postman came I would give him my packet — the day's portion of "copy" of that Heptameron translation that I was then making and sending to the publisher in York Street, Covent Garden. The postman would put the parcel in his bag, cross the road, and go striding off into the dim country beyond, finding his way on a track that no townsman could see, by field and wood and marshy places, crossing the Canthwr brook by a narrow plank, coming out somewhere on the Llanfrechfa road, and so entering at last Caerleon-on-Usk, the little silent, deserted village that was once the golden Isca of the Roman legions, that is golden for ever and immortal in the romances of King Arthur and the Graal and the Round Table.

So, in an instant’s time, I journeyed from the lighted room in the big Oxford Street restaurant to the darkening lane in far-away Gwent, in far-away years. I gathered anew for that little while the savour of the autumnal wood beside which the boy of thirty years before was walking, and also the savour of his long-forgotten labours, of his old dreams of life and of letters. The speech and the dream came to an end: and the man on the other side of the table, who is probably the most skilful and witty writer of musical comedy “lyrics” in England, was saying that once on a time he had tried to write real poetry.

I shall always esteem it as the greatest piece of fortune that has fallen to me, that I was born in that noble, fallen Caerleon-on-Usk, in the heart of Gwent. My greatest fortune, I mean, from that point of view which I now more especially have in mind, the career of letters. For the older I grow the more firmly am I convinced that anything which I may have accomplished in literature is due to the fact that when my eyes were first opened in earliest childhood they had before them the vision of an enchanted land. As soon as I saw anything I saw Twyn Barlwm, that mystic tumulus, the memorial of peoples that dwelt in that region before the Celts left the Land of Summer. This guarded the southern limit of the great mountain wall in the west; a little northward was Mynydd Maen — the Mountain of the Stone — a giant, rounded billow; and still to the north mountains, and on fair, clear days one could see the pointed summit of the Holy Mountain by Abergavenny. It would shine, I remember, a pure blue in the far sunshine; it was a mountain peak in a fairy tale. And then to eastward the bedroom window of Llanddewi Rectory looked over hill and valley, over high woods, quivering with leafage like the beloved Zacynthus of Ulysses, away to the forest of Wentwood, to the church tower on the hill above Caerleon. Through a cleft one might see now and again a bright yellow glint of the Severn Sea, and the cliffs of Somerset beyond. And hardly a house in sight in all the landscape, look where you would. Here the gable of a barn, here a glint of a whitewashed farm-house, here blue wood smoke rising from an orchard grove, where an old cottage was snugly hidden; but only so much if you knew where to look. And of nights, when the dusk fell and the farmer went his rounds, you might chance to see his lantern glimmering a very spark on the hillside. This was all that showed in a vague, dark world; and the only sounds were the faint distant barking of the sheepdog and the melancholy cry of the owls from the border of the brake.

I believe that I have seen at all events the main streets of London at every hour of the day and night. I have viewed, for example, Leicester Square between four and five of a summer morning, and have marvelled at its dismal disarray and quite miserable shabbiness of aspect. With the pure morning sun shining upon its gay places in clear splendour they are infinitely more "shocking" than they can appear at night-time to the narrowest of provincials. The Strand is a solemn street at two in the morning, Holborn has a certain vastness and windiness about it as the sky grows from black to grey, and at six the residential quarters seem full of houses of mourning, their white blinds most strictly drawn.

And at one time I had almost as full a knowledge of my native country, though not so much with respect to the category of time as to that of place. I have, it is true, seen the sky above the dark stretch of Wentwood Forest redden to the dawn, and I have lost my way and strayed in a very maze of unknown brooks and hills and woods and wild lands in the blackest hours after midnight. But the habits of the country, unlike those of London, generally fail to give reason or excuse for night wanderings. If you stayed in friendly and hospitable company much after ten of the night, it was usually a case of the spare room, newly aired sheets, one pipe more, and so to bed. This at all events on nights that were very black or tempestuous with wind and rain; for on such nights it is difficult to make out the faint footpath from stile to stile, and only the surest sense of locality will enable one to strike the felled tree or the narrow plank that, hidden by a dense growth of alders, crosses the winding of the brook. But from very early years indeed I became an enchanted student of the daylight country, which, I think, for me never was illuminated by common daylight, but rather by suns that rose from the holy seas of faery and sank down behind magic hills. I was an only child, and as soon as I could walk beyond the limits of the fields and orchards about the rectory, my father would take me with him on such parish visitations as were fairly within the stretch and strength of short legs. Indeed, I began my peregrinations at a still earlier period, for I can remember a visit to the mill, that was paid when I was a passenger in a perambulator, and aged, I suppose, about three.

Later these travels became more frequent, and I have recollections, still fresh and pleasant, of sitting still in old farm-house kitchens while my father was about his ghostly business. Always, even in the full blaze of summer, there would be a glint of fire on the cavernous hearth and a faint blue spire of wood smoke mounting the huge hollow of the chimney. The smell of this wood smoke scented and sweetened the air, in which there was usually a hint of apples stored away in loft or cellar, somewhere behind one or other of the black tarred doors that opened from every wall in the long, low room, and here and there bevelled what should have been an angle. By the hearth stood a big curving settle on one side, on the other there was usually an armchair for the farmer's wife. One small window, with square leaded panes, with solid oaken mullions, looked out on the garden, and so thick were the walls — they were always heavily "battered," or sloped outward towards the ground — that there was a depth of at least three feet between the window panes and the inner wall of the room. There was whitewash within and without, renewed every spring, and it is one of the most beautiful circumstances in Gwent that this custom of whitewash prevails. To look up to a mountain side and to see the pure white of the walls of the farms and cottages established there, fronting great winds, but nestling too in a shelter of tossing trees, gives me even now the keenest pleasure. And if on a summer day one climbs up amidst those brave winds and looks down on all the rolling land of Gwent, it is dotted with these white farms, that shine radiant in the sunlight.

And these farm-house kitchens were floored with stone, which was so purely and exquisitely kept that people said "one could eat bread and butter off Mrs. Morgan's kitchen floor." Such a place was, and still is, my notion of comfort, of the material surroundings which are fit to house a man. Now and then, in these later days, my business — never my pleasure — calls me to our Hôtel Glorieux or our Hôtel Splendide; to the places where the rooms are fifty feet high, where the walls are marble, and mirrors and gilding, where there are flowery carpets and Louis Quinze chairs and the true American heat. I think then of the kitchens of Pantyreos and Penyrhaul, as Israel in exile remembered Syon.

But it is not in summer-time that it is best to remember these places, excellent though the thought of their coolness and refreshment may be. I like to think of them as set in a framework of late autumn or deep mid-winter. I will be more curious than De Quincey: no mere bitter wind or frost, not even snow will serve my turn, though each of these has its admirable uses.

But let me have a night late in November, let us say. Every leaf has long been down, save that the beech hedgerow in the sheltered forest road will keep its tawny copper all through the winter. Rain has been sweeping along the valleys for days past in giant misty pillars, the brooks are bank high with red, foaming water; down every steep field little hedgerow streams come pouring. In the farmyards the men go about their work clad in sacks, and if they may will shelter under penthouses and find work to do in the barns.

Give me a night in the midst of such weather, and then think of the farm atop the hill, to which two good miles of deep, wandering lane go climbing, and mix the rain with a great wind from the mountain: and then think of entering the place which I have described, set now for the old act of winter. The green shutters are close fastened without the window, the settle is curved about the hearth, and that great cavern is ablaze and glorious with heaped wood and coals, and the white walls golden with the light of the leaping flames. And those within can hear the rain dashing upon shutter and upon closed door, and the fire hisses now and again as stray drops fall down the chimney; and the great wind shakes the trees and goes roaring down the hillside to the valley and moans and mutters about the housetop.

A man will leave his place, snug in shelter, in the deepest glow of the fire, and go out for a moment and open but a little of the door in the porch and see all the world black and wild and wet, and then come back to the light and heat and thank God for his home, wondering whether any are still abroad on such a night of tempest.

Looking back on my native country as I first remember it, I have often regretted that I was not born say twenty or thirty years earlier. I should then have seen more of a singular social process, which I can only call the Passing of the Gentry. In my father’s parish this had taken place very long before my day, or his either. Indeed, I am not quite sure that any armigerous families had ever inhabited Llanddewi; though I have a dim notion that certain old farm-houses were pointed out to me as having been “gentlemen’s houses.” But an adjoining parish had once held three very ancient families of small gentry. One was still in existence well within my recollection, another became extinct in the legitimate line soon after I was born, and the third had been merged in other and larger inheritances.

There were no Perrotts left, and their house had been "restored," and was occupied as a farm. I often sat under their memorials in the little church, and admired their arms, three golden pears, and their crest, a parrot; altogether a pretty example of heraldia cantans, or punning heraldry. Of the other two houses one was a pleasant, rambling, mouldering place, yellow-washed, verandahed, and on the whole more like a petit manoir in Touraine than a country house in England. The third mansion was a sixteenth-century house built in the L shape, and here dwelt in my childhood the last of the ancient gentry of the place.

Even he was descended from the old family in the female line. The old race had been named Meyrick, and they had given land in the thirteenth century that a light might burn before the altar of a neighbouring church for ever. The family affirmed that at one time they had owned all the land that could be seen from a certain high place near their house, and very possibly the tradition was a true one. They had remained faithful to the Latin Church through all the troubles — up to the year of Napoleon Buonaparte's sacring as Emperor by the Pope in Notre-Dame. And when the reigning squire of Lansoar heard the news he raged with fury, and saying, as the story goes, "Damn such a Pope as that!" left the Roman Church for ever. His grandson, whom I knew, always read the Bible in the Douay version and praised the Papists. Indeed, he used often to end up, addressing my father, "In fact they tell me that you're more than half a Roman Catholic yourself, and I like you none the worse for it!"

He was an extraordinary old man. In his youth he had been busy one morning packing up his portmanteau to go to Oxford. News came that his father was ruined; it was probably in the wild smash of speculation that brought down Sir Walter Scott. The young man quietly unpacked his portmanteau and took possession of the mill, not many yards from his own door. He ground corn for the farmers; he did well; he moved into Newport, and became, I think, an importer of Irish butter. Probably, also, he had his share in the industrial developments of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire, then at the height of their prosperity. At any rate in twenty years or so the fortunes of the old house were redeemed. The drawing-room of Lansoar had been used as a barn for storing corn; in my day it was the most gracious and grave room that I have ever seen. The old family portraits were back on the walls, the old tapestried chairs were in their places, there was not a thing in the room less than a hundred years old, and the squire sat beside his hearth, looking — as I have found out since those days — exactly like Henry IV of France.

He had travelled a good deal in his time, and was supposed to have had his fancy taken by the clothes he had seen worn by the Heidelberg students. So he wore an odd sort of vestment striped with black and dull red, and gathered in with a belt of the same stuff. We called it a blouse, but it must have been something of the shape of a Norfolk jacket. In the evening he would put on a black velvet coat which, as he told me, he got from Poole's at the price of five guineas. Smoking he abominated, and it was never allowed at Lansoar, save when Mr. Williams of Llangibby was a guest.

The owner of Lansoar was in many ways a kindly and benevolent old gentleman, but I think we in the country were chiefly proud of his temper. It was said to be terrific, even in a land of furious, quickly-raised rages. People told how they had seen the old man's white moustache bristling up to his eyes; this was a sign that the fire was kindled. And, as I once heard him say, "the Meyricks always get white with love and hate." It was said that his sister was the only person who met him on something like equal terms. She was an ancient gentlewoman with a tremendous aquiline nose and was more like a marquise of 1793 going proudly to instant execution than can possibly be imagined. She and her brother differed — it is much too mild a word, I am sure — so fiercely as to what were the true armorial bearings of the family that when these were to be emblazoned above the dining-room hearth a compromise had to be arranged, and two shields were painted, one on each side.

I am sorry that I was too young to observe Lansoar and its ways with intelligent interest. The people that lived there were of a race and sort that have now perished utterly out of the land; there never will be such people again. But I was banished from Lansoar for the last year or two of the old squire's life. I had left school and was at a loose end at home, and I heard I had fallen under heavy displeasure. It seemed that the descendant of the Meyricks had known a doctor who had lived in Paris on five shillings a week at the beginning of the nineteenth century; he wished to know why I was not living in London on five shillings a week in 1880. The answer would have been that I had neither five shillings nor five pence a week; but one did not answer Mr. James of Lansoar.

I am heartily sorry that the class which he represented has perished. I am sorry to think of all their houses scattered over Gwent; now mere memorials of something that is done for ever and ended. One came upon these houses in every other valley, on every other hillside, looking pleasantly towards the setting sun. They are noble old places, even though they are noble in a humble way; there are no Haddon Halls in Gwent. But these old homes of the small gentry of the borderland — now for the most part used as farm-houses — show their lineage in the dignity of their proportions, in the carved armorial bearings of their porches. The pride of race that belonged to the Morgans, Herberts, Meyricks that once lived in them has passed into their stones, and still shines there.

There is a great book that I am hoping to write one of these fine days. I have been hoping to write it, I may say, since 1898, or '99, and somewhere about the latter year I did write as many as a dozen pages. The magnum opus so far conducted did not wholly displease me, and yet it was not good enough to urge me forward in the task. And so it has languished ever since then, and I am afraid I have lost the MSS. that contained all that there was of it long ago. Seriously, of course, it would not have been a great book if it had been ever so prosperously continued and ended; but it would have been at least a curious book, and even now I feel conscious of warm desire at the thought of writing it — some day. For the idea of it came to me as follows:

I had been thinking at the old century end of the work that I had done in the fifteen years or so before, and it suddenly dawned upon me that this work, pretty good or pretty bad, or as it may be, had all been the expression of one formula, one endeavour. What I had been doing was this: I had been inventing tales in which and by which I had tried to realise my boyish impressions of that wonderful magic Gwent. Say that I had walked and wandered by unknown roads, and suddenly, after climbing a gentle hill, had seen before me for the first time the valley of the Usk, just above Newbridge. I think it was on one of those strange days of summer when the sky is at once grey and luminous that I achieved this adventure. There are no clouds in the upper air, the sky is simply covered with a veil which is, as

I say, both grey and luminous, and there is no breath of wind, and every leaf is still.

But now and again as the day goes on the veil will brighten, and the sun almost appear; and then here and there in the woods it is as if white moons were descending. On such a day, then, I saw that wonderful and most lovely valley; the Usk, here purged of its muddy tidal waters, now like the sky, grey and silvery and luminous, winding in mystic esses, and the dense forest bending down to it, and the grey stone bridge crossing it. Down the valley in the distance was Caerleon-on-Usk; over the hill, somewhere in the lower slopes of the forest, Caerwent, also a Roman city, was buried in the earth, and gave up now and again strange relics — fragments of the temple of “Nodens, god of the depths.” I saw the lonely house between the dark forest and the silver river, and years after I wrote “The Great God Pan,” an endeavour to pass on the vague, indefinable sense of awe and mystery and terror that I had received.

This, then, was my process: to invent a story which would recreate those vague impressions of wonder and awe and mystery that I myself had received from the form and shape of the land of my boyhood and youth; and as I thought over this and meditated on the futility — or comparative futility — of the plot, however ingenious, which did not exist to express emotions of one kind or another, it struck me that it might be possible to reverse the process. Could one describe hills and valleys, woods and rivers, sunrise and sunset, buried temples and mouldering Roman walls so that a story should be suggested to the reader? Not, of course, a story of material incidents, not a story with a plot in the ordinary sense of the term, but an interior tale of the soul and its emotions; could such a tale be suggested in the way I have indicated? Such is to be the plan of the “great” book which is not yet written. I mention it here chiefly because I would lay stress on my doctrine that in the world of imagination the child is indeed father of the man, that the man is nothing more than the child with an improved understanding certainly, with all sorts of technical advantages in the way of information and in the arts of expression, but, on the other hand, with the disadvantages of a dimmed imaginative eye and a weakened vision. There have been a few men who have kept the awe and the surmise of earlier years and have added to those miraculous gifts the acquired accomplishments of age and instruction; and these are the only men who are entitled to the name of genius. I have said already that in my boyhood and youth I was a deep and learned student of the country about my home, and that I always saw it as a kind of fairyland. And, cross-examining my memory, I find that I have in no way exaggerated or overcoloured these early and earliest impressions. Fairyland is too precise a word; I would rather say that I saw everything in something of the spirit in which the first explorers gazed on the tropical luxuriance and strangeness of the South American forests, on the rock cities of Peru, on the unconjectured seas that burst upon them from that peak in Darien, on the wholly unimagined splendours of the Mexican monarchy. So it was with me as a child. I came into a strange country, and strange it ever remained to me, so that when I left it for ever there were still hills within sight and yet untrodden, lanes and paths of which I knew the beginning but not the end. For it is to be understood that country folk are in this respect like Londoners: that they have their customary tracks and ways which lead more or less to some end or other; it is only occasionally that either goes out determined not to find his way but to lose it, to stray for the very sake of straying. Thus I walked many times in Wentwood and became familiar with the Roman road that passes for some distance along the summit of that ancient forest, but only once, I think, did I set out from the yellow verge of the Severn and cross the level Moors — a belt of fen country that might well lie between Ely and Brandon; really, no doubt "y môr," the sea — and wonder for a while at the bastioned and battlemented ruins of Caldicot Castle, and so mount up by the outer hills and woods of the forest, through Caerwent, past the Foresters' Oaks, a grove of trees that were almost awful in the magnificence of their age and their decay, and so climb to the ridge and look down on the Usk and the more familiar regions to the west.

And, as you may judge, it was only the knowledge that one must not frighten one's family out of its wits and that camping out in forests without food or drink is highly inconvenient that kept me on this comparatively straight path. So all the while, as I paced an unknown way, yet more unknowns were beckoning to me on right and left. Paths full of promise allured me into green depths, the wildest heights urged me to attempt them, cottages in orchard dells seemed so isolated from all the world that they and theirs must be a part of enchantment. And so I crossed Wentwood, and felt not that I knew it, but that it was hardly to be known.

I have already mentioned, I think, that I was an only child. Add to this statement that I had no little cousins available as play-fellows, some of these being domiciled in Anglesea, others in London; that it was only by the merest chance and on the rarest occasions that I ever saw any children at all, and I have given some notion of the extreme solitude of my upbringing. I grew up, therefore, all alone so far as other children were concerned, and though I went to school, school did not seem to make much difference to my habit of mind. I was eleven years old at the time, and I suppose I was "set" to loneliness. I passed the term as a sort of interlude amongst strangers, and came home to my friendly lanes, to my deep and shadowy and secret valleys, as a man returns to his dear ones and his dear native fields after exile amongst aliens and outlanders.

I came back, then, again and again to solitude. There were no children's parties for me, no cricket, no football, and I was heartily glad of it, for I should have abhorred all these diversions with shudderings of body and spirit. My father and mother apart, I loved to be by myself, with unlimited leisure for mooning and loafing and roaming and wandering from lane to lane, from wood to wood. Constantly I seemed to be finding new, hitherto unsuspected tracks, to be emerging from deep lanes and climbing hills so far but seen from the distance, matters of surmise, and now trodden and found to be Darien peaks giving an outlook upon strange worlds of river and forest and bracken-covered slope. Wondering at these things, I never ceased to wonder; and even when I knew a certain path and became familiar with it I never lost my sense of its marvels, as they appeared to me.

I have read curious and perplexed commentaries on that place in Sir Thomas Browne in which he declares his life up to the period of the "Religio Medici" to have been "a miracle of thirty years, which to relate were not a history, but a piece of poetry." Dr. Johnson, summing up the known events of Browne's early life, finds therein nothing in the least miraculous; Southey says the miracle was the great writer's preservation from atheism; Leslie Stephen considers that the strangeness "consists rather in Browne's view of his own history than in any unusual phenomena." "View of his own history" seems a little vague; but however critical sagacity may determine the sense of the passage, I would very willingly adopt it to describe these early years of mine, spent in that rectory amongst the wild hills of Gwent. Of my private opinion, I think there can be little doubt that when Sir Thomas Browne used the word “miraculous” he was thinking not of miracles in the accepted sense as things done contrary to the generally observed laws of nature, but rather of his vision of the world, of his sense of a constant wonder latent in all things. Stevenson, I believe, had some sense of this doctrine as applied to landscape, at least, when he said that there were certain scenes — I forget how he particularised them — which demanded their stories, which cried out, as it were, to have tales indited to fit their singular aspects. This, I think I have shown, is a crude analysis. I should put it thus: this group of pines, this lonely shore, or whatever the scene may be, has made the soul thrill with an emotion intense but vague in the sense in which music is vague; and the man of letters does his best to realise — rather, perhaps, to actualise — this emotion by inventing a tale about the pines or the sands. Such at all events was my state through all the years of boyhood and of youth: everything to me was wonderful, everything visible was the veil of an invisible secret. Before an oddly shaped stone I was ready to fall into a sort of reverie or meditation, as if it had been a fragment of paradise or fairyland. There was a certain herb of the fields that grew plentifully in Gwent, that even now I cannot regard without a kind of reverence; it bears a spire of small yellow blossoms, and its leaves when crushed give out a very pungent, aromatic odour. This odour was to me a separate revelation or mystery, as if no one in the world had smelt it but myself, and I ceased not to admire even when a countryman told me that it was good for stone, if you gathered it “under the planet Juniper.”

And here, may I say in passing, that in my opinion the country parson, with all the black-coated class, knows next to nothing of the true minds of the country folk. I feel certain that my father, if asked by a Royal Commission or some such valuable body, “What influence has astrology on your parishioners?” would have answered: “They have never heard of such a thing.” In later years I have wondered as to the possible fields which extended beyond the bounds of our ignorance. I have wondered, for example, whether, by any possibility, there were waxen men, with pins in them, hidden in very secret nooks in any of the Llanddewi cottages.

But this is a mere side-issue. To return to my topic, to that attitude of the child-mind which almost says in its heart, “things are because they are wonderful," I am reminded of one of the secret societies with which I have had the pleasure of being connected. This particular society issued a little MS. volume of instructions to those who were to be initiated, and amongst these instructions was the note: "remember that nothing exists which is not God." "How can I possibly realise that?" I said to one of the members of the society. "When I read it I was looking at the tiles on each side of my fireplace in Gray's Inn, and they are of the beastliest design it is possible to imagine. I really cannot see anything of Divinity in those tiles." I do not remember how my objection was met; I don't think it was met. But, looking back, I believe that, as a child, I realised something of the spirit of the mystic injunction. Everywhere, through the darkness and the mists of the childish understanding, and yet by the light of the child's illumination, I saw latens deitas; the whole earth, down to the very pebbles, was but the veil of a quickening and adorable mystery. Hazlitt said that the man of genius spent his whole life in telling the world what he had known himself when he was eighteen. Waiving utterly — I am sorry to say — the title of man of genius, I would reaffirm Hazlitt's proposition on lower grounds. I would say that he who has any traffic with the affairs of the imagination has found out all the wisdom that he will ever know, in this life at all events, by the age of eighteen or thereabouts. And it is probable that Hazlitt, though he never dreamed of it, was but re-expressing those sentences in the Holy Gospels which deal with the intimate relationship between children and "the Kingdom of Heaven." In the popular conception, of course, both amongst priests and people, these texts are understood to refer to the innocence of childhood. But a little reflection will satisfy anyone that in the true sense of the word children are only innocent as a stone is innocent, as a stick is innocent; that is, they are incapable of committing the special offences which to our modern and utterly degraded system of popular ethics constitute the whole matter of morality and immorality. I remember a few years ago reading how an illustrious Primitive Methodist testified on the sacred mount of Primitive Methodism at some anniversary of the society. He said that his old grandmother had implored him when he was a boy never to drink, never to gamble, never to break the Sabbath, and, he concluded triumphantly, "I have never done any of these things."

"Therefore I am a good Christian" is the conclusion evidently suggested. This poor man, it may be said, knew no better, but I am much mistaken if the majority of our Anglican clergy would not accept his statement as a good confession of the faith. The New Testament for all these people has been written in vain; they will still believe that a good Christian is one who drinks a cup of cocoa at 9:30 and is in bed by ten sharp. And to such persons, of course, the texts which assert the necessity of becoming like little children if we would enter the Kingdom of Heaven are clear enough; it is a mere matter of early hours and plenty of cocoa — or, perhaps, of warm bread and milk. But, personally, I cannot at all symbolise with them. I look back to the time when the mountain and the tiny shining stone, the flower, and the brook were all alike signs and evidences of an ineffable mystery and beauty. I see myself all alone in the valley, under hanging woods, of a still summer evening, entranced, wondering what the secret was that was here almost told, and then, I am persuaded, I came near to the spirit of St. Thomas Aquinas: Adoro te devote latens Deitas.

There comes to me from very long ago the memory of a burning afternoon in the hot heart of July. I am not sure whether it was in the dry summer. This was in '68 or '69 — I am not certain which — and it was notable for many things in my recollection. Firstly, the mountain caught fire. This sounds a terrific and unlikely statement, considered with relation to the temperate and reasonable geology of this land, which has known nothing for many æons of volcanoes or burning mountains. What had happened, of course, was that the heather and wild growth on the mountain had somehow been fired, and so all through that hot August I remember looking westward to the great mountain wall, and watching the dun fume that drifted along its highest places; looking with a certain dread, for there was something apocalyptic in the sight.

Another notable event was the failure of the water supply. The rectory stood almost on top of a long hill that mounted up from the valley of the Soar, there were no ponds or tanks in its curtilage and the drought of this year exhausted the water in the great butt that stood in the yard and received the streams from the roof in rainy weather. This, of course, was not drinking water; that we obtained always from a well deep in the brake, about a quarter of a mile from the house; and without contempt for other and more elaborate beverages, I may say that there are few draughts more delicious than cold well-water, dripping from the rock, and shaded in its hollow basin by the overhanging trees. Our London water is, I believe, perfectly wholesome, but it is absolutely tasteless, no doubt through the manifold purifications and purgations which it has undergone. But well-water has a savour and a character of its own, and the product of one well will often differ in a very marked degree from that of another. Before my day, oddly enough, we had in the county a connoisseur or gourmet of wells. He was a clergyman, and he had been heard to boast that he had tasted the water of every well in the forest of Wentwood. Our own well in the rectory brake was thought excellently of by good judges of clear cold water.

I think it was in this year of the burning mountain that the rectory paid a call on Mr. and Mrs. Roger Gibbon, of the Wern, on a blazing afternoon. They were very old people, and the stock of the Gibbons — I am not using their real name — was one of the most ancient and honoured in the land of Gwent. I suppose, indeed, that they would look on many dukes as parvenus of yesterday. Furthermore, this branch of the race was quite comfortable and well-to-do in money matters.

They received my father and my mother and myself with the heartiest kindness — they had known my father from his boyhood — and insisted on the necessity of some refreshment. So presently the maid came in with a tray and old Roger solemnly mixed for my father and mother, for his wife and himself, four reeking glasses of hot gin. I think that, all things considered, this was the very strangest refreshment ever offered. The old people swallowed their boiling spirit with relish, my parents took their dose with shuddering politeness, and the thermometer rose steadily. Roger and Caroline had been quarrelling about a carpet before we came, and after a decent interval the quarrel was resumed. Roger addressed himself to my mother.

“She would buy it too small. I told her it would be too small, and there it is, with three or four feet of the floor showing. And what do you think she says, Mrs. Machen? She says she will have the bare boards painted green to match the carpet. I say that’s ridiculous, don’t you think so? [Without waiting for an answer, and bellowing to deaf old Caroline.] There, Caroline, I told you what everyone would say. Mrs. Machen says it’s ridiculous. The idea of painting the boards green!”

And the old man, turning to my father, told him in a lower voice and with considerable enjoyment of some home-made wine that his wife had concocted. She had stored it in a cupboard in their bedroom, and Roger told how he used to lie awake at night laughing as he listened to the bottles bursting, the old lady being much too deaf to hear the reports.

Old Gibbon was an expert shot, but he could never be persuaded to use the new-fangled percussion caps. He brought down his birds to the last by means of flint and steel. He was an enthusiastic fox hunter also, but he never hunted on horseback. Up to something past the middle of his life the Llangibby Hounds had been hunted afoot, the Rector of Llangibby being the master, and afoot Roger Gibbon followed them up to his old age. And so cunning had he become in matter of wind and scent and lie of the country that he rarely failed to be in at the death. I doubt whether he knew much of the world outside of a twenty-mile radius, Caerleon being taken as the centre of the circle. But when Roger Gibbon was quite an old man people told him that he ought to see London. So he went to London. He walked out of Paddington Station and saw London, as he thought; and, filled with a great horror and disgust and terror at what he had seen, he trotted back into the station, and paced the platform till the next train for the west started. He got into that train, and returned to the Wern and to the shelter and companionship of his hills and woods, and there abode till the ending of his long days.

It was strange how in those times people were fixed in the soil, so that for many miles round everybody knew everybody, or at least knew of everybody. It is all over, I suppose, and again I think it is a pity that it is over. It was a part of the old life of the friendly fires, and the friendly faces, and when, rarely enough, in this great desert of London, I meet a friend of those old days, I think we both feel as if we were surviving tribesmen of some sept that has been “literally annihilated” or “almost decimated” — to use our modern English.

One says: “Do you remember that walk over Mynydd Fawr to the Holy Well?” The other replies: “How good the beer at the Three Salmons tasted that day we walked all the way from Caerleon on the Old Usk Road.” “Let me see; when was that?” “April, ‘83.” And we look on one another and, lo, our heads have whitened and our eyes are beginning to grow dim.

But, as an instance of the fellowship and brotherhood that there was in the land of Gwent in the old days, here is a true story. I have told of fierce old

Mr. James, of Lansoar, the ancient squire. Well, there had been a raging and tremendous quarrel between Mr. James and a neighbouring farmer called Williams, and as Williams was an honest and excellent and placable old man, there was not much doubt as to who was the aggressor. After years of hate, on one side at all events, a false rumour went about the county that Mr. James had lost all his money, in “Turkish Bonds,” I think. Then did old Mr. Williams, the farmer, go up one night secretly to old Mr. James, the squire, and altogether heedless of the white face and the furious glance and the bristling moustache that greeted him, he offered all he had to his enemy.

May he remember me from his happy place.

Chapter II

BY THIS TIME I hope that I have made a sort of picture of my conditions as they were up to the time that I left school at the age of seventeen. Solitude and woods and deep lanes and wonder; these were the chief elements of my life. One thing, however, I have so far omitted, that is the matter of books, which I will now consider.

And, firstly, I must record with deep thankfulness the circumstance that as soon as I could read I had the run of a thoroughly ill-selected library; or, rather, of a library that had not been selected at all. My father's collection, if that serious word may be applied to a hugger-mugger of books, had grown up anyhow and nohow, and in it the most revered stocks had mingled with the most frivolous. There were the Fathers, in the English version made by the Tractarians, and there was also no end of "yellowbacks" bought at Smith's bookstalls on railway journeys. There was a row of little Elzevir classics, "with the Sphere," bound in parchment that had grown golden with its two hundred and odd years; there was also Mr. Verdant Green in his tattered paper wrapper as my father had bought him at Oxford. Next to Verdant Green you might very likely find the Dialogues of Erasmus in seventeenth-century leather, and Borrow in his original boards — we read Borrow at Llanddewi long before there were any Borrovians — might hide an odd volume of "Martin Chuzzlewit" (in a "Railway Edition") which had tumbled to the back of the shelf. Hard by stood Copleston's "Prælectiones Academicæ," and close to it a complete set of Brontë books, including Mrs. Gaskell's "Life," all these in yellowish linen covers, being, I imagine, the first one-volume edition issued by the publishers. And here again Llanddewi in the woods may claim to have been in advance of its age, for we were devoted to the name of Brontë.

Suppose the weather did not beckon me, I would begin to go about the house on the search of books. I might have "Wuthering Heights" in my mind and be chasing that amazing volume very closely, and be, in fact, hot on the scent, when I would be brought up sharply by my grandfather's Hebrew grammar. I always loved the shape and show of the Hebrew character, and have meant to learn the language from 1877 onwards, but have not yet thoroughly mastered the alphabet. I once, indeed, got so advanced as to be able to spell out the Yiddish posters which cover the walls in the East End of London, and I remember being much amused when I had deciphered a most mystic, reverend-looking word and found that it read "Bishopsgyte." But I believe that in Yiddish the two "yods" represent the "a" sound.

Well, this Hebrew grammar would distract me from the hunt of Emily Brontë's masterpiece, and by the time I had decided that Monday would be soon enough for a serious beginning in Hebrew, while I meditated in the meanwhile on the beauty of the names of the four classes of accents — Emperors, Kings, Princes, and Dukes, I think — it was likely enough that I had got hold of Alison's "History of Europe," or "The Bible in Spain," or a book on Brasses. And by the time I had gloated over the horrors of the French Revolution as described in Alison, or had marvelled at Borrow in the character of a Protestant colporteur, or had admired the pictured brasses of Sir Robert de Septvans, Sir Roger de Trumpington — winnowing fans on the coat-armour of the one, trumpets on the shield of the other — and Abbot Delamere of St. Albans it was tea-time, and I probably spent the rest of the evening with a bound volume of "Chambers's Journal," "All the Year Round," "Cornhill," or "The Welcome Guest." These were always a great resource; and I particularly wish that I still possessed "The Welcome Guest," a popular weekly dating from the late ‘fifties of last century. It was full of work by people who afterwards became famous, and now, again, are fading into forgetfulness. John Hollingshead we still remember, though it is only the elderly who can tell much now of "the sacred lamp of burlesque," which was kept burning at the Gaiety. Hollingshead was a contributor to "The Welcome Guest," so also were the Brothers Mayhew and the Brothers Brough, so on a great scale was George Augustus Sala, who wrote in it "Twice Round the Clock" and something that was called, I fancy, "Make Your Game or, the Adventures of the Stout Gentleman, the Thin Gentleman, and the Man with the Iron Chest." This was a "lively" account of a visit to the gaming tables then existing in Germany. The Stout Gentleman was one of the Mayhews, the Man with the Iron Chest was Sala himself; and I met the Thin Gentleman many years afterwards in a cock-loft in Catherine Street, where I was cataloguing books on magic and alchemy and the secret arts in general. The cock-loft was over the Vizetellys' publishing office, and the Thin Gentleman was old Mr. Vizetelly. We "larned" him to publish a translation of "La Terre" by sending him, an old man past seventy, to gaol for three months. He died soon afterwards; I forget whether his death took place before or after the very handsome and official and "respectable" reception and entertainment that were given to Zola on his visiting England.

I must say that I should like to see the old "Welcome Guest" volume again. I am afraid I should not admire its literature very much, for Sala, the chief contributor, had already acquired those vicious mannerisms which pleased the injudicious. He would speak of Billingsgate as a "piscatorial bourse," for instance. I am afraid I should find it all terribly old-fashioned. But I should like to hold the fat volume again and glance through its pages, for they would bring back to me the long winter evenings, and the rectory fire burning cheerfully, and the heavy red curtains drawn close over the windows, shutting out the night.

I must say that I found a great joy and resource in these old magazines. If one were in a mood averse from reading in the solid block, if the hour did not seem propitious for beginning once more "Pickwick" from the beginning, it was a delight to think of those bound volumes all in a row, and of the inexhaustible supply of mixed literature which they contained. For just as there was always the chance, and indeed the likelihood, of making new discoveries in the happy confusion of the Llanddewi library, so it was with these rows of "Household Words," "Chambers's," "All the Year Round," "Welcome Guest," and "Cornhill"; there was always the possibility of a find; some tale or essay hitherto overlooked or neglected might turn out to be full of matter and entertainment. And so the most unlikely events happened. You would expect to find good things of all sorts in a magazine edited by Charles Dickens, but you would hardly expect to find there the curious thing or the out-of-the-way thing. Still, it was in a volume of "Household Words" that I first read about alchemy in a short series of papers which (I have since recognised) were singularly well-informed and enlightened. I do not wish it to be understood that I myself have any strong convictions on the matter of turning inferior metals into superior, though I believe the later trend of science is certainly in favour of the theoretical possibility of such a process. Nor do I hold any distinct brief for the very fascinating doctrine which maintains, or would like to maintain, that the great alchemical books are really symbolical books; that while seeming to relate to lead and gold, to mercury and silver, they hide under these figures intimations as to a profound and ineffable transmutation of the spirit; that the experiment to which they relate is the Great Experiment of the mystics, which is the experiment of God. This, I say, is a fascinating theory; whether it have any truth in it I know not, and perhaps it is one of those questions of which Sir Thomas Browne speaks; questions difficult, indeed, and perplexed, but not beyond all conjecture. But, however this may be, I recollect that those articles in that old, half-calf bound volume of "Household Words," while not affirming this, that, or the other doctrine as to alchemy in so many distinct words, did suggest that a few of the old alchemists, at all events, were something more than blundering simpletons engaged on a quest which was a patent absurdity, which could only have been entertained by the besotted superstition of "the dark ages," which had this one claim to our attention inasmuch as the modern science of chemistry rose from the ashes of its foolish fires.

This is not the place for a discussion of the art of Thrice Great Hermes; the matter is cited here as an example of the odd and unexpected way in which my attention, I being some eight or nine years old, was directed to a singular and perplexing subject which has engaged my curiosity at intervals ever since. I see myself sitting on a stool by the rectory hearth, propping up "Household Words" against the fender, quite ravished by the story of Nicholas Flamel, who found by chance "The Book of Abraham the Jew," who journeyed all over Europe in search of one who would interpret its figures to him, who succeeded at last in the Operation of the Great Work, and was discovered by the King's Chamberlain living in great simplicity, eating cabbage soup with Pernelle, his wife. These fireside studies of mine must have been made forty-three or forty-four years ago, but I still think the story of Nicholas Flamel and Pernelle, his wife, an enchanting one. But then I re-read the tale of Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp only the other day, and I am still thrilled and perplexed by that most singular and important fact; that the genie declared himself to be the servant of the Roc's Egg.

I am sorry to have to confess that the rectory shelves held no copy of "The Arabian Nights." I made up this deficiency soon after I went to school by buying an excellent edition, issued, I think, by Routledge for a shilling. This edition is now, the booksellers tell me, out of print, and it is a pity, for now if you want the book there is nothing between an edition obviously meant for the nursery, with gaudy plates, and Lane’s version for thirty shillings. I speak not of Burton, for I found myself unable to read a couple of pages of his detestable English, made more terrible by the imitations of the rhymed prose of the original. I came upon something which went very much as follows: —

Then followed the dawn of day, and the Princess finished her allotted say, Praise be to the Lord of Light alway, who faileth not to send the appointed ray —— and so on, at much greater length; highly ingenious, no doubt, and also infinitely foolish.

I remember once wasting hours — nay, days — in the effort to render Rabelais’ “Verses written over the Great Gate of the Abbey of Thelème” into English, following as far as I could the rhyme system. Now, according to the French notion, “don” is a perfect rhyme to “pardon,” and so Rabelais wrote: —

Or donné par don,
Ordonne pardon
A cil qui le donne;
Et bien guerdonne
Tout mortel preudhom
Or donné par don.

That is, the final sound of each line is almost identical with the final sound of every other line; and of this I made: —

For given relief,
Forgiven and lief
The giver believe;
And all men that live
May gain the palm leaf
For given relief.

Soon afterwards, while I was resting from this mighty effort, I read in Disraeli’s “Curiosities of Literature” a quotation from Martial: Turpe est difficiles habere nugas— ’Tis folly to sweat o’er a difficult trifle.’ I was convinced of my sin. I suppose that the real translator when confronted by such puzzles contrives to think of an indirect rather than a direct solution. For example, the right way of getting the effect of the Arabic jingle into English might be sought by the path of alliteration; or possibly blank verse might give to the English reader something of the same kind of pleasure as that enjoyed by the Oriental in reading a prose which infringes on the region of poetry. And it may be that the queer music of Rabelais could be echoed, at least, in English by the use of assonance.

Here is, indeed, a diversion, but it has arisen, legitimately enough, from that shilling, paper wrapper volume of “The Arabian Nights” bought in 1875 or ‘76 or thereabouts. And another event of like importance was my seeing De Quincey’s “Confessions of an English Opium Eater” at Pontypool Road Station. This also I instantly bought and as instantly loved, and still love very heartily. It always vexes me to detect, as I constantly do detect in modern critics, the subtle desire to run down De Quincey. The critic is afraid to make a frontal attack — the stress of these times will win pardon for the phrase — since he knows that he will be opposed by such splendours and such terrors— “an army with banners” — as the English language can scarce show elsewhere. He is quite aware, since he is, ex hypothesi, an able critic, that De Quincey deliberately used our tongue as if it had been a mighty organ in mightier cathedral, so that the very stones and the far-lifted vault and the hollow spaces of the towers re-echo and reverberate and thrill with tremendous fugal harmonies. And our critics are advised also that De Quincey was no mere player of clever tricks with the language; his was not the amusing Stevensonian method of counting the “l’s” and estimating the value of medial “s’s” and the terrifying effect of the final reiterated “r.” There was none of this; he wrote in the great manner because he thought in the great manner. The critic cannot deny this; he must admit the beauty and pathos of the Ann episode and of the vision of Jerusalem; but still he will hint a fault and hesitate his dislike of this greater master. The reason is not far to seek. All realism is unpopular, and De Quincey was eminently a realist.

Now I know that I am touching here on a great question. I hope to debate it at length later on; for the moment I would merely say that I define realism as the depicting of eternal, inner realities — the “things that really are” of Plato — as opposed to the description of transitory, external surfaces; the delusory masks and dominoes with which the human heart drapes and hides itself. But, all this apart, I cannot help dwelling on the manner in which I associate these early literary discoveries of mine with the places where they were made.

You may hear friends and lovers discussing after many years the manner of their first meeting; Daphnis as Darby will remind Chloe — now Joan — how they saw one another for the first time at the Smiths' garden-party, and one plate of their bread and butter tasted slightly of onions, and the curate achieved six faults running at lawn-tennis, and it came on to rain. So I can never take up De Quincey without thinking of the dismal platform at Pontypool Road, and the joy of coming home for the holidays, and the mountains all about me as I stood and waited for my father and the trap and read the first pages of the magic book. Those great mountains, and the drive home by the green arched lanes, abounding in flowers, and the very dear look of home amidst its orchards; all these are part and parcel of my joy in the "Confessions" for ever. And so again with another noble book; with one of the noblest of all books, as I have ever esteemed it. I am a very small boy; about seven or eight years old, I conceive, and my mother takes me with her to pay a call on Mrs. Gwyn, of Llanfrechfa Rectory. The ladies talk, and I, seeking quietly for something to entertain me, light in a low bookcase on a fat, dumpy little book. I suspect it was the oddity of the shape, the extreme squabness of the volume, that first took my fancy, and then I open the pages — and I have never really closed them. For the dumpy book was a translation of "The Ingenious Gentleman, Don Quixote de la Mancha"; and those are words that will thrill a lettered man as the opening notes of certain fugues of Bach will thrill a musician. I heard nothing of the amiable talk of the ladies. I was deep in the small print — alas! it would now blind my tired eyes — and when my mother rose to go I clung so desperately and piteously to the fat little book that the kind Mrs. Gwyn said she would lend it to me, and I might take it home. For which benevolence I am ever bound to pray for her good estate, or for her soul; as it may chance to be.

So, as Hereford Station spells for me, principally, "The Arabian Nights," as De Quincey is linked with domed mountains and green lanes and the return home: the Ingenious Gentleman advanced to greet me, mysteriously enough, in the drawing-room of the rectory of Llanfrechfa, and I shall always reckon Frechfa — the “freckled” — as among the most venerated of the Celtic saints.

For a long time, as it seems to me, I have been talking of discoveries of books; discoveries in our own Llanddewi shelves, in the shelves of neighbours, on railway bookstalls. We shall hear more of books by and by, of books found in very different places — Clare Market and the Strand of 1880 and back streets by Notting Hill Gate are even now looming before us — so for the present we may hear more of the conditions of that Gwent where I was a boy and a young man.

I have said that I was born just a little too late to witness the Passing of the Gentry. Few of them survived into my day, and I was too young to see with intelligence that which still remained to be seen of the old order. But one thing I do remember, that the gentry of those times, even when they were wealthy, lived with a simplicity that would astonish the people of to-day. Those who know “Martin Chuzzlewit” will remember how Tigg Montague, who was Montague Tigg, lunched luxuriously in the board room of his city office. The meal was brought in on a tray and consisted of “a pair of cold roast fowls, flanked by some potted meats and a cool salad.” There was a bottle of champagne and a bottle of Madeira. This was the luncheon of vulgar and ostentatious luxury in the ‘forties; compare it with the kind of midday meal that the modern Montague would eat at the Hôtel Splendide or the Hôtel Glorieux; the meal of the man who eats and drinks as much to impress others with his wealth as to gratify his own appetite.

Well, I have often seen “the old Lord Tredegar” eating his luncheon. My father and I would be in the coffee-room of the King’s Head, Newport, waiting for the ostler to put in the pony. And there in one of the boxes sat the old lord — a very wealthy man — eating his luncheon; which was bread and cheese and a tankard of ale. And, oddly enough, on the one occasion on which I visited the Ham, the magnate thereof, Mr. Iltyd Nicholl, was enjoying a meal similar in every respect to that of Lord Tredegar — though I believe he had a little cold apple tart after his cheese. We, of the middle people, always dined at one on meat, pudding, and cheese; tea followed at five, an affair of bread and butter and jam, with, possibly, a caraway loaf. Hot buttered toast was distinctly festal. The day closed so far as meals were concerned with bread and cheese and beer at nine o'clock. On rare occasions, once in three years or so, a number of clergy who called themselves collectively the Ruridecanal Chapter came to hear a paper read and also to a dinner. This would probably consist of a salmon of Severn or Usk — which muddy waters breed incomparably the finest salmon in the world — of a saddle of Welsh mutton from the mountains, and of a rich sweet called, very lightly and unworthily, a trifle. There would be a dessert of almonds and raisins and, according to the season, home-grown apples and pears or greengages. These delicates would be displayed on a service which showed green vine-leaves in relief against a buff ground, bordered with deep purple and gold. It was hideous, and, I should think, Spode.

In the autumn my mother used to concoct a singular dish which she called fermety. It is more generally known as frumenty; you will find it mentioned in Washington Irving's "Christmas," where the squire makes his supper off it on Christmas Eve — no doubt because it was the traditional fasting dish for the Vigil of the Nativity. It was made, so far as I can remember, of the new wheat of the year, of milk, of eggs, of currants, of raisins, of sugar, and of spices, "all working up together in one delicious gravy." No doubt a very honourable dish and a most ancient and Christian pottage; but I am not quite sure that I should like it, if it were proffered to me now. Among the farmers a few of the elder people still breakfasted on cawl, a broth made of fat bacon and vegetables, and decorated, oddly enough, with marigold blossoms. And a fine old man whom I once met in a lane spoke violently against tea, as a corrupting thing and a very vain novelty. For women, he said, it might serve, but the breakfast for a man was a quart of cider with a toast. But most of the farming people breakfasted on rashers of bacon, cooked by being hung on hooks before the fire in a Dutch oven. With the bacon they ate potatoes, which were done in a very savoury manner. Take cold boiled potatoes, break into small pieces, fry (or rather, faites sauter) in bacon fat, then press into a shallow dish, pat to a smooth surface, and brown before the fire. This is a breakfast that goes very well with a keen mountain breath of a morning.

And I believe that cheese always formed part of the farmers' breakfast, as a kind of second or cold course. This was of their own making, and was of the kind called after Caerphilly, a little town with a huge ruinous castle in a hollow of giant hills. It is a white cheese of a creamy consistency and delicate flavour, and is to be commended for the making of Welsh rarebit. The farmers, as I say, ate it at breakfast, again at twelve o'clock dinner, after hot boiled fat bacon and beans or cabbage, and again at tea, where, to their tastes, it seemed to go very well with bread and butter — I find it hard to realise in London that bread and butter can be a choice delicacy — and a sweet, such as an open-work raspberry tart. And, of course, the Caerphilly cheese appeared again at supper, and with bread and onions it was always the hedgerow snack of the man in the fields.

And the cider of that land was good. It was a greenish yellow in colour, with a glint of gold in it if held up to the light, as it were a remembrance of the August and September suns that had shone mellow on the deep orchards of Gwent. It was of full body and flavour and strength, smooth on the palate, neither sweet nor sharp; and I do not think there was anyone in Llanddewi parish so poor as not to have a barrel or two in his cellar against Christmastide and snowy nights, though to be sure in years wherein apples were a scanty crop some of the smaller folk increased the bulk of their cider by strange expedients. Pears went to the mill always, and as a matter of course. In most of the orchards there were one or two big pear trees, and possibly the wisdom of the Gwentian ancients had concluded that a slight admixture of pears with the apples improved and mellowed the cider. But in scanty years, when the man with but a few trees saw bare boughs in autumn, he went to his garden, dug up a barrow load or two of parsnips and added them to his apples. I cannot say anything as to the resultant juice, since I never tasted it.

There was no wretched poverty in Llanddewi, because almost everybody had a little land of his own. Tenant farmers there were, of course, who held of Mr. John Hanbury, of Pontypool Park, lord of the manor of Edlogan; a manor named after a certain Edlogion who was a prince of the sixth century and the protector of Cybi Sant. But besides his tenants and those of other landlords there was a numerous race of small freeholders, who owned eighty, fifty, ten acres of land, and so down till you came to a holding of a house and a garden and a mere patch by the roadside. But with a garden and a patch of land a clever cottager of the old school could do a great deal. I remember an old man named Timothy who lived in a house very small and very ancient in the midst of the fields, far, even, from a by-road; and he thought in greengages as a Stock Exchange man thinks in shares. For about his old cottage there were three or four, or maybe half a dozen, greengage trees that had been planted so long ago that they had grown almost to the dignity of timber, and spread wild branches high and low and far and wide, so that one might say that old Timothy lived in a grove or wood of greengage trees. So you may conceive how deeply the poor old man thought of these gages, beside which his little orchard of damsons and bullaces was of small account. A really plentiful crop, when the big boughs were heavy and drooping with rich green, sun-speckled fruit, meant to him abundance and luxury; and bare trees spelt on the other hand a bare winter and some pinching of poverty, though nothing beyond endurance. Timothy was a smallholder on the smallest scale, but there were many people of two, six, or twelve acres who did very well in their humble way — which I have always thought is the happy way, if one can attain to it. The man would work for a farmer in the day-time, and often be sturdy enough to do many things on his own estate on summer evenings; and all the day long his wife was busy with her pigs and bees and fowls, and perhaps with two or three cows. There was a good market for their produce at Pontypool, a town on the verge of the industrial district, for the colliers and the tinplate workers love to feed richly. I once saw a woman putting the last touches to a flat apple tart in a little tavern called Castell-y-bwch (Bucks' Castle) on the mountain side. She drew out the tart from the oven, prised open the lid of pastry, and inserted some half-pound of butter and half pound of moist Demerara sugar, and then put back the lid and replaced the pastry in the oven; so that apple juice, sugar, butter should fuse all together. That is a fair sample of hill cookery; other people of the hills would buy fresh butter at a high price, and give what they were asked for "green" Caerphilly cheese, still melting from the press; and they loved to plaster butter heavily on hot new bread and then crown all with an equal depth of golden honey. And they had a goodly appetite also for great fat salmon, caught in the yellow Usk water; and so the fishermen of Caerleon and the little farmers of such parishes as Llanddewi profited hugely by these mountain tastes.

Many years afterwards I lived for a short while on the Chiltern Hills. Here was a different tale. In a whole parish there was, I think, barely a single small holder; the little properties had all been bought up by the great landlords. There was no comfort about the tumbledown, leaky cottages which, in many cases, depended for their drinking water supply on dirty water-butts. None of the farm labourers had fowls or pigs or bees; the farmers, their employers, did not allow the men to keep pigs or fowls lest they should be tempted to steal corn and meal.

So the poorer folk were divided into two classes — the good-humoured wastrels, who “went on the parish” at the slightest provocation and without the slightest shame, and a few more prosperous, sour, ill-mannered boors, who were consumed with an acrid “Liberalism” and with a rancorous envy of anyone better off than themselves.

But at Llanddewi the small holder of land, so far from envying or hating the great landlord, took, as it were, a pride in him. I remember Mrs. Owen Tudor, owner of nine or ten rough acres of wild land in Llanddewi, being both grieved and angry when she heard that a great and ancient Gwentian house might be forced to sell a certain portion of their estates through the pressure of bad times in the early ‘eighties. She, too, was a landowner — of rushes chiefly and alder copses and bracken — and of ancient, though unblazoned, family, and if the great Morgans suffered, so also did she suffer.

It comes to my mind that I must by no means forget Sir Walter Scott and all that he did for me. And to get at him it is necessary that we enter the drawing-room at Llanddewi. I was amused the other day to see in an old curiosity shop near Lincoln’s Inn Fields amongst the rarities displayed small china jars or pots with a picture of two salmon against a background of leafage on the lid. I remember eating potted salmon out of just such jars as these, and now even in my lifetime they appear to have become curious. So, perhaps, if I describe a room which was furnished in 1864 that also may be found to be curious. I may note, by the way, that we always applied the word “parlour” — which properly means drawing-room, and is still, I think, used in that sense in the United States of America — to the dining-room, which was also our living room for general, everyday use. So Sir Walter Scott speaks of a “dining-parlour,” and Mr. Pecksniff, entering Todgers’s, of the “eating-parlour.” And now the word only occurs in public-houses, in the phrase “parlour prices,” and even that use is becoming obsolete.

But as for the Llanddewi drawing-room: the walls were covered with a white paper, on which was repeated at regular intervals a diamond-shaped design in pale, yellowish buff. The carpet was also white; on it, also at regular intervals, were bunches of very red roses and very green leaves. In the exact centre of the room was a round rosewood table standing on one leg, and consequently shaky. This was covered with a vivid green cloth, trimmed with a bright yellow border. In the centre of the cloth was a round mat, apparently made of scarlet and white tags or lengths of wool; this supported the lamp of state. It was of white china and of alabastrous appearance, and it burned colza oil. One had to wind it up at intervals as if it had been a clock. In the sitting-room, before the coming of paraffin, we usually burned “composite” candles; two when we were by ourselves, four when there was company.

Over the drawing-room mantelpiece stood a large, high mirror in a florid gilt frame. Before it were two vases of cut-glass, with alternate facets of dull white and opaque green, of a green so evil and so bilious and so hideous that I marvel how the human mind can have conceived it. And yet my heart aches, too, when, as rarely happens, I see in rubbish shops in London back streets vases of like design and colour. Somewhere in the room was a smaller vase of Bohemian glass; its designs in “ground” glass against translucent ruby. This vase, I think, must have stood on the whatnot, a triangular pyramidal piece of furniture that occupied one corner and consisted of shelves getting smaller and smaller as they got higher.

Against one wall stood a cabinet, of inlaid wood, velvet lined, with glass doors. On the shelves were kept certain pieces of Nantgarw china, some old wine-glasses with high stems, and a collection of silver shoe-buckles and knee-buckles, and two stoneware jugs. The pictures — white mounts and gilt frames — were water-colours and chromo-lithographs. Against one of the window-panes hung a painting on glass, depicting a bouquet of flowers in an alabaster jar. There was a plaster cast in a round black frame, which I connect in my mind with the Crystal Palace and the Prince Consort, and an “Art Union,” whatever that may be: it displayed a very fat little girl curled up apparently amidst wheat sheaves. A long stool in bead-work stood on the hearthrug before the fire; and a fire-screen, also in bead work, shaped like a banner, was suspended on a brass stand. On a bracket in one corner was the marble bust of Lesbia and her Sparrow; beneath it in a hanging bookcase the Waverley Novels, a brown row of golden books.

I can see myself now curled up in all odd corners of the rectory reading “Waverley,” “Ivanhoe,” “Rob Roy,” “Guy Mannering,” “Old Mortality,” and the rest of them, curled up and entranced so that I was deaf and gave no answer when they called to me, and had to be roused to life — which meant tea — with a loud and repeated summons. But what can they say who have been in fairyland? Notoriously, it is impossible to give any true report of its ineffable marvels and delights. Happiness, said De Quincey, on his discovery of the paradise that he thought he had found in opium, could be sent down by the mail-coach; more truly I could announce my discovery that delight could be contained in small octavos and small type, in a bookshelf three feet long. I took Sir Walter to my heart with great joy, and roamed, enraptured, through his library of adventures and marvels as I roamed through the lanes and hollows, continually confronted by new enchantments and fresh pleasures. Perhaps I remember most acutely my first reading of "The Heart of Midlothian," and this for a good but external reason. I was suffering from the toothache of my life while I was reading it; from a toothache that lasted for a week and left me in a sort of low fever — as we called it then. And I remember very well as I sat, wretched and yet rapturous, by the fire, with a warm shawl about my face, my father saying with a grim chuckle that I would never forget my first reading of "The Heart of Midlothian." I never have forgotten it, and I have never forgotten that Sir Walter Scott's tales, with every deduction for their numerous and sometimes glaring faults, have the root of the matter in them. They are vital literature, they are of the heart of true romance. What is vital literature, what is true romance? Those are difficult questions which I once tried to answer, according to my lights, in a book called "Hieroglyphics"; here I will merely say that vital literature is something as remote as you can possibly imagine from the short stories of the late Guy de Maupassant.

The hanging bookcase in the drawing-room under the marble bust of Lesbia and her Sparrow is not only rich and golden in my memory from its being the habitation of the Waverley Novels. This had been treasure enough, indeed, to make the shelves for ever dear; but there was more than this. The bookcase held, besides Sir Walter's romances, my father's school and college prizes, dignified books in whole calf and in pigskin, adorned with the arms of Cowbridge School and Jesus College, Oxford, in rich gold. Here was the Judicious Hooker, whose judiciousness, I regret to say, I could never abide nor stomach; here that noble book, Parker's "Glossary of Gothic Architecture," in three volumes, one of text and two of beautifully executed plates; and here was an early volume of Tennyson.

Of these two last-named books I can scarcely say which is the more precious and eminent in my recollection. The one stands for my initiation into the spirit of Gothic, and I think that is one of the most magical of all initiations. More furious and frantic nonsense has been talked about "paganism" than about almost any other subject; it will only be necessary to think of Swinburne with his "world has grown grey" phrase to indicate what manner of nonsense I have in mind. But the fact is that the heart of paganism was not exactly contrite or broken, but certainly resigned, with an austere and stoical acceptance of fate, which is not without its beauty and its majesty. The nearest modern equivalent to the classic or pagan spirit is Calvinism — the Œdipus Tyrannus is nothing but the doctrine of predestination set to solemn music — and this austere spirit stamped itself on all the finest Greek art. It is somewhat softened in Plato, for Plato drew from the East by way of Pythagoras, but the beauty of Greek tragedy, architecture, sculpture, is essentially austere and severe. It is Calvinism in marble; and judgment and inexorable vengeance on guilty sinners are sung in choral odes.

Now winter has its splendours; but with what joy do we welcome the yearly miracle of spring. We and the whole earth exult together as though we had been delivered from prison, the hedgerows and the fields are glad, and the woods are filled with singing; and men's hearts are filled with an ineffable rapture. Israel once more has come out of Egypt, from the house of bondage. And all this is expressed in the Gothic, and much more than this. It is the art of the supreme exaltation, of the inebriation of the body and soul and spirit of man. It is not resigned to dwell calmly, stoically, austerely on the level plains of this earthly life, since its joy is in this, that it has stormed the battlements of heaven. And so its far-lifted vaults and its spires rush upward, and its pinnacles are like a wood of springing trees. And its hard stones, its strong-based pillars break out as it were into song, they blossom as the rose; all the secrets of the garden and the field and the wood have been delivered unto them. And not only is all this true of building. Take a common iron nail that is to be driven into a door. The Gothic smith would so deal with that nail that its head should become a little piece of joy and fantasy, a little portion of paradise. Nay, take the letter A, as the Romans gave it to us; a plain, well-built, business-like letter, admirably fulfilling its purpose, with no nonsense about it. Now look at a thirteenth-century illuminated manuscript and seek out this A. It has every kind of "nonsense" about it; of that nonsense that makes earth into heaven. It is not only that it glows with rich raised gold, that it is most imperially vested in blue and in scarlet, but its frigid form has relaxed into beauty; it is no longer a mere letter, it is as a wild rose-tree in a hedge. From it spring curves of infinite grace, which enclose the page of text, and hair-line branches break from the main stem and blossom out into flowers of paradise: so the wild roses, delicate, enchanting, sway and quiver over the green field in the month of June.

So much for the "Glossary"; now for the other volume, the little early Tennyson. My attention was directed to this in an odd manner. One of the masters at school had called me a "lotus-eater," and I was much pleased with the sound of the phrase, though the master did not mean to be complimentary, and I had no notion as to what a lotus-eater really was. But in the course of the next holidays, rummaging at random among the books at the rectory, as my custom was, I opened the Tennyson and found the poem of "The Lotos-Eaters" with the "Choric Song" annexed. I began to read that I might be instructed as to the exact nature of my crime. I read on, enchanted, and it was then, in my twelfth or thirteenth year, that I first delighted in poetry as poetry, for its own sake, apart from any story it might tell.

And here I find an extraordinary difficulty in "making a distinction," as the casuists say, between two very different kinds of literary pleasure. For some time I had enjoyed great literature in such books as "Don Quixote" and Sir Walter Scott's romances; but "The Lotos-Eaters" — which is also, I think, great literature — gave me a quite new and peculiar delight. Hitherto it had been the story which had charmed me; but now I found myself delighting in the music and melody of verse, in the "atmosphere" of the poem, in the "colour" of the words — to use terms of which I disapprove, but for which I can find no efficient substitutes. I suspect, indeed, that I found in Tennyson's poem the transmuted and golden image of my own solitary and meditative habit of mind; and this may have counted for something in the sum of my delight. The master, a cheery, excellent young man as I remember him, may have made a correct diagnosis; I had been a lotus-eater for years without knowing it, and so recognised Ulysses' entranced companions as my true comrades in dreams. It may have been so; but in any case I have always dated my inoculation with the specific virus of literature from my reading of those verses in the little calf-bound volume.

Chapter III

SOME YEARS AGO I was asked by the editor of a well-known paper to write a short series of articles about London. The subject seems ambitious enough, and indeed London considered either physically or intellectually is so vast and mighty a world, that the study of any one — of even the smallest and least considerable — of its aspects may well be the task of a lifetime. But, so far as I can remember, my instructions were of the liberal and catholic kind. I mean, I was not required to write of the great city as the goal of the timber merchant or of the dealer in precious stones, or of the makers of chasubles, or of the fashioner of wigs, but rather to depict it as the end sought by all these, and by myriads more. And so I set about the task in my usual spirit, firmly convinced, that is, that better men had said all that there was to say on the matter brought before me, and yet resolved to do my best and to try to make something of the job in one way or another. So I set to work, and found, strangely enough, that though I was writing about London, I was also writing a mystical treatise, on a text which I will not divulge in this place. But for the beginning of my series I remember that I went back a good many years to the time when London began to call to me. I often speculate now in these later days as to how it would have been with me if this call had never come. For I have certain friends — very few of them — still living in Gwent and on its borders who have not heard the summons. The special family that I have in mind has lived in those regions for more centuries than I can tell. It would be a bold and learned Welsh herald who would trace them to their beginnings on the Celtic side, but on the Norman they go back to Sir Payne Turberville, the companion of Fitzhamon, and even in Wales a story of nine hundred years is a long story.

Well, coming down a little through the ages, the Rowlands that I knew — of course, their grandfather knew my grandfather — are still on the soil. Certainly a younger son has crossed the Severn, but the two others have not moved their habitations more than ten or twelve miles in the last fifty years. From half-way between Newport and Cardiff to Newport, from Newport to a mile east of Newport, then to four miles east of Newport, at last to three miles west of Cardiff: they will surely be laid in the land of their fathers at the end. So it might have been with me, perhaps, if it had not been for the blood of certain Scottish sailors intermingled with the stay-at-home stock of Gwent. But I often wonder, as I say, how it would have happened to me if I had found a home under the shadow of Twyn Barlwm instead of becoming a dweller in the tents of London. Tents, I say advisedly, for, with the rarest exceptions, Londoners have no homes. This was true in a great measure nearly two hundred years ago, when Dr. Johnson first came to London from Lichfield; it is now all but universally true.

But, anyhow, the call of London, partly external and partly internal, came to me, and for some months before I left the old land for the first time I was imagining London and making a picture of it in my mind, and longing for it. I turned up the old magazines and re-read Sala's "Twice Round the Clock." I came upon the strange phrase, "the City," in stories, and wondered what the City signified. And I began to have an appetite for London papers. For it should be understood that at Llanddewi Rectory a London paper was a thing of the rarest appearance. I think I can remember that when the Prince of Wales — afterwards King Edward VII, of happy memory — was dangerously ill, my father made some kind of arrangement — I cannot think what it could have been — by which he got the "Echo" of those days, not only on week days, but on Sunday afternoons. And in ordinary times, when we went into Newport on market days, we might possibly bring back a "Standard" or a "Telegraph," but likely enough not. We saw the "Western Mail" occasionally, the "Hereford Times" once a week; weekly also came the "Guardian," an excellent paper, but with more of Oxford, Pater, and Freeman, and Deans, and Dignitaries in it than of London or Londoners. Indeed, I remember how the news of the fall of Khartoum came to the rectory. I had been spending the evening with some friends across a few miles of midnight and black copse, and ragged field and wild, broken, and wandering brook land, and I remember that not a star was to be seen as I came home, wondering all the while if I ever should find my way. One of my friends had been in Newport that day, and had seen a paper, and so when I got back at last and found my father smoking his pipe by the fire, I announced the news in a tag of Apocalyptic Greek: Khartoum he polis he megale peptoke, peptoke; Khartoum the mighty city, has fallen, has fallen. And sometimes I wonder now in these days, when I am nearer to the heart of newspapers, whether our work in Fleet Street, with its anxious, flurried yell over the telephone, its tic-tac of tapes, its slither and rattle and clatter of linotypes, its frantic haste of men, its final roar and thunder of machinery ever gets itself delivered at last on a midnight hillside so queerly as the tragic news of Khartoum was delivered in the “parlour” of Llanddewi Rectory.

But the days came when above the clear voice of the brook in the hidden valley, above the murmur of the trees in the heart of the greenwood there sounded from beyond the hills to my heart a clearer voice, a mightier murmur. London called me, and all documents relating to this new unknown world became matters of the highest consequence and significance, and so London papers must by all means be obtained.

Far and long ago that spring and summer of 1880 now seem to me. It was then that London began to summon, and I was filled with an eager curiosity to know all about the new world which I was to visit.

As I have explained, the London paper made a very rare and occasional appearance at Llanddewi-among-the-Hills, and I don’t think that any of us felt any aching need of it. But now for me “Standard” and “Telegraph” became mystic documents of the highest interest and most vital consequence; these were the charts to the Nova Terra Incognita; every line in them came from the heart of the mystery and was written by men who were learned in all the wisdom of London. London papers I must have; that was certain; so I set out to get them.

The nearest point at which these precious rarities were obtainable was Pontypool Road Station, about four miles distant from Llanddewi Rectory. It was the place where I had bought my copy of “De Quincey” some years earlier, and is now sacred to me on that account. But in this month of April thirty-five years ago I thought little of De Quincey or of his visions. Columbus, I suspect, while he watched the fitting of his caravel forgot any mere literary enthusiasms that he might have once possessed; for him there was but one object and that was the tremendous, marvellous, terrible venture into the unknown that he was soon to make. So it was with me; London loomed up before me, wonderful, mystical as Assyrian Babylon, as full of unheard-of things and great unveilings as any magic city in an Eastern tale. It loomed up with incredible pinnacles — to quote Tennyson on another city — and in its mighty shadow all lesser objects disappeared. De Quincey? After all he was not without value, since he spoke of Oxford Street; still, I wanted later news of the City of the Enchanters. So three or four times a week I walked the four miles to Pontypool Road, taking the short cut across the fields which leaves the by-way at Croeswen and brings one out on the high road from Newport to Abergavenny, somewhere about a mile from the station, near the lane which wanders through a very solitary country into Usk.

Pontypool Road Station lies, as I have said, under mountains, or rather under the huge domed hills which we in Gwent call mountains. It is one of the many meeting-points between the fields and the "works," and is always associated in my mind with a noise of clanking machinery and a reek of black oily smoke of rich flavour, which this generation would not recognise, since it is only to be imitated by blowing out a tallow candle that has long wanted snuffing; and now there are neither tallow candles nor snuffers. Here, then, of a "celestial" agent of W. H. Smith I bought my papers; usually the "Standard" and the "Daily Telegraph." The "Morning Post" was, I think, twopence in those days, and twopence was too much to give for a daily paper, and, moreover, we had a vague belief that the "Morning Post" was almost exclusively concerned with the social doings of the aristocracy, splendid matters, doubtless, but no affairs of mine. With these two papers, then, and once a week with a copy of "Truth," I would make my way out of the station, and along the high road till I came to the stile and the lonely path across the fields, and alone under a tree or in the shelter of a friendly hedge I would open my papers, cut their pages, and plunge into their garden of delights. One of my chief interests in these journals — perhaps my chiefest interest — was the theatre; and I am sure I cannot say why this was so. As far as I can remember I had up to this time witnessed three performances of stage plays, and of these three one was certainly not "legitimate," being a drama of the circus called "Dick Turpin's Ride to York." Its chief incidents were firing pistols and leaping over five-barred gates, and I must have been about seven when I saw it at Cardiff. Then in '76 I was at Dublin, and saw "Our Boys," and was very heartily bored, and finally in '78 or '79 I went with a school-fellow to the skating-rink at Hereford — I remember the former as well as the latter rinking mania — and enjoyed a touring company's rendering of "Pinafore." And, looking back, I believe that it was then that the delightful poison began to work; then when in that ramshackle barn of a place in the Hereford backstreet the curtain went up on the Saturday afternoon, and eight men dressed as sailors began to sing: —

We sail the ocean blue,
And our saucy ship's a beauty;
We're gallant men and true,
And attentive to our duty.

I remember that, young as I was, I could not help feeling that eight was a very small number for the male chorus. This circumstance confirms me in a belief which I have long entertained that Heaven meant me to be a stage-manager. True, I could never master simple addition, and a stage-manager has to keep accounts. Still, I should not have been the first stage-manager whose ledgers were filled with "comptes fantastiques."

But here I am under my tree or my hedge on a sunny morning of that Gwentian spring of so many years ago, eagerly opening the paper and turning to the theatrical advertisements in that part of the journal which I have in later years learned to call the "leader page." I read about Mr. Henry Irving at the Lyceum and Mr. Toole at the Folly — I do not think the vanished theatre was known as Toole's in those days. Mme. Modjeska and Mr. Forbes-Robertson were, I believe, at the Court, Dion Boucicault's play, "The Shaughraun," was running at the Adelphi — or, stay, was this old house of melodrama then the home of "The Danites"? In Wych Street, at the Opera Comique, was "The Pirates of Penzance"; "Madame Favart" enchanted at the Strand; "Les Cloches de Corneville" was at the Globe or the Olympic, I forget which. And, said each advertisement, "for cast see under the clock."

I was vividly interested in that phrase, "For cast see under the clock," which I read in the sibylline leaves of my London papers. The real meaning of the words never occurred to me; I conceived that somewhere, in some dimly-imagined central place of London, there was a great clock on a high square tower, and that this tower was so prominent an architectural feature as to be known all over London as "the clock." And at the base of this tower, so I proceeded in my fancy, there were displayed bills or posters, containing the casts of all the plays of all the theatres. I never found that mighty tower in London, but it was many years before it dawned on me that "the clock" was merely the pictured clock-face in the newspaper itself, under which the full casts were then printed.

As I have said, I cannot quite make out the sources of this intense interest of mine in the theatre. But I suspect that for the time I had got into that strange frame of mind to which Thackeray alluded when he asked a man if he were "fond of the play." Thackeray's friend replied, I think, to the effect that it depended on the play, whereupon Thackeray told him that he didn't understand in the least what the phrase "fond of the play" implied. Thackeray was right; for this attitude of mind is universal, not particular; and oddly enough, I believe it is very little related to any serious interest in the drama as a form of art. There is so vast a gulf between the theatre of to-day and that of thirty-five years ago that I do not know whether it is now possible for anybody to be "fond of the play" in the old sense; but if there be such people left, I am sure that they have not the faintest interest in the proposals to build and endow a national theatre. For to those in the happy state to which Thackeray alluded, the theatre was loved not for itself, but as a symbol of gaiety; I would almost say of metropolitanism as opposed to provincialism. I have known countrymen relating their adventures in London almost to wink as they included a visit to the Globe or the Strand in the list of their pleasures; the theatre represented to them the "chimes at midnight" mood.

Thackeray meant — do you like the mingled gas and orange odours of the theatre, do you like the sound of the orchestra tuning, the sight of the footlights suddenly lightening, can you project your self readily into the fantastic world disclosed by the rising curtain, and afterwards, do you like a midnight chop at Evans's, with Welsh rarebit to follow, and foaming tankards of brown stout, and then "something hot"; in fine, do you like to be out and about and in the midst of gaiety at hours of the night when your uncles and aunts and all quiet country people are abed and fast asleep? That is what Thackeray meant by his question, and I suppose that our modern, serious lovers of the drama would regard the man who was fond of the play in this sense as an utter reprobate, a stumbling-block and a stone of offence. But it was in that sense that I pored devoutly over everything relating to the theatre that I found in my newspapers, as I delayed in my walks home from Pontypool Road, not being able to refrain any longer.

Well, the day dawned at last for dreams to come true — or as true as they ever come. My father and I set out one fine Monday morning for Paddington, starting, I think, at about eleven o'clock from Newport, and getting to London by five in the afternoon. This was then the best train in the day; for the Severn Tunnel was not yet made, and we went all the way round by Gloucester. It was a six hours' journey, and now one can get from London to Newport in two hours and a half. At Westbourne Park we changed and got into the Underground system, and so came to the Temple Station on the Embankment. Thence it was a short walk to the private hotel in Surrey Street where my father had always stayed on his infrequent visits to town. I have forgotten the name of the hotel; — Bradshaw's office is built on the site of it — it was Williams's, or Smith's, or Evans's, or some such title, and as I believe was then the way, it was understood to be more or less the preserve of people from the west. I suppose there were other little hotels for parsons and small squires of the east and north and south; for all the streets that go down from the Strand to the river were then occupied by these private hotels and by lodging-houses. Craven Street, by Charing Cross, is the only one of these streets that has at all preserved the old manner, which, let me say, was a dingy and dim but on the whole a comfortable manner. Our hotel was just opposite the pit door of the old Strand Theatre, and in a former visit my father and mother, sitting at their window, had had the gratification of seeing Mrs. Swanborough sitting at her window over the way knitting busily. Now all our ladies, however smart, have become knitters, but if I had been writing these reminiscences a few years ago I should have asked: "Can you imagine a London manageress of these days sitting and knitting in her room at the theatre?"

We went out for a short stroll before eating, and for the first time I saw the Strand, and it instantly went to my head and to my heart, and I have never loved another street in quite the same way. My Strand is gone for ever; some of it is a wild rock-garden of purple flowers, some of it is imposing new buildings; but one way or another, the spirit is wholly departed. But on that June night in 1880 I walked up Surrey Street and stood on the Strand pavement and looked before me and to right and to left and gasped. No man has ever seen London; but at that moment I was very near to the vision — the theoria — of London.

After the astounding glimpse at the Strand we went back to the private hotel in Surrey Street and had something to eat. I am not sure, but I think the meal consisted of tea and ham and eggs, the latter beautifully poached. I know that my mind holds a recollection of this simple dish very admirably done in connection with Smith's, or whatever the place was called; and I believe it was eaten in the evening of our arrival. And I may say in passing that the hotel had a pleasant, well-worn, homely look about it; very plain, but extremely comfortable. I think that my bedroom carpet was threadbare and that the bed was a feather bed; at all events one slept sublimely there under the roof, under the London stars.

Then for the Strand again, now sunset flushed, beginning to twinkle with multitudinous lamps — I had hardly seen a lamp-lit street before — and so to the Opera Comique, where they were playing "The Pirates of Penzance." The Opera Comique was somewhere in Wych Street, which has gone the way of the streets of Babylon and Troy; purple blossoms and big hotels and other theatres that I know not grow now in the place where it once stood. We went to the upper boxes of the Opera Comique and enjoyed ourselves very well. I remember my father being especially pleased with the Pirate King's defence of his profession: "Compared with respectability it's almost honest," or words to that effect. But, oddly enough, I was a little disappointed. There was not the sense of gaiety that I had expected. For one thing the music reminded me of the classic glees and madrigals which I had heard discoursed by the Philharmonic Society at Hereford, where I was at school, and I did not want to be reminded of Hereford. And the female chorus hardly looked as thoughtless as I could have wished; it seemed to me that they might very well have come fresh from the rectory like myself. Of course, it was all very well to be ladylike, and so forth; but what I asked of the stage was careless devilry, the suggestion, at all events, of naughtiness. In fact, my attitude was perilously near to that of the Arkansas audiences as analysed by the Duke in "Huckleberry Finn": "What they wanted was low comedy — and maybe something ruther worse than low comedy." But I was not really quite so bad as the "Arkansaw lunkheads." We went on another night to "Les Cloches de Corneville," a most harmless production, I am sure; and that was what I wanted. I was enchanted from the rising of the curtain; there was the sunlit scene in Normandy, charming, smiling, and a whole row of pretty girls, evidently as thoughtless as the lightest heart could wish, dancing down to the footlights and singing: —

Just look at that,
Just look at this,
Don’t you think we’re not amiss?
A glance give here,
A glance give there,
Tell us if you think we’re dear.

And — not one of these girls looked as if she could have come from any conceivable rectory. Decidedly, “Les Cloches de Corneville” was the comic opera for my money. What a pleasing thrill the scene afforded when the entire village, for some reason that I cannot well remember, dressed up as Crusaders and Crusaderesses, and came suddenly into the room of Gaspard, the miser, and the big bell began to toll and the gold was poured out in a torrent on the ground. “When the heir returneth, then shall ring the bell, so the legend runneth, so the old men tell”; in some such words was this grand peripeteia announced in the text. So the heir no doubt returned and married the extra pretty girl whose name I have forgotten — she was not Serpolette, I know, for Serpolette was comic, delightfully, impudently comic, but still comic, and so no mate for the hero. Serpolette, I think, having regard to the Unities, ought to have married the thin but amusing assistant of the Bailie; but I do not know whether this were so. But I am sure everybody was happy ever after, and of “Les Cloches” and other comic operas like it I say, in the words of Coleridge’s friend: “Them’s the jockeys for me!”

I have never been able to make up my mind as to the respective merits of “Les Cloches de Corneville” and “Madame Favart,” which was running at the Strand. “Les Cloches” had the more coherent plot of the two, and the great scene of the miser and the crusaders was more effective in its stagey way than anything in “Madame Favart,” but, then, Florence St. John was Madame Favart, and to old playgoers I need say no more. And Marius, a delightful French comedian, was in the cast; and there were those songs dear to memory: “Ave, my mother,” “The Artless Thing,” “To Age’s Dull December,” and

Pair of lovers meet,
Stolen vows are sweet,
Sighs, etcetera.
Love is all in all,

On a garden wall,
Never heed papa.

This was sung by Marius, who had no voice in particular, but an infinite Gallic relish and unction and finish in everything that he did. The fourth piece that we went to in this wonderful week was “The Daughter of the Drum Major,” at the Alhambra, then a theatre, with an extremely roomy, comfortable pit. This last piece made but little impression on me. From my recollection, it seems to have been more in the modern mode, that is, a mere excuse for showing off a “beauty chorus” without the little touch of thin, theatrical but pleasant romance that delighted me in the two other plays. But the poverty of the play was atoned for by the happy circumstance that before going to it we dined at the Cavour. And the Cavour in 1880 was exactly like the Cavour in 1915, save in this one matter, that on the earlier date there was included in the price of the dinner a bottle of violet wine.

Looking back through the years and comparing the London of the early ‘eighties with the London of to-day, one circumstance emerges very clearly in my mind: that is, that the early London had an infinitely “smarter,” wealthier air than the later. I say “air” advisedly, to make it clear that I knew nothing of the real interior life of the place, or of the resources of its rich inhabitants. I judged of London purely by its exterior aspects, as one may judge of a passing stranger in the street, and decide that he goes to an expensive tailor, without knowing anything of the condition of his banking account. So, I say that the outward show and lineaments of the London of 1880 were much more refulgent and splendid than those of the last few years. I was a good deal surprised when the truth of this first dawned on me some three or four years ago. For I believe that as a matter of fact the new London is a much wealthier, more luxurious, more extravagant place than the old. The rich people of to-day spend hundreds instead of tens, thousands for the hundreds of their fathers; the “pace” of the splendid has increased enormously in the last thirty-five years; and all the facilities for expending very large sums of money have also increased to a huge extent. So well was I convinced of all this when I fell to comparing the London of my boyhood with the London of my middle age that at first I thought that there must be a fallacy somewhere, and I was very willing to believe that those early impressions of mine were illusions, natural enough in a lad who had never seen any more splendid streets than those which the Newport and Cardiff of those days had to show, than the venerable, peaceful, ancient ways of Hereford, whose stillness was only broken by the deep, sweet chiming of the cathedral bells. But when, interested, I went into the facts of the question, I found that I had not been mistaken in my first view — i.e., that London was a smarter-looking place thirty years ago than at the present day, and this for several reasons.

To begin with, there is the trifling matter of men's dress. I do not know whether we have yet realised the fact that the frock coat is rapidly becoming "costume," verging, that is, towards the status of levee dress. Already, I believe, it is only worn on occasions of semi-state, at functions where the King is expected, at smart weddings, and so forth. Before long it will probably attain the singular twofold state of "evening dress," which is worn all day long by waiters and by what are conveniently called gentlemen after seven o'clock in the evening. So very likely the frock coat will soon be seen on the backs of the maître d'hôtel, the hotel manager, the shopwalker, the major-domo — if there be any majores-domo left — as a kind of uniform or livery, while it will also be the afternoon wear of dukes at great social functions. And so with the silk hat; it has not gone so far on the road of obsolescence as the frock coat, but, unless I mistake, it has entered on that sad way.

Here, then, is the point of contrast. Between 'eighty and 'ninety — and later still — practically every man in London went about his business and his pleasure with a high hat on his head. Every man, I say, above the rank of the mechanic; certainly all the clerkly class; Mr. Guppy and his friends were still faithful to this headdress; which, be it remembered, was once universal all over England, so that even smock-frocked farm labourers wore it. As for the London of pleasure, the West End, it would have been quite impossible to conceive a man of the faintest social pretensions being seen abroad in anything else. And now, I go up and down Piccadilly, Bond Street, the Row at the height of the London season, and see — a few silk hats and morning coats, it is true — but the majority of well-dressed men in "lounge" suits and grey soft hats and black and grey bowlers.

Now let it be clearly understood that I have no passion for black coats and shiny hats myself, nor for the dazzling white linen which has largely given way to soft, unstarched stuffs. But it is not to be denied that all those habits had a “smart” appearance, and that a pavement crowded with shiny black hats, shiny white cuffs and collars, and long black frock coats made a much more imposing show than the pavement of to-day, on which the men’s dress is very much as they please. The modern men look extremely comfortable and well at their ease; but they do not scintillate in the old style. A soft grey hat does not flash back the rays of the sun.

Then, another point and a most important one: the coming of the motor. I suppose the kind of motor-impelled vehicle which one is likely to see in Hyde Park may very well have cost seven or eight or nine or ten times as much as the horse-drawn carriages which I remember going round and round so gay and so glorious. Well, I have watched the modern procession of motor-cars, and they are about as impressive as a career of light locomotive engines. It may indeed in course of time become fashionable to go up and down the Row in express locomotives capable of drawing their hundred coaches at a hundred miles an hour, but the effect would not be smart. Now, the old equipages were undeniably the last word of smartness; in themselves they were enough to tell the stranger that he had come to the very centre of the earth, of its riches and its splendours. There were the high-bred, high-spirited, high-stepping horses, in the first place, groomed to the last extreme of shiny, satiny perfection, tossing their heads proudly and champing their bits and doing the most wonderful things with their legs. The bright sunlight of those past London summers shone on their glossy coats, shone in the patent leather of the harness, shone and glittered on the plated bolts and buckles and ornaments. And the carriages were of graceful form, and the servants of those days sometimes wore gorgeous liveries; and scores of those brilliant equipages followed on one another in an unending dazzling procession. That was the old way; now there are some “Snorting Billies” that choke and snarl and splutter as they dodge furtively and meanly in and out of the Park, like mechanical rabbits bolting for their burrows.

While I contrast the London of my young days and the London of my old — or present — days, I would like it to be remembered that I am, so far, only contrasting the two cities from one point of view, the point of view of smartness. I have not been saying that 1880 London was more sensible than 1915 London; but merely that the former struck an outsider as a more brilliant place than the modern city. The fact is that I have the most cordial approval for all social pomps and splendours, so long as I am not required to take part therein. I hate wearing frock coats and silk hats and shiny shirts; but I am very well pleased to sit in the pit, as it were, and watch those exalted persons who are cast for the decorative parts going through their brilliant performances. And, after all, if a man finds that plate armour is uncomfortable, that is no reason why he should not delight in seeing other people wearing it, and wearing it with dignity. And in speaking of the Hyde Park and Rotten Row of the old days I mentioned that there were some gorgeous servants' liveries still left in 1880. And while we are on that matter, I may say that I have never sympathised at all with those persons who have found something mean and ridiculous in a manservant in purple and gold or in blue and crimson, unless, that is, the point be taken that only a splendid duty should be dignified with a splendid vestment, and in that objection I admit there is some force. Not that I agree for one moment that there is anything contemptible in "menial" service; but I am willing to allow that it may not be altogether seemly for a faithful fellow, whose business is to hold on behind a carriage and wait at dinner, to outshine a bishop in pontificals. But I suspect that the people who sneered at poor Jeames and his plush were not actuated by this reasonable motive, but rather by that vile "Liberal" objection to splendour as splendour. The man who found "Blazes" ridiculous would probably find the King in his Coronation robes equally ridiculous. And so you may go on, up the scale and down the scale; but the only logical alternative to splendour is Dr. Johnson's proposed suit of bull's hide — all beyond that is superfluity and vain show, according to the doctrine of the wretches who in times not long past sold antique civic ornaments, such as chains and maces, on the ground that the Mayor of Little Pedlington did not need such gauds to help him in his customary task of sentencing "drunks."

There is one more point in connection with the Row. Twenty-five years ago the appointed hour was five o'clock in the afternoon. Then people sat in the chairs and walked up and down and looked at the carriages, and I remember a friend observing to me this singularity, that though the place was public and open to anybody, still only those persons who were dressed in the regulation costume — frock coat and silk hat for men — ever came near the sacred ground. The people in lounge suits and bowler hats stood apart, and watched the show from some distance. Well, the hour of the Row is now in the morning; but there is a greater change. There are still "smart" people there; but there are also people who cannot by any possibility be described as smart, not even if they be judged by the very lax standards of these days.

In another matter the London of to-day is much less impressive in its outward show than the London of 1880; that is in the aspect of its principal streets. There are still excellent shops in Bond Street, Regent Street, and Piccadilly; but there is no longer in any of them that air of exclusiveness and expensiveness that I can remember, and this is particularly true of Regent Street. In 1880 you felt as soon as you turned up the Quadrant that anything you might buy therein would certainly be dear; the very stones and stucco exuded costliness and the essential attars of luxury. I feel convinced that the cigars of Regent Street were of a more curious aroma than cigars bought in any other street, that it was the very place wherein to purchase a great green flagon of rare scent as a present for a lady, that if you happened to want a Monte Cristo emerald this was the quarter wherein to search for it. That was my impression, but lest it should be mere fancy, a year or so ago I asked one of the older shopkeepers whether the street was quite what he and I remembered it. He said very emphatically it was not at all what it had been; and I feel sure that he was right, and that in a less degree the other principal shopping centres have declined from their former splendour.

And this for two reasons; first, the curious modern tendency of the best and most luxurious shops to scatter and disperse themselves abroad about the side streets of the West End, leaving gaps which are filled in most cases by dealers in cheaper wares. And secondly, the coming of the popular tea-shop has, in my opinion, done a very great deal to “unsmarten” the streets of which I am speaking. Let it not be understood for one moment that I would speak despitefully of cheap tea-shops; that would indeed be vilely thankless in one who has often made the principal meal of the day at an A.B.C. — large coffee, threepence; milk cake, twopence; butter, a penny — and has been grateful that for once in a way he has dined. But, it cannot be pretended that a milk cake is a costly or a curious dish, or that a plate of cold meat for sixpence or eightpence is an opimian banquet; and so, when I pass a popular tea-shop or eating-house, I feel that my dream of luxury and expense is broken; and that something of glitter and splendour has passed away from the West End of London.

I spent the years from the summer of 1880 to the winter of 1886 in a singular sort of apprenticeship to life and London and letters and to most other things. Sometimes I was in London; then for months at a time I was out of it, back again in my old haunts of Gwent. I had hot fits of desire for the town when I was forced to stay in the country; and then, settled, or apparently settled, in the heart of London, its immensities and its solitudes overwhelmed me, the faint, hot breath of its streets sickened me, so that my heart ached for the thought of the green wood by the valley of the Soar, and for the thought of friendly faces.

They say that in old Japan they had a wonderful and secret art of tempering their sword blades. Now the steel was placed in the white heat of the fire, now it was withdrawn and plunged into the water of an icy torrent; and then again the trial of the furnace. So heat and cold were alternated, according to an ancient and hidden tradition, till at last the craftsman obtained an exquisite and true and perfect blade, fit for the adorned scabbard of a great lord of Japan. When I think of those early years of mine I should be reminded of the process of the Japanese sword-craftsman — if only the heart were as tractable as steel. The Kabbalists, I believe, take the view — a gloomy one — that the innermost essence of man’s spirit goes out from the world in much the same state as that in which it came into the world; and it is certainly true that some men seem incorrigible; neither fire nor ice will temper them aright.

During these early years of my London experience I lived under very varying conditions. I lived with families, and I lived alone; I lived in the suburbs and in the centre; I had enough to eat, and then narrowly escaped starvation. My first habitat was in the High Street of a southern suburb. My memory holds a picture of an ancient street of dignified red-brick houses, a Georgian church, and a stream of quite inky blackness. The old houses had old gardens behind them, green enough, but with a certain grime upon them that made them strange to eyes unused to this combination of soot and leafage. But it was quite easy in those days to get from the suburb to the open country.

Not that I desired any such excursions, for my notion of an ideal residence was then a lodging in one of the streets or courts or passages going down from the Strand to the Thames. This was a dream that I realised years afterwards, when many waters (not of the Thames) had passed over my head. It was well enough, and I used to go out and get my breakfast at the "chocolate as in Spain" shop at the west end of the Strand, on the north side. It was well enough, I say, but it was not absolute paradise. And, furthermore, and in an interior parenthesis, let me say that the chocolate at the old Strand shop was not as in Spain, though very decent chocolate. The Spanish service of chocolate — I encountered it when I was in Gascony — consists in this, first that the chocolate is made extremely strong and thick, and secondly that with it comes a goblet of ice-cold well-water, to be drunk after the chocolate, on the principle, I suppose, of the Scots who drink water, not with whisky, but after it.

Well, to return to the more or less — chiefly less — direct current of my tale, after my sojourn in the southern suburb came a return to the country, where I remained eight or nine months. It was during this exodus or hegira, I think, that I was excommunicated by old Mr. James, of Lansoar, because I was loafing at home instead of living on five shillings a week in London. But my long sojourn in Gwent was in fact due to a very dismal discovery having been made of me by certain persons called examiners. They found me utterly incapable of the simple rules of arithmetic; and hence I was debarred from the career which I had been contemplating. And here I would say that I am almost proud of myself for my quite extraordinary arithmetical incapacity. I am not merely dull and slow, but desperate. I am so wanting in the mere faculty of counting as to be curious, like those tribes of savages that can say "One, two, three, four, five … many." There are people who make a living by exhibiting their arithmetical skill in the music-halls; someone writes on the blackboard a multiplication sum of fifteen figures multiplied by fifteen figures, and a second or two after the last figure is drawn the arithmetical artist utters the result. Well, I am at the opposite end of the scale, and I have sometimes wondered whether "Incompetent Machen" would not be quite a good turn. It would make anybody laugh to hear me doing a sum in simple addition. It is like "Forty-seven and nine, forty-seven and nine, forty-seven and nine." I ponder. Then a brilliant idea strikes me. I pretend the problem is "forty-seven and ten." I get the result, fifty-seven, deduct one and proceed.

Well, I came to London again in the summer of '81, thinking of another and quite a different career, which did not involve, on the face of it, that little difficulty of arithmetic. Again I was in a suburb, and again in an old one, but this time the quarter was in the far west. I stayed in Turnham Green, then a place of many amenities standing amongst fields and gardens and riparian lawns, which, long ago, have been buried beneath piles of cheap bricks and mortar, for a year and a half, and then again I altered my plans, or fate rather altered them for me. I started on a new tack and kept it for a month, and then somehow slid into a backwater, in which I was afloat and nothing more than afloat. Summoning this period into recollection, I find my position very much like to that of certain ancient and outworn barges, grass-grown, flower-grown, that I have come upon suddenly in improbable back alleys of water, in the midst of a maze of by-streets at Brentford; but, locally and literally, I was then living in a small room, a very small room, in Clarendon Road, Notting Hill Gate.

I have already stated that when I first came up to London I had no thought of literature as a career. Indeed, I never have thought of it as a career, but only as a destiny. Still, my meaning is that it in no wise dawned upon me as I travelled up from Newport to London in the early summer of 1880 that writing of any kind or sort was to be a great part of my life's business. And yet, before I had lived a month in the old red house by the inky stream, I was trying to write, in the intervals of a very different task, in an atmosphere which was utterly remote from literature of any kind. How was this? Partly, I suppose, because of the very large proportion of Celtic blood in my veins. It is quite true that the Celt — the Welsh Celt, at all events — has directly contributed very little to great literature. This I have always maintained, and always shall maintain; and I think all impartial judges will allow that if Welsh literature were annihilated at this moment the loss to the world's grand roll of masterpieces would be insignificant. I, speaking from the point of view of my own peculiar interests, I should be very sorry to miss my copy of the "Mabinogion," and there are certain stanzas of the poem called "Y Beddau"— "Vain is it to seek for the grave of Arthur" — which have a singular and enchanting and wizard music; but in neither case is there any question of a literary masterpiece.

Yet there is in Celtdom a certain literary feeling which does not exist in Anglo-Saxondom. It is diffused, no doubt, and appreciative rather than creative, and lacking in the sterner, critical spirit which is so necessary to all creative work; still it is there, and it is delighted with the rolling sound of the noble phrase. It perceives the music of words and the relation of that music to the world. I was taking a lesson in Welsh pronunciation some time ago, and uttered the phrase "yn oes oesodd" — from ages to ages. "That is right," said my Welsh friend, "speak it so that it makes a sound like the wind about the mountains." And, with or without the leave of the literary rationalists, I would say that the spirit of that sentence is very near to the heart of true literature.

So far then, as a man three-parts Celt, I was by nature inclined to the work of words, and there was, moreover, a feeble literary strain in my own family. There was a second cousin, or Welsh uncle, I am not certain which, who had composed a five-act heroic blank verse drama, called "Inez de Castro," which was almost, but not quite, represented by the famous Mrs. Somebody at the Lane in the early 'fifties. And then, more potent still, was the heredity of bookishness, the growing up among books that had accrued from grandfathers and uncles and cousins, all men who had lived all their days amongst books, and had sat over country hearths on mountain sides, reading this leathern Colloquies of Erasmus, this little Horace in mellow parchment, with the Sphere of Elzevir.

And then there was the old-fashioned grammar school education, of which it must be said, by friends and foes, that it is an education in words. One spent one's time, unconsciously, in weighing the values of words in English and Greek and Latin, in rendering one tongue into another, in estimating the exact sense of an English sentence before translating it into one or another of the old tongues. So that a boy who could do decent Latin prose must first have mastered the exact sense and significance of his English original, and then he must also have made himself understand to a certain extent, not only the logic but the polite habit of each language. I remember when I was a very small boy rendering "Put to the sword" literally into "Gladio positi." "Well," said my master, "there is no reason on earth why the Romans shouldn't have said 'gladio positi,' but as a matter of fact they did say 'ferro occisi' — killed with iron." And if one thinks of it, he who has mastered that little lesson has also mastered the larger lesson that literature is above logic, that there are matters in it which transcend plain common sense. And so, the long and the short of it was, that in 1880 I began to try to write.

Now I believe that one of the most tortuous and difficult questions that engages philosophy is the theory of cause and effect. I think, though I am not quite sure, that in one of Mr. Balfour's philosophical books this matter is treated, and the familiar case of a sportsman's pulling a trigger, firing a gun, and thereby bringing down a bird, is made an instance. What is the "cause" of the bird's death? Roughly speaking, of course, the pulling of the trigger; but roughly speaking is not the same thing as philosophically speaking; and if anyone be so simple as to conclude that roughly speaking means truly speaking and that philosophy is all nonsense, let me remind him that when he enjoys his after-dinner cigar in his arm-chair he is not conscious of the fact that he is being whirled through space, like a top, at the most terrific speed.

So, if I remember rightly, Mr. Balfour left the philosophical "cause" of the bird's death an open question, if not a question altogether beyond determination of human wit; and thus it is with the impulse that sends off a harmless young fellow on the career of letters. One can talk of the causes that impel a grain of corn to grow from the ground; sound seed, good soil, good farming; dry weather, wet weather, each in its season; but at the last the engendering of the green shoot remains a mystery. And so it is a mystery that near midsummer in 1880 I suddenly began to write horrible rubbish in a little manuscript book with a scarlet cover; rubbish that had rhymes to it.

But if ultimate causes lie beyond those flaming walls of the world that put bounds to all our inquisition, it is not so hard to trace those causes which are proximate. The bird dies because the shot hit it in a vital part, the corn sprouts because it is put into the ground — and I began to write because I bought a copy of Swinburne's "Songs Before Sunrise."

I forget how I heard of this name, which once loomed so fiery and strange a portent, which still, in the estimation of many excellent judges, stands for a great literary achievement. I know it was while I was down in the country, because I can remember one of our clergy, an Eton and Christchurch man, telling me gossip about the poet, who had in those early days retired from the world to Putney. It is to be supposed that I had read something concerning Swinburne in one of those wonderful London papers that came over our hills from another world, that might almost have fallen from the stars they were so wholly marvellous. But, somehow or other, I was possessed by an eager curiosity concerning this Swinburne, convinced in advance — I cannot remember how — that here I should surely find an unexpected, unsurmised treasure. And so, one hot, shiny afternoon, I came up from the old Georgian suburb by the black stream, crossed Hungerford Bridge, and made my way into the Strand; into that Strand which is as lost as Atlantis. And going eastward past many vanished things, past the rich odours of Messrs. Rimell's soap-boiling, I came to St. Mary-le-Strand, and the entrance of Holywell Street. At the southern corner of this street, facing the east end of the church, there stood Denny's bookshop, and, gold in my pocket, I went in with a bold appearance, and said, "Have you got Swinburne's 'Songs Before Sunrise'?" The shopman did not seem in the least astonished at my question. He said he had got the book, and produced it, and showed it me, and the very cover was such as I had never seen before, provocative, therefore, in a high degree. And so I bought the book and carried it out of Denny's into the sunlight in a great amazement.

For, be it remembered, one did not go into a provincial bookshop in that easy way and say, "Have you got this or that?" For the chances were about a thousand to one that they hadn't got it, and never would have it. It is odd, but I cannot remember exactly the nature of the stock of the average country bookseller; my impression is of Bibles, Prayer Books, Church Services, and Pitman's Shorthand Manuals. So, if you wanted a book in the county town, you did not say, "Have you got so-and-so?" but "Will you get me so-and-so?" and in four or five days you called and the book was ready. But I had a notion that in this wonderful London the bookshop would actually have the book that you wanted, there actually in presence, and waiting for you on its shelves. I had a notion, I say, but again, it seemed almost incredible that there should be such shops in the world, and so when the bookseller under St. Mary-le-Strand said "Yes," quite simply, and handed me the "Songs Before Sunrise" in two or three seconds, I was amazed and exultant too; the legend of London, though marvellous, was evidently a true one.

Now I have a friend who is very fond of preaching the doctrine of what he calls the cataclysm. He holds that we are all much bettered by an occasional earthquake, moral, mental or spiritual. He says that volcanoes which suddenly burst out from under our feet are the finest tonics in the world, that violent thunderstorms, cloud-bursts, and tornadoes clear our mental skies. The treatment is heroic, but my friend may be right; certainly that volume of "Songs Before Sunrise" was to me quite cataclysmic. First there was the literary manner of the book, which to me was wholly strange and new and wonderful, and then there was the tremendous boldness of it all, the denial of everything that I had been brought up to believe most sure and sacred; the book was positively strewn with the fragments of shattered altars and the torn limbs of kings and priests.

How do the lines go? I quote from memory, but they run something like this: —

Thou hast taken all, Galilæan, but these thou shalt not take;
The laurel, the doves and the pæan, the breasts of the nymph in the brake.

Clearly this was a terrible, a tremendous fellow, an earth-shaking, heaven-storming poet. And so between my endeavours to qualify for passing the preliminary examination of the Royal College of Surgeons, I began to write; I should think the most horrible drivel that ever has been written since rhymes first jingled. I can't remember, oddly enough, whether I tried to imitate Swinburne; I know one copy of verses was "inspired" by a picture called "Harmony," which I think was hung in the Academy of 1880. It depicted a mediæval maiden playing the organ, while a mediæval youth watched her in a dazed and love-stricken condition. This is positively the only one of these early horrors of mine, of which I have any recollection; my memory is purged of the rest of them, I am glad to say. I merely mention these things because they illustrate a very singular point in literary psychology; in universal psychology, for the matter of that. For I believe it is a rule that almost every literary career, certainly every literary career which is to be concerned with the imaginative side of literature, begins with the writing of verses. Nay, people who are to live lives quite remote from literature will often try to write poetry in their youth; and on the face of it, this is a great puzzle. For poetry, be it remembered, is the most "artificial" kind of literary composition, it is immeasurably the most difficult, it is by far the most remote from that which is commonly called life. Why, then, does the inexperienced beginner, devoid of all technical ability, invariably essay this most difficult technical task on his entry into the literary career?

The problem of the boy in the back room, not far from the dark stream of the Wandle, writing verses in the red notebook, is really one of the enigmas of the universe; it is rather a Chinese-box puzzle; riddle is within riddle.

For if we start at the beginning of things, or at what seems to us to be the beginning of things, we are met by the question as to why there should be any such thing as poetry in the universe. I need not say how much wider this question is than it seems; how it must be asked about all the arts, about fugues and cathedrals and romances and dances. It is an immense question; immense when one considers that with nine people out of ten the great criterion is, “Does it pay?” That is, will it result in a larger supply of fine champagne, four ale, roast legs of pork, and mousses royales to the population? Will this scheme of things enable Sir John to keep a fifth motor-car, or will it get Bill meat three times a day? That is, at last, the test by which we judge all things. It is an old and approved British test; by it Macaulay condemned the whole of Greek philosophy, because that philosophy did not lead up to the invention of the steam engine. Now, it is quite clear that poetry, speaking generally, pays neither the producer nor the consumer of it; it does not lead to motor-cars, beefsteaks, vintage clarets, or four ale. It is not even moral; not a single man has ever been induced to drink ginger-beer instead of beer by reading Keats.

I must pause for a moment; I fear that it may be thought that I am trying to be funny or — more injurious accusation! — trying to be clever. I am not trying to be either; I am stating the simple facts of the case. Hardly a month passes by without some indignant person pointing out in the Press that Engineering and Commercial Chemistry are infinitely more useful — i.e., lead to more beefsteaks — than Latin and Greek; and that when Oxford and Cambridge find out that obvious truth they may become of some service to the State. Indeed, it is only a few weeks ago since a gentleman wrote to a paper showing that military training was better for a boy — i.e., would make him the better soldier — than “silly old” Greek plays. And let me acknowledge that these contentions are perfectly true; just as it is perfectly true that fur coats are much warmer than Alcaics. So, I say, here is the problem: the common, widely accepted test of the right to existence of everything: does it pay, does it add to the physical comforts of life, is quite clearly opposed to the existence of poetry, and yet poetry exists. Therefore, either the poets and the lovers of poetry are mad, or else the common judgment is … let us say, mistaken. I need scarcely say that I incline to the latter solution of the problem, and so qua human being, I am not ashamed of trying to write poetry by the Wandle, though I recognise, qua Arthur Machen, that I was, very decidedly, not born a poet.

For I firmly hold the doctrine that the natural, the arch-natural expression of man, so far as he is to be distinguished from pigs and dogs and goats, is in the arts, and through the arts and by the arts. It is not by reason, as reason is commonly understood, that man is distinguished from the other animals; but by art. I can quite well conceive the Black Ants sending the message "Hill 27 fell before the Red Ant attack early this afternoon," but I cannot conceive either Red or Black Ants writing odes or building miniature cathedrals. The arts, then, are man's difference, that which makes him to be what he is; and when he speaks through them he is using the utterance which is proper to him, as man. For, if we once set aside the "does it pay" nonsense, which is evidently nonsense and pestilent nonsense at that, we come clearly and freely to the truth that man is concerned with beauty, and with the ecstasy or rapture that proceeds from the creation of beauty and from the contemplation of it. And youth, as I think I have pointed out before, is the time of revelation. It is children who possess the "kingdom of heaven," to them are vouchsafed glimpses of that paradise which is the true home of man, and so it is that the boy with literature in his blood naturally makes his first efforts in the region of poetry, which is the heart and core of all literature.

The heart and core; for, as in the individual man, so in the whole history of men literature begins always with poetry, just as speech began with song. First, the magic incantation, sung about strange secret fires in hidden places by wild men, then the ballad or lyric, then Homer, then Herodotus, with the odours of the sanctuary of poetry still about him, though he has come down into the market-place of prose. And it is not necessary to go farther in time or space than the Northumberland of a few years ago to hear phrases common enough, things of everyday, set to enchanting melodies. I shall never forget how once in the years of my wandering I came one wet autumn afternoon to a little town called Morpeth. It struck me as a dingy place enough, "un petit trou de province, sale, noir, boueux," and my lodging was dingy, and musty too, in a house kept by an old invalid woman who moved about in a wheel chair and grumbled if a window were opened. But when it came to the question of the stroller's tea, the servant-maid, who came, I think, from the wild places of that land, said consolingly: "You need not trouble yourselves; you shall have your tea in half an hour." No doubt the girl was mortal, but she spoke the tongue of the immortals; her phrase about our tea was chanted to an exquisite melody that might have come from the Gradual — or from fairyland.

The natural man, then, is a singer and a poet, and so we may say that all artists are in reality survivals from an earlier time, and so it is that even in these later days the lad, with something of the youth and true nature of his race restored to him for a brief hour, sits in solitary places and endeavours to exercise his birthright. Alas! he stutters deplorably in his speech as he delays by the Wandle, inditing verses; but it is thus that he would declare that he is a citizen of no mean city; he would fain say through those sorry rhymes, Civis cœlestis sum.

Chapter IV

WELL, I SAW the first of Augustus Harris's autumn dramas at Drury Lane, heard the newsboys calling out the death of Miss Neilson one misty evening up and down the Strand, and went back to Gwent in the character of a bad penny; and so fell to writing of those autumn and winter nights, when all the house was still.

Poor wretch! For this is the misery of literature, that it has no technique in the sense that music and painting have each its own technique. The young painter and the young composer, having acquired a certain mechanical skill in the elements of their arts, have studios and schools which they can attend. They have masters who lead them in their several ways, or who tell them, if necessary, to abandon those ways with all convenient speed. But for the lad with letters on the brain there is no help, no guidance; nor is there the possibility of any direction in the literary path. Now and then people send me manuscripts, and ask for my opinion; I give it because I am weak, but I always tell them that in literature the other man's opinion is not worth twopence.

No; the only course is to go on stumbling and struggling and blundering like a man lost in a dense thicket on a dark night; a thicket, I say, of rebounding boughs that punish with the sting of a whip-lash, of thorns that most savagely lacerate the flesh — it is the flesh of the heart, alas! that they tear — of sharp rocks of agony and black pools of despair. Such is the obscure wood of the literary life; such, at least, it was to me. You struggle to find your way; but again and again you ask yourself whether, for you, there is any way. You think you have hit upon the lucky track at last. And lo! before your feet is the black pit. And such is not alone the adventure of little, ineffectual, struggling men. How old was glorious Cervantes, now serene for ever amongst the immortals, when he found his way to that village of La Mancha? Fifty, I think, or almost fifty. And he had been striving for years to write plays, and poetry, and short stories of passion and sentiment; and it was only the roar of applause that thundered up from the world when the Knight and the Squire were seen riding over the hill that convinced Cervantes that at last he had discovered his true path; if indeed he ever were convinced in his heart of the magnitude and majesty of the achievement of “Don Quixote.”

And if these things are done with the great, what will be done with the little? If the clear-voiced rulers of the everlasting choir are to suffer so and agonise, what of miserable little Welshmen stammering and stuttering by the Wandle, in the obscure rectory amongst the hills, in waste places by Shepherd’s Bush, in gloomy Great Russell Street, where the ghosts of dead, disappointed authors go sighing to and fro? For the fate of the little literary man there is no articulate speech that is sufficient; one must fall back on aoi or oimoi, or alas, or some such vague lament of unutterable woe.

Now one of the first agonies of the learner in letters is the discovery of the horrid gulf that yawns between the conception and the execution. Some years before this winter of 1880, when I was at school, I had read the tale of Owain in the Mabinogion, of the magic sudden storm, and of the singing of the birds after it. And going out for a walk one half-holiday with a school-fellow, just such a sudden storm, as it seemed to me, overtook us as we went down into a beautiful valley not far from Hereford; and after it there was a like joyful singing of birds in the trees. And somehow the magic atmosphere of the old tale, mingled with the enacting, as it were, of one of its chief circumstances, left on my mind a very strong and singular impression which, when the desire of literature came upon me, I yearned to put into words. I did so, in the blank verse form, and sent the “poem” to the “Gentleman’s Magazine,” and this I think was my first attempt to get into print. I need not say that my nonsense was returned to me, with thanks; but I wish I knew why I chose that particular magazine. It must have had some especial attraction for me, since ten years later I sent Sylvanus Urban a prose article, which he accepted and paid for at the appropriate eighteenth-century rate of a guinea a sheet; that is sixteen pages. But I must say in all fairness that Sylvanus warned me in advance of his rate of payment.

But that gulf between the idea as it glows warm and radiant in the author’s heart, and its cold and faulty realisation in words is an early nightmare, and a late one, too. For the beginner, if he suffer from many terrible disappointments, has also the consolations of hope, fallacious though these may prove to be. This scheme that looked so well has certainly come to the saddest grief, but there may be better luck next time; if this road have led to nothing but a blank wall of failure, that way may rise from the valley and climb the hill and lead into a fair land. It is later in the life of the literary man, when he has tried all roads and made all the experiments, that his final sorrow comes upon him. He may not be forced to say, perhaps, that he has been a total failure; he may, indeed, be able to chronicle achievements of a minor kind, successes in the estimation of others. But now, with riper understanding, he perceives, as he did not perceive in the days of his youth, the depth of the gulf between the idea and the word, between the emotion that thrilled him to his very heart and soul, and the sorry page of print into which that emotion stands translated. He dreamed in fire; he has worked in clay.

I did not know (happily for myself) of these things in the ending of the year 1880; and so, when all the rectory was abed and asleep, I sat up by a dying fire writing a “poem” on a classic subject.

The classic “poem” was finished some time in the winter of 1880-81, and then I performed a bold action. I sent the manuscript — I can see it now, written in a sprawly hand on both sides of ordinary letter paper — to a Hereford stationer, and bade him print me one hundred copies thereof. He, strangely enough, did so, and I saw myself in print for the first time. I have been looking at my copy of this work, I should think the only copy in existence, and wondering whether I would quote a few lines from it. I have decided against this course. But, after all, I was only seventeen when I wrote “Eleusinia.”

But the little pamphlet had its influence on my life. My relations decided, after reading it, that journalism was the career for me; a decision that then seemed to me both reasonable and pleasant, which now strikes me with amazement, nay with stupefaction. Since those days I have found out a good many things concerning both poetry and journalism; and looking over that old copy of “Eleusinia,” I have meditated on what career I should advise for the author of that work if he were now to consult me. I give it up; I abandon the problem utterly. And yet, strange as it seems, strange most of all to me, my relations were justified after all. I did become a journalist, just thirty years afterwards. But by 1910, those who had arranged this destiny for me were long dead and delivered from all their troubles. I remember my father, who knew about as much of the matter as I did, sketching out my future career. I was to go to London to learn the business first of all, shorthand, of course, and all that sort of thing. A chief portion of the task, he said, half jocularly, would be to lurk in the entrance-halls of great houses and write down the names of distinguished guests on the nights of grand receptions. And then, eventually, some few hundreds would come to me, and with this I was to buy an interest in a small local paper, and so, I suppose, write leaders and live happily ever after. The programme has not been carried out literally. The few hundreds have been more agreeably spent long years ago, and my editor never sent me to get the names of distinguished guests at great houses — knowing, wise man, that I should make a sad mess of such a business. But one of my first "assignments" in journalism was to describe a Giant Apple. I chased after that apple from Bond Street to Covent Garden, from Covent Garden back to Bond Street, and wrote in my paper about its smiling face, wishing my poor father were alive to hear the story of my long-deferred entrance into the art and mystery of the journalist. He would have laughed consumedly; and from my dear remembrance of him, I think he would have found a quotation from Horace to meet the case. Once, I recollect, it turned out that the odd man at the rectory, supposed to be a bachelor, had abandoned a wife and twelve children — all of them small ones, for aught I know — somewhere in Gloucestershire. A policeman came for poor Robert, and my father was very sorry for the man, even though he were a sad dog, and a notorious toper of ale. But the rector thought of the phrase: "Raro antecedentem scelestum deseruit pœna," and cheered up amazingly.

Well, on the strength of the verses about the Eleusinian mysteries, I am to be a journalist, and consequently, as it was thought in those days, I must learn shorthand, so that I may be able to write a hundred and fifty words in a minute. And here again comes a chapter as sad as that which I have written on my arithmetic. I never learnt shorthand effectively, because I was too stupid to learn it. The queer thing is that when I was quite a little boy at school this art of shorthand had a strange and mysterious attraction for me. Why? I am sure I don't know; why did the small boys of my generation love dark lanterns? Robert Louis Stevenson has written an enchanting essay on the fascination of this instrument of the mysteries; but I am not quite sure that even he has penetrated to the heart of the enigma. For I, though a lonely child, knew the joy of the dark lantern, and it was a great and exceeding joy. The glowing of heat that rose from its roof — corrugated, I think? — the rank smell of its oils were charms that somehow carried me over the borders of this common world into an exquisite region of wonder and surmise. And now I come to look back into days horribly distant — the shorthand question must wait for a while — I perceive that there was a perfect ritual, or ceremonial rather, of the Dark Lantern, the origins of which are as obscure to me as are the origins of other primitive mysteries. Of one thing only I am certain, and I speak with all due deference to the author of "The Golden Bough," not forgetting Miss Jane Harrison; the lantern service of my early boyhood had no reference whatever to the young crops or to the sprouting of the corn. As I lit the wick I did not say, "O Sun! shine thou also on the land and make it warm so that there may be many cabbages, so that green peas may not be lacking to the lamb which is equally nurtured by thy beams." Of course, I am quite willing to allow that, as a general rule, an anxiety about the spring crops fully explains the origin of all painting, all sculpture, all architecture, all poetry, all drama, all music, all religion, all romance: I admit that the Holy Gospels are really all about spring cabbage, that martyrdom and mass are spring cabbage, that Arthur is really arator, the ploughman; that Galahad, denoting the achievement and end of the great quest, is Caulahad, the cabbage god. I admit all this because it is so entirely reasonable and satisfactory, and, indeed, self-evident; but though all Frazerdom should rise up against me, I cannot allow that when I lit my dark lantern I was inviting the sun to help the crops.

There was some sort of obscure connection — I seem to remember — between Dark Lanterns and Masks. They were both properties in singular mysteries of a formless character which were enacted in dark shrubberies on dark nights, just before bed-time. It was well understood, I know, that these objects must be kept in secret places, and must not by any means be seen by the uninitiated; and the uninitiated were everybody besides myself. And here, I believe, I was following unconsciously, but most strictly, the rules of all primitive mysteries throughout the world. The Greeks of the historical period had become lax; they carried about the mystic fan of Iacchus in public procession. But amongst the Blackfellows of Australia, where the rites are much nearer to the original purity of their institution, the mystic fan is not seen, only heard. Therefore the Dark Lantern and the Mask were kept hidden in an obscure cranny of the coach-house, which was at the end of an overshadowed drive at some distance from the rectory. They were produced under the cover of the darkness, these sacramental instruments, clouds and stars and the dim boughs of trees and tangled undergrowth alone saw them. There were certain solemn words which accompanied the ostension of the objects, but they were in a language which I have long forgotten. But some day, when the turmoil has died down, when the clouds have cleared for the sunset and the apparition of the evening star, as I sit by a western shore awaiting the boat of Avalon, I shall write my last treatise, under the title of "The Dark Lantern and the Mask," libellus vere mysticus. And here I give notice to all good and lawful men that I am duly seized of the above title, so that they may abstain from intromitting with the same.

This digression of the dark lantern proceeded, naturally enough, from my speaking of shorthand. This art, I said, appealed to me when I was a boy, and its appeal was that of a kind of mystery writing, of a script not in common use. For my acquaintance did not lie in journalistic circles. I knew nobody who could write shorthand or understood anything about it, and so the three books of Pitman— "Teacher," "Manual," and "Reporter" — were three mystery books, so far as my small world was concerned. But now, in later years, having written that famous poem on the initiation of Eleusis, I was to be a journalist, and to be a journalist I must learn shorthand. And then I found Phonography a mystery indeed, and too great a mystery for me, since I could not attain to it. I muddled about with it for three or four years; I actually made some use of it in one of my queer employments, but I never wrote it decently. I was too fumble-fisted; try as I would, I could not form the characters with elegance or accuracy. My p's and b's would wobble and bend till they looked like f's and v's, if I tried to halve a letter I quartered it. A kindly reporter gave me a hint: "Don't bother about the thick and thin lines," he said, "I never do." And no doubt the skilled shorthand writer can play all manner of tricks with the system, but I was not a skilled writer, and I took the reporter's advice and made bad worse. My last shorthand lesson was taken in 1885, long after I had ceased to think of journalism as a profession. Indeed, I cannot now remember why I continued to waste my time over a craft that I could not master; but I suppose I thought the endeavour gave an air of respectability and solidity to my proceedings that they would have lacked without it. From June 1881 to December 1882 I was more or less vaguely bent on the journalist's career. I remember feeling somewhat discouraged during this period by reading an advertisement for a journalistic position in a London paper. The applicant could write shorthand at the rate of one hundred and fifty words a minute, he understood all about reporting, he was an expert at “leaderettes,” and quite willing to take a turn at the case — all for thirty shillings a week. This did not seem promising, but I need not have disturbed myself; my journalistic days were not yet, nor for many years to come. In the meanwhile I read variously and became thoroughly familiar with Boswell’s Johnson (in Mr. Percy Fitzgerald’s edition). And one windy, gusty night, when the costers’ flares in the back streets were burning with a rushing sound, I came upon a secondhand bookshop on the main road between Hammersmith and Turnham Green, and went in and found an odd volume of William Morris’s “Earthly Paradise.” Now followed the old trouble, and in a worse form. As Swinburne’s “Songs Before Sunrise” had first set me versifying, so the “Earthly Paradise” reinforced the original virus. And now I had acquired some slight facility of a worthless sort, and so I began to imitate William Morris, and spent the odd hours of six good months in writing a sham-Greek tale in rhymed couplets; which I tore up thirty years ago. And then I discovered Herrick, and tried to imitate that inimitable writer; but this effort, though vain in itself, was not so wholly vain. For it brought me, as it were, into the seventeenth century, into an age which I have loved ever since with a peculiar devotion. Ten years later I went on pilgrimage to Dean Prior and Dean Churchtown, and in spite of the restored church, trod the lanes under the moor with reverence, since Herrick’s feet had passed by those ways.

But now towards the end of the year 1882, after I had known London, on and off, for nearly two and a half years, all that feeling of its immense gaiety with which I had approached it in the first place was dropping from me. I began to realise, very gradually and by dismal degrees, that the gaieties of London were commodities that had to be bought with money, and that I had none. The theatre had ceased to charm me, and I am very sorry to say that it has never charmed me since; that is from the point of view of the man sitting in the pit. By the end of ‘82 I had quite definitely ceased to be “fond of the play.”

For now London began to assume for me its terrible aspect. It was rather a goblin’s castle than a city of delights; if indeed it had not become a place of punishment wherein I was condemned to hard labour through many dreary and hopeless years.

Chapter V

IN THAT WONDERFUL volume which is called the Grand Saint Graal we are told how the hermit Nasciens received a magic book from paradise. It was divided into portions, and one of these portions was intituled “Here Begin Terrors.” I can find no words that might more fitly introduce the tale of my solitary life in London. I was only twenty; I was poor; I was desolate. And I frizzled all the time (or most of it) on the fire of my own futility; I longed to make literature, and I could only write nonsense.

I was employed for a time in a house of business in a street north of the Strand and parallel to it, which, I suppose, must have been Chandos Street. I know that it was still paved with cobble-stones. My employers were publishers — the firm has for many years ceased to exist — and I was something or other in what is called the “editorial” department. But to the best of my belief publishing books was but a minor part of the energies of the house, and I should think a later growth. The real staple was wholesale stationery; there was an important “line” of copybooks, there was a great deal done with ornamental and decorated albums, and also with pictorial calendars. The Shakespeare calendar of the House is still in existence, or was in existence a year or two ago, and it bears the name of the vanished firm. Mr. (afterwards Sir) Walter Besant had been the “editor” of Messrs. Chandos and Co., but just before I made my first trial of business life he had resigned, and his place was taken by a very kindly literary gentleman, whose name I have forgotten. Afterwards he edited a series, if not several series, of anthologies, and was, I believe, appointed Professor of English Literature at some Indian seminary of learning. I do not know whether he is still alive. Well, it was my business to assist this gentleman. I think I was engaged as his “secretary,” but I was known in the House as his “clurk.” I am trying to recollect what I actually did to assist him.

My first job on the morning of my arrival I can remember. I made a copy of Mr. Gladstone’s Latin version of the well-known hymn, “Rock of Ages”:

"Jesu, pro me perforatus," it began. And then I had to take down in shorthand and afterwards write in longhand a stern letter to somebody who had made a mistake in the name of King Alfred's grandmother. This error had occurred in one of a series of Board School history books that the firm was publishing; and this circumstance alone gave me a loathing and hatred for the whole business, since I thought then, and think still, that the name of King Alfred's grandmother is not of the faintest consequence to any reasonable being. It is the kind of fact which would interest a German deeply; he would spend years of his life to find out all about it; but such is not the occupation of a gentleman.

In the afternoon of that day we became a little livelier. My chief contributed a London letter to some Scottish paper — he came from the northern part of this island — and again my shorthand was required. The London letter was distinctly gay in its tone, it dealt in a cheerful spirit with some early incidents in the career of a certain admirable actress whose talents then engaged and delighted us. As I took it down it struck me as over worldly for the readers of the "Haddaneuk Herald," and sure enough my man reconsidered the matter and struck out the gaieties from the copy. And how did that famous shorthand of mine serve me? Not so vilely, considering all things. I had a quick memory then, and remembered many of the phrases that had been dictated, and I could read quite a lot of the characters that I had formed, and others gave me a vague sort of intimation of the sense; just as the neumes helped the church-singers of the earlier ages; they were quite useful if you knew the tune.

I search my memory for further details of my occupation with Chandos and Co. I think that the Shakespeare Calendar occupied me during odd hours for a week or more. This was January, and I was set to the preparation of the calendar for the next year. It was not a difficult task, and I was furnished with a sort of album, containing the Shakespeare calendars for the past six or seven years, and my only business was to make a new almanack out of these old elements. Thus January 1, 1884, gave the Shakespearean quotation that had been assigned to December 27, 1877; for January 2 I chose a motto that had pertained to February 6, 1882, and so forth. It was easy, but dull. And I was dull, too, or I would have invented Shakespearean lines that Shakespeare never wrote, and trusted to the all but universal ignorance of Shakespeare. I did something like that, when I was an older and a merrier man. I persuaded a friend of mine, a young fellow of literary tastes, that one of the most famous phrases ascribed to Shakespeare was in reality a gag, invented by Mr. F. R. Benson's stage manager. "Do you mean to say," said my friend, "that this Mr. Randle Ayrton invented 'a poor thing, but mine own'?" "Certainly," I replied. "Then," said he, "Ayrton must be a most wonderful man." And I wonder how many of my readers know exactly how the matter stands — without referring to the play?

And then what else did I do for my pound a week in Chandos Street? Chiefly, I think I took down and transcribed a daily report to the head office of the firm, which was in Belfast or Dundee or some such town. I don't remember in the least what it was about, whether it dealt with King Alfred's grandmother's name or with other matters. But I had to write about two quarto pages daily of this report, and put D 1 in the margin. I think D 1 meant Literary Department; but the whole thing was the terror of my life. For it had to be neatly written, with a fair and level margin on each side; and this I could by no means achieve. Again and again my D 1 was condemned as a ragged and untidy performance, and I had to copy it out all over again, as if I had been a careless schoolboy — as, indeed, I was from the firm's point of view.

And I sit in my corner, trying to write a round, clear, clerkly hand, trying to remember that of the two forms of the small "t" one was much to be preferred, trying to observe the rule that "today" must be written as one word, not two, and that for commercial purposes "draft" must be spelt with "f," not with "ugh"; and thinking of the nightingale in the thorn bush by the Soar, in the still valley.

Here I was, then, in Chandos Street, a peg of no particular shape at all in a perfectly round hole, feeling very miserable indeed. We were, I believe, somewhat cramped for room, and I had a desk in the album department. Here three very cheerful and kindly young fellows of about my own age did something with handsome albums. I don't know in the least what they did; so far as I could see they took albums out of tissue paper and put them back into tissue paper all day long. One of them, the senior of the room — he must have been three or four years older than any of us — was just about to make a real start in life. He used to tell me all about it when we were alone together for a minute or two, as sometimes happened. There was a young lady whom he was to marry in a few months' time, and he had made arrangements for setting up as a stationer in Harlesden, and he meant to push Chandos's stuff — albums and everything — and to do well and be happy. "Poor man, and then he died," to quote one of Dr. Johnson's muttered undertones. I do not know how far his short life at Harlesden was successful or felicitous. But as for me, I hated it all. It was not that the work was hard, but that I took no interest in it, and saw no reason why it should be done at all, or why anybody alive should do it. So I looked about me, and through the favour of a friend I got a little teaching of small children at twenty-five shillings a week. Then I gave notice to Messrs. Chandos. They were very kind; they offered me twenty-five shillings a week to stay, but I thanked them and said no. It was the business atmosphere of the place that I detested; I have always agreed with the small boy in "Nicholas Nickleby" who uttered the great maxim, "Never Perform Business." The teaching which followed was certainly not exciting, but I did not mind it. Indeed, having to teach Euclid, I found to my amazement that it was about something, and actually was a coherent and reasoned scheme of things, not a mere madhouse puzzle, as I had always imagined. But then my own geometrical instruction had been limited. It consisted simply in this: Fourteen Euclids were served out to fourteen small boys. The mathematical master then said: "Learn the Definitions, Axioms, and Postulates." That was my first and my last lesson in geometry; though I duly went through the accustomed books of Euclid, trying to learn by heart what was to me mere unmeaning gibberish.

At this time and for the next year and a half I was living in Clarendon Road, Notting Hill Gate — or Holland Park, to give the politer subdirection. I am sorry to say that I had not a garret, since the houses of that quarter, being comparatively modern, do not possess the sloping roofs which have seen the miseries of so many lettered men. Still, my room had its merits. It was, of course, at the top of the house, and it was much smaller than any monastic "cell" that I have ever seen. From recollection I should estimate its dimensions as ten feet by five. It held a bed, a washstand, a small table, and one chair; and so it was very fortunate that I had few visitors. Outside, on the landing, I kept my big wooden box with all my possessions — and these not many — in it. And there was a very notable circumstance about this landing. On the wall was suspended, lengthwise, a step-ladder by which one could climb through a trap door to the roof in case of fire, and so between the rungs or steps of this ladder I disposed my library. For anything

I know, the books tasted as well thus housed as they did at a later period when I kept them in an eighteenth-century bookcase of noble dark mahogany, behind glass doors. There was no fireplace in my room, and I was often very cold. I would sit in my shabby old great-coat, reading or writing, and if I were writing I would every now and then stand up and warm my hands over the gas-jet, to prevent my fingers getting numb. I remember envying a man very much indeed on a certain night in late winter or early spring. It was a very cold night; there was a bitter north-easter blowing, and the wind seemed to pierce right through my old coat and to set my very bones shivering and aching. I had gone abroad, because I was weary of my den, because I was sick with reading and in no humour for writing, because I felt I must have some change, however slight. But it was an evil and a bitter blast, so I turned back after a little while, coming down one of the steep streets that lead from Notting Hill Gate Station to Clarendon Road. And half-way home I came upon a man encamped on the road by the pavement. He was watching over some barrows and tools and other instruments of street repair, and he sat in a sort of canvas wigwam, well sheltered from the wind that was chilling me to the heart. His coat, too, looked thick and heavy, and he had a warm comforter round his neck, and before him was a glowing, ardent brazier of red-hot coals. He held his hands and his nose over the radiant heat, and smoked a black clay pipe; and I think he had a can of beer beside him. I envied that man with all my heart; I don’t think I have ever envied any man so much.

Occasionally I had applications for the loan of a book from my step-ladder library. These came from the lodgers on the ground floor, an Armenian and his wife, who annoyed the landlady by sleeping in cushions piled about the carpet and hanging their blankets in front of the doors and windows. It was the Armenian lady who had literary tastes, and her desire was always for “a story-book.” I never saw her or her husband, but I often heard him calling Mary, the servant. He would stand at the top of the kitchen stairs and shout “Marry! Marry!” and then, reflectively, and after a short interval, “Damn that girl.” He gave a fine, Oriental force to the common English “damn.” Other lodgers that I remember were a young Greek and a chorus girl, mates for a single summer. They occupied the first floor and were succeeded by a family from Ireland. I have a confused notion that there was something a little queer about the head of this household. He was, I think, a major, and I know he was Evangelical. As I went down the stairs I heard him more than once uttering in loud, earnest tones the words, “Let us pray.” This was startling; and one of his daughters would always shut the door of their room with a bang on these occasions, and that was startling, too.

The little table in my little room turned out to be a very useful piece of furniture. I not only read at it and wrote on it, but I used it as a larder. In the corner nearest the angle of the wall by the window I kept my provisions, that is to say, a loaf of bread and a canister of green tea. Morning and evening the landlady or “Marry” would bring me up a tray on which were a plate, a knife, a teapot, a cup and saucer, and a jug of hot water. With the aid of a kettle and a spirit lamp, which came, I think, from under that serviceable table — one may fairly say from the cellar — I made the hot water to boil and brewed a great pot of strong green tea.

In the first months of this life of mine an early dinner was added to the fees of my teaching; later, my pupils changed, and the dinner disappeared. I then used to spend the hour in the middle of the day in wanderings about Turnham Green and the waste places round Gunnersbury, making my meal on a large Captain’s biscuit and a glass of beer. I varied this repast by taking it in various public-houses. In those days there were still pleasing and ancient taverns scattered along those western roads. One I remember in particular, a very old, tumbledown house, set at the edge of the market gardens, which then approached almost to Turnham Green. There was not a straight line about this old, old house, its roof-tree dipped and wavered, and the roof was of mellowed tiles, and one end of the place was quite overwhelmed by a huge billow of ivy. I used to think that highwaymen must have lurked in the little room where I took my biscuit and glass of ale; and the food and drink tasted much better on that account. The old tavern, and its leaning sheds and ragged outbuildings, its red roof and its green ivy; all are gone long ago. There is a row of raw houses where it stood, and I hate them. Sometimes I did not have any beer, either because I did not want any, or because it struck me as too great a luxury. Then I would buy a small bag of currant biscuits and take them to the region of the market gardens and devour them, sitting on a gate or sheltering behind a hedge. I don’t know how it is, but these feasts are always connected in my mind with a grey and gloomy sky and a very cold wind, so that I shiver when I think of flat, square biscuits in which currants are embedded. But I have a reverence for them, too. There were, I confess, days of gross debauch. Once a week, or once a fortnight at the least, I went to a goodly and spacious and ancient tavern on the high road, and had a grilled chop, potatoes, bread, and beer; which came to one and a penny or one and twopence. Les Cotelettes de Mouton, Sauce Bénie the dish is called by the experts of the haute cuisine. I can recommend it. And in the evenings I sometimes exceeded, though not so violently. I would, nine evenings out of ten, buy my provision of bread at a shop at the bottom of the long main road, opposite or nearly opposite to Uxbridge Road Station. The shop kept a very choice kind of gingerbread, and I would buy a couple of bricks of this gingerbread, and munch them with a high relish as a supplement to the common bread.

As the spring of 1883 advanced, and the weather improved and the evenings lengthened, I began the habit of rambling abroad in the hope of finding something that could be called country. I would sometimes pursue Clarendon Road northward and get into all sorts of regions of which I never had any clear notion. They are obscure to me now, and a sort of nightmare. I see myself getting terribly entangled with a canal which seemed to cross my path in a manner contrary to the laws of reason. I turn a corner and am confronted with an awful cemetery, a terrible city of white gravestones and shattered marble pillars and granite urns, and every sort of horrid heathenry. This, I suppose, must have been Kensal Green: it added new terror to death. I think I came upon Kensal Green again and again; it was like the Malay, an enemy for months. I would break off by way of Portobello Road and entangle myself in Notting Hill, and presently I would come upon the goblin city; I might wander into the Harrow Road, but at last the ghost-stones would appal me. Maida Vale was treacherous, Paddington false — inevitably, it seemed, my path led me to the detested habitation of the dead.

Be it remembered that my horror at the sight of Kensal Green Cemetery was due to this, that, odd as it may seem to townsfolk, I had never seen a cemetery before. Well I knew the old graveyards of Gwent, solemn amongst the swelling hills, peaceful in the shadow of very ancient yews. I knew well these garths. There was Henllis, high up on the mountain side, in the place of roaring winds, under the faery dome of Twyn Barlwm. I had lingered there of autumn evenings while the sun set red over the mountains, and a drift of rain came with the gathering darkness, as the yew boughs beat upon the east window of the church. There were graves there with flourished inscriptions, deeply cut, and queer Welsh rhymes — dyma gareg dêg: —

Here’s a rare stone — of death.
Beneath it lies
A rarer dust, that shall arise
By heavenly breath alone; and climb the skies —
We trust.

I knew the churchyard of Llanddewi, looking down the steep hillside into the chanting valley of the Soar, and Kemeys, between the Forest and the Usk, and Partrishw, in the heart of the wild mountains beyond Abergavenny. These places of the dead were solemn with old religion, and the tones of Dirige and De Profundis and Requiem Æternam sang still about them on their hills; but this white ghostly city of corruption — there was nothing but horror in it! Still, I see myself on these wanderings, beating to and fro in the stony wilderness, entangled, as I say, in the endless mazes of unknown streets. Now I would succeed in breaking away. I would pass that sad zone of destruction and disgrace that always lies just beyond the furthest points of the suburb. These are the places where the hedges are half ruined, half remaining, where the little winding brook is defiled, but not yet a drain, where one tree lies felled and withered, while its fellow is still all green. Here curbstones impinge on the fields, and show where new, rabid streets are to rush up the sweet hillside and capture it; here the well under the thorn is choked with a cartload of cheap bricks lately deposited. I would pass over these dismal regions and come, as I thought, into the fair open country, and then suddenly at the turn of the lane I would be confronted by red ranks of brand-new villas: this might be Harlesden or the outposts of Willesden.

I think that on the especial occasion that I have in mind the red row of houses must have been some portion or fragment of Harlesden. I remember that, like the cemetery, this impressed me as a wholly new and unforeseen horror, something as strange and terrible as the apparition of a rattlesnake or a boa-constrictor might be to an English child, wandering a little away into the orchard or the wood near the house. I had never lived in a world that might have prepared me for such things; in Gwent — in my day, at all events — there was no such phenomenon as this sudden and violent irruption of red brick in the midst of a green field; and thus when I came round the corner of a peaceful lane and saw in the midst of elms and meadows this staring spectacle, I was as aghast as Robinson Crusoe when he saw the track of the foot on the sand of his desert island.

… And here I would make a parenthesis, and say that so long as my writing habits had any concern with the imagination I never departed from the one formula. This not consciously; in fact, I have a secret doctrine to the effect that in literature no imaginative effects are achieved by logical predetermination. I have told, I think, how I was confronted suddenly and for the first time with the awe and solemnity and mystery of the valley of the Usk, and of the house called Bartholly hanging solitary between the deep forest and the winding esses of the river. This spectacle remained in my heart for years, and at last I transliterated it, clumsily enough, in the story of "The Great God Pan," which, as a friendly critic once said, "does at least make one believe in the devil, if it does nothing else." Here, of course, was my real failure; I translated awe, at worst awfulness, into evil; again, I say, one dreams in fire and works in clay. But, at all events, my method never altered. More legitimately than in the instance of "The Great God Pan" I made the horrid apparition of the crude new houses in the midst of green pastures the seed of my tale, "The Inmost Light," which was originally bound up with "The Great God Pan." And so the man in my story, resting in green fields, looked up and saw a face that chilled his blood gazing at him from the back of one of those red houses that once had frightened me, when I was a sorry lad of twenty, wandering about the verges of London. The doctor of my tale lived in Harlesden.

And if I may pursue this subject farther I would suggest that the whole matter of imaginative literature depends upon this faculty of seeing the universe, from the æonian pebble of the wayside to the raw suburban street as something new, unheard of, marvellous, finally, miraculous. The good people — amongst whom I naturally class myself — feel that everything is miraculous; they are continually amazed at the strangeness of the proportion of all things. The bad people, or scientists as they are sometimes called, maintain that nothing is properly an object of awe or wonder since everything can be explained. They are duly punished.

If we go more deeply into this text of Horror and Harlesden, it will become apparent, I think, that what is called genius is not only of many varying degrees of intensity, but also very distinctly of two parts or functions. There is the passive side of genius, that faculty which is amazed by the strange, mysterious, admirable spectacle of the world, which is enchanted and rapt out of our common airs by hints and omens of an adorable beauty everywhere latent beneath the veil of appearance. Now I think that every man or almost every man is born with the potentiality at all events of this function of genius. Os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque tueri: man, as distinct from the other animals, carries his head on high so that he may look upon the heavens; and I think that we may say that this sentence has an interior as well as an exterior meaning. The beasts look downward, to the earth, not only in the letter but in the spirit; they are creatures of material sensation, living by far the greatest part of their lives in a world of hot and cold, hunger and thirst and satisfaction. Man, on the other hand, is by his nature designed to look upward, to gaze into the heavens that are all about him, to discern the eternal in things temporal. Or, as the Priestess of the Holy Bottle defines and distinguishes: the beasts are made to drink water, but men to drink wine. This, the receptive or passive part of genius, is, I say, given to every human being, at least potentially. We receive, each one of us, the magic bean, and if we will plant it it will undoubtedly grow and become our ladder to the stars and the cloud castles. Unfortunately the modern process, so oddly named civilisation, is as killing to this kind of gardening as the canker to the rose; and thus it is that if I want a really nice chair, I must either buy a chair that is from a hundred to a hundred and fifty years old, or else a careful copy or replica of such a chair. It may appear strange to Tottenham Court Road and the modern furniture trade; but it is none the less true that you cannot design so much as a nice arm-chair unless you have gone a little way at all events up the magic beanstalk.

Still, many of us have our portion of the passive or perceptive faculty of genius; we are moved by the wonder of the world; we know ourselves as citizens of an incredible city, we catch stray glimpses of faery Atlantis, drowned beneath the ocean of sense. But it is one thing to dream dreams; and quite another to interpret them, and in this active faculty of interpretation, or translation of the heavenly tongues into earthly speech, there are infinite degrees of excellence. And the masters in this craft of interpretation are few indeed. And the final conclusion — a sad one for me — is that if I could have “translated” the Horror of Harlesden competently I should have been a man of genius.

Still, I see myself all through that year 1883 tramping, loafing, strolling along interminable streets and roads lying to the north-west and the west of London, a shabby, sorry figure; and always alone. I remember walking to Hendon and back — this must have been on a whole holiday — and to this day I can’t think how I found my way there, through what clues I struck from the north parts of Clarendon Road into the Harrow Road, and how I knew when to leave the Edgware Road and bend to the right. Anyhow, I got there and back, tired enough and glad of the half-loaf of bread that awaited me.

Then I became learned in Wormwood Scrubs and its possibilities. It was and is a very barren and bleak place itself, but in those days there was an attractive corner on the Acton side of the waste, that I was fond of contemplating. This was a sort of huddle of old cottages and barns and outhouses with a fringe of elms about them. It did my eyes good then as now to look on something that was old and worn with use and mellow; my eyes that were bleared and aching with the rawness and newness of multitudinous London. To me an old cottage, with its little latticed porch and its tangled garden patch, was veritable balm; I would gaze on such a place with refreshment and delight, as desert travellers must gaze on the cold pools and green leafage of an unexpected oasis. I used to light on these little, humble, pleasant retreats in my walks — there were many more of such cottages in the outskirts of London then than now — and make impossible plans for migrating from the urbanity of Clarendon Road into one of these hidden places, where there would be a garden for me to walk in, and perhaps a summer-house overgrown with white roses, and a little low room with oldish furniture. But I found no such place, and still went prowling in a kind of torment of the spirit by the highways and by-ways of the west. Acton used to do me good; it was then more like a country town than a modern suburb. On the right hand, as you came up from the Uxbridge Road under the railway bridge, there were then some grave and dignified houses of the early Georgian period, with broad lawns before them and big gardens behind them. On the left was the Priory, with spacious and park-like grounds and many greeny elms. Legends about the first Lord Lytton hung about the Priory, and it was whispered that the old lady who kept the lodge-gate had in her day written daring poetry, of the erotic kind. There are laundries and rows and rows of little houses now where the Priory stood; the Georgian houses on the other side of the road have all been pulled down. But I have a notion that the last time I went that way I saw a second-hand bookshop on the London side of the railway bridge, where in ‘83 I bought an old, odd volume of Cowley’s poems.

The second-hand bookshop, which includes the bookstall, is one of the many things that I have dabbled in; but I have never been sworn to the hunt over the old shelves as to a devouring passion. I lack the great incentive: the love of rare books on account of their rarity. I have a great respect for the collector of such things, and I often envy him his sudden joys of discovery; it must be like finding a golden treasure in a rubbish heap; but I could never follow his example. Still, I often used to amuse myself by grubbing about the dusty shelves for an odd hour or two, turning over vast masses of insignificance — of insignificance for me, at all events — conning titles, diving into prefaces, glancing doubtfully over strange pages, wondering whether this or that or the other would bring me the best entertainment for the few shillings that I had to spend. In these new days the young man with a thirst for literature has his labours simplified; the classics of the world are ready for him, nicely printed, in a handy form, and at a low price. He has simply to go into a shop, put down his shilling, and get his book, and it is all over. This would never have done for me. When I bought a book I required and obtained a long drawn-out, deliberated pleasure; I considered that the possession of three-and-sixpence or five shillings entitled me to a whole afternoon’s rich enjoyment. Just as ladies of the suburbs make arrangements — as I understand — to come up to town and do a little shopping, and have a delicate cress-sandwich or two in Regent Street, and then go to a matinée at the theatre, and have creamy cakes for tea before they start back for the red villas: so did I use to travel from Notting Hill Gate to Charing Cross, and stroll up Villiers Street, and walk along the Strand, relishing its savours, which never grew stale to me. For I do believe that the old Strand, before they destroyed it with their porphyries and their marbles and Babylonian fooleries and façades of all sorts, was the very finest street in all the world. I know quite well its manifest and manifold weaknesses and faults, if it were to be regarded from the point of view of a classical town-architect. There was no plan, no design about it, no uniformity; its houses were of all shapes, sizes, periods, and heights; it had no more been designed than a wild hedgerow has been designed. And there, exactly, was its infinite and subtle and curious charm. Nothing could be more urban or urbane than the Strand; and yet it had grown, as the green brake grows, as the cathedrals and the country houses of England grew from age to age, gathering beauty as they increased. The Strand was an altogether English street, and it was the very heart of London. In it, or beside it, were the theatres and the bookshops and the cookshops; to north and south odd passages and stairs and archways admitted the curious into the oddest places and quarters. You were weary of the traffic and the pattering feet? Then you could turn into New Inn or Clement's Inn and enjoy deep silence. You wanted to see the old hugger-mugger of the London back streets, dark taverns of the eighteenth century, where men had lain hidden from the hangman? Here was Clare Market for you. You had heard that "Elzevirs" were very rare and curious books, and would like to see an Elzevir? You would lose your opinion of their rarity, for you would see as many Elzevirs as any man could desire in Holywell Street, where I believe they were to be bought by the sack, as if they had been coals. And Elzevirs apart; the naughty prints and books of Holywell Street were as good as a play. For I believe that the Row had turned naughty somewhere in the early 'fifties; it had then got in its stocks — and had kept them. Here were the works of G. M. W. Reynolds in large volumes; "Mysteries of the Court of St. James," and such weariness. Here was the faded coloured engraving of a young female of extreme gaiety — with ringlets, and the appearance of the chambermaid in the once-famous print, "Sherry, sir." And with all the curiosity, and variety, and oddity and richness of the Strand, it had the while a manner of snug homeliness and cosiness and comfort about it which was quite inimitable. To be in the Strand was like drinking punch and reading Dickens. One felt it was such a warmhearted, hospitable street, if one only had a little money. Unfortunately, I was never on dining terms, as it were, with the Strand; but I always felt that if it only knew me it would have called me "old boy" and given me its choicest saddles of mutton and its oldest port, and I felt grateful. Somehow I always warmed my hands when I got into the Strand … and they were often chilly enough.

Such, then, was my preparation for a book-foray in the heart of London, this relished, leisurely, savoury walk along the Strand; and then I might dive into Clare Market by Clement's Inn and look for mystery books in a certain shop that I knew there. I bought one of the most curious — I do not say the best — books in the world, Vaughan's "Lumen de Lumine" in a shop in Clare Market, and still I should be much obliged if someone would tell me what "Lumen de Lumine" is about. Or I might try Denny's, at the western end of Booksellers' Row, or like enough go grovelling round the shelves of Reeves and Turner, who were then in the southern bend of the Strand, opposite to St. Clement Dane's Church.

One dull afternoon, I remember, I ran to earth in this shop on a lower shelf a dim, brown elderly-looking book in cloth covers called "Ferrier's Institutes of Metaphysic." It repaid me many times over for the couple of shillings that I gave for it. I took Ferrier home in delight to the little room in Clarendon Road, and made a great deal of green tea, and found the dry bread of quite admirable flavour, and smoked pipes and read the new book far into the night. Before I went to bed Ferrier had quite convinced me of the truth of the proposition — which looked odd at first — that we can only be ignorant of that which we can know. This means, of course, that no man can be ignorant of the existence of four-sided triangles; which is evident enough. But as I fell asleep, I felt I had had a tremendous day.

I look back upon myself in that little room in Clarendon Road with some amazement. I come in from one of my long, prowling walks — I may have been to Hounslow to look for the Heath, or I may have been to Hampton Court — and make my meal of bread and tea, and then settle down to tobacco and literature. I find that my landlady turns off the gas at the meter at midnight, so I provide myself with carriage candles, which I fix up somehow on the table. I read on night after night. It may be Homer's "Odyssey," or it may be "Don Quixote" — to which I have been faithful ever since I found the book in the drawing-room of Llanfrechfa Rectory — it may be that singular magazine of oddities, Disraeli's "Curiosities of Literature," it may be Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy"; a great refuge, this last, a world of literature in itself. Or I am reading Pepys for the first time, with ravishment, or Pomponius Mela "De Situ Orbis" in a noble Stephanus quarto, or Harris's "Hermes," or Hargrave Jennings on the Rosicrucians; this last one of the craziest and most entertaining of books, which had a little later an odd influence on my fortunes. It was a sad blow to me to find out afterwards, chiefly through the medium of A. E. Waite's "Real History of the Rosicrucians," that, as a cold matter of fact, there were no Rosicrucians. A Lutheran pastor who had read Paracelsus, wrote, early in the seventeenth century, a pamphlet describing a secret order which had no existence outside of his brain. Naturally enough, societies arose which imitated, so far as they could, the imaginary organisation described by the fantastic Johannes Valentinus Andrea; I should not be surprised, indeed, to be told that such societies are now in being in modern London; but these orders are late "fakes"; the 'seventies and 'eighties of the last century saw their beginnings. There are no Rosicrucians — and there never were any.

Or I am reading Carlyle— "Sartor Resartus" or the Johnson and Burns and Walter Scott Essays — and I must say that I think a good many young men of this age would be all the better for a Carlyle course. For though Carlyle was not the prophet of full inspiration that the time just before my own imagined, though he exalted brute force into a place that belongs to the Divine Wisdom, though his original Calvinism hung like a dark and obscuring cloud over all his life, yet I know not any man of these days that is worthy to dust Carlyle's hat or to clean his pipe for him.

There is a passage in the Johnson essay telling how the poor, agonised, heroic doctor made for himself a boat of the transient driftwood and enduring iron, and sailed down Fleet Ditch, "the roaring mother of dead dogs," to the City that hath foundations; the phrases ring still in my heart, noble music; worthier stuff than the prophecies of to-day — or should I say of yesterday? These, so far as I can make out, bid us abstain from meat and beer and tobacco, and the State shall give us a pound a day and save our souls alive. This message does not ring in my heart a noble music; I think Carlyle would have called it "a damned potato gospel." I read Carlyle, then, in my little room, and find a strange encouragement and strength in him. His picture of life is of a bitter struggle, and so indeed I find it — at twenty. Man, in Carlyle, is a poor wretch in thin and ragged clothes, out on a blasted heath, with all the heavens and all the clouds crashing and pouring upon him; blackness over him, hailstorms and fire showers his portion in the world. Get into whatever kennel or doghole you can find, says Carlyle, and shelter yourself from the blast so long as you can keep it, and be thankful. I liked the doctrine then, and it still seems to me a very good philosophy.

So I read and meditated night after night, and I am amazed at the utter loneliness of it all, when I contrast this life of mine with the beginnings of other men of letters. These others have often gathered friends of all sorts, both useful and pleasant, at the University; they have come of well-known stocks, every step they take is eased for them, their way is pointed out, there are hands to help them over the rough and difficult places. Or, even if they have not been at Oxford or Cambridge, if they have not come of "kent folk," they know, somehow or other, young fellows of their own age, with whom they can engage in endless talk about letters over eternal pipes and ever-welling tankards. One informs another, one, consciously or unconsciously, charts the other's way for him. I am often made quite envious when I see and hear how a young man, fresh on the town, drops so easily, so pleasantly, so delightfully into a quite distinguished place in literature before he is twenty-five. He enters the world of letters as a perfectly well-bred man enters a room full of a great and distinguished company, knowing exactly what to say, and how to say it; everyone is charmed to see him; he is at home at once; and almost a classic in a year or two.

And I, all alone in my little room, friendless, desolate; conscious to my very heart of my stuttering awkwardness whenever I thought of attempting the great speech of literature; wandering, bewildered, in the world of imagination, not knowing whither I went, feeling my way like a blind man, stumbling like a blind man, like a blind man striking my head against the wall, for me no help, no friends, no counsel, no comfort.

Somehow or other, out of a welter of reading of the most miscellaneous and shapeless sort, out of long walks and long meditations, out of moonings and loafings by Brentford and the parts thereto adjacent, there rose up in the spring of 1883 the beginnings of something that had a vague resemblance to a book. I had finished that miserable "poem" which attempted the manner of William Morris, and from that time my attacks of verse-writing became brief and trifling, causing no uneasiness. And, this trouble happily over, I became immersed in the study of scholastic logic, and gave many days and nights to Whately's "Elements." I got Thomson also, and dallied with the quantification of the predicate, but I found such devices too new-fangled; what I wanted was the logic of the mediæval schools, and in this I took a singular and intense delight.

And here is a paradox, which may be worthy the consideration of the curious: that age which was above all the age of logic, was also the age of the most luxuriant and splendid imagination. The scholars and thinkers of the Middle Ages have been reproached with idolising the logical process to a point of utter extravagance, with treating the syllogism as a sort of divining rod by which all the treasures of the spiritual, intellectual, and physical worlds could be discovered and drawn up from the dark womb and chaos of things into the light of the sun. These reproaches, I think, have chiefly proceeded from people to whom exact thinking has proved unpleasant and unprofitable; but it is certainly true that the logical art was deeply and profoundly and constantly studied in the thirteenth century — which was the age of the marvellous imagery, the great magistry of the Gothic cathedrals, of the Arthurian romances, of Dante. Nay, it is interesting to note that Coleridge and De Quincey, two main agents of the "renascence of wonder" at the beginning of the nineteenth century, were both practised logicians. It would seem, therefore, that the dream and the syllogism have between them a certain secret alliance and bond, and so, naturally enough, two of the most extravagant dreams, "Alice in Wonderland," and "Alice Through the Looking-Glass," were the visions of a master of logic. As for the Snark, I can inform the inquisitive as to his true abode. He dwells in the place that is called Bocardo.

And so I steeped myself in these rare and entrancing studies, for such they seemed, and still seem to me. And thus I would sit on a bench on that bald, arid, detestable Shepherd's Bush Green, and be in reality, though not in actuality — let us for the moment adapt our discourse to the matter, and make the distinction — in cool, grey cloisters of the Middle Ages, walking in the silvery light with the Master of the Sentences, with the Angelic Doctor, listening to the high, interminable argument of the Schools. High, indeed, as dealing with immortal essences, not with monkeys' guts; interminable also in the manner of the cathedral rushing upwards to the stars which it cannot attain, of the old modes in which there are no true closes, but rather hints of undying melodies far beyond their endings; interminable, according to the dictum of one of these dark-robed Masters; omnia exeunt in mysterium. For there is a quest to which there is no term, nor bound, nor limit: pelagus vastissimum. Meditating these things, the jangling of the old horse trams might disturb me, and I would carry my quiddities to green fields by Hanger Hill, or to solitary places in Osterley Park, beyond Brentford, and so muse till the shadows came and sent me homeward under the twinkling, wavering lamps of those far-off days. Then for much tobacco, the disjunctive hypothetical syllogism and the strict rigour of the game. I am afraid very little of the old science has remained with me, but now and then I come with some amusement on distinguished personages engaged in what they suppose is argument. I see no arguments; but undistributed middle terms are thick as October leaves in Wentwood.

From such a soil, then, the thing that had certain resemblances to a book rose up and gradually took shape, so far as it ever had any shape. It came up out of my logic books and out of Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," and so it was called "The Anatomy of Tankards." For, having enough sense, even though I was only twenty, to know that I could not write a serious treatise concerning the high doctrines that entranced me, I wrote a grave burlesque of what I loved. I examined into the essence of the tankard, I sought deeply into its quiddity, I divided its properties from its accidents, and distinguished again between the separable and inseparable accidents. I showed philosophically and conclusively that if there were no tankards there would be no men, that is, no rational or civilised men. For the ancient Greeks truly taught that man was raised from the brutish to the spiritual state by Bacchus, the giver of the vine. By wine is man made divine; and a diviner, says Bacbuc: and since wine must be contained before it can be drunk, it is clear that without tankards man cannot become divine; that is, cannot be man at all, in the proper sense of the term. And so on, and so on, with an infinite deal of easy dictionary learning, with much twisting of my logic formulæ; it was all too elaborate, elephantine, prolonged; a little thing that might have been well enough in its way drawn out into a big thing, and so spoiled. Still, I was only twenty, and twenty is apt to worry its bone long after all the meat has disappeared.

But if I could only have written the real book — that is, the dreamed, intended book — and not the actual book! Then, I promise you, you should have had high fantasies; not only arguments that began with a pebble by the way and rose upward to the evening star, that deduced all the shining worlds in an ineffable sorites from one mere letter of the alphabet. You should not only have been in at the death when Achilles caught at last the tortoise and passed him by, spurning his body into that utter void where parallel straight lines meet; you should have had an English Rabelais.

I remember taking my thoughts of the book up to Ealing Common one autumn evening. The work was drawing to a close, and I stood meditating the matter, looking from the height down towards Brentford. There was a wild sunset, scarlet and green and gold, and as it were, gardens of Persian roses, far in the evening sky. I stood by an old twisted oak, and thought of my book as I would have made it, and sighed, and so went home and made it as I could.

Chapter VI

THE KIND OF life that I have been trying to indicate lasted for about eighteen months, and then my pupils mysteriously disappeared. Mysteriously, I say, for I have completely forgotten what became of them, and by what ways they left me. At all events, they vanished, and I, being destitute, returned to Gwent and my old home. There they were almost as poor as poverty, but they were glad to see me. And I, waking in the morning to the brave breath from the mountain, wandering in the sunshine — it was summer-time — about the gardens and the orchards, revisiting the green, delicious heart of the twisted brake, listening once more to the water bubbling from the rock; I thought I had been translated from hell to paradise.

For, be it remembered, I have dealt gently with the days of Clarendon Road. I have spoken for the most part of the happier hours, of eager reading, of finding an enchanting book on dusty shelves, on the delights of the mind, on the capacity of changing dreary, common Shepherd's Bush into the cloistered walks of the Schools, on the joy of obtaining some kind of literary utterance. I have said little of the black days and the waste nights, of the desolation that would sometimes engulf me as it were with a deep flood. For many weeks at a time I never spoke to any human being; save to my pupils on Euclid and Cæsar, and this was a speech that was no speech. And being born, I believe, with at least the usual instincts of human fellowship and a great love of all genial interchanges of thought and opinion, this silence seared my spirit; to the interior sense I must have shown as something burnt and blasted with ice-winds and fires. Indeed, when I was released from this life in the manner that I have described, I came out, as it were, a prisoner from the black pit of his dungeon, all confused, trembling, and afraid, scarce able to bear the light of genial affection. For a long while I spoke but little, and then with difficulty; I was fast losing the habit of speech. Indeed, the eighteen months in Clarendon Road had been a very grave experience; but I think that what affected my relations most in my demeanour was this: for a long time I would cut myself a piece of dry bread at tea, and munch it mechanically, having forgotten all about the use of butter. This struck them as dreadful; one might be poor, but to eat dry bread was more than poverty; it was beggary. When my aunt first noticed this trick of mine, she pushed the butter dish towards me, saying in a disturbed voice that there was no need for that any more.

And for many days I was in a sort of swoon of delight. I had no desire for activities of any kind; I had all the happy languor of the convalescent about me. It was bliss to stroll gently in that delicious air, to watch the mists vanishing from the mountain-side in the morning, to see again the old white farms beneath Twyn Barlwm and Mynydd Maen gleaming in the sunlight, to lie in deep green shade and to feel that I was at home again; that my troubles were over. I did not fret myself by inquiring as to whether they would not begin again. Indeed, in this first passion of relief, I loved to imagine myself as dwelling for the rest of my days amidst friendly faces in a friendly land, and devoting, say, fifty years to healing the wounds of eighteen months. It is a sorry thing to be but twenty-one and to feel so.

But it is thus, I suppose, that the man of the imaginative cast of mind pays, and pays heavily, for whatever qualities he may possess, and it will always be a question whether the price exacted be not too dear and beyond all proportion to the value received. But the case, I apprehend, is this: Mr. Masefield has said, very finely, that literature is the art of presenting the world as it were in excess. To the lovers in Mr. Stephen Phillips's drama of "Paolo and Francesca" the earth appears a greener green, the heavens a bluer blue; all beautiful things are raised to a higher power by the fire of their passion; the whole world is alchemised. And this state, which is a result of love, is the condition of imaginative work in literature, and so the man who is to make romances sees everything and feels everything acutely, or, as Mr. Masefield says, excessively. Now there would be nothing amiss in this state of things if these exalted and intensified perceptions could be utilised when there was a question of making a book and then abrogated and laid aside with pen and ink and paper. Unluckily, however, this cannot be so managed; and too often the dealer in dreams finds that his magic magnifying glass is tight fixed to his eyes and cannot be moved. And thus a mere common bore or nuisance appears to him as dreadful as Nero or Heliogabalus, the possibility of missing a train is as tragical as "Hamlet," and the pettiest griefs swell into the hugest sorrows.

I, in truth, had suffered; I had been through a dreary and a dismal experience enough; but my pains had racked me to excess; the pinpricks, unpleasant in plain earnest, had become stabs of a poisoned dagger. And so I came back to Gwent as to Avalon; there to heal me of my grievous wounds. So, as I say, it was mercifully given to me to saunter under the apple trees in July and August weather, to watch the sun and the wind on the quivering woods, to wander alone, and yet how deeply consoled and medicined, by the winding Soar Valley. Now and again I recollected, as I hope we shall recollect earthly torments in Paradise, as things over and paid for, the interminable, cruel labyrinths of London. I saw myself again, a half-starved, unhappy, desolate wretch astray in those intolerable, friendless, stony mazes of Notting Hill and Paddington and Harrow Road; I came again by obscene, obscure paths to Kensal Green, the place of the whited sepulchres. Or the hideous raw row of suburban houses would suddenly confront me, surging up, a foul growth, from the green meadow, or the sick reek of the brickfields by Acton Vale blew in my nostrils. And the grim little room and solitude for the end of every journey!

I recollected these things, but though only days or weeks had been interposed between my happy state and my endurance of them they were as torments suffered in some remote æon. I said to myself, “I am as they that rest at last,” and almost heard the words In Convertendo: with whatso in that psalm is after written.

Among the books that I kept in my step-ladder library in Clarendon Road I mentioned that queer piece of sham learning and entertaining extravagance “The Rosicrucians: Their Rites and Mysteries,” by Hargrave (or Hargreave?) Jennings. I said that this odd volume had eventually a curious influence on my life; and this was as follows: I was reading Herodotus and that portion of Herodotus which treats of Egypt — I have long ago forgotten the Muse which names the book — and Herodotus, it will be remembered, was very deeply interested in the Mysteries of the Egyptian religion. In treating of these occult things of Osiris the historian mentions certain singular matters which were highly pertinent to Mr. Jennings’s thesis — if Mr. Jennings could be said to have had anything so definite as a thesis. But “The Rosicrucians” contained no mention of that which Herodotus had seen when night was on the Nile, so I ventured to write to the ingenious author, pointing out the particular passage which, I thought, would interest him. Mr. Jennings did not answer my letter; he was odd to extremity in most things, but in this particular he conformed perfectly to all the literary men whom I encountered in my early days. I came into contact with four or five men of a certain reputation; or perhaps I should say I came within sight of them; and they could very easily have flung me a word or two of encouragement, which would have been very precious to me then. But I never had that word, and so was forced to go on and do my best without it; the better way, no doubt, but a hard way. But though the author of "The Rosicrucians" did not reply to my letter, he passed my name and address to another man, a young fellow who had just set up as a publisher, and was going to issue one of the astounding Jennings books. So Davenport, the publisher, sent me his catalogue of new and second-hand books, and I, on reading it, sent him the manuscript of my "Anatomy of Tankards."

Here a parenthesis, if not several parentheses. We are now in 1884, and I had finished the "Anatomy" in the autumn of 1883. Soon after it was ended I sent the MS. to a gentleman who was then but in a small way. He is now a very eminent publisher indeed, and loved so much by his authors — by some of them at all events — as to be known as "Uncle." Well, "Uncle" (though, alas! it was not fated that he should ever be uncle-in-letters of mine) sent back the MS. in due season with a letter that almost made up for any disappointment my first "boomerang" may have occasioned.

His letter delighted me, not because it was specially complimentary, nor because it gave evidence of a careful and critical reading of the rejected manuscript, but because it was almost a replica of the publisher's letter which introduces Mr. Tobias Smollett's admirable epistolary romance, "Humphry Clinker." My actual publisher so resembled Smollett's feigned bookseller in the manner of his letter that I should suppose the one had deliberately made the other his model, did I not know "Uncle" to be far too good a man to read such a book as "Humphry Clinker." I have not got my Smollett by me, I am sorry to say, so I cannot quote, but I may mention that both publishers made a very liberal use of the dash, or mark of parenthesis, and were curious in avoiding the word "I."

My letter ran somewhat as follows: —

"Dear Sir,

“Referring to your favour of the 17th ult., enclosing MS. of work, ‘Anatomy of Tankards’ — have read MS. with interest — fear it would hardly command large sale — have had little encouragement to speculate lately — would recommend topic of more general public interest — hoping to have pleasure of hearing from you on some future occasion.

“Etc. etc.”

I was delighted, only a few years ago, to find that “Uncle’s” hand has not lost its epistolary cunning. A distinguished friend of mine had been good enough of his own motion — not with my knowledge — to write to this publisher suggesting that a book by me would ornament his catalogue. The publisher approached me by letter. I wrote to him briefly, saying that I was just finishing a romance. He wrote back: “Sorry you speak of a romance — fear there is very little sale for those old things — however,” etc. etc.

I did not trouble to go into whatever might lie beyond the portals of “however.” But note the phrase, “those old things.” It seems to me more precious than gold that has passed the furnace.

But to return from this backwater of narrative; I found Mr. Davenport established in an old street in the quarter of Covent Garden. I got to know this street well afterwards, and to like it, too, for all its associations and circumstances. Over the way, opposite to Davenport’s offices, was the house where they said De Quincey had written his great book; there were theatrical shops all tinsel and wigs and grease paints close at hand, and on market days the street was all apack with carts and waggons and clamorous with marketmen who are still a rough and primitive and jovial race. Indeed, the market overflowed into York Street and submerged it, and I have had to leap over an undergrowth of green, springing ferns established on the office steps. Mr. Davenport had written me a very agreeable letter, and we had a very agreeable interview. The book on his publication-list which had attracted my attention was called “Tavern Talk and Maltworms’ Gossip,” and an admirable little anthology it was, compiled (as I found out afterwards) by Davenport himself. I thought there was a certain congruity between this book and my “Anatomy of Tankards,” hence the despatch of the manuscript to York Street. The publisher liked my book very much. He wanted to publish it badly; but there were certain preliminaries to be adjusted before this could be done, and I did not see how the obstacle could be surmounted. This conference took place at that singular hour of my career when my pupils seemed to melt away from me, as though they had been morning dew. I was just bound for the country, and the publisher agreed to hold the little matter of which I have spoken in suspense.

So I went westward, and there in Gwent there were kind people who had known my father all his days, and my grandfather before him, and so, for the sake of "the family," they helped me to arrange those "preliminaries." And, after all, perhaps it is fair enough that a man should pay his footing when he enters the craft.

So here was another element or elixir in the potion of my bliss, that I was drinking among those dearly-beloved hills and woods of Gwent. The bad old days were all over, and my torments were past; Clarendon Road and all its sad concatenations were like a black wrack of cloud seen far down on the horizon, as the sun rises splendid on a bright and happy day. I was come to the territory of Caerleon-on-Usk which was Avalon; and every herb of the fields and all the leaves of the wood, and the waters of all wells and streams were appointed for my healing. And my book was going to be published; I was to see myself in print, between covers — vegetable vellum they turned out to be — and I should be reviewed in London newspapers; and, not a doubt of it, be happy ever after.

Mr. Pecksniff, it will be remembered, spoke of the melancholy sweetness of youthful hopes. "I remember thinking once myself, in the days of my childhood, that pickled onions grew on trees, and that every elephant was born with an impregnable castle on his back. I have not found the fact to be so; far from it." Nor have I found "the fact" to be so. Still, these visions of fair print and title-pages and reviews are very pleasant in the green of youth, and they helped to make that summer of 1884 delightful for me. I "worked in" the thought of the coming proof-sheets — even the anticipation of a proof-sheet is almost too much joy at twenty-one — into my escape from hard bondage, into the summer sunlight, into the odours of the solemn woods at night, into the cool breath of the brook, into the twilight fires of the sky above Twyn Barlwm. They were brave days while they lasted.

And now and again I had gallant tramps over the country with my old friend Bill Rowlands. I saw Bill a couple of years ago, after an interval of a quarter of a century, and Bill wore a long black coat and a solemn collar, having been a clerk in holy orders for many years. But when I began to speak of the little tavern at Castell-y-Bwch there was a twinkle in Bill's eye, and at the mention of the chimes of Usk, we both laughed till we cried — and perhaps we did cry internally. But I said to Bill, "Now I am going to take you to the Café Royal; it's the best I can do for you. But I wish it were the Three Salmons at Usk!" — where, if I remember rightly, we had bread and cheese and a great deal of beer and hot brandy and water to follow.

But that was a great day. We had gone over hill and dale, through the depths of woods and over waste lands, finding footpaths in the most unsuspected places that we had never dreamed of. And I remember that these footpaths gave me a singular impression of travelling in time — backwards, not forwards, as in Mr. Wells's enchantment. For the track of feet was but barely marked, and seemed on the point to fade away altogether, and the stiles that we climbed were of old, old oak, whitened and riven with age, and the outlets of these paths were into deep, forgotten lanes where no one came. And if one passed a house, it was roofless and ruinous; its gable-wall standing grey, with fifteenth-century corbel stones. The garden wall was fallen into a heap of stones, and the fruit trees were dead or straggled into wildness. So it seemed to me that we had fallen on old ways that were not of our day at all, and no one, perhaps, had been there for fifty or a hundred years, and if we saw anyone it would not be a man of our time. Bill, I am convinced, thought nothing of all this; his talk was of B.N.C. and mad tricks and all the mirth in the world, and I warmed the chilled hands of my spirit at his gaiety, as I had longed to warm my bodily hands at the watchman's brazier, glowing red in the cold London street. So Bill and I came at last into Caerleon, having succeeded by much extraordinary wandering in making five miles into ten, and at Caerleon we drank old ale at the Hanbury Arms, which is a mediæval hostelry, close to the Roman tower by the river. And then nothing would satisfy us but to go to Usk by the old road; again, ten miles instead of five, but with our "short cut" imposed upon it, a good fifteen miles.

The way goes over the river; on the right are King Arthur's Round Table and the relics of the Roman city wall of Isca Silurum, as the Second Augustan Legion, garrisoned at Caerleon, called the place. Then through the village, still known in my days as Caerleon-ultra-pontem, and so into that most wonderful, enchanted, delicious road that winds under the hillside, under deep Wentwood, above the solemn curves and esses of the river. We passed Bulmore, which does not mean a moor of bulls, but pwll mawr, the great pool, of the Usk river. It is a farmhouse now, but once a retired officer of the 2nd Augustan had his villa here, and his graveyard also: and here, I think, in the orchard, as they were planting some young trees, they found the stone inscribed: Ave, Julia, carissima conjux; in æternum vale. Hail, Julia, dearest wife; farewell for ever.

And here, to the best of my belief, Bill was telling me how an undergraduate friend of his at B.N.C., a schoolfellow of mine, found himself under the painful necessity of screwing up the Dean in his rooms; the screws employed being coffin-screws, headless, that is, and not to be extracted without enormous pains.

We went on our way by the river, and passed under Kemeys, a noble grey old house, with mullioned windows and Elizabethan chimneys. There is such a peace about this place, such a sweetness from the wood, such a refreshment from the water, so grave a repose upon it, that I translated to Kemeys one of my heroes, a clerk in Shepherd’s Bush. This clerk had found out that all the bustle and activity of modern life are delusions and wild errors, and his reward was to be that he should end his days at Kemeys, sheltered from all turmoil and vanity, garnered from the evil world.

The peace of Kemeys was the peace of all the valley of the Usk, and what balms it exhibited to my spirit only those can know who have been bred in such places, and have experienced the jar and dust and racket of some great town, and then have returned to the old groves.

My friend Bill and I went swinging along the winding lane beside the winding river, and as we went the sound of pouring waters sang to us. For now the over-runnings of the wells of Wentwood came from the hill as rivulets, and about each stream its twisted thicket grew, accompanying it all down the steep, to the river below. We passed little Kemeys church, watching above the pools of the Usk, and then on the hillside, almost in the shadow of the forest, was Bartholly, that solitary house which awed me for years, so that I made my awe into a tale. And here was Newbridge, crossing a river that had now ceased to be tidal and yellow, and had become glassy clear, and so on northward, and it seemed into silences and solitudes that grew ever deeper and more solemn, more evidently declaring the great art-magic of God that has made all the world. The day drew on, the sun sank below wild unknown hills — neither of us had ever been this way before — and the green world was dim for a while, and then was lighted up with the red flames of the afterglow. The evening redness appeared, and in those fires the ash tree became of immortal growth, the round hills rose above no earthly land, the winding river was a faery stream. Then, veil upon veil rising from the level, rising from the fountains in the wood, mists closing in upon us.

My friend Bill said we should never get to Usk at this rate; he felt sure that there must be a short cut across the fields. So we took the first stile that appeared and set out over country that was utterly unknown to us; and the marvel was that we ever got to Usk at all — or to anywhere for the matter of that. I have a confused recollection of walking for hours in a gathering darkness, through jungles and brakes of dark wood, climbing hills that rose fantastic as out of dreamland, going down into dusky valleys where white mist rose icy from the courses of the brooks, threading an uncertain way through quaking marshland, and the regions of the distance as vague as shapes of smoke.

The bells were ringing nine when we came out of this dim world into Usk, and to the lights and cheerfulness of the Three Salmons, to ale and to laughter. There was a wonderful old fellow, a Water Bailiff, making the mirth of that cheerful, ancient parlour; and he told us of the tricks he had played on poachers and fishermen till we roared again. He was a fellow of strange disguises; if one of his stories were to be believed he had caught the most famous salmon poacher of the Usk by assuming the gait and utterance of a calf seeking for its mother at midnight. The tale may have been true; it was certainly an excellent entertainment.

Such was one of our days; and again we would go wandering over the mountains to west and to northward; climbing up into great high wild places of yellow gorse and grey limestone rocks, stretching and mounting onward and still beyond, so that one said in one’s heart “for ever and ever. Amen.” High up there; the sunlight on that golden gorse, on the yellow lichens that encrusted the rocks ringed in old Druid circles, the great sweet wind that blew there, the heart of youth that rejoiced there, all the dear shining land of Gwent far below us, glorious; it is all an old song.

And there was a day on which we mounted over Mynydd Maen and came down into a valley in the very heart of the mountains, and walked there all the day, and in the evening returned again over the mountain at the southern end, winding under Twyn Barlwm as the twilight fell. It is only music, I think, that could image the wonder of the red sky over the faery dome, and the gathering dusk of the night as it fell on the rocks of that high land, on the streams rushing vehemently down into the darkness of the valley, on the lower woods, on the white farms, gleaming and then vanishing away. Only by music, if at all, can such things be expressed, since they are ineffable; not to be uttered in any literal or logical speech of men. And if one looks a little more closely into the nature of things it will become pretty plain, I think, that all that really matters and really exists is ineffable; that both the world without us — the tree and the brook and the hill — and the world within us do perpetually and necessarily transcend all our powers of utterance, whether to ourselves or to others. Night and day, sunrise and moonrise, and the noble assemblage of the stars, are continually exhibited to us, and we are forced to confess that not for one moment can we proclaim these appearances adequately. We stammer confusedly about them, much as a savage who had been taken through the National Gallery might stammer a few broken sentences, the applicability of which would be more or less dubious. “Woman — very bright round head,” might be the Blackfellow’s “description” of a famous Madonna; and a Turner would be summed up as “plenty clouds — one big tree.” And in like manner we, confronted, not only with things remote and majestic, but with things familiar and near at hand, stutter a few lame sentences, endeavouring to describe what we have seen. And thus all literature can be but an approximation to the truth; not the “truth” of science, for that is a figment of the brain, a non-existent monster, like dragons, griffins, and basilisks; but to that truth which Keats perceived to be identical with beauty. And it is further evident that even this approximation to the truth of things is a matter of the utmost difficulty and not very far from a miracle, inasmuch as in a generation of men there are only two or three who achieve it, who in consequence are hailed as men of the highest genius.

Of course, there are persons for whom “truth” implies “even gilt-edged securities slumped heavily,” or some such statement. To them, I tender my sincere apologies.

The proof-sheets of my book began to appear early in that autumn of ‘84; they made me rapturous reading. And while I was correcting them, with a vast sense of the importance and dignity of the task, Davenport, the publisher, was writing to me, asking if I had any ideas for new books, and throwing out suggestions of his own.

Now this was very pleasant, for it all tended to persuade me, in spite of any doubts and fears of mine, that I was really a literary man. I would read Davenport’s letters again and again, and deliberate gravely with myself over the answering of them; I enjoyed this very much indeed. But the correspondence led to no practical result; because I could not then — or ever — perform the Indian mango trick. The expert conjurers of the East, as is well known — in magazine fiction — will put a seed into a flower pot, cover up for a second or two, and lo! there is a little plant. Again the concealment; the plant has grown, and so forth, till within the space of five minutes you can gather ripe mangoes from the tree that you saw sown. This is the mango trick of fiction; that of fact, as I have seen it, is about the dreariest and most ineffective piece of conjuring imaginable. But, as I say, I could never imitate those fabled Orientals. If Mr. Murray and Mr. Longman were to jostle one another on my doorstep, clamouring for a masterpiece, and offering Arabian terms, it would make no difference; if I had no book within me, I should not be able to produce one on demand. In practice, I have found that I take about ten years to grow these things; though I have one in my mind now that was first thought of in 1898-99 and is not yet begun.

So Mr. Davenport’s letters produced no literature, interesting though they were; and I must say that a less sluggish mind would have found them stimulating in a high degree. But the literary publisher struck on cold iron; he suggested, I remember, a volume of scathing criticism— “like Mozley’s Essays” — as likely to receive his most favourable attention. But, really, I could not think of anybody that I particularly wanted to scathe — now, perhaps, I could oblige a publisher in search of anathemas and Ernulphus curses — and I had not read Mozley, nor have I read him to this day. Then I, on my side, suggested a book to be called “A Quiet Life,” this being, in fact, a description of the life that I was then gratefully and gladly leading. I sent a specimen chapter, and so far as I remember Davenport counselled me to defer the writing of that sort of book till I was eighty or thereabouts. I daresay he was right. Then my half-dozen copies of "The Anatomy of Tankards" reached me; and I believe that as soon as I saw the book printed and complete in its (vegetable) vellum boards I began to be ashamed of it. I think that this was hard lines, but the trick has been played on me again and again; and I do believe that a moderate, not excessive, dose of the good conceit of oneself is one of the chiefest boons that parents should beg from fairy godmothers for their offspring. For life is necessarily full of such buffetings and duckings, such kicks and blows and pummellings, that balms and elixirs and medicaments of healing are most urgently indicated, and there is nothing equal to this same rectified spirit of conceit. It may tend to make a man an ass, but it is better — or more agreeable, anyhow — to be an ass than to be miserable.

Then came the reviews, and they did me some good, for, as far as I remember them, they were kindly and indulgent. I think the critic of the "St. James's Gazette," then in its glory under the editorship of Greenwood, spoke of "this witty and humorous book," while he said, with absolute justice, that I had ruined the popularity of my parodies by their prolixity. Then the publisher, despairing, I suppose, of getting any ideas out of me, produced a notion of his own. He sent me three or four French texts of the "Heptameron," and bade me render it into the best English that I had within me; and so I did forthwith, for the sum of twenty pounds sterling. I wrote every night when the house was still, and every day I carried the roll of copy down the lane to meet the postman on his way to Caerleon-on-Usk.

And so my story has come round full circle. In the first of these chapters I told how the kindly speaker at the Persian Club, praising my version of the French classic, transported me in an instant from that shining banqueting hall in the heart of London, over the bridge of thirty years, into the shadows of the deep lane. Again it was the autumn evening, and the November twilight was passing into the gloom of night. There was a white ghost of the day in the sky far down in the west; but the bare woods were darkening under the leaden clouds; the familiar country grew into a wild land.

And I, with time to spare, walk slowly, meditatively down the hill, holding my manuscript, hoping that the day's portion has been well done. As I come to the stile there sounds faint through the rising of the melancholy night wind the note of the postman’s horn. He has climbed the steep road that leads from Llandegveth village and is now two or three fields away.

It grows very dark; the waiting figure by the stile vanishes into the gloom. I can see it no more.
